I. Labor law. Faithful to the Jewish tradition (Gen 2:15; Ex 20:9; Sir 38:29-35; Pirke Aboth 2,2) and the New Testament (Mt 10:10; Mk 6:3; 13:1f.; 24:45-51; 1 Cor 4:12; 1 Th 2:9; 2 Th 3:10-12; Eph 4:20), the Fathers rehabilitate labor in all its forms and recall the obligation of it. For them, labor is a divine institution written into the work of creation. "Man"—Irenaeus writes—"received from God his hands to maintain and to work. Whoever participates in the art and wisdom of God, participates also in his power" (Adv. haer. V, 3,2). Through their labor, humans continue in some way the labor of God; like God, they must use wisdom, strength and beauty. The greater part of the Fathers are even clearer in underlining that labor allows humans to assure their own sustenance and that of their families; and that it contributes to the prosperity of the state (Arist., Apol. 15; Tertull., Apol. 42,1-2; Clem. Alex., Strom. I, 25-26). *Augustine, in turn, sketches an ethics of labor: labor is a commandment of God; every person, therefore, physically sound, must see to his or her own maintenance with his own work. Even the monk cannot escape this duty with the pretext of needing to attend to contemplation (De opere monachorum, 1,2; 16,9). A summary apologetic underlines, with a certain redundance, the esteem which the first Christians, on the example of Jesus and Paul, had for manual labor, condemning all forms of laziness and parasitism, and opposing, in favor of labor, the equivocal vagabondage of certain pagan intellectuals. It is not, though, correct to advance a clear contrast between the attitude of the Fathers and that of the Greco-Roman world, declaring the latter voluntarily hostile to manual labor and entrusting it entirely to slaves. The criticisms of manual labor raised by Xenophon, Isocrates and Cicero seem like a rather banal literary topos; in fact, these same authors are favorable to the labor of the fields, which fortifies the body and spirit, and is indispensable to the good of humanity. On the other hand, it is good to mention that Classical Antiquity never thought that manual labor was in itself degrading, but manual activity was condemned in its more humiliating forms in the measure to which it ruins the body, subjecting it to intolerable weights, enervates the spirit, and leaves no time for friendship, family life and social life. Antiquity did this in order that the true nature of "servile" labor might emerge more clearly. In the same way it is not correct to try to find in the Fathers clarifications on the legal or financial conditions of the ancient economy, on the mechanisms of production and exchange. The Fathers do not have a "social doctrine"; they do not provide models applicable in themselves to the world of labor or capable of providing a Christian criterion for economic life. Rather, they look principally to the moral aspect of labor and of the professions. They do not minimize the painful character of labor (Iren., Adv. haer. V, 33,2; Clem. Alex., Protr. 115,1), but strongly underline its irreplaceable dignity and greatness; with their labor, humans participate in the work of the Creator, and imprint in this way a personal seal on their creations; they become aware, in the completed work, of their qualities, of their savoir faire and of the talents which are their own. *Clement of Rome describes the satisfaction of the worker who has done his or her work well (1 Clem. 34,1); the Christian epitaphs exalt the merits of good workers. And nonetheless, labor is not the whole of humanity. It is not a goal in itself, but a means which people must know how to use well (Hermas, Vis. III, 6,5-7; Mand. X, 1,1-4).

II. Christians and trades. The majority of the Christians of the pre-Nicene era belonged to modest classes; among them were numerous slaves. Farmers or artisans, they lived from the fruit of their labor, continuing to carry out their trades from before their conversion (1 Cor 7:20). *Tertullian attests that the converts came from the most varied professions: soldiers and sailors, farmers and merchants (Apol. 42,2-3; see also To Diognetus 5,4; Orig., C. Cels. I, 29; III, 56-58). Christians were forbidden only the trades which were in direct relationship with idolatry, violence and immorality. For this reason, the Apostolic Tradition refuses baptism to the sculptors and builders of idols, to gladiators, to charioteers and to actors. The world of theater and dance fell under the same reprobation. It goes without saying that the world of prostitution and everything that belonged to it were excluded from Christianity. Tertullian dedicated an entire treatise, De corona, to the art of arms, which he claims Christians should not exercise. His extreme position has never been accepted by the authority of the church.

III. Employers and workers. The Fathers accept the social situation of their time; they do not contest the inequality which exists between the worker who needs a salary to live and the employer who offers work. They limit themselves to moral considerations, without great originality of thought; sometimes, however, they also express, with brutally energetic tones, the principles which should guide this relationship. *Clement of Alexandria, citing Dt 24:15, recalls that "the Scripture teaches that it is necessary to pay on the same day the agreed salary" (Strom. II, 85,1). The Sibylline Oracles repeat the invective of James against owners who cheat workers of their salary, threatening them with the worst punishments, "Since the straits of the harvesters have reached the ears of the God of Hosts." And Clement adds: "The unjust are nourished for the day of slaughter" (II, 30,74). The Fathers leave the care for fixing the just salary to the conscience of the employers and to their fear of the judgment of God. They limit themselves also to urging workers to fulfill their duty in the best way, without laziness and without negligence.

A.T. Geoghegan, The Attitude Towards Labor in Early Christianity and Ancient Culture, Washington, D.C. 1945; H. Holzapfel, Die sittliche Wertung der körperlichen Arbeit im christlichen Altertum, Würzburg 1941; W. Bienert, Die Arbeit nach der Bibel, Stuttgart 1954; Ch. Munier, L'Église dans l'Empire romain (IIe-IIIe s.), Paris 1979, 83-88; RAC 1, 585-590; TWNT 2, 645-647 (TDNT 2, 643-652); S. Felici (ed.), Spiritualità del lavoro nella catechesi dei Padri del III-IV sec., Biblioteca di Scienze Religiose 75, Rome 1986; B. Van den Hoven, Work in Ancient and Medieval Thought: Ancient Philosophers, Medieval Monks and Theologians and Their Concept of Work, Occupations and Theology, Amsterdam 1996; A. Quacquarelli, L'educazione al lavoro. Dall'antica comunità cristiana al monachesimo primitivo, in Res christiana: temi interdisciplinari di patrologia, ed. A. Quacquarelli, Rome 1999, 9-22.

Ch. Munier - G. Pilara

LACTANTIUS (ca. 260–ca. 330). The principal source concerning the life and works of Lucius Caecilius (Caelius, acc. to other witnesses of the MS tradition of his works) Firmianus Lactantius is *Jerome (Vir. ill. 80): "Firmianus, also called Lactantius, disciple of Arnobius, taught rhetoric at Nicomedia, where he had been called under the emperor Diocletian, together with the grammarian Flavius whose books on medicine written in verse survive; due to the scarcity of pupils, since the city was of Greek speech, he dedicated himself to the activity as a writer. From him we have a Symposium, which he wrote as a young man in Africa, and a Hodoeporicon [i.e., the description of a journey] from Africa to Nicomedia written in verses and another book titled Grammaticus; furthermore, the wonderful book on the wrath of God, the seven books against the pagans and the epitome of the same work, whose text has reached us without the first part, two books dedicated to Asclepiades, a book on the persecution, four books of letters to Probus, two books of letters to Severus, two books of letters to his disciple Demetrianus and the book on the divine work or on the creation of humanity dedicated to the same disciple. In extreme old age he was in *Gaul the teacher of the Caesar Crispus, the son of Constantine, who was later killed by his father." He was probably born around 260 in Proconsular *Africa, where Jerome makes him the disciple of the rhetor *Arnobius of Sicca (see also Ep. 70,5). He converted to Christianity perhaps in *Bithynia, as it seems from some elements of his theological culture. At Nicomedia he almost certainly knew *Constantine, a forced guest at the court of *Diocletian. He was constrained to abandon the city together with his profession of rhetor during the persecution of Diocletian. After Constantine had become emperor, he was called to *Trier in Gaul as preceptor of Crispus and perhaps also as counselor to the emperor, whose letters and laws written in that time seem to be under the influence of Lactantian language and thought.

We do not know, however, how long he remained in Gaul, nor the date of his death, to be located perhaps at Trier around 330. Of the many works listed by Jerome, extant are the De opificio Dei, the Divinae institutiones, the De ira Dei and the De mortibus persecutorum, which almost certainly should be identified with the De persecutione cited in the De viris illustribus. Also attributed to Lactantius, starting from Gregory of Tours (De cursu stell. 12), are the 85 elegiac distichs of the poem De Ave Phoenice. In the treatise De opificio Dei the beauty and the perfect functionality of the human body are described, exalting, in polemic with the Epicureans who denied it, the existence of divine Providence. In the prologue and epilogue there are allusions to the persecution of Diocletian, by which it seems that the little work was written between 303 and 305. It was precisely during the raging of the persecution, as he himself declares (Div. inst. V, 2,2), that he conceived the project of a great apologetic work, the Divinae institutiones, in defense of Christianity, a project which he realized between 306 and 313, but not in a definitive form, as is evident from some traces of reelaboration; it was probably finished during his stay at the court of Constantine in Gaul. The work is structured in seven books: (1) De falsa religione, (2) De origine erroris, (3) De falsa sapientia philosophorum, (4) De vera sapientia et religione, (5) De iustitia, (6) De vero cultu, (7) De vita beata. He speaks about divine wrath in a specific work, the De ira Dei, announced in the Divinae institutiones (II, 17,4-5), to demonstrate, in polemic perhaps with his master Arnobius and certainly against the *Stoics, who wanted a purely benevolent Providence, and against the Epicureans, who maintained the indifference of any eventual existing divinities, that God is moved by sentiments of benevolence toward the just and wrath toward sinners. At the court of Constantine, with the intention of political-religious propaganda against Licinius, probably between 318 and 321, Lactantius composed the De mortibus persecutorum, to testify to future generations the avenging justice of God, who had punished the principal persecutors of the Christians. In all likelihood he composed the Epitome of the Divinae institutiones after the De mortibus persecutorum, summarizing its principal themes, but then also adapting it to the new political-religious reality which had come into existence under Constantine.

The merits and the limits of Lactantius as a Christian writer and thinker, of Ciceronian mold, have been expressed fleetingly by Jerome both in his letter to *Paulinus (Ep. 58,10): "Oh, if Lactantius, almost a river of Ciceronian eloquence, had been able to maintain our cause with the same facility with which he overturned that of our adversaries!" and in his letter to Magnus (Ep. 70,5): "Arnobius published seven books against the pagans, as did his disciple Lactantius, who also composed two works, on the wrath and the creative work of God, in which you will find, if you would read them, an epitome of the dialogues of Cicero." Lactantius himself, in the introduction to the Divinae institutiones, declares that he wishes to illustrate the Christian truth with the splendor of eloquence, since elegance and beauty of expression attract readers and move their emotions, thus making acceptance of the truth easier (Div. inst. I, 1,7-10; cf. III, 1,1-2; V, 1,9.11; V, 4,1-2). In Lactantius's work the philosophical-religious eclecticism joins or juxtaposes conceptions of Platonic, Stoic, Pythagorean origin with elements of the Jewish-Christian tradition. A conception results which could be accused of theological, anthropological and cosmological dualism (Div. inst. II, 8.9.12), but Lactantius expressly affirms that the first cause of the cosmic conflict between light and darkness, between life and death, between good and evil, is the very creative will of God who wanted two antagonistic spirits, one the principle of good, the other the principle of evil. A clear limit of the Lactantian theology is, however, the identification of the generation of the Word with the process of divine "spiration," so that he does not distinguish the Word, firstborn spirit of the Father, from the *Holy Spirit, as a third autonomous person of the trinitarian mystery. Reserve should also be held regarding his description of the millenarian kingdom of Christ on earth. But despite the limits both of his theological thought and stylistic and linguistic originality, sacrificed to the intentional imitation of Cicero, he has great importance in the history of Western literature and culture, having been the first Christian thinker to attempt a systematic exposition of his faith, addressing himself to the cultivated classes of the Roman world, not renouncing its cultural and literary tradition, rather exerting himself to join it with the moral and religious message of Christianity. From a purely historical-literary point of view he was the first Christian writer in Latin who attempted to illuminate the Christian teaching, promoted by him as the true philosophy and the true wisdom, with the splendor of eloquence and classical culture. Without doubt Lactantian eloquence is exceptionally vibrant and overwhelming, but there are times in which it becomes impassioned and emotional, ironic and biting, dramatic and incisive. He excels among Christian writers for purity of language and classical elocution, while accepting vocabulary together with semantic and syntactic links particular to postclassical Latin literature or borrowed from the sermo cottidianus, as well as suggestions from Christian, biblical and liturgical language.

CPL 85-92; PL 6-7; CSEL 19 (S. Brandt, 1890); 27 (S. Brandt - G. Laubmann, 1897); M.C. Fitz-Patrick, Lactantius' De ave phoenice, Philadelphia 1933; E.H. Blakeney, Lactantius' Epitome of the Divine Institutes, London 1950; J. Moreau, Lactance. De la mort des persécuteurs, III, Paris 1954 (SC 39); H. Kraft - A. Wlosok, Lactantius. De ira Dei. Vom Zorne Gottes, Darmstadt 1957; A. Wlosok, Laktanz und die philosophische Gnosis, Heidelberg 1960; H. Hross, Lactantius. Divinae Institutiones. Fünftes Buch, Munich 1963; F. Corsaro, Lucii Caecilii Firmiani Lactantii De mortibus persecutorum, Catania 1970; V. Loi, Lat- tanzio nella storia del linguaggio e del pensiero teologico preniceno, Zürich 1970 (Bibliotheca Theologica Salesiana, Ser. I, n. 5); E. Heck, Die dualistischen Zusätze und die Kaiseranreden bei Lactantius, Heidelberg 1972; P. Monat, Lactance. Institutions Divines. Livre V, Paris 1973 (SC 204-205); M. Perrin, Lactance. L'ouvrage du Dieu créateur, I-II, Paris 1974 (SC 213-214); Id., L'homme antique et chrétien. L'anthropologie de Lactance (250-325), Paris 1981; E. Lamirande, Lactance: DSp IX (Paris 1976), col. 48-59; M. Perrin (ed.), Lactance et son temps. Recherches actuelles, Paris 1978; P. Monat, Lactance et la Bible, Paris 1982; Id., Institutiones divines, livre I, Paris 1986 (SC 326), livre II, Paris 1987 (SC 337); Chr. Ingremeau, La colère de Dieu, Paris 1982 (SC 289); R. Teja, Sobre la muerte de los perseguidores, Madrid 1982; H. Kraft - A. Wlasok, Vom Zorne Gottes, Darmstadt 41983; J.L. Creed, De mortibus persecutorum, Oxford 1984; Cetedoc, Thesaurus Lactantii (Concordanze), Turnhout 1998; Autour de Lactance, Hommage à P. Monat, éds. J.-Y. Guillaumin - S. Ratti, Besançon 2003.

V. Loi - B. Amata

LAIDCENN (or Laidcenn mac Buith Bannaig) (d. 661). A clever interpreter of the Scripture, known for this reason also as sapiens or sanctus confessor, he was a monk of Cluain Ferta Mo-Lua (Clonfert-Mulloe) and died in 661. He wrote the Egloga, which constitutes a sort of summary of the Moralia in Iob of *Gregory the Great, and part of the MS tradition attributes the Lorica to him, otherwise held to be the work of *Gildas, a prayer which invites every creature (cherubim, seraphim, patriarchs, prophets, apostles, martyrs, virgins, confessors etc.) to unite with Christ to build a crown which will be able to protect every single part of the body from the evil one, focusing attention on private prayer and presupposing a certain knowledge of the medical and magical literature of antiquity.

Egloga: CPL 1716; M. Adriaen (ed.), CCL 145, Turnhout 1969; L. Gougaud, Le témoignage des manuscrits sur l'oeuvre du moine Lathcen: Revue Celtique 30 (1909) 37-46; R. Wasselynck, Les compilations des Moralia in Job du VII[e] au XII[e] siècle: RTAM 29 (1962) 5-32; C.D. Wright, Biblical Commentaries—Old and New Testaments, in Sources of Anglosaxon Literary Culture: A Trial Version, ed. F.M. Biggs - T.D. Holl - P.E. Szarmach, Binghamton 1990, 90-123.

Lorica: CPL 1323; J.H.G. Grattan - C. Singer, Anglo-Saxon Magic and Medicine, Oxford 1952, 130-147; PLS 4, 1260-1261; L. Gougaud, Études sur les loricae celtiques: BALAC 1 (1911) 265-281 and 2 (1912) 33-41, 101-127; M. Esposito, The Lorica of Lathcen: JTS 30 (1929) 289-291; G.S. Mac Eoin, Invocation of the Forces of Nature in the Loricae: Studia Hibernica 2 (1962) 212-217; M.W. Herren, The Authorship, Date of Composition and Provenance of the So-Called Lorica Gildae: Ériu 24 (1973) 35-51.

P. Marone

LAMB. The importance of the term lamb, associated with that of the goat and the sheep, is immense in Christian literature, both due to the affection inspired by the little lamb and what that expresses, and for the other economic, social and political dimensions which produced a plurality of meanings in various cultural settings, which later came together, almost universally, in the language of Christian religious worship.

Patristic *exegesis is based on the meaning and original symbolism of the Hebrew term kebes ("lamb"), which is in contrast with tso'n ("sheep or small livestock"). The Greek term ἀμνός (amnos, Lat. agnus) indicates a young sheep, sometimes a yearling, or an animal for the sacrifice; ἀρέν (aren, Lat. ovis, aries) also indicates a lamb to be slaughtered, while pathetic overtones attach to the diminutive ἀρνίον (arnion, Lat. agnellus), "little lamb"; πρόβατον (probaton, Lat. pecus, ovis, quadrupes animal domesticum), instead, is generic, and can indicate a single sheep or domestic livestock.

All this semantic variety comes together in the christological designation of Jesus as the Lamb, the Son of God. Whereas the figure of the sheep and its independence with respect to the flock (see Mt 18:12-14; Lk 15:4-7) is preferred in *gnostic imagery, among Christian authors the lamb always preserves a particular christological aspect of tenderness, and enters into (1) the symbolism of suffering, as with the lamb led to the slaughter; (2) eschatological symbolism, as with the lamb on mount Zion; (3) the deprecatory, sacrificial and expiatory dimension, as with the lamb who bears and takes away sin; (4) the paschal typology, as the summation, synthesis and exaltation of the pneumatic (the spiritual pastures), christological (Christ the Lamb) and theological (God the Shepherd) aspects of the salvific event, brought to fulfillment in Christ.

In the biblical tradition of the priestly writings, the lamb is the preferred sacrificial victim, whether in the form of a burnt offering or a simple offering (Lev 9:3; Num 15:5), or in the purification of the people or of individuals (see Lev 14:10).

Jesus, the true Lamb (Jn 1:29, 36; Acts 8:32; 1 Pet 1:19), the Lamb of God, is the counterpart of the unnamed servant of God who patiently suffers like a lamb led to the slaughter and is silent before his shearers (Is 53:7; cf. Acts 8:32-35). Taking into account the fact that the Aramaic talia can mean both lamb and young man or servant (puer), it is natural to see in Jesus the perfectly unitary semantic realization of the lamb and of the servant of God, persecuted like Jeremiah (Jer 11,19) and killed for the expiation of the sins of his people.

The arnion of the Apocalypse is the Lord worthy of adoration, the one who opens the seals, but also the lamb slain, who has redeemed people of every race with his own blood (Rev 5:9-10). He is the wrathful lamb (Rev 6:16), but also the lamb who celebrates the wedding feast. This heavenly lamb is the same as the paschal lamb (Rev 5:9-10), simultaneously sacrificed and triumphant. He is the lamb in his redemptive death, but the victorious lion in the liberation of the people of God from the powers of evil (Rev 5:5-6; 12:11).

The Christian writers are extremely faithful to the divine Word, concentrating primarily on the christological and eschatological symbolism of the lamb (see Ex 12:3-13 and 1 Cor 5:7), on its typologies of sacrifice and atonement (cf. Is 53:7), particularly redemptive and universal (Jn 1:29 and Rev 5:8), relating the biblical data in vivid messianic typologies.

Beginning with the philosopher and apologist Justin, a long series of authors consider the lamb and the banquet of the exodus as the prefiguration of the immolation of the flesh of the paschal lamb, and of the eucharistic banquet of Christ (Just., Dial, 40; Melito, Peri Pascha 5; 67; 71; ps.-Hippolytus, In Sanctum Pascha 2, 20; 32; 40; Origen, Hom. 13 in Lk; Peri Pascha, 9: see Nautin, SCL 36, 84, n. 1; Tertullian, Adv. Iud. 10,18; Cyprian, Ep. 63, 12, 2; Lactantius, Div. Inst. IV, 26, 36-39; Gaudentius, Tract. III, 21; Isidore of Pelusium, Ep. IV, 162; Cyril Alex., In Io. 7; Gregory Ill., Tract. IX; Passio Andreae 6; Gelasius Cyz., Hist. Eccl. II, 31, 6). The contexts are various, but the statements are repeated like a refrain providing the cadence for Christ's triumphal procession. "How could there have been reconciliation between God and the human race if the mediator between God and humanity had not taken upon himself the debt of all? . . . Among all people, only in our Lord Jesus Christ, the true spotless lamb, have all been crucified, all put to death, all buried and all also risen" (Leo the Great, Letter to the Emperor Leo, 4-5).

Just as the blood of the lamb saved the Jews, so the blood of Christ will save humanity (Cyprian, Ad Demetr. 22; Lactantius, Div. Inst. IV, 26, 41-42; Gaudentius, Tract. VI, 11; Gregory Ill., Tract. IX). He is the true sacrificial lamb, offered for the sins of the world (1 Pet 1:19; Melito, frg. in Gen.; Clement Alex., Paedag. 1, 51; frg. of the Chron. Pasc. 14-15: GCS III, 216,20–217,7; Origen, In Io. VI, 51-52; Epiphanius, Haer. 69; Cyril Jer., Catech. 19,3; Theodore Mops., Io. 1, 29). Lamb of God is his name par excellence (see Clem. Alex., Paed. 1. 5, 24, 4; Origen, Com. in Io. VI, 52; Gaudentius, Tract. II, 14.17; ps.-Ambrose, Hymn 62).

"We have therefore become, in the blood of our redeemer, the people of his conquest, just as the people of Israel was once rescued from Egypt through the blood of the lamb" (Bede, Comm. 1 Pet, 2).

"The mystery of Easter is new and old, timeless and in time, corruptible and incorruptible, mortal and immortal. Old acc. to the law, but new acc. to the Word; in time acc. to the figure, eternal acc. to grace. Corruptible through the slaying of the lamb, incorruptible through the life of the Lord; mortal by his burial in the earth, immortal by his resurrection from the dead. The law is old, but the Word is new; the figure is in time, grace in eternity. The lamb is corruptible, the Lord incorruptible: sacrificed as a lamb, he was raised as God. Because 'like a sheep he was led to the slaughter' [Is 53:7], but he was not a sheep; 'like a silent lamb' (Acts 8:32), but he was not a lamb. . . . I—he says—am the Christ. All of you, therefore, come, families of humanity covered with sin, and receive the forgiveness of sins. Because I am your forgiveness, I the Easter of salvation, I the lamb sacrificed for you. I am your redemption, your life, your resurrection" (Melito of Sardis, Peri Pascha, 2-6; 39-40;100-103).

The liturgy, in proclaiming Christ the true paschal lamb (preface of the Mass of Easter), echoes a very ancient tradition going back to the very origins of Christianity and to the preaching of Paul, who exhorts the faithful of Corinth to live as unleavened bread in sincerity and truth, because our paschal lamb, Christ, has been sacrificed (1 Cor 5:7).

The symbolism of the lamb, therefore, also had great importance in the catacombs and in the first places where Christians were able to publicly profess their religion.

In basilicas after *Constantine, the lamb polarizes the visible dimension of the trinitarian and ecclesial mystery: cross and lamb indicate the victim; purple background and palm branches indicate the triumph (Paul. Nola, Lett. 32,10). The divine lamb is sometimes on a mountain from which flow the four rivers of Eden—the holy evangelists, with twelve sheep, the apostles—arranged symmetrically, coming out of Jerusalem and Bethlehem: i.e., from the holy city, seat of the holy temple, where the paschal lamb was sacrificed, and from the city made holy by the birth of the Lamb, the Son of God.

R. Cantalamessa, L'omelia "In S. Pascha" dello Ps.-Ippolito di Roma, Milan 1967, 306-312; V. Loi, La tipologia dell'agnello pasquale e l'attesa escatologica in età patristica, in Fons vivus, Misc. Lit. Don Eusebio Maria Vismara, Rome 1971, 125-142; J. Jeremias, ἀμνός: TWNT 1, 342-44 (TDNT 1, 338-341); Lampe, ἀμνός, 89-90; M.P. Ciccarese (ed.), Animali simbolici. Alle origini del Bestiario cristiano. I, EDB 2002.

V. Loi - B. Amata

LAMBAESIS (Lambaesis, in Numidia, today Tazoult, in Algeria). This city was situated on the NW slope of the Aurès Mountains, which divide the fertile plateau from the Sahara Desert, where one of the few passes toward the S could be controlled. Born as a military fortress in AD 81, it became the seat of the general quarter (Principia) of the III Legio Augusta from 115–120, and of the legatus, who commanded a vast territory, which included the S of Numidia as far as Fezzan. *Hadrian passed in review in 128, giving a speech 1 July, part of which survives on an inscription (CIL 8, 2532, 18042 = ILS 2487, 9133-9135). The legion, dissolved in 238 by Gordian III, was reconstituted in 253 by *Valerian. Near the encampment, about a km to the SW, at the time of *Marcus Aurelius, the city developed, under Latin law, becoming a colonia in the 2nd half of the 3rd c. Around 198 it became capital of the new province of Numidia (Africa Nova), which was substantially a military territory, and only later of the Numidia Militaris. Lambaesis in the course of the 4th c. lost importance to the advantage of *Constantine (Cirta) 140 km (87 mi) to the N, which became capital of the reunited province of Numidia in 314, and to the advantage of the neighboring Timgad (Thamugadi) as a military center. Christianity arrived in Lambaesis at the end of the 2nd c., and it became an episcopal see. The first known bishop is Privatus, deposed as a heretic by a council of 90 bishops at *Carthage during the time of *Donatus, bishop of Carthage, and of Pope *Fabian (Cypr., Ep. 59,10); he appealed to *Rome. He was succeeded by *Januarius, who participated in the Council of Carthage of 1 Sept 256 (Sent. Ep. 6), the last name known. Several letters of Cyprian are addressed to him. The bishop of Lambaesis appears as the head of the Numidian episcopate, and his prestige is due to the rank of the city and not the importance of the Christian community; at the beginning of the 4th c. the role of primate fell to the oldest of the province. As episcopal see it disappeared in the course of the 4th c., since its bishop was not present at the Conference of Carthage in 411 and was never mentioned. There is no information on struggles between Catholics and Donatists. We encounter martyrs at Lambaesis already at the beginning of the 3rd c., since *Tertullian praises the praeses legionis for having the Christians decapitated without torturing them (Scap. 4). Christians of other cities, too, were tried and condemned at Lambaesis, as the seat of the governor of the province, since only he could condemn anybody to death. The Passio Mariani, Iacobi et soc. (BHL 131) situates the death of these martyrs, coming from the area of Cirta, at Lambaesis in 259; the Acta Mammarii (BHL 5205-5206) say they were native to the city. The martyrs mentioned in this passion must doubtless be identified with those who appear in the Mart. hier. for 23 Feb. Some Christian vestiges still exist, while the remains of the ancient city are abundant.

DHGE 1, 752-753; PWK 12, 539-541; DACL 8, 1067-1075; Y. Le Bohec, La troisième légion Auguste, Paris 1989; Id., Tertullien, De corona, I: Carthage ou Lambèse?: REAug 38 (1992) 6-18; A. Ferlenga, Africa. Le città romane, Milan 1990, 52-57; I. Gui - N. Duval - J.-P. Caillet, Basiliques chrétiennes d'Afrique du Nord, Paris 1992, I, 145-147; Y. Duval, Lambèse chrétienne. La gloire et l'oubli, Paris 1995; F. Rakob, Die Bauphasen des Groma-Gebäudes im Legionslager von Lambaesis: Römische Mitteilungen 108 (2001) 7-40.

V. Saxer - A. Di Berardino

LAMBERT (d. 705). Bishop of Maastricht and evangelizer of the pagans of Toxandria from 670 to ca. 705, he is venerated as a martyr having been killed, acc. to a tradition (PL 160, 133), for having publicly accused Pippin II of adultery. From 675 to 682 he took refuge in the monastery of Stavelot to escape the persecutions and intrigues of the master of the palace and left there to be named bishop (Hrabanus Maurus, Martyrologium, PL 110, 1169). His successor, St. Hubert, built a basilica in his honor at Liège, where he transferred the episcopal see.

G. Kurth, Saint Lambert et son premier biographe: Annal. de l'Acad. d'Archéol. de Belgique 3 (1876) 5-112; W. Lampen: BS 7, 1079-1080 (with further bibl.).

F. Cocchini

LAMP. While during the entire late Roman period lamps (of clay, metal, glass) constituted the most widespread instrument for domestic illumination, after the 7th c. the archaeological evidence documents a near total disappearance of clay lamps, despite the sources continuing to mention them during the entire Byzantine period, in favor of the spread of candles (Kazhdan-Buras 1991). In the Christian environment the lamp, with its immediate practical functionality and its evident link with the symbolic values of light, has always played a fundamental role. Already in the early Middle Ages the Novella 67 of *Justinian (AD 538) recommended the creation of appropriate revenues for the maintenance of church illumination (Buras 1991). The church environment is the only one which offers the possibility of a morphological and functional analysis of its lamps, thanks to a careful study of the lists of gifts present in the Liber pontificalis among the information on the construction and decoration of the religious spaces. The internal order of the lists and certain details on the location of the lamps permit the identification of three different types of manufacture: the coronae, the canthara cereostata and the phara canthara. The coronae, the most important and precious, also called phara canthara, phara coronata, coronae pharales or canthara, are chandeliers generally of silver, sometimes of gold, in the form of cylindrical crowns with dolphin applications rising from the upper rim and to whose tails rings are soldered which support glass vials for the provision with oil. Placed in elevated positions, hanging or affixed, they were used for the illumination of the altar and of the confessio, therefore of the presbytery including not just the apse but also a good part of the central nave. The canthara cereostata, also called briefly cereostata or canthara, are in contrast lamps for candles, in general of brass or bronze, sometimes silver, and these too, hanging, are placed in the section of the central nave toward the entrance, to the two sides of the solea. The last category, the simplest and the most frequently neglected, that of the phara canthara or simply phara, is composed of hanging oil lamps, of a less-articulated workmanship compared to the first category and without dolphins. Rarely in silver and brass, generally of bronze, they were destined for the side aisles and were sometimes divided into unequal groups causing greater artificial illumination of the right aisle.

Among the special lamps a weighty and precious corona, generally of gold, also called corona quae est pharus cantharus (LP, I, 176, 182) fixed the spot of the mobile altar (to be placed probably not at the entrance of the apse but further ahead in the aisle), therefore illuminating the focal point of the space. At the feet of the altar there were in contrast two or more great candelabra of brass or bronze, heavy and not easily moved. In the 5th c., in contrast, the candelabras were of silver and much lighter, probably therefore placed on the altar as part of the liturgical furnishings.

In particular buildings such as oratories or baptisteries, despite the limited space, the same type of illumination was sought as was used in the basilicas around the altar or venerated place. A type of special lamp not present in the large basilical spaces is the lucerna aurea with ten or twelve flames, which in the 4th c. we find cited at Rome for the crypt of S. Lorenzo and for the baptistery near S. Agnese, and in the 5th c. for that of the Lateran (Geertman 1988).

Catalogs: M. Conticello de' Spagnolis - E. de Carolis, Le lucerne di bronzo, Vatican City 1986; M.T. Paleani, Le lucerne paleocristiane, Rome 1993; C. Pavolini, Le lucerne tardo-antiche di produzione africana, Rome 1993.

Studies: H. Geertman, Forze centrifughe e centripete nella Roma cristiana: Rend. PARA 59 (1986/1987) 63-91; H. Geertman, Liber Pontificalis come fonte archeologica: RivAC 63 (1987) 367-371; H. Geertman, L'illuminazione della basilica paleocristiana secondo il Liber Pontificalis: RivAC 64 (1988) 135-160; A. Kazhdan - L. Buras, Lighting in Everyday Life: ODB 2, 1228; L. Buras, Lighting, Ecclesiastical: ODB 2, 1227-1228; C. Pavolini, Lucerna. Mediterraneo occidentale: EAA, Secondo supplemento, III, Rome 1995, 454-464; A. Bonanni, Lampada e lampadario: EAM VII (1996) 558-569; D. Stiaffini, Il vetro nel Medioevo. Tecniche, strutture, manufatti, Rome 1999.

C. Loasses

LAMPSACUS, Council of. In this city on the Hellespont many *homoiousian bishops met in 364. After two months of discussion they invalidated the pro-*Arian formula of faith of *Rimini and the decisions of the Council of *Constantinople in 360. They affirmed again the validity of the *Antiochene formula of 341, integrated with the proposition of the homoiousios (= similar acc. to the ousia) to bring out the distinction of the divine *hypostases. They rehabilitated the bishops deposed at Constantinople and established that, in the case of controversy upon their return to their sees, regional councils would decide the matter.

Hfl-Lecl 1, 974-976; Simonetti 394; Palazzini 2, 224; R.P.C. Hanson, The Search for the Christian Doctrine of God, Edinburgh 1988.

M. Simonetti

LANGUAGES of the FATHERS. Greek was the universal language of the primitive Christian gospel proclamation (one thinks of the Letters of Paul and the other writings subsequently included in the canon) and of the most ancient Christian literature: from the so-called Apostolic Fathers to the *Apologists of the 2nd c. It was in fact the language of the Hellenized world, in which sphere it expressed not only Greek thought but also a part of both Jewish and Roman thought. By way of example, the evangelists Mark and John were Jews; *Clement and *Hermas lived in Rome; *Justin Martyr, from a pagan family, was born in *Palestine and then lived for a long time in the capital of the empire, where he died; *Tatian was Syrian; but, despite their very diverse geographical and cultural settings, all of them wrote in Greek. It was much the same among the pagans of the first centuries of the Common Era, as we see in the cases of Favorinus or Apuleius, *Suetonius or Aelian, and indeed the emperor *Marcus Aurelius, who in the 2nd half of the 2nd c. wrote his Meditations in Greek.

When we speak of Greek we mean, in reference to this period, the *κοινὴ διάλεκτος, that language spoken in the Hellenistic East and in the cosmopolitan cities of the West, which bore the stamp of ancient culture and above all the capacity and adaptability of a tool suited to express very complex and subtle ideas. With reference more specifically to the Greek used by Christians, we notice at the same time the influence of the Hellenized Jewish idiom, which made itself felt in the early church through the OT version of the LXX. Greek was therefore the oldest medium which the Christian community used across the whole empire in evangelization, liturgy and internal organization. Only beginning from the 2nd c. did the communities of the West gradually replace it with Latin.

The Greek Christian authors, representing such a large part of ancient Christian literature, perhaps do not constitute a homogeneous group precisely because the language they used was not at all unusual. The "classical" language of the Cappadocian Fathers is very different from the style of John Malalas or of the popular Greek of numerous monastic writings. We see no less difference between the Didache or Clement of Rome, with their biblical hue, and, e.g., *John Chrysostom or *Cyril of Alexandria (see A Patristic Greek Lexicon, ed. G.W.H. Lampe, pref., VI).

The first Christian Latin literature appears about halfway through the 2nd c. and takes the form of translations (as happened long before, outside the Judeo-Christian tradition). These translations were of the Sacred Scriptures. *Augustine of Hippo speaks of this (see De doctrina christ. II, 12,16), affirming that in the early times of the faith there were innumerable translators of the Bible from Greek to Latin (although his chronological reference primis fidei temporibus is very vague). From the Acta Scilitanorum, a document which recounts events that occurred in 180, we learn that the witnesses possessed libri et epistulae Pauli viri iusti (12), which, given what we may suppose was their basic level of education, would in all probability have been in translation. Between the 2nd and 3rd c. the works of *Tertullian indicate with relative certainty that he had Latin texts before him. Cyprian in the Testimonia (ca. 250) gives us a large number of fragments which show that by this time the Latin version of the entire Bible was both completed and widely known. At around this period, the Roman priest *Novatian made use of a European Vetus latina (itala) and an African one (afra).

The motive is clear in this case of making the sacred text accessible to those who were not capable of understanding it. The translated texts kept very close to the originals, and therefore introduced calques from the Greek, coining grammatical forms and new syntax which bear the mark of the biblical language, as well as introducing certain Hebrew idioms and lending new meanings to existing Latin words. Shortly before 200, true and proper Latin Christian literature was born, very late in respect to its Greek counterpart. (To explain this, scholars have proposed various hypotheses: the first Latin-speaking Christians were illitterati homines; their silence is to be attributed to an unwillingness to clothe in the form of paganism a system of thought so far from it; the necessity of evangelization being the sole measure, Christians began to use Latin so as to penetrate those milieus where no other language was known.) According to what we learn from *Jerome (see De vir. ill. 53; also see ibid., 34 and 42), the oldest Latin writer comes from the heart of the empire: *Victor, bishop of Rome between 189 and 198, African by origin, and with whom the process of Latinization of the church began, a process which would end only in the 4th c. with the introduction of the new language in the liturgy. After him Jerome mentions *Apollonius, senator and martyr under *Commodus (193–211), and then *Tertullian and *Minucius Felix (but modern scholars are not in agreement over giving chronological precedence to the first—who certainly worked between the last decade of the 2nd c. and the 1st two decades of the 3rd).

Here it is sufficient to note that, particularly during recent decades, there has been much study of the origin and characteristics of the Christian use of Latin, among others the research of the Swedish school led by Einar Löfstedt and the Dutch school begun by Jospeh Schrijnen and continued by Christine Mohrmann and her pupils. Notwithstanding the reservations advanced by authoritative critics, esp. in relation to the theories proposed by the last two scholars (about the genetic interpretation of Christian Latin, the historical-linguistic validity of the classification of words directly or indirectly influenced by the new religion, the syntactical evolution of "Christian Latin," etc.), the information we now have about Latin Christian texts is impressive, enormously increasing our knowledge of them and our capacity to interpret them.

The primitive Christian East used other languages besides Greek: Coptic, Syriac, Georgian, Armenian, Arabic and Ethiopian. (See the article of S.J. Voicu in the bibl.) Each of these languages has its own story and particular characteristics, which it is not possible to investigate or illustrate here.

It is sufficient to observe that Coptic Egyptian is a language in that there are elements of Ancient Egyptian (which was spoken in its last period from the 7th c. BC to the 5th c. AD). Ethiopian is part of a group of Semitic languages similar to S Arab dialects. Ge'ez, or classical Ethiopian, may be found in epigraphic sources of the 3rd c. and was used for a great many Christian writings.

Syriac, together with Mandaean and Jewish-Babylonian, is one of the three Eastern dialects which descend from Imperial Aramaic, the lingua franca spoken from the Nile to the Indus during the Achaemenid Empire. Although it was replaced by Greek at the time of the conquest of Alexander the Great, Syriac continued to develop and, more than that, at the end of the period of Hellenistic domination, reached a level of literary refinement which gave birth to a substantial body of works between the 2nd and 13th c. AD. With the Arab domination from the middle of the 7th c. AD, Syriac gradually disappeared as a commonly spoken language; we find it only in learned milieus, like Latin in the late medieval period in the West. As for Armenian, the creation of its alphabet, which has remained the same up to the present day, was initiated by Mesrop Mashtots (ca. 361–ca. 439), his work encouraged by the head of the Armenian Church of his time, Sahak the Great (350–438), and by the Arsacid king Vramshapuh. The Armenians were able in this way to know the Bible better, and to take part in the liturgical rites with greater cognizance. This occurred 400 years before Methodius and Cyril accomplished the same work for the Slavs. The vernacular was thus introduced into all aspects of the life of the Armenian Christian community.

The Georgian language, which is found after AD 450, belongs to the SW or Kartvelian group of Caucasian languages. Its alphabet went through various stages of evolution—from majuscule to minuscule to Mkhedruli ("knightly"), which appears in the codices of the 10th c. onward and is still in use today. From the mid-5th c. we find translated into Georgian the Psalter, books of the NT and also original works. The whole body of works endowed with a distinctive stamp a country and people who recognize their very roots in Christian Late Antiquity.

In the family of Semitic languages, Arabic constitutes with Ethiopian the SW group, which in turn subdivides into N and S, the last of which—esp. after the Muslim conquest—almost completely disappears. From N Arabic descends the classical Arabic, which became very widespread, in line with the expansion of Islam; in its turn, it gave birth to various dialects. Each of these languages yielded its own literature, which—as a rule—have several general characteristics in common: They consist almost exclusively in religious literature; they grew up in Late Antiquity and the Early Middle Ages, between the 4th and 10th c., first as a translation of biblical texts, then ecclesiastical, from Greek, on which terrain they had their principal root (cf. Omelie copte, 5-6, ed. T. Orlandi). Among those who write in Coptic we should note *Pachomius (4th c.) and *Shenoute (end 4th–5th c.); in Syriac authors such as *Aphraates (1st half of 4th c.) and *Ephrem (4th c.), of whom we have letters, exegetical works, dogmatic sermons, exhortatory and lyrical, and also *Cyrillona (end 4th–5th c.), Balai and many others. With a clear intention of freeing their people from Byzantine and Syriac domination, *Mesrob and *Eznik (both 5th c.) wrote in Armenian. To the time of *Honorius and *Arcadius we may date the Georgian version of the Scriptures, while chants and patristic translations in that language used in the liturgy should probably be placed much later (from the 8th c. onward).

As for Ethiopian, very little remains of the original from the *Aksumite period (a Christian inscription of King Ezana [1st half of 4th c.], later the inscription of Ham [7th–8th c.] and those of King Daniel [10th or 11th c.]), while a group of works translated from Greek survives from the 4th c. and later, naturally including biblical texts. For Christian Arabic, in the period preceding the rise of Islam—i.e., before 630—we should mention the numerous poets from Bedouin tribes and above all the stable Christian populations of N Arabia and the Syro-Palestinian area (among which poets Adi ibn Zaid [5th–beginning of 6th c.] is the most famous). In the subsequent period we should note, among others, Theodore Abu-Qurrah (750–830), the celebrated representative of Arab Christian literature during the iconoclasm crisis, heir to the thought of *John of Damascus, and contemporary of Theodore the Studite (d. 826). He constitutes an important link between the Greek Fathers and writers of his own language: he writes in Arabic for the Arabs, reflecting the mentality and thought typical of Syriac areas bordering the Eastern Roman Empire.

Two useful books for work in Christian Greek and Latin are A. Biaise - H. Chirat, Dictionnaire latin-français des auteurs chrétiens, Strasbourg 1954 and G.W.H. Lampe, A Patristic Greek Lexicon, Oxford 1961. Studies and monographs include J. Schrijnen, Charakteristik des altchristlichen Latein, Nijmegen 1932 (the first volume of many in the series "Latinitas Christianorum primaeva," containing studies by scholars linked to the school of Nijmegen); G. Bardy, La question des langues dans l'Église ancienne, I, Paris 1948; Chr. Mohrmann, Études sur le latin des Chrétiens, 4 vols., Rome 1958ff.; E. Löfstedt, Late Latin, Oslo 1959. From 1962 the following series, also at Nijmegen: "Graecitas Christianorum Primaeva." Also see V. Loi, Origini e caratteristiche della latinità cristiana, Rome 1978; Omelie copte, ed. T. Orlandi, Turin 1981 (see p. 5 for bibliographic information on the Coptic and related literature of the Christian East); S.J. Voicu, Lingue orientali e patristica greca. Sussidi bibliografici: Augustinianum 16 (1976) 205-215; LACL 650-656.

P. Siniscalco

LAODICEA, Councils of. Under *Theodosius the Great (347–395) a council was called at Laodicea in Phrygia (see prologue of the Cod. Vindob. Hist. graec. 7, 11th–12th c.), whose canons, in addition to the Greek and Latin collections, are also reported by *Gratian (Decretum XVI, c. 11), who, however, raises some doubts about this date. In fact *Theodoret of Cyrrhus (ca. 393–ca. 458), citing can. 35 (In Col. II, 18), presents the council as an event contemporaneous with himself (after 430), which seems to be confirmed by the tenor of some canons which are a summary of preceding legislation which had entered the canon tradition of Phrygia (see can. 35, which condemns the cult of the angels, widespread in the region; cf. Theodoret, In Col. II, 18: PG 82, 614).

There are 59 canons in the collection of 50 titles of *John Scholasticus (ca. 550) and in that of *Dionysius Exiguus. They aim at opposing superstition (can. 36), for fear of which the veneration of the angels is also opposed (can. 35); they regulate public penance (can. 2); they limit second marriages (can. 1) and mixed marriages (can. 10, 31); they discipline the celebration of baptism (can. 45-47), of chrism (can. 48), of marriage (can. 52-53), and the conferral of the orders (can. 3, 5, 11, 44) of the priesthood (can. 13) and of the episcopate (can. 12, 57); they submit the clergy to the bishop (can. 41, 42, 56); they give dispositions concerning liturgy (can. 14, 16-17, 18-19, 27-28, 49, 58-59.) and discipline (norms of behavior, fasting, sanctification of Sunday: can. 29-30, 50-51, 54-55); and they dissuade Catholics from having relationships with heretics (can. 6-9, 31-34, 37-39).

Between 478 and 481 (most likely in 481) another council met, whose Acts have not survived, to deal with the case of Stephen, bishop of Antioch, who was brought before the emperor of the East *Zeno, accused of being a *Nestorian by the followers of the *monophysite Peter the Fuller. Stephen had been deposed, but the council recognized his innocence and reestablished him in his see.

For the first council: Sources: Lauchert 72-79; Joannou 1, 2, 1027-1055. Studies: DTC 8, 2611-2615; DDC 6, 338-343; Hfl-Lecl 1, 2, 989-1028. For the second council: Mansi 7, 1022; Palazzini 2, 229; I canoni della chiesa antica, ed. A. Di Berardino, I, Rome 2006, 335-352.

C. Nardi

LAODICEANS, Letter to the. A Letter to the Laodiceans is mentioned by St. Paul (Col 4:16); in the Muratorian *Canon it is considered a *Marcionite work; it is found in some codices of the NT. This letter of the 2nd c. was identified with the Letter to the Ephesians (Tertullian, Adv. Marc. 5,11-17; Epiphanius, Haer. 42,9,3; 42,123; Theodoret, Col 4,16), used by the Marcionites. *Filaster of Brescia (Haer. 89) and *Jerome (De viris ill. 5) confirm the existence of this letter. We cannot confirm a relationship between that letter and the one existing today; the typically Marcionite elements are missing, but the texts of the OT are missing too; the role of St. Paul is emphasized, which might be related to the Marcionites. Our text is confirmed in the De divinis scripturis of ps.-Augustine (5th–6th c.), by *Victor of Capua, who inserted it in the Codex Fuldensis, and by *Gregory the Great. The letter exists in Latin, but the original language is Greek. It consists of about a hundred texts of St. Paul, particularly from Philippians and Galatians; it emphasizes moral problems.

Erbetta 3, 63-67; Moraldi 3, 78-81, 91-92 (bibl.), 95 (tr.); Starowieyski 3, 51-54, 355 (bibl.); Elliott 543-546.

M. Starowieyski

LAPSI, Problem of the. After *Tertullian (Praescr. 4) had spoken of remaning steadfast in persecutions, *Cyprian, at the outbreak of the persecution of *Decius, turned to the two verbs stare and labi as characteristic of the constant (Ep. 14,2: inconcussa fide stantes) and of those who, in some way, failed (Ep. 11,8: lapsorum poenitentia reformetur). The latter must submit to an adequate penance and make a public confession of guilt in front of the community (exomologēsis), after which they can receive the imposition of hands by the bishop and clergy and be readmitted to the *Eucharist (Ep. 15,1; 16,2). All failures must be investigated truly as to their gravity (Ep. 15,3), so that it is possible to establish an adequate penance: for this a synod was necessary (Ep. 17,3), which was possible only at the end of the persecution (Ep. 15,2). Cyprian curses with bitterness the lax priests, who without alerting the bishop, and without an adequate penance or confession of guilt, readmit the lapsed to the Eucharist (Ep. 15,2; 16,2). Even the letters of intercession of the martyrs (who died in the persecution giving the witness of their own blood) must be examined one at a time (Ep. 16,3; 26,1). Whoever readmits the lapsed in anticipation blocks the execution of penance and the possibility that they might become worthy of God's pardon, leading them back in this way to the fall (Ep.

16,2-3). Only those lapsi who have proven to have completed the penance, or who are sick, can make the confession of guilt to any priest, and, in extreme cases, even to a deacon, and so return in peace to God (Ep. 18,1).

The Roman clergy, temporarily without bishop, agreed with this procedure (Ep. 8,2-3 and 30,3-8); they expected, however, a regulation from their future bishop. The neighboring bishops also supported this provisional pastoral letter concerning penance (Ep. 30,8). In a future synodal council, laity who remained solid in the faith were also to take part (Ep. 30,5). After the end of the persecution, however, Cyprian, supported by the agreement of Rome, sent to his community a longer and more systematic exposition on the lapsed in 36 chapters. He explained clearly (as before in the letter of the Romans addressed to him 30,3) the different position of the lapsed: some Christians spontaneously participated in sacrifices offered to idols (Laps. 8); others drank wine offered to idols, even leading their children to this (Laps. 9); still others fell into weakness under tortures (Laps. 13); and finally others, after a first moment of error through fear, confessed their faith, becoming victorious martyrs (ibid.). The letter of the Roman clergy (Ep. 30) names in the first place those who obtained false libelli (certificates of sacrifice to the idols), without, however, having actually sacrificed to them. These were judged as having participated in the sacrifices offered to the idols (Ep. 30,3). In this way two categories were established: the libellatici and the sacrificers (Ep. 55,17). Although Ep. 30 spoke of "devastating ruin" (Ep. 30,3.5) and Cyprian himself in 251 had compared the lapsed to the dead (Ep. 15,2; Laps. 30), the next year he made a clarification: we should not consider them as dead, but as almost dead (semianimes); and in justification of this he adduced the fact that some deniers later confessed again the faith, even becoming martyrs (Ep. 55,16). Cyprian did not modify his position on the lapsed, but described their state in a different way. In the meantime, *Novatian had made clear his total refusal of the readmission of the apostates, based on the fact that they were spiritually dead and therefore could no longer be saved. The unknown author of the Ad Novatianum also calls attention to the apostates who later became martyrs and simply says that all the lapsed, still in penitential state, could be considered on equal footing with them (pares: Ad Novat. 7,1). This audacious simplification was directed toward unmasking a false biblical argument adopted by the Novatians. If even a single lapsus became a martyr, not all the lapsed can be reproved as wood, hay or straw (1 Cor 3:12). If the lapsed act so as to be readmitted to the Eucharist, they do not do this without a personal initiative; therefore, they cannot be compared to those dead in combat, but to the severely wounded, who, struggling in the field with their last bit of strength, are saved (Ad Novat. 6,2) when they are helped and cared for. *Dionysius of Alexandria reproved Novatian for "having exiled completely the Holy Spirit, although a hope remains that he might remain in them or return there" (Eus., HE VII, 7). Dionysius does not wish to judge if the lapsed are dead or if they have completely lost the Spirit, nor pardon them if they do not do penance. But in practice he answered the question of the lapsed in the same way as Cyprian: they should be guided to penance and then granted reconciliation. The same problems appeared in a particular way during the persecution of *Diocletian; however, the accumulated experience made the solution easier, but struggles were not absent among rigorists, those who were lax, and those who wanted to apply a consolidated pastoral practice.

A. Portolano, Il dramma dei "lapsi" nell'epistolario di Cipriano, Naples 1972; M.R. Macina, Un modèle pour délier les divorcés mariés: l'"admission provvisoire" des lapsi par Cyprien de Carthage († 258): Le Supplément 165 (1988) 94-134; H. Heuden, La première année du schisme mélitien "305/306": Ancient Society 20 (1989) 267-280; A. Martin, La réconciliation des lapsi en Égypte. De Denys d'Alexandrie à Pierre d'Alexandrie, une querelle des clercs: RSLR 22 (1986) 258-269; Id., Athanase et l'Église d'Égypte au IVe siècle (328-373), Rome 1996.

H.J. Vogt

LAPSU SUSANNAE, De. *Gennadius of Marseille (Vir. ill. 22) mentions an Ad lapsam virginem libellum among the works of *Niceta of Remesiana (d. 414). Perhaps it is the same work of ps.-Ambrose De lapsu Susannae (De lapsu virginis consecratae), which also appears among the letters of ps.-Jerome (Ep. 20); it is different, however, from Ad lapsam virginem epistula (CPL 652). As for the anonymous text, it is an energetic admonition against a virgin, Susanna, who broke her vow, seduced a lector and finally killed her child. It is a rant devoid of content in an exaggeratedly rhetorical style.

CPL 651; CPPM II A 869; II B 3580 and 3695; H.J. Frede, Kirchenschriftsteller, Freiburg [4]1995, 647-648; E. Cazzaniga, De Lapsu Susannae (De Lapsu Virginis Consecratae), Turin 1948.

S. Samulowitz

LATE ANTIQUITY. One of the extensively treated and discussed themes at the international level of historical scholarship in the last few decades is without a doubt the period referred to as Late Antiquity. The birth of this historiographical concept, today broadly applied in research on the ancient world, is owed to the debates that arose within the research of the history of classical art: we owe, in fact, the art historian Alois Riegl the honor of having first formulated the concept of Late Antiquity as an autonomous period of history of ancient art (Die spätrömische Kunstindustrie nach den Funden in Österreich-Ungarn, Vienna 1901). Opposing primarily the position of empirical positivism, maintained in the field of art history by the Hamburg architect Gottfried Semper and his followers—who tended to reduce works of art to mechanical products conditioned by concomitant external factors—and rejecting the Winckelmannian concept of the Dekadenz of late Roman art rooted in Enlightenment historiography, Riegl proposed, acc. to a continuity perspective of history, that each era had its own and idiosyncratic Kunstwollen ("will of art"). In this sense he attributed to Late Antiquity and the artistic productions conceived and elaborated in that historical juncture a value and autonomous excellence that rescued it from the critical judgment that had usually been leveled against it. Nevertheless, a rigid periodization to isolate the Late Antique phenomenon in time becames necessary, and Riegl, as a clear witness to the complexity of defining the correct chronology, was himself uncertain whether to begin the art of Late Antiquity with the age of *Marcus Aurelius or with the *Edict of Milan, though eventually he resolved his own positions in favor of the Constantinian age, while the end of the period was identified as the ascent of Charlemagne.

The reception of Rieglian thought in the context of the history of ancient art was initially very limited, and archaeology's first critical discussion of his work could in effect be considered the long review published in 1929 by Guido von Kaschnitz Weinberg during the publication of the new edition of the journal Spätrömische Kunstindustrie edited by Emil Reisch in 1927 (see Gnomon 5 [1929] 195-213). During those years, Rieglian thought on Late Antiquity began to be received and discussed, while not lacking those who, inheriting the terminology coined by the Austrian scholar, distorted the original chronological framework—significantly lowering the historiographical horizons of Late Antiquity—and pushed toward including even the Trajan era in late Roman art, considering the famous historiated column one of the first artistic manifestations of Late Antiquity (see A. K. Lehmann-Hartleben, Die Trajanssäule. Ein römisches Kunstwerk zu Beginn der Spätantike, Berlin - Leipzig 1926). On the level of historical research, after the attentive analyses and assessments of Otto Seeck (Geschichte des Untergangs der antiken Welt, I-VI, Berlin-Stuttgart 1897-1920) and Ernst Stein (Geschichte des spätrömischen Reiches. I: Vom römischen zum byzantinischen Staate, 284-476 N. Chr., Vienna 1928; Id., Histoire du Bas-Empire. II: De la disparition de l'Empire d'Occident à la mort de Justinien, 476-565, Paris-Brussels-Amsterdam 1949), on the Italian side, it was Santo Mazzarino—in his book on *Stilicho (published in 1942, but its initial composition dated back to his thesis discussed in 1936) and research on the social history of the 4th c. (Aspetti sociali del quarto secolo. Ricerche di storia tardo-romana, Rome 1951)—that bore the merit of having individuated Late Antiquity as an autonomous historical period with a "positive" value, an age in which the world changed and "turned toward a new form," thus freeing the field from the preconceived ideas of Enlightenment historiography.

Subsequent reflections of scholars from different methodological approaches have contributed to better define the real importance of Late Antiquity (with respect to Mazzarino, see the articles contained in the volumes Antico, tardoantico ed era costantiniana, I-II, Bari 1974-80), but paradoxically some refinements have triggered a perilous interpretive system that today generally tends to identify this age as the absolute creator of models and the root of numerous and primary aspects of the modern world. In addition to such an intrusive "rhetoric of modernity," another aspect, which in our days heavily catalyzes the attention of historians, is certainly the one connected to periodization. This phenomenon has therefore led scholars to add to the original and customary Rieglian periodization several decades back in time (to the point of including the final years of the 2nd c.) and, something perhaps more disturbing for the apparent dissolution of the Early Middle Ages, several centuries forward in time, reaching to include within the idea of Late Antiquity even the 10th c.

K.F. Stroheker, Um die Grenze zwischen Antike und abendländischen Mittelalter: Saeculum 1 (1959) 433-465 (= Germanentum und Spätantike, Zürich-Stuttgart 1965, 275-308); H.-I. Marrou, Décadence romaine ou antiquité tardive? III^e-VI^e siècle, Paris 1977; A. Heuss, Antike und Spätantike, in J. Kunisch (ed.), Spätzeit. Studien zu den Problemen eines historischen Epochenbegriffs, Berlin 1990, 27-88; L. Cracco Ruggini, Il Tardoantico: per una tipologia dei punti critici, in A. Carandini - L. Cracco Ruggini - A. Giardina (ed.), Storia di Roma. III. L'età tardoantica. I. Crisi e trasformazioni, Turin 1993, XXXIII-XLIV. The bibliography, moreover, is very vast and continually growing. For important and well-documented frameworks offering an overall perspective, with abundant bibliography, see the investigations done by M. Mazza, Di Ellenismo, Oriente e Tarda Antichità. Considerazioni a margine di un saggio (e di un con- vegno): Mediterraneo Antico 1 (1998) 141-170, and A. Giardina, Esplosione di tardoantico: Studi Storici 40, 1 (1999) 157-180. Limited to the artistic aspects, and esp. geared toward the reception of the concept of Late Antiquity in Italian historiography of the first decades of the 20th c., M. Ghilardi, Alle origini del dibattito sulla nascita dell'arte tardoantica. Riflessi nella critica italiana: Mediterraneo Antico 5 (2002) 117-146. For an extensive and recent panorama on the world of Late Antiquity, see also G.W. Bowersock - P. Brown - O. Grabar (eds.), Late Antiquity: A Guide to the Postclassical World, Cambridge, MA-London 1999; for the lines of research on Late Antiquity and for the debate among scholars of ancient history, see the studies by D. Vera, L. Cracco Ruggini, E. Fentress, A. Schiavone, C. Lepelley and G. Bowersock in Antico e tardoantico oggi: RSI 114, 2 (2002) 349-379.

M. Ghilardi

LATIN TRANSLATIONS OF GREEK TEXTS. During the classical period, translations had some special characteristics: in reality we possess few true and proper translations from pre-Christian times; some of the paraphrases such as those of the poetical works have come down to us (e.g., those of the writings of Quintus Ennius, Lucius Accius, Statius Caecilius and Catullus), whose works were translated on account of their very nature. In addition to Cicero's translations of Plato's writings, we do not have many other examples.

Already during the Christian era, starting from the year 180, some Acts of the martyrs mentioned several sacred books which, in *Africa, must have been in Latin. This fact would demonstrate the precedence of the Afra family of the first Latin translations (Vetus Latina or rather Veteres Latinae) over the Itala family. Scholars use the Vetus Latina to refer to a collection of non-Hieronymian translations, generally before the so-called Vulgata, which depend on the Septuagint version for the OT and the original Greek of the NT. The work of gathering these pre-Hieronymian versions was undertaken by Sabatier (1743) and then continued with new information by the Vetus Latina Institute from the Abbey of Beuron, which continues to publish enormous volumes of this Herculean undertaking. The sources used are citations from the Latin Fathers, ancient biblical MSS (many of which are fragmentary or palimpsests) before the 8th c., medieval Bibles that continued to transmit archaic models until the 13th c., glosses, liturgical texts etc. The Vetus Latina is important primarily insofar as it reflects the Septuagint version.

With Jerome all these versions were reviewed in various ways and were also integrated with the translations of entire books made by Jerome himself in his great project that today we recognize as the Vulgata; this, however, is mistaken, because not all of the Hieronymian text is in the Vulgate, nor is the entire Vulgate Hieronymian. The characteristics of these texts have been illustrated by Blatt: the Hieronymian texts (acc. to his scrupulous rule of translating word for word, because everything in the sacred texts, even the order of the words, is a mystery: Ep. 57,5,2) are very literal translations, but the Veteres Latinae also possess this characteristic: Jerome, therefore, is not solely responsible for the literalism of the biblical translations.

Numerous apocryphal texts (gospels, acts, apocalypses; 4 Esdras) have accompanied the canonical books; their traces are more sporadic. It is difficult to determine the dates of the translations or the milieus that influenced them. An abundant list is supplied (6th c.?) by the Index de libris non recipiendis (Decretum Gelasianum*); the texts were presented by Lipsius-Bonnet, but many were enriched by the most recent discoveries; see, e.g., the Transitus of the Virgin, A. Wilmart (ST 59, 323-369) and A. Wenger (L'assomption de la T.S. Vierge, Paris 1955, 245-256).

A characteristic of the ancient Latin versions of patristic texts was that, in contradistinction to the biblical texts, which demanded great fidelity, the translator felt himself to be completely free in his translation. According to an ancient account that narrates how a translation of *Dionysius the Areopagite was made, a Greek monk read the text out loud, a second monk orally translated it into Latin, and a third, immediately, wrote out the translation (Dekkers).

*Calcidius's chief characteristic (4th c.), however, was the exacerbation of literalness: when *Ossius asked him for a translation of *Plato's Timaeus (the first Christian translation of this work), he bent the Greek words in such a way that in order to make sense of them it was necessary to make use of another text, either the original or a translation. We will not make reference here to the Greek translations of Latin patristic texts, which are far less numerous.

It has been thought that the Roman community translated *1 Clement as early as the 2nd c. There exist two versions of the Shepherd of *Hermas. With respect to *Polycarp, chs. 10-14 have survived in Latin; a similar phenomenon holds for *Irenaeus's Adversus haereses. From the writings of *Clement of Alexandria, there remains the Adumb. in ep. cath. (GCS 3), which has been lost in Greek.

The great era of translations was the age of *Rufinus and *Jerome, who worked esp. in the East, and who saved *Origen and other authors whom Greek copyists, however, wished to make disappear, or at least allow to perish. During the same period, the *Arians, for their part, saved the other works of Origen (*Commentary on Matthew). The *Pelagians or those who sympathized with this movement were esp. interested in the work of *John Chrysostom or the commentaries of *Theodore of Mopsuestia. Some homilies delivered by *Basil and *Gregory of Nazianzus drew the attention of Rufinus, as well as Basil's Asceticon, whose Hexameron, after having been used by *Ambrose, was translated by Eustathius.

Monastic literature represented a notable center of interest. *Evagrius of Antioch and an anonymous individual translated into Latin *Athanasius's Life of Anthony immediately after its publication. Numerous minor writings were translated, while Western visitors went to search for information while undertaking pilgrimages in the East, and some "Latin Easterners" (John *Cassian, a native of *Scythia) used and elaborated a vast amount of information.

*Boethius (480–524) had the intention of translating all the writings of Plato and Aristotle, and from this unfinished project, there remain translations of Aristotle's Categories, De interpretatione, Topica and Sophistic Refutations (and the now lost Posterior Analytics); he also translated *Porphyry of Tyre's Isagoge for Aristotle's Categories; these translations followed the original verbatim.

*Cassiodorus (490–583) and his collaborators at the *Vivarium are an example of an organized literary cooperation, although he himself corrected the translations of others: these versions are full of rhythmic clauses, which is not very common in translated literature. One notes, therefore, a more developed literalism, in comparison to the preceding translations, and one perceives therein a better understanding of the Greek language in comparison to the medieval translators.

Around the mid-6th c., the Roman deacons *Pelagius and *John, two future popes, translated an excellent collection of Apophthegmata, a treasure to which others also returned. The controversies with *Constantinople that followed the Council of *Chalcedon led to once again undertaking and improving the translations of the Byzantine canonical collections. Many translations followed, and it is difficult to orient oneself in the subsequent works. One must mention esp. the work of *Dionysius Exiguus, who was also a Scythian who had come into the service of the holy see (d. ca. 550). Such Africans as *Facundus of Hermiane also performed the role of translator.

At the end of the 9th c., *Anastasius Bibliothecarius put himself once again at the service of the Roman curia for systematic translations. In *Gaul, John Scotus Erigena, Irish by culture, was able to translate *Gregory of Nyssa and Dionysius the Areopagite. These exceptional individuals became very famous already during their own time. Nevertheless, in different eras, a good number of anonymous individuals showed themselves capable of rendering in Latin short hagiographical, homiletic and ascetic texts. Southern Italy was not the only place where the two cultures met.

In brief, it was fortunate for a Greek author to be translated into Latin, inasmuch as the translations were indispensable means of cultural mediation. Moreover, medieval Latin cited and knew only the Greek authors translated into Latin. Then, Erasmus and the humanists such as Reuchlin, who was also known by his name translated into Greek, Capnio (1455–1522), also did a huge amount of work in translation.

Moreover, Rufinus, Jerome and others not only brought knowledge of Greek authors but also often saved their writings. The Latin versions, ancient and literal, are often excellent testimonies to the originals, and are important for knowledge about the transmission of the text. One simply has to think of the case of Irenaeus, with extensive portions of the Adversus haereses which have been retranslated into Greek in the edition of the SC, thanks to the literalism of the Latin and *Armenian translation.

P. Sabatier, Bibliorum Sacrorum Versionis Antiquae seu Vetus Italica, Reims 1743 (repr. Turnhout 1976), F. Blatt, Remarques sur l'histoire des traductions latines: Classica et Mediaevalia 1 (1938) 217-242; P. Courcelle, Les lettres grecques en Occident, Paris ²1948 (Eng. tr. Cambridge, MA 1969); A. Siegmund, Die Überlieferung der christl. Literatur in der lat. Kirche bis zum XII. Jahrh., Munich-Passing 1949; B. Fischer (ed.), Vetus Latina. Die Reste der altlateinischen Bibel nach Petrus Sabatier neu gesammelt und herausgegeben von der Erzabtei Beuron, Freiburg 1952–; E. Dekkers, Les traductions grecques des écrits patristiques latins: SE 5 (1953) 193-233; S. Lundström, Übersetzungstechnische Untersuchungen auf dem Gebiet der christlichen Latinität, Lund 1955; Ch. Munier, Les sources patristiques du droit de l'Église du VIIIᵉ au XIIIᵉ s., Mulhouse 1957; J. Gribomont, Patrologia III, 188-203 (bibl.), C. Mohrmann, Linguistic Problems in the Early Christian Church: VChr 11 (1957) 11-36; P.O. Kristeller - F.E. Cranz (eds.), Catalogus Translationum et Commentariorum: Medieval and Renaissance Latin Translations and Commentaries: Annotated Lists and Guides, I, Washington D.C. 1960; F. Weissengruber, Epiphanius Scholasticus als Übersetzer, Vienna 1972; A. Ceresa-Gastaldo, A proposito dell'edizione di antiche versioni latine di testi patristici greci: VetChr 10 (1973) 47-50; R. Hirsch, Early Printed Latin Translations of Greek Texts, in The Printed Word: Its Impact and Diffusion, London 1978, 1-6; J. Gribomont, Le traduzioni. Girolamo e Rufino: Patrologia III, 185-240; P.-M. Bogaert, La Bible latine des origines au moyen âge. Aperçu historique, état des questions: RTL 19 (1988) 137-159; 276-314; B. Kytzler, Fidus Interpres: The Theory and Practice of Translation in Classical Antiquity: Antichthon 23 (1989) 42-50; V. Brown (ed.), Catalogus Translationum et Commentariorum: Medieval and Renaissance Translations and Commentaries: Annotated Lists and Guides, VII, Washington D.C. 1992; VIII, Washington D.C. 2003; Cristianesimo latino e cultura greca sino al sec. IV, XXI Incontro di studiosi dell'antichità cristiana, Roma, 7-9 maggio 1992 (SEA 42), Rome 1993; J. Berlioz, Identifier sources et citations, Turnhout 1994, 47-74; F. Cardini - C. Vasoli, La conquista della lingua e della letteratura greca. Traduzioni latine di testi greci, in Storia della letteratura italiana, ed. E. Malato, III, Il Quattrocento, Rome 1996, 62-66; W. Berschin, Traduzioni dal greco in latino (secoli IV-XIV), in I Greci, Storia, Cultura, Arte, Società. 3: I Greci oltre la Grecia, ed. S. Settis, Turin 2001, 1023-1033; P. Botley, Latin Translation in the Renaissance. The Theory and Practice of Leonardo Bruni, Giannozzo Manetti and Desiderius Erasmus, Cambridge 2004.

A. Hamman - J. Leal

LATIN, CHRISTIAN

The notion and the existence of a Christian Latin are not accepted by all scholars. In general there is agreement that it expresses the contents of the Christian religion in a form and language marked by particular novelties and differences with respect to the Latin used by the classical pagan authors. In fact, in analyzing the evidence from its first expressions, it is easy to detect that there are two kinds of documents of Christian literature, very different from one another: the first is fairly close to the origins and better reflects the situation of the pastoral ministry, with its need to stay close to the people and to be understood by the people, using perhaps the everyday sermo vulgaris; the second group, in contrast, closely reflects the rhetorical teaching of the pagan schools, with a more educated language, even academic, rhetorical and rhythmical, later adopted by the magisterium of the church and of the pontifical curia, in this too heir of the imperial chancellery. One can therefore speak of different Christian Latins: liturgical, patristic, ecclesiastical, canonical and scholastic, with particularities and forms proper to each. Christian Latin appears as a universal category that embraces all the linguistic manifestations of the new Christian religion, with literary genres common to Latin literature or its own, from the poetry of the elogia and the carmina, to the prose of apologetics, homiletics, history, apocalyptic, epistolography.

In reality the new religion induced not only new notions and new words or renewed meanings in the Latin lexicon but also a new way of conceiving the very capacity of expression and communication among persons and peoples.

The origins of Christian Latin are almost wrapped in mystery, but they can reasonably be situated as early as the 2nd c., given that the development of the Christian consciousness of the Latin communities is evident in the popular piety expressed in a mature form in the plastic, pictorial and architectonic arts, esp. in the catacombs, in the 3rd–4th c. Certainly at the beginning the proclamation of the gospel was made in Greek, and Greek was the language of the liturgy in the first Christian communities in the West (and this explains the survival of Greek liturgical formulas, even after its abandonment as liturgical language in the West, formulas which furthermore remain unaltered, one can say, up to our days), even if the attempts to translate sacred texts from Hebrew into Latin are documented, in continuity with the efforts of translation of the Jewish communities of the Diaspora. (This explains the numerous Hebraisms remaining in the liturgy and in later versions of the sacred texts.) As early as the 3rd c., there were, esp. in *Africa (and perhaps also in *Gaul), rather lively and culturally prepared Christian communities, at the point of making of Christian Latin a vulgata language, rendered familiar by liturgy and preaching, acquiring the capacity of fully expressing the religious and emotional sentiment of the adherents of the new religion, and this Latin, even if it does not appear very different from the Latin used by the contemporaneous pagan authors, nevertheless offers some individual characteristics, taken both from liturgical use and from the rhetorical education given in the schools from which the Christian authors came.

The characteristics of mature Christian Latin therefore depend on the notable linguistic contributions made by Christian authors, starting from that fundamental one made by *Tertullian held to be, rightly or wrongly, the founder of Christian Latin, having created over 900 neologisms, some of which have had a large and durable influence. These individual characteristics of the Latin of the Christian communities of the West in the 2nd–5th c. concern lexicographical, semiological and syntactic aspects and phenomena.

Among the lexicographical phenomena, the Hebraisms, Hellenisms and neologisms—i.e., the words borrowed from the Hebrew and Greek languages or formed ex novo through the normal processes of Latin suffixation—have particular importance. These are the vital proof of a community, which also distinguished itself from pagan society linguistically, through the effect of its own discipline, worship and doctrine, and therefore responded to its own needs and the particular situations of its religiosity, creating its own mode of expression, which flanked and lived with the sermo cottidianus, rusticus, militaris, of other analogous environments. The process of distinction and separation of the language from contemporaneous common use led, in short, directly to the affirmation de facto and de jure that Latin too was a sacred language, equal to Hebrew and Greek, through the majestic prejudice that the liturgical language had to be worthy of the divinity and had to be adapted to express sublime truths, such as, in particular, the theological truths and the prayers which rise from earth to heaven through the ministry of a priest. Hebrew was in fact held to be a sacred language since it had been the language of the people of God, ancient Israel, and the Scriptures had been given in it, the divine Word given to Moses and the prophets. Greek, too, was a sacred language since it had been the vehicle of the evangelization of the peoples of the Mediterranean and the NT had been written in Greek; in addition almost all of the OT had been translated into Greek, widely spread and known as the Septuagint (LXX). Latin, finally, was acknowledged as the third sacred language, equal in dignity to Hebrew and Greek, because it was the language of the successor of Peter and of the Roman Church, Caput Urbis et Orbis, as well as its liturgy or rite named precisely Latin or Roman.

Regarding vocabulary, scholars have sought to distinguish in Christian Latin, to be accepted with reservations, four categories of lexical and semantic innovations, denominated direct and indirect, complete and partial Christianisms.

1. Direct complete Christianisms are proper and completely Christian words, such as the names of the days of the week—feria secunda, tertia, quarta, quinta, sexta, sabbatum, dies dominica—to avoid the names of the week linked to the pagan divinities of the Moon, Mars, Mercury, Jove, Venus, Saturn, the Sun; these denominations last to this day in liturgical use. Some Hebrew acclamations and formulas reflect the attachment to the tradition and the effort to translate as faithfully as possible the divine message; still alive today in the liturgy are amen, alleluia, hosanna, sabaoth together with proper and common names such cherubim, gehenna (infernus), iubilaeus annus, manna, messias, seraphim, Iacob, Iesus, Ioseph, Maria. Names within a Greek matrix or composed on Greek examples were equally coined or preserved, such as acolythus, anastasis and resurrectio, anathema and anathematizare, angelus, apologia (apologeticum), apostata, apostasia and apostatare, apostolatus and apostolus, archangelus, archidiaconus, archipresbyter, baptismus or baptismum, baptista, baptisterium, baptizare; catechumenus, chrisma, Christus, Christianismus, Christianitas, christianizare, Christianus, clerus, coemeterium, coenobium, diaconus and minister, ecclesia, eleemosyna, epiphania, episcopatus and episcopus, ethnicus, eucaristia, evangelium and evangelizare, haeresis, idòlum (idoleum, idolium), laicus, latria, liturgia, martyr and martyrium, monacha, monachium, monachus, monasterium, patriarcha (-es) and patriarchatus, presbyter and presbyteratus, presbyterium, propheta, prophetia and prophetizare, salmista, psalmodia and psalmus, pseudoapostolus, pseudopropheta, schisma and schismaticus, synaxis, synodus.

Some Hellenisms were not relevant to either Christian doctrine or liturgy, but survived as relicts of the era in which Greek was the language of the Scriptures and the liturgy, as, e.g., the words abyssus, arrabon, brabium, exstasis, scandalum and scandalizzare. Lexicographical calques coined in perfect equivalence to the Greek words of the sacred texts are benedictio from eulogia, primogenitus from prōtotokos, resurrectio from anastasis, revelatio from apokalypsis and unigenitus from monogenēs.

2. Direct partial Christianisms are words particular to Christians but only partially Christian, since they were used by Christians to indicate new realities, unknown to the pagans. Among these stand out the words and verbs suffixed with -fico, -mentum, -tela, -tia, -tura, of vulgar imprint, such as benefico, corruptela and incorruptela, creatura, documentum, firmamentum, incorruptela, metatura, potentia, sufferentia, supplementum, sustinentia (exspectatio); the words adinventio, aedificare and aedificatio, benedicere, caritas, communio, confessio, confessor, confiteor, coetus congregatus, consilium, contribulare, conversio, cornu, devotio, devotus, dominicum, dormire (in Domino), eructare, factum, fidelis and infidelis, fides, fortitudo, gentilis, gentilitas, gratia, humilis, humilitas, incarnari, incarnatio, incarnatus, inventum, iustificare, lapsus, libertas, mediatio, mediator, mediatrix, missa, orare, oratio, paganitas and paganus, peccatum, reconciliatio, regenerare, regeneratio, regeneratus, reparatio, resurrectio, robur, salus, salvare, salvatio, salvator and servator, salvum facere, sanctificatrix, sanctificatus, sanctificus, stips collata, susceptor (adiutor), templum, tribulatio, viaticum, virtus, vigor, vivificatus.

One may also add the composite adjectives such as immarcescibilis, incommutabilis, indeficiens, indeflexibilis, indesinens. Following the regular procedures of Latin neology, one passes from the particularly meaningful terms of Christian ideology or discipline to a notable enrichment and semantic dilatation. For example, from the equivalence of Greek sarx with caro were created carnalis and carnaliter; from that of hagios with sanctus came sanctificator, sanctificatio, sanctificare; from zōopoiein with vivificare were coined vivificatio, vivificator. The semantic calques are often justified by a partial coincidence of meaning of the Greek terms with the Latin equivalents, such as diathēkē with testamentum (foedus), doxazein with honorificare, lytron with redemptio, mystērion with sacramentum. To make the biblical message accessible to the culturally humblest members of the community, the Christian preachers did not flee from terms and constructs of vulgar Latin, which the proponents of classicist purism rejected in the usus scribendi and loquendi.

The oldest interpretations of the sacred text reflect the different linguistic experiences of the first Christian generations which were received, transmitted and systematically developed in families of words, such as incarnari, incarnatio, concarnari, concarnatio concerning the incarnation of the Son of God; figuraliter, praefigurare, praefiguratio from the term figura with the acceptation of the Greek typos equivalent to "prefiguration," "symbolic meaning" concerning the persons and events of the OT. Equally accepted lexicographical groups such as ecclesia catholica, vita aeterna, and syntactic groups such as terra promissionis ("promised land") plebs fidelium ("Christian community"), operari iustitiam ("do good works"), operari virtutes ("perform miracles"), and even biblical metaphors and images, consecrated by the liturgical use and rendered familiar by preaching and catechesis or by personal meditation on sacred texts. The direct Christianisms became of common use among Christians and popular expressions entered the liturgy. *Augustine cites at least ten times, above all in his discourses, Sursum cor habeamus, and Erimus et nos gloria in excelsis Deo.

3. The indirect complete Christianisms are the words which are entirely but not inherently Christian, which do not concern strictly Christian realities but which are found only in Christian authors, such as those suffixed with -ntia, -tas, -tio (destructio, dormitio, tribulatio), -tudo, -tus; think of substantives used as adjectives, of adjectives used in place of a genitive or of an adverb, of terms such as apostolicus, caelestis (-ia), catholicus-catholici, fideles, gentilis (-es), haereticus, hibernum, incensum, increduli, indeficienter, ineffabiliter, laicus, matutinus, peccator, praepositi, relicta, salutare, superlevare, superexaltare, superextendere, superglorificare, supersperare, terrena.

4. The indirect partial Christianisms are pagan words often used by Christians. Think of the preference given to ambulare compared to ire, to honorificare compared to honorare, to manducare compared to edere and to salvator compared to conservator or servator.

Among semiological phenomena one should include the notions intimately connected with Christian doctrine, life and sentiments. Think of all the vocabulary relative to the theme of salvation and to the mystery of the redemption such as mediatio, mediator, mediatrix, salus, salvare, salvatio, salvator, sanctificare, sanctificatio, sanctificator, and the adaptation to a Christian sense of words like clarificare, corruptibilis, destructor, imperfectio, incorruptio, indeficienter, ineffabiliter, infatigabiliter, miserator, mortaliter, mortificare, operator, transgressor, tribulatio, trucidator.

As for syntactic phenomena, the influence of the vulgar language is notable, particularly in the preference given to the syntagmata proper to the language of the people, such as the notable preference given to analytic constructions with qualiter, quia, quod, quoniam and a finite mood of the verb, compared with the accusative with infinitive more frequent in the Latin of the authors; think of the favor given to the periphrastic futures or the extension of the use of the de and the in with instrumental ablative: delectari in, laetari in, percutere in virga, in nomine Domini, gladium in manu sumere. Next to the accentuated use of infinitive prepositions with quod and causal ones after the verba dicendi and sentiendi, one should mention the frequency of constructs of the type dicere ad, loqui ad; pleonasms of the type clamaverunt dicentes (Mt 8:29); locutus est eis dicens (Jn 8:12); the transitive use of intransitive words, such as benedicere aliquem; some particular syntagmata, of the type credere in aliquem, maior ab angelis, dico enim vobis quod, iurare ut, facilius est ut. Worth a mention also is the collective use of adjectives: Negat Manichaeus . . . sed Arrianus confitetur (Aug., Ser. 183,1,1); of present and past participles having become substantives: credentes, diffidentes, dormientes (mortui), collecta, relicta, incensum, praepositi; of substantives used as adjectives: populus peccator (Hier., In Eccl. c. 1140 B); of the adjective as complement of specification: apostolica praecepta, divina misericordia; dominica indignatio, dominica mandata, dominicus dies; of the adjective in the place of the adverb: domum matutinus ascendit; of the accentuated use of abstract words: obsecro te ignoscas tarditati meae (Hier., Ep. 99,2); te universa fraternitas salutat (ibid.); sanctitas vestra (Aug., Psal. 25,2,1.5).

Therefore, precisely in the biblical translations one can find the matrix of a great part of the lexicographical, semantic and syntactic phenomena peculiar to Christian Latin starting from Tertullian, who was largely heir to a linguistic tradition, which, through missionary preaching, liturgical and catechetical preaching and the translations of biblical passages for the liturgy, has consolidated in the churches of the West from the oldest phases of the Latinization of the Christian communities. Certainly this creativity was largely strengthened by the linguistic-literary activity of *Hilary, cultural bridge with the East, of Jerome, translator of the Bible, and of Augustine, thinker, preacher and writer. To the authority of these figures is due the affirmation of the language of the biblical tradition in the Latin literature of Christian inspiration, and to their genius is due also the creation of numerous neologisms which were affirmed in the Christian linguistic tradition.

F. Ozanam, Comment la langue latine devint chrétienne, Œuvres Complètes, II, Paris 1855, 117-147; H. Rönsch, Itala und Vulgata, Marburg [2]1875 (repr. Munich 1965); G. Koffmane, Geschichte des Kirchenlateins, I-II, Breslau 1879-1881 (repr. 1966); E. Löfstedt, Philologischer Kommentar zur Peregrinatio Aetheriae, Uppsala 1911; S.W.J. Teeuwen, Sprachlicher Bedeutungswandel bei Tertullian, Paderborn 1926; E. Leitl, Das Latein der Kirche, Munich 1927; J. Schrijnen, Charakteristik des altchristlichen Latein, Nijmegen 1932 (It. tr. Bologna 1977); Chr. Mohrmann, Die altchristliche Sondersprache in den Sermones des hl. Augustin, Nijmegen 1932; M. Schuster, Altchristliches Latein, Leipzig 1933; J. Schrijnen - Chr. Mohrmann, Studien zur Syntax der Briefe des hl. Cyprian. I-II, Nijmegen 1936-37; Chr. Mohrmann, Introduzione generale, in G.J.M. Bartelink (ed.), Vite dei Santi, Vita di Antonio, Fondazione Valla, Milan 1974, XIII; the articles published by Mohrmann on Christian Latinity are gathered in the volumes Études sur le latin des chrétiens, I, Rome 1958 (repr. 1994); II, Rome 1961; III, Rome 1965 (repr. 1979); IV, Rome 1977 (repr. 1994); W. Matzkow, De vocabulis quibusdam Italae et Vulgatae Christianis, Berlin 1933; M. Flad, Le latin de l'Église, étudié d'après la grammaire et la liturgie, Paris 1938; J. de Ghellinck, Latin chrétien ou langue latine des chrétiens?: Les Études Classiques 8 (1939) 449-478; M.A. Sainio, Untersuchungen über die Entstehung der christlichen Latinität, Helsinki 1941 (Annales Academiae Scientiarum Fennicae, 47/1); F. Di Capua, Osservazioni sulla lettura e sulla preghiera ad alta voce presso gli antichi: RAAN n.s. 28 (1952) 59-99; M. Dilworth, The Syntax of Christian Latin: Clergy Rev. (London) 43 (1958) 462-474; Id., The Morphology of Christian Latin: ibid. 45 (1960) 88-97; Id., The Vocabulary of Christian Latin: ibid. 51 (1966) 349-369 and 429-447; E. Norden, Die antike Kunstprosa, Leipzig-Berlin [4]1959, It. tr. La prosa d'arte antica, I-II, Rome 1986; R. Braun, "Deus Christianorum." Recherches sur le vocabulaire doctrinal de Tertullien, Paris 1962; Id., Origini e caratteristiche della latinità cristiana, Rome 1978; S. Marsili, La latinité chrétienne. Développement et introduction de la langue chrétienne: La MaisonD 86 (1966) 127-140; V. Loi, La latinità cristiana nel "De Trinitate" di Novaziano: RCCM 13 (1971) 136-177; A.N. Wilder, Early Christian Rhetoric: The Language of the Gospel, repr. New York 1971; G.M. Mir, Latinitas christianorum propria, I: Latinitas 19 (1971) 233-248; II-III: Latinitas 20 (1972) 10-20 and 180-200; G.L. Leone, Latinità cristiana. Introduzione allo studio del latino cristiano, Lecce 1971; J. Bastardas, El latín de los cristianos. Estado de su problemática: Boletín del Instituto de Estudios Helénicos 7,2 (1973) 5-17; G. Romaniello, La formula "Ite missa est" e il significato della parola "Missa," Latina 1975; E. Malaspina, Gli studi sulla latinità cristiana (1951-1978), I-II: Cultura e Scuola (Rome) 18 (1979) n. 71, 40-47, n. 72, 64-70; C. De Meo, Lingue tecniche del latino, Bologna 1983; G. Caliò, Il latino cristiano, Bologna 1985; C. Codoñer Merino, Latín cristiano, ¿lengua de grupo?: Nova Tellus 3 (1985) 111-126; P. Serra Zanetti, "Sermo humilis" negli autori latini cristiani, in Orientamenti recenti della critica nella lettura dei testi latini, Bologna 1988, 51-59; L.F. Pizzolato, Metodi di ricerca nella letteratura cristiana antica, in B. Amata (ed.), Cultura e Lingue Classiche 2, LAS, Rome 1988, 105-115; J. Oroz Reta, Del latín cristiano al latín litúrgico: algunas observaciones en torno al Itinerarium Egeriae: Latomus 48 (1989) 401-415; B. Amata, Quaestio de linguarum studio in Ecclesia: Latinitas 3 (1989) 210-217; Lingua Patrum, I. Bibliographie signalétique du latin des Chrétiens, Turnhout 1989; B. Luiselli, *Il linguaggio della "evangelizatio pauperum" nella chiesa latina antic*a, in La tradizione patristica. Alle fonti della cultura europea, Florence 1995, 31-58; V. Grossi, Dal "sermo humilis" delle traduzioni latine della Bibbia alla teologia agostiniana dell'evangelizzazione, in L. Padovese, Atti del VI Simposio di Efeso su S. Giovanni Apostolo, Pontificio Ateneo Antoniano, Rome 1996, 273-291; S. Sconocchia - L. Toneatto (ed.), Seminario Internazionale sulla letteratura scientifica e tecnica greca e latina 1, Trieste 1993; 2. Bologna 1997.

V. Loi - B. Amata

LATRONIANUS (d. 385). A follower of *Priscillian, he was executed at *Trier together with Priscillian himself and others. *Jerome praises him as a well-trained poet, worthy of being compared to the ancient authors, and records his poetical works, composed in different meters (Vir. ill. 122).

H. Chadwick, Priscillian of Avila: The Occult and the Charismatic in the Early Church, Oxford 1976, 144; V. Burrus, The Making of a Heretic: Gender, Authority, and the Priscillianist Controversy, Berkeley-Los Angeles-London 1995, 98, 210, n. 102.

S. Zincone

LAUDATIO SANCTI MARTINI. An anonymous sermon (laetemur in Domino) of the 6th c., from *Gaul, in honor of St. *Martin of Tours, composed for the dies natalis of the saint. The text is an exaltation of the festival day, in which everyone should rejoice.

CPL 480; PLS 4, 602-604; B.M. Peebles, Saint Martin et son temps, Rome 1961, 237-249; A. Lambert, Le premier panégyrique de St Martin: Bulletin de St-Martin et de St-Benoît 32 (1924) 316-320.

A. Di Berardino

LAUDE MARTYRII, De. An anonymous work in the form of a sermon which dates probably to the 3rd c. Contrary to what was thought until a few years ago, this text does not belong to *Cyprian and even less to *Novatian. In its content, the text can be divided into three sections: an introduction (1-3), a part concerning the greatness of martyrdom in response to three questions (quid sit, quantum sit, cui rei prosit; 4-12) and finally a part on the foundation of martyrdom (13-24). In fact already in this text there are the principal components of the definition of martyrdom: the suffering, the blood and the crown. The author praises the greatness of the glory which Christ gives to his disciples after having suffered for him. That is to say that the full meaning of martyrdom cannot be understood without reference to Christ. Therefore, martyrdom is first of all the confession of faith in Christ: quod confessio vocis unius Christi perpetua confessio seruetur (see Lk 12:8). Such a confession has the particularity of being the moment of manifesting the virtues so as to participate in eternal felicity while the enemies of Christ are consumed by eternal fire. Yet the martyr truly acquires a dignity for all eternity (dignitas martyrii). Everything depends on the level of our love for Christ: the more we love him, the more we are able to imitate his love for us (1 Cor 7:7; 1 Cor 11:1). Therefore, the martyrs are pushed by divine love to become imitators of Christ, pouring out their blood for him (pro eo fundere sanguinem metius). The author radicalizes his teaching, saying that those who love Christ do not love the world (qui amat Christum, non amat saeculum). In short, the foundation of martyrdom is love for Christ. Only those who truly love Christ can die for him. Since, in imitation of Christ, the martyr accepts torments to receive the title of inestimable glory linked to the resurrection (Col 2:20), martyrdom is a title of glory (titulus gloriae) and of dignity (titulus dignitatis), which cannot be obtained without corporal torments (Mt 19:29).

CPL 58; PL 4, 816-834; CPPM 4559; W. Hartel: CSEL, 3, 3 (1871) 26-52; H. von Soden, Die Cyprianische Briefsammlung. Geschichte ihrer Entstehung und Überlieferung, Leipzig 1904 (= TU, N. F. 10, 3), 214-216 (pls. IV and V); H. Koch, Cyprianische Untersuchungen, Bonn 1926, 334-357; Patrologia I, 600-601; G. Mercati, Opere minori 2, ST 77, 184-191; Eng. tr.: R.E. Wallis, ANL 13; ANF 5, 579-587; M. Bévenot, The Tradition of Manuscripts: A Study in the Transmission of St. Cyprian's Treatise, Oxford 1961; M. Bévenot, The Oldest Surviving Manuscripts of St. Cyprian Now in the British Library: JTS 31 (1980) 368-377; M. Marin, Problemi di ectdotica ciprianea. Per un'edizione critica dello pseudociprianeo de aleatoribus: VetCh 20 (1983) 141-239; L. Ferreres, Index verborum et locutionum quae in Ps. Cypriani "De laude martyrii" opuscolo inveniuntur, Barcelona 1999.

M.W. Libambu

LAUDES DOMINI (317–323). The anonymous hexameter poem in 148 verses, "located between casual poetry and the encomium of a mythological hero" (Smolak), is the first example in Latin of a poetic account of a nonbiblical miracle. It is a miracle which took place in the region of the Edui in *Gaul: a man puts his deceased wife in a large sepulcher, where he reserves a place for himself as well. At his death, the tomb is opened and the woman greets her husband with a hand gesture. The macabre narratio, under many aspects already medieval, is interpreted as a testimony of the imminent second parousia. Starting from the miraculous event, the poet sings the praises of the Lord and of his redemptive work. The poem, stitched with Virgilian reminiscences, finishes with the prayer to Christ, that he may assure victory and joy to emperor *Constantine, in virtue of his exemplary conduct of life and pro-Christian legislation (v. 143-148: At nunc tu dominum meritis, pietate parentem, / imperio facilem, uiuendi lege magistrum / edictisque parem, quae lex tibi condita sancit, / uictorem laetumque pares mihi Constantinum! / Hoc melius fetu terris nil ante dedisti / nec dabis: exaequent utinam sua pignora patrem!). The eulogy would be taken up and developed later by *Juvencus in the close of his paraphrastic poem (4,806-812).

CPL 1386.

Editions: PL 6, 45-50; 19, 379-386 (Arevalo); 61, 1091-1094 (Fabricius); W. Brandes, Über das frühchristliche Gedicht "Laudes Domini," Braunschweig 1887, 5-10; P. van der Weijden, Laudes Domini, Paris-Amsterdam 1967 (text, Dutch tr. and comm.); A. Salzano, Laudes Domini. intro., text, It. tr. and comm. (Università degli Studi di Salerno. Quaderni del Dipartimento di Scienze dell'Antichità 23), Naples 2001.

Studies: G. Bardy, Les Laudes Domini poème autunois du commencement du IVe siècle: Mémoires Ac. Sc. Arts B.L. de Dijon (1933) 36-51; A. Frisone, Sancti poetae: Helikon 9-10 (1969) 673-676; I. Opelt, Das Carmen De laudibus Domini als Zeugnis des Christentums bei den Galliern: RomBarb 3 (1978) 159-166; J. Fontaine, Naissance de la poésie dans l'Occident chrétien, Paris 1981, 101-102; K. Smolak, La poesia cristiana latina tra il quarto e il quinto secolo: Salesianum 62 (2000) 26.

A.V. Nazzaro

LAUDES EUNOMIAE. A Parisian MS of the 11th c. (Parisinus 8319) has transmitted two short poems to us, in which the praises of Eunomia, who consecrated herself to God, are sung. The title of the first is Laus domnae Eunomiae sacrae virginis. It is composed of five distichs (Incipit: Plena Deo, moderata animo . . .), and resolves into a paraphrase of the concept of the wise virgin (Mt 25:1-13). The other component, of 25 somewhat irregular verses (Incipit: Fulgens Eunomia decensque virgo), sings the glory of the blessed woman and ends with a prayer. In the context allusions are not absent to the nobility, perhaps even royalty, of Eunomia's origins. There are no proofs that this is Eunomia, daughter of the rhetor Nazarius of Bordeaux (4th c.).

CPL 1422a; PLS 3, 1430; ICL 12055; F. Bücheler - A. Riese, Anthologia latina, I, 2, Leipzig 1906, 252, nr. 767-768; E. Galletier, Panégyriques latins, II, Paris 1952, 147; L. de Camargo Schnetzer, Ensaio sobre a historia da moral e da arte lirica na Grecia: Rev. Hist. 37 (1968) 3-31 (also discusses Eunomia).

L. Dattrino

LAURA (λαύρα = narrow path). A monastery, esp. in Palestine, composed of a group of single cells for semihermits united under the guide of a single superior, therefore like a village of monks with the church at the center. The cell dwellers met together only on Saturday and Sunday to celebrate the liturgy and receive the Eucharist which they carried with them. Later the term laura came to indicate also the grand monasteries. The oldest and most famous lauras were built in Palestine in the 4th–5th c. by *Euthymius and by his disciple *Sabas, defender of *Chalcedonism, founder of the Great Laura called Mar Saba. The separation of the *Origenist monks from the Great Laura gave rise to the New Laura to the S of Bethlehem. The role played by these lauras in the defense of Chalcedonism and in the Origenist question is important.

Cyril Scythop., Vita Sabae 90; Evagrius Schol., HE 2,21 (PG 86, 2477-2478); EC 7, 858-860; DACL 8, 1961-1988; DIP 5, 499-500; J. Pargoire, L'Église Byzantine de 527 à 847, Paris 1905; L. Duchesne, L'Église au VIe siècle, Paris 1925; Y. Hirschfeld, The Judean Desert Monasteries in the Byzantine Period, New Haven, CT 1992.

M.G. Mara

LAURENTIUS, antipope (d. after 507). At the death of Pope *Anastasius II (d. 498) there were two factions in *Rome: one favorable to the Eastern politics of the deceased pope and the other against. The pro-Byzantine party elected the presbyter Laurentius, titular of St. Prassede (22 Nov 498), while the other, on the same day, nominated the deacon *Symmachus at St. John Lateran. As uproar broke out in Rome between the two factions, the Arian king *Theodoric called the two contenders together at *Ravenna, where Symmachus was recognized as pope. He called a council in Rome which met 1 March 499, and in which Laurentius also participated as priest of St. Prassede. He signed the Acts (Mansi 8, 235) and then accepted the bishopric of Nocera in Campania. The opposition to Symmachus continued, encouraged by Probinus and Festus; the two senators actually achieved the return of Laurentius in 502, who proceeded to take possession of all the churches, except St. Peter's, which remained loyal to Symmachus; Laurentius was excommunicated in a Roman synod. There followed years of anonymous writings and accusations, struggles and massacres before Theodoric, convinced by the Alexandrian deacon Dioscorus, in March 507 recognized only Symmachus, and Laurentius was constrained to retire to the villa of his friend Festus. Thus the Laurentian Schism was ended, and its supporters gradually diminished; peace returned completely only under Hormisdas (514–523). A follower of Laurentius made a version of the Liber pontificalis, of which remain part of the biography of Anastasius and material against Symmachus (LP I, 44-46).

LP I, XLIII-XLIV; 44-46; III, 88-90; EC 8, 1545; L. Duchesne, L'Église au VIe siècle, Paris 1925, 113-128; Fliche-Martin IV, 424-437; A. Alessandrini, Teodorico e papa Simmaco durante lo scisma laurenziano: Archivio Soc. rom. di Storia Pat. 67 (1944) 120-207; R.I. Harper, Theodoric and the Laurentian Schism: An Aspect of Fifth Century Church and State: Southern Quarterly 4 (1965) 123-143; Ch. Pietri, Le sénat, le peuple chrétien et les partis du cirque à Rome sous le pape Symmaque (498-514): MEFR Ant. 78 (1966) 123-139; P.A.B. Llewellyn, The Roman Church during the Laurentian Schism: Priests and Senators: ChHis 45 (1976) 417-427; T. Sardella, Società, Chiesa e Stato nell'età di Teoderico. Papa Simmaco e scisma laurenziano, Soveria Mannelli 1996; Epapi I, 473-475; PCBE 2, 1244-1246.

A. Di Berardino

LAWRENCE (Laurence) (1st half of 5th c.). Bishop of Novae, on the lower Danube (lower Moesia; now Svishtov, Bulgaria), at the beginning of 5th c. One of the few Latin writers of Eastern Romania (CPL 644-645; PL 66, 89-124), author of the tracts De poenitentia and De elemosyna; translator of *John Chrysostom (De Chananaea: CPG 4529). He insists on the remission of sins not through the sacred minister but by the means of good works. God has determined two periods of penitence, one from Adam to Christ and the other from Christ onward, through *baptism (remissio publica), while remissio privata is the fruit of penitence. We know no more of him, but today a number of scholars identify him with Lawrence, third bishop of Novara.

G. Morin, L'évêque Laurent de "Novae": RSPh 26 (1937) 307-317; DSp 9, 402-404; J. Gribomont: Novarien. Ass. Studi di Novara 18 (1988) 151-180; LTK³ 3, 687 (Laurence of Novara).

J. Gribomont

LAWRENCE (Laurence), Roman martyr (d. 258)
I. Biography - II. Archaeology

I. Biography. Lawrence was inserted as a martyr in the Depositio martyrum* 10 Aug; as deacon (archdeacon in the second family of MSS) in the Mart. hier. The two documents mention his tomb in the Via Tiburtina, with the second adding a cemetery named after him. *Constantine had a basilica built ad corpus (eius). *Prudentius dedicated to him his second "crown" (Perist. 2), in which the martyr is presented as the first of the Levites. In these documents the oldest facts about his cult are to be found, which already show some development: martyr, deacon, archdeacon. This progression seems to owe to legends which grew up around the saint. Their primitive form is attested by St. *Ambrose of Milan, by Prudentius as already noted, by *Augustine of Hippo, by *Maximus of Turin and by *Peter Chrysologus. We find echoes of it in the oldest liturgical books of *Rome (Sacr. Leon.), *Gaul (Miss. Goth.) and Spain (Orat. visig.). In these Lawrence is archdeacon of Sixtus II (257–258), who distributes the wealth of the church to the poor, and suffers martyrdom on a gridiron: in all probability, however, he was decapitated together with Sixtus, as were the other contemporaneous martyrs. In all these accounts we find already the famous dialogues between Lawrence and the pope, the judge and the executioner. In ca. 500, the passion was incorporated into the cycle of Polychronius, which combines in a vast narrative, in episodes, details of the Roman saints (and non-Roman saints), from the end of July to the middle of August. To the Constantinian basilica dedicated to him, the foundations of which were rediscovered during World War II, another basilica was added underground by *Pelagius II (579–590). The present basilica, oriented in the opposite direction to the latter, is from the 13th c. In Rome, the cult of the saint saw a great flowering; no fewer than 34 churches bear his name. From Rome, the cult spread across the West.

AASS Aug. 2, 1735, 485-532; BHL 708-712; ad novum Suppl. (1986) 518-521; P. Franchi de' Cavalieri, S. Lorenzo e il supplizio della graticola: RQA 14 (1900) 159-176; Id., Note agiografiche 5, ST 27, 65-82; 33, 147-178; AB 51 (1933) 34-98; DACL 8, 1917-1961; LTK³ 6, 88-89; BS 8, 108-129; LCI 7, 374-380; LMA 5, 1757ff.; R. Krautheimer, Corpus basilicarum christianarum Romae, 2, Rome 1962, 1-146; A. Amore, I martiri di Roma, Rome 1975, 95; V. Saxer, Morts, martyrs, reliques en Afrique chrétienne aux premiers siècles, Paris 1980, 204-206, 212-216, 225-227; E. Giannarelli - A. Benvenuti, Il diacono Lorenzo fra storia e leggenda, Florence 1998.

V. Saxer

II. Archaeology

1. Shrine. The Depositio martyrum* and the Mart. hier., as also the itineraries for the city of Rome of the 7th c., are in agreement in placing the tomb of Lawrence in the Via Tiburtina. According to sources, including a Passio (perhaps of 5th c.) and the Liber pontificalis, the remains of the martyrs were placed in agrum Veranum, within the crypt of a cemetery subsequently named after him. Near the tomb and above ground, supra arenario cryptae, the emperor Constantine had a basilica built (LP I, 181), spoken of by the sources until the mid-9th c., when Leo IV (847–855) restored it, and of which we have only a few vestiges. It was a large building, referred to often as basilica maior, with three aisles, the lateral aisles continuing around the apse, so making a continuous ambulatory: a cemeterial basilica of the so-called cruciform type, its particular planimetry, recalling a circus, corresponding to a very limited group of basilicas built in the Roman suburbs at the time of Constantine and his successors. The emperor also undertook work on the tomb of Lawrence, probably surrounding it with plutei and decorating it with marble, but this work, set out in the Liber pontificalis, cannot easily be reconstructed. Constantine then constructed grados ascensionis et descentionis, two flights of stairs, one to descend to the tomb of the martyr and the other to ascend, so making access easier for visitors by creating a one-way route which was both rapid and direct. At the end of the 6th c., Pope *Pelagius II (579–590), probably following a rockslide which had affected the cemetery area around the tomb of Lawrence, built a new basilica, this time ad corpus—i.e., immediately over the tomb—destroying in the process a part of the galleries of the catacomb which surrounded the crypt of the martyr and cutting into the adjacent hill. Pope Honorius II (1216–1227) made a radical transformation, building a new church to the W of the Pelagian basilica: the structure of the 6th-c. basilica, its apse having been demolished, became the presbytery of the new basilica. Several times restored over the course of the centuries, and particularly after the devastating bombing of 1943, the present basilica of St. Lawrence Outside the Walls is formed substantially from the Pelagian-Honorian complex.

2. Iconography. In the depictions of St. Lawrence in the first centuries of Christian art, the saint always appears as young, with an ample tonsure, with or without beard. Frequent attributes are the cross carried on the shoulders, the triumphant sign of the martyr as a perfect imitator and follower of Christ (trophaeum Christi); the book, sign of a deacon, but taken along with the cross evocative also of the doctrine and the faith for which Lawrence had suffered martyrdom; and the gridiron, instrument of his passion. With cross and book Lawrence appears in a picture in the catacomb at Albano (Rome) from the end of the 5th c. (M. Marinone, La decorazione pittorica della catacomb di Albano: RIA 19-20 [1972-73] fig. 20), one of the earliest images of him; it is also the first iconographic evidence in the West of the deacon's stole (M. Marinone, Un'antica testimonianza iconografica sull'uso della stola diaconale in Occidente: EphLit 90 [1976] 87ff.). The catacomb of St. *Januarius in Naples contains a fresco (6th–7th c.) depicting Lawrence with the crown of martyrdom in his hands, symbol of victory and of his heavenly reward (U.M. Fasola, Le catacombe di S. Gennaro a Capodimonte, Rome 1974, 102, fig. 69). The oldest representation of the martyrdom of Lawrence, even if the triumphal meaning of the scene prevails over the narrative intention, is believed to be a lunette mosaic in the mausoleum of Galla Placidia in *Ravenna, where the holy deacon is pictured next to a gridiron (F.W. Deichman, Frühchristliche Bauten und Mosaiken von Ravenna, Baden-Baden 1958, plates 5-7; F. Bisconti, Dentro e intorno all'iconografia martiriale romana: dal "vuoto figurative" all'"immaginario devozionale," in Martyrium in multidisciplinary perspective. Memorial Louis Reekmans, Leuven 1995, 291). In fact, a brief note in the biography of Sylvester in the Liber pontificalis reveals that the decoration which Constantine provided for the tomb of Lawrence included scenes relating to his passion (LP I, 181). We find a representation analogous to that of the mausoleum of Galla Placidia, even if more complex and rich in detail, in the Sucessa gold medallion once kept in the Vatican Museums where a figure identified with Lawrence is stretched out on a gridiron between two executioners, in the presence of a magistrate; its authenticity, however, is much in doubt (F. Bisconti, Riflessi iconografici del pellegrinaggio nelle catacombe romane, in Akten des XII. Internationalen Kongresses für Christliche Archäologie, Münster 1995, 552ff.). From the end of the 6th c. there is the splendid mosaic image in the absidal arch of the basilica of St. Lawrence Outside the Walls, from the time of Pelagius II (579–590) (G. Matthiae, Mosaici medievali delle chiese di Roma, Rome 1967, 152ff.). A depiction of Lawrence has also been identified in the catacomb of St. Valentine in Rome, in the fresco of a procession of saints in the vestibule, from between the middle of the 7th and the first years of the 8th c. (Nestori, 2, n. 1; J. Osborne, The Roman Catacombs in the Middle Ages: PBSR 53 [1985] 312). More evidence of the vast popularity of Lawrence's cult is to be found in his frequent appearances on so-called gold glass, where a glass container is decorated with a thin layer of gold, not only for the purposes of decoration, but also—esp. when decorated with images of saints and martyrs—for protection of the loculi in the catacombs (see C.R. Morey, The Gold-Glass Collection of the Vatican Library with Additional Catalogues of Other Gold-Glass Collections, Vatican City 1959, nn. 36, 40, 240, 283, 344, 460).

On the shrine: R. Krautheimer, Corpus basilicarum christianarum Romae, II, Vatican City 1962, 1-147; G. Matthiae, San Lorenzo fuori le mura (Le chiese di Roma illustrate, 89), Rome 1966; S. Serra, San Lorenzo fuori le mura, in L. Pani Ermini (ed.), La visita alle "Sette Chiese," Rome 2000, 101-112.

On the iconography: DACL 8, 1925ff.; EC 7, 1542ff.; BS 8, 121ff.; LCI 7, 374ff.; L. Réau, Iconographie de l'art chrétien, III: Iconographie des saints, Paris 1958, 789ff.; G. Kaftal, Iconography of the Saints in Central and South Italian Schools of Paintings, Florence 1965, 644f.

M. Marinone

LAWRENCE (Laurence) of Canterbury (saint; d. 619). Priest and monk, probably of St. Andrew's on the Caelian (Rome), Lawrence was sent with other monks to Britain in 597 in the first mission planned by Pope *Gregory the Great (d. 604) for that region. In 601 he returned to ask the pope for new missionaries, and then went back to the island with a second group of monk-evangelizers and the archiepiscopal pallium for St. *Augustine of Canterbury (d. 604/605), with whom he was by then the principal collaborator. With Augustine he is considered one of the first founders of the church in England, developed on a monastic model. From 26 (28?) April 604/605 he was archbishop of *Canterbury, succeeding Augustine. As bishop in an Anglo-Saxon area, Lawrence did not succeed in overcoming differences with the Britons in respect to liturgical rites, esp. in relation to the date of Easter, as we see from a letter sent in the years 610–618, inviting the Britons to accept Roman usages. Lawrence always remained faithful to Rome. In 616 he met with a series of difficulties with King Eadbald of Kent, supporter of paganism; Lawrence therefore relocated to Gaul, but an appearance of St. Peter, reproaching him for his departure and abandoning his diocese, caused a rapid development of the situation. The king converted, and Lawrence took up his pastoral activity once more. He died 2 Feb 619, and on that day is celebrated locally in the liturgy.

Bede the Venerable, Historia ecclesiastica gentis Anglorum, I, 27,33; II, 4-7 (ed. B. Colgrave - R.A.B. Mynors), Oxford 1969, 78, 114, 144-148, 152-156; William of Malmesbury, De gestis pontificum anglorum, I; PL 179, 1443AB; BHL 4741-4742; EC 7, 1548; P.B. Gams, Series episcoporum ecclesiae catholicae, Regensburg 1873-1886 (anastatic reprint Graz 1957), 182; P. Grosjean, Recherches sur les débuts de la controverse pascale chez les Celtes, 6. Le Faust de 606 prouvient-il de Cantorbéry? Date de la lettre des SS. Laurent, Mellitus et Justus aux Irlandais: AB 64 (1946) 231-239; BS 8, 129-134; PCBE 2, 1261-1263; L.E. von Padberg, Mission und Christianisierung: Formen und Folgen bei Angelsachsen und Franken im 7. und 8. Jahrhundert, Stuttgart 1995, 247-248.

R. Grégoire

LAWRENCE (Laurence) of Milan. Bishop of Milan (486–508; on his dates, see Stein-Palanque, 127, n. 1).

*Ennodius of Pavia, his relative and for some time his secretary, gives us scanty and allusive hints as to his life and activity (see Dictio I: PL 68, 263-267; and Carmina II, 8, 12, 56 and 60 and elsewhere: see index of CSEL 6, 624-625). Lawrence, once elected bishop, found himself involved in the fight between *Odoacer and *Theodoric, lending his support to the latter, for which he was consigned to prison; he was freed after the victory of Theodoric. With *Epiphanius of Pavia he went to *Ravenna to ask Theodoric to revoke a particularly vexing law (see Ennodius: CSEL 6, 363). In the Roman schism, following the election of *Symmachus, Lawrence supported Symmachus against the priest *Laurentius and also helped him financially in his journey to Ravenna. He participated in the three sessions of the Roman synod of 502, convened by the king, to end the Roman schism. He was the first to sign the synodal decision of 23 Oct 502. He devoted himself to charitable works, and undertook construction and restoration projects in *Milan. He was patron of a certain *Arator, probably the poet; he fostered education by founding a school of higher learning in Milan.

BS 8, 148-149; PCBE 2, 1239-1242; F. Savio, Gli antichi vescovi d'Italia. La Lombardia, I, Milan 1913, 32-33, 185-217; F. Lanzoni, Le Diocesi d'Italia, Faenza 1927, 1021-1023; E. Stein - J.-R. Palanque, Histoire du Bas-Empire, Paris-Bruges 1949; Storia di Milano, I, Milan 1953, 382-390, II, Milan 1954, 3-22; M. Cagiano de Azevedo, Milano da Sant'Ambrogio a Desiderio: Notizie Chiostro Monastero Maggiore 3-4 (1969) 35-52.

A. Di Berardino

LAY – LAYMAN – LAITY. The word lay (layman/laity) is borrowed from the Greek λαικός and the Latin Graecism laicus which derives from the substantive λαός ("people"). The category "people" has great importance in the OT, in the relationship which Israel has with YHWH and in the relationship which it has with other peoples. In Ex 19:5-6 one reads, in the promise made by God to Moses: "If you wish to hear my voice and preserve my covenant, you will be for me a possession among all the peoples, because all the earth is mine! You will be for me a kingdom of priests and a holy nation"; and in Dt 7:6, in the speech given to the people by Moses, before dying, to remind them of past events and to increase their fidelity to the covenant of Sinai, it is written: "You are a people sacred to the Lord your God; the Lord your God chose you to be the privileged people among all the peoples who are on the earth." The vocation and the promise of God are thus addressed to Israel as a "people." For the service of the sanctuary, however, just one tribe is chosen, that of Levi, and just one family, that of Aaron, receives the priestly function with a special consecration.

When, with the passage of time, worship came to be celebrated in a single temple, the temple of Jerusalem, it was given exclusively to the high priest to offer the sacrifice in the holy of holies, one single day of the year, the solemn day of atonement. In this way the high priest was clearly separated from the priests in general, and the priests as well were separated from the people, even if the sacerdotal function is certainly intended to render glory to God (but no less to open to the people the possibility of communion with God and communion with all). In the NT the word laos indicates either Israel or the church (see Acts 18:10; Rom 9:25; Heb 4:9; 1 Pet 2:10), while the word laikos does not appear. Jesus does not belong to the tribe of Levi, and therefore he is not a priest acc. to the law, and no one believes him to be one in the events of his life nor in his death, which took place outside of any ritual environment, an object of execration, not a source of blessing for the people. He is never named "priest" (hiereus), except in the letter to the Hebrews, in which he is designated "priest" acc. to an order superior to that of Aaron; and his sacrifice is said to be offered once for all time. Other NT passages attribute (common) priesthood to the entire community of the believers, in a collective aspect, through participation in the mission of Christ, without any attempt to put this in relationship with the apostolic—or, if one insists, ordained—ministry, understood as the power of representing the mediation of Christ. In the NT, however, the term klēros does not designate that part of the community which has the responsibility for governing, but that portion of men and women who participate in the promise of God from the moment in which they are marked by the seal of the Spirit. To be sure, the klēros as a whole is entrusted to the care of "overseers," of "elders," who have nothing to do with the Jewish priests and who come from the people. Within its context, however, multiple functions flourish which correspond to vocations or often to charisms received from above.

If the OT maintains a system of separation—between priesthood and laity, between worship and life—the NT suppresses this system and replaces it with a dynamism of participation and communion. Christ became similar to and supportive of all; fulfilling the will of the Father, he became obedient to death on the cross. Two characteristics therefore distinguish his offering: fellowship, which brings with it the shared responsibility for the good of all, and filial obedience. And these seem to be the characteristic traits of life in the early church, even for the laity.

To mention just a few authors, the word laikos in Christian literature appears for the first time, as far as we know, in *Clement's Letter to the Corinthians (40,5), dating to the end of the 1st c. The term, referred to people and not to things, is used in relationship with the Jewish sacerdotal hierarchy and indicates a category of persons in relationship with the sacerdotal category. The author exhorts the preservation of the order established in the church of God, acc. to which everyone should fulfill a function which is different but nevertheless complementary toward those exercised by other members of the same body. The focal point remains that of achieving harmony, of realizing unity, acc. to the divine plan.

An aspect which *Ignatius of Antioch, at the beginning of the 2nd c., and *Justin (after the middle of the 2nd c.), emphasize: no separation is made within the community, to which everyone belongs through baptism not as an isolated individual but as a person who is part of a body. Around AD 220 the situation, acc. to surviving evidence, was changing. *Clement of Alexandria distinguishes the laity from the clerics—divided into "presbyters" and "deacons"—but associates them all with the same discipline.

For the first time in the *Latin of Christians, the word laicus occurs with *Tertullian, formally borrowing from Greek in a rather interesting context. He exalts the figures of the confessors and the martyrs—who are usually laypeople—who reveal the work of the *Holy Spirit and are considered charismatic people. To the martyrs in particular is reserved the gift of prophecy, independent of the function which they exercise in the church. In two writings which are separated by some years, the De praescriptione haereticorum and the De pudicitia, he raises an important question, which concerns our subject, that of the relationship between the institutional church and the church of the Spirit. In the first of the two treatises Tertullian affirms that all the churches have their origin from the apostles and take the faith from there; therefore, all are first, all are apostolic; they constitute a single church, of which tradition is the hinge, and of which the successors of the apostles, i.e., the bishops, are guarantors. In the De pudicitia, a work which expresses Tertullian's new position in favor of *Montanism, he rejects the institutional church and appeals to a church of the Spirit, to whose authority alone he recognizes potestas, incarnated by the new prophets. The ordained ministry is put aside to leave space for charisms, and the ius sacerdotale is assigned even to lay men and women.

The Syriac Didascalia* (2,34,5ff.; 35,1ff.), composed toward 230, insists on the submission of the laity to the bishop and on their duty to bring him the fruits of their labor (in this way the ordained ministry is relieved from material preoccupations) and on the necessity of not judging the way in which the bishop himself manages the property offered to him; but the same work (see 2,26,1) addresses the laity, calling them the "elect church of God"—"catholic church, sacrosanct, royal priesthood, holy multitude, chosen people, bride adorned for the Lord God."

With *Cyprian, in the middle of the 3rd c., the church appears clearly structured: the presbyters must dedicate themselves to divine worship and not be distracted by profane occupations; they are distinct from the plebs ("common people"), whose consensus nevertheless takes on notable importance in moments, even decisive ones, of the life of the community, next to the council of priests and deacons formed around the bishop. In the 3rd c. emerges therefore, in my judgment, the question of the position of the laity, at the time in which the church defined itself better as an institution. This happened because of organizational necessity, due also to a period of peace and religious tolerance which made it easier to increase the number of faithful, but posed serious problems for those responsible in the Christian community. Other elements, however, seem to have influenced this process: the OT model which showed a separation between the priestly caste and the people; the form of Roman society and its pyramidal organization; the suggestion deriving from *Platonic and *Neoplatonic philosophical reflection with its structure directed from above to below. (*Dionysius the Areopagite shows the ecclesiastical hierarchy as an image of the celestial hierarchy.)

Critics have interpreted this ecclesiastical course in different ways: some have emphasized the contrast between NT times and the later centuries characterized by a grave antinomy between clerics and the laity, as if the people of God were divided into two parts, almost as if the hierarchy found itself systematically opposed to the laity. Other scholars have noted that, if in the earliest period, the accent on Christian identity prevailed—i.e., on the awareness of belonging to a single body in a dimension of both mystery and communion—between the end of the 2nd and the beginning of the 3rd c. there appeared the category of laypeople, distinct from that of priests and deacons. This did not, however, eliminate the consciousness of belonging to the same mysterious reality, which has its focal point in baptism, that link of grace with the Lord Jesus, through the participation in the triple munus as priest, prophet and king. It is enough to think of the weight of the Christian plebs, also in later times, in the choice of bishops and, esp., outside the church, of the essential role which, from the earliest periods, the laity had in "mission"—i.e., in the spread of the gospel message, which has marked its history.

With the "Christianization" of the empire the process of distinction and distancing between clergy and laity accelerated, starting from the legislation emanating from Constantine which created many privileges for ordained ministers: their education and even their lives were influenced by it; their status was defined; the steps of the clerical cursus were defined; the churches governed by them received economic goods and landholdings; the number of priests multiplied, so much that not a few bishops worried about the phenomenon, which of itself made the fulfillment by the laity of functions and services rendered to the community diminish (it is significant that, in the middle of the 5th c., Pope *Leo I forbade anyone, monk or lay, to teach or preach in his church, except for the ministers of the altar [see Epist. 119,6]; an expression which suggests that in certain churches and on certain occasions the laity also taught or preached, as some ancient sources attest). It is not by chance that in this new situation an extraordinary flowering of forms of monastic life took place, already present for some time in the Christian world. These, in the variety of their expressions, have a challenging character: They show a movement of protest of the "secularization" of the clergy; they give rise to a demanding ascetical conception of baptism; and they recover a strong eschatological sense. Originally monasticism was a lay estate and did not wish to give rise to any other spirituality than that inspired by the gospel, understood in its radical simplicity. Later, esp. in the West, the monk was ordained, and this did not always take place in view of a community to serve. For its part, monastic spirituality exercised a strong influence on the fabric of the church and offered itself as an example for all its members, even for the laity. To the prevalence of a clergy which marginalized the laity, was added, on the side of spirituality, an essentially monastic approach, which in the end reduced the laity to a "minority," preventing them from creating the conditions necessary for the development of their own potentialities. With the fall of the political, civil and social structures of the Roman Empire, in the West the classical school system, which had lasted until that time, disappeared. Episcopal, monastic and presbyterial schools were born, which had the goal of receiving young men destined to become priests or monks and of furnishing them first with a religious education, which was also joined with an elementary literary education, otherwise unobtainable. The language, too, marked this situation: litteratus corresponds to clericus; illiteratus or idiota or rudis corresponds to layperson. (And among the "clerics" should be counted in the first rank the monks who transmitted the classical and patristic heritage—Greek and Latin—to medieval Christianity; a privilege which was not limited to just male monasteries, but extended to female ones as well.)

Despite the conditions which have been mentioned, in the church no one lost the sense of the essential unity of the people of God, the faith in the one and equal church, in which the laity as priests, kings and prophets have a post of honor the same as all the baptized, and the bishops and priests, without forgetting the ministry which they fulfill, also belong to the people of God. *Augustine of Hippo, e.g., makes himself a spokesperson for the latter reality when in a sermon (340,1), turning to his people, he observes: "It terrifies me what I am for you, while it consoles me what I am with you. Because, for you I am a bishop, with you I am a Christian. The former is a name of an assumed office, the latter of grace; the former is a name of danger, the latter of salvation." It is like an underground stream which runs hidden to reemerge in the early and then later Middle Ages. Think, e.g., as early as the 9th c., of Jonah of Orléans and of his De institutione laicali, a true "code" of spirituality for the layperson, which corresponds to the Rule of Aachen for the ordo clericorum or to the Benedictine rule, compliance with which was imposed on all monks. Think, later, toward the middle of the 12th c., of the Epistula apologetica of Anselm of Havelberg, who emphasized that what was important was not the "state of perfection," but the "perfection of the state"—i.e., the response to the will of God and to the personal vocation. Or again, think of the Liber de aedifixio Dei, where Gerhoch of Reichersberg brings to light the responsibility that all Christians have through their baptims. Think of the great ecclesiastical reforms of the 11th and 12th c. and also of the blossoming later of lay movements of great importance. To understand these events it is perhaps necessary to distinguish a sociological level—on which there is indeed a separation between the clerical or monastic state and lay state—from a spiritual level—on which, despite everything, no fractures take place or even substantial situations of "inequality" and where the substantial unity of the people of God is recognized as well as the "equality" which reigns between the baptized in building up the body of Christ, despite the distinction of functions.

M. Yves - J. Congar, Jalons pour une théologie du laïcat, Paris 1953; E. Lanne, Le laïcat dans l'Église ancienne, in var. aus., Ministères et laïcat, Taizé 1964, 105-126; H.-I. Marrou, Histoire de l'Éducation dans l'Antiquité, Paris [6]1964 (It. tr., Rome [2]1994) 431ff.; F.L. Pizzolato, Laicità e laici nel cristianesimo primitivo, in var. aus., Laicità. Problemi e prospettive, Atti del XLVII Corso di aggiornamento culturale dell'Università Cattolica, Milan 1977, 57-83; A. Vanhoye, Prêtres anciens, Prêtre nouveau selon l'Ancient Testament, Paris 1980 (It. tr. Leumann [Turin] 1985); A.M. Erba, in var. aus., Dizionario di spiritualità dei laici, Milan 1981, s.v. Laico (storia del), 369-373; J. Gaudemet, I laici nei primi secoli della Chiesa: Communio 13/83-84 (1985) 12-25; A. Faivre, Les laïcs aux origines de l'Église, Paris 1984 (It. tr. Cinisello Balsamo 1986); J. Fontaine, The Practice of Christian Life: The Birth of the Laity, in var. aus., Christian Spirituality: Origins to the Twelfth Century, New York 1985, 453-491; P. Siniscalco, Laici e laicità. Un profilo storico, Rome 1986; A. Faivre, Naissance d'un laïcat chrétien. Les enjeux d'un mot: FZPhTh 33 (1986) 391-429; P. Siniscalco, I laici nei primi secoli del cristianesimo, in Il laicato nella Bibbia e nella storia, ed. P. Vanzan, Rome 1987, 91-105; P. Bovati, I laici nell'Antico Testamento, ibid., 29-45; A. Vanhoye, I laici nella Lettera agli ebrei, ibid., 47-56; M. Adinolfi, I laici nella Prima lettera di Pietro, ibid., 57-66; E. dal Covolo, I laici nella chiesa delle origini, in var. aus., Laici per una nuova evangelizzazione, Leumann (Turin) 1990, 41-54; A.M. Ritter: TRE 20, 378-385 (bibl. on p. 383-385); A. Faivre, Ordonner la fraternité. Pouvoir d'innover et retour à l'ordre dans l'Église ancienne, Paris 1992 (large bibl. on p. 455-511); M. Vergottini, La teologia e i "laici." Una ipotesi interpretativa e la sua recezione nella letteratura: Teologia 18 (1993) 166-186; P. Siniscalco, Universalità e nazioni in scrittori cristiani antichi. Qualche osservazione a partire dai termini "laos" e "ethne" in Paolo, in var. aus., Atti del I Simposio di Tarso su S. Paolo Apostolo, Rome 1993, 31-45; Laici e laicità nei primi secoli della Chiesa, ed. E. dal Covolo - F. Bergamelli - E. Zocca - M.G. Bianco, Milan 1995; J. Werbick: LTK[3] 6, 589ff., s.v. Laie.

P. Siniscalco

LAYING-ON of HANDS. The laying-on of hands (or of one hand) is a gesture with several meanings adopted by the Christian communities for almost all sacred rites: the act of baptism, exorcism, the reconciliation of penitents, confirmation, several blessings (of the sick, monastic rituals), but esp. for conferring ministries. The laying-on of hands preexisted in the pagan and Jewish religions. Here the presence of the rite will be treated in Judaism and Christianity.

Judaism. The basic meaning of the laying-on of hands can be summed up as a blessing (a symbol of the grace granted by God, and not the communication of a fluid, as in paganism). The oldest example is Jacob imposing his right hand on Ephraim and his left on Manasseh, while crossing his forearms (Gen 48:14). The laying-on of hands is also found in the context of sacrifices (e.g., Lev 1:4; 3:2-13; 4:4-33) or the apotropaic rite of reconciliation in which the high priest lays hands on the scapegoat loaded with the sins of Israel, which is then chased into the wilderness (Lev 16:21), or as a gesture that confers the spirit (Num 27:21).

NT writings. The laying-on of hands is an act of blessing (Mk 10:16) and a gesture of healing (e.g., Jesus in Mk 6:5; Lk 4:40; the disciples in Mk 16:18; Acts 28:5). The hands are imposed in order to confer a ministry (the seven elders in Acts 6:1-6; other examples: 1 Tim 4:14; 2 Tim 1:6)—but not to confer a charism (1 Cor 12). Hands are imposed as well to give the Spirit (which, in the NT sources, is not to be confused with a charism; Acts 8:15-17; 19:6).

Western liturgies. The laying-on of hands is the privileged gesture of all major ritual acts: in the rite of Christian initiation hands are imposed on the catechumens (Apos. Trad. Coptic 19), at the time of the baptismal act itself (Apos. Trad. Frag. Veron. 21 manum habens in caput eius impositam, baptizet) and confirmation (Apos. Trad. Frag. Veron. 21: oleum sanctificatum infundens . . . et imponens manum in capite). *Tertullian identifies the imposition after baptism with the bestowal of the Spirit (De bap. 8). The bishop lays hands on penitents to reconcile them (e.g., Stat. Eccl. Ant. 20: reconciliari per manus impositionem; cf. Cyprian Ep. 19,2; 74,1). *Augustine describes this act as a prayer that gives the *Holy Spirit (De bap. 3,16,21). Throughout the course of their penance, priests lay their hands on penitents at specified intervals. In the West, orders properly so called (bishops, priests, deacons) are conferred by the laying-on of hands (Stat. Eccl. Ant. 90-92), but not the lower ministries, contrary to the practice in the East, where the imposition of hands is used for the creation of ministers as a whole, but with two radically different meanings: the laying-on of hands, given inside the sanctuary (altar), is currently defined as cheirotonia in the case of major orders, and as cheirothesia, conferred outside the sanctuary (altar) in the case of a subdeacon, lector, monk or the abbot of a monastery. The imposition of hands is frequently depicted in Christian iconography in the wider context of gestures of the hand or hands: the posture of the orans, dexterarum iunctio in marriage, and later joined hands, Maiestas Domini, Dextera Dei and the laying-on of hands proper.

DTC 7, 1302-1425; DACL 7, 391-413; RAC 13, 402-482; F.J. Dölger, Der Exorcismus im altchristlicher Taufritual, Paderborn 1909; J. Coppens, L'imposition des mains, Paris 1925; J.A. Jungmann, Die lateinischer Bussriten, Innsbruck 1932; L. de Bruyne, L'imposition des mains dans l'art chrétien ancient: RivAC 20 (1943) 113-278; E. Lohse, Die Ordination im Spätjudentum u. im NT, Göttingen 1951; M.A. Siotis, Die klassische und die christliche Cheirotonie in ihrem Verhältnis, Athens 1951; C. Vogel, Chirotonie et chirothesie: Irenikon 45 (1972) 7-21, 207-238; M. Paternoster, L'imposizione delle mani nella Chiesa primitiva.

Rassegna delle testimonianze bibliche, patristiche e liturgiche, fino al sec. quinto, Rome 1977 (²1983); J.K. Coyle, The Laying on of Hands as Conferral of the Spirit: Some Problems and a Possible Solution: SP 18/2 (1989) 339-353; G. Cavalli, L'imposizione delle mani nella tradizione della chiesa latina: un rito che qualifica il sacramento, Rome 1999.

C. Vogel - A. Fitzgerald

LAZARUS, RISEN (iconography). A demonstration of faith in the omnipotence of Christ and in the certainty of the resurrection after death, the resurrection of Lazarus was not represented in conformity with the complex gospel account. In fact, Lazarus is represented normally as a mummy (in the most ancient representations he can be nude: Rome, cemetery of *Callistus, cubiculum A6 of the sacraments: 3rd quarter of the 3rd c.), standing on the threshold of a funeral monument, which from the 4th c. perhaps recalls the tomb venerated in Bethany, and is in front of Christ armed with the virga or represented in the act of speech, and accompanied or not by one or both of the sisters and by some apostles. (In the cemetery of Via Dino Compagni at Rome he is surrounded by a crowd of people: cubiculum C, 2nd quarter of 4th c.) Wilpert lists more than fifty examples in painting (e.g., Rome, cemetery of Sts. Peter and Marcellinus: 2nd half of the 3rd c.; cemetery of Priscilla, Greek chapel, cemetery of Callistus, so-called red sepulcher: 2nd half of the 4th c.) and as many on *sarcophagi (e.g., Rome, Museo Pio Cristiano Vat., the so-called sarcophagus of Jonah: last decade of the 3rd c.; ibid., the so-called sarcophagus of the two brothers: in the aedicule Lazarus is missing, 2nd third of the 4th c.; ibid., the so-called dogmatic sarcophagus: 2nd quarter of the 4th c.). The scene was etched on inscribed tabulae (Rome, cemetery of Priscilla: end of the 3rd. c.), represented on lamps (*Carthage, *Alexandria in Egypt), on gilded glass (Rome, Bibl. Vat., Museo Sacro, collection of gray glass plates, Lazarus is lying down; ibid., cup collection), on ivories (Brescia, Museo Cristiano, lipsanoteca: 4th c.; ibid., diptych of Boethius, painting on reverse: 6th c.; Milan, Tesoro del Duomo, diptych: 5th c.), on works of goldsmithery (Brivio, silver capsella: 5th c.), or even woven on fabric acc. to *Asterius bishop of Amasea (PG 40, 166). Perhaps from *Trier is the decoration of the sarcophagus of *Paulinus, of which a pierced clipeus is preserved with Christogram and a garland with Alpha and Omega, a scene of the original *sin and one of the resurrection of Lazarus (Frühchristliche Zeugnisse 71). He appears also in biblical cycles, as attested by, among others, the distich written by Prudentius for a basilica of *Saragossa (PL 60, 106) and the mosaic scene in St. Apollinare Nuovo at Ravenna (6th c.). In contrast, the purple Codex of Rossano follows the text of John (grotto, Christ with the apostles, the two sisters, two Israelites who flee in terror, while another, holding his nose, looses the bandages of Lazarus: 6th c.), on which depends the Coptic Gospel of the Bibl. Nat. of Paris (ms. copt. n. 13, fol. 253V).

E. Iosi: EC 7, 995f.; H. Meurer: LCI 3, 33-38; Wp 40-1; G. Schneider-Graziosi, Il labaro costantiniano e la risurrezione di Lazzaro sopra due marmi del cimitero di Priscilla: NuovoBullArchCr 19 (1913) 131-141; Ws II, 302-3; E. Mâle, La résurrection de Lazare dans l'art: Rev. des Arts 1 (1951) 44-52; R. Darmstädter, Die Auferweckung des Lazarus in der altchristlichen und byzantinischen Kunst, Bern 1955; A. Hermann, Ägyptologische Marginalien zur spätantiken Ikonographie: JbAC 5 (1962) 60-66; Frühchristliche Zeugnisse im Einzugsgebiet von Rhein und Mosel, ed. Th.K. Kempf - W. Reusch, Trier 1965; J.St. Partyka, La résurrection de Lazare dans les monuments funéraires des nécropoles chrétiennes à Rome, Varsovie 1993; TIP 201-2.

G. Santagata

LAZARUS of Pharp (Łazar Pʻarpecʻi; 2nd half of the 5th c.). Author of a History of the Armenians between 387 and the death of Peroz king of Persia (484), which sought to extend the Histories of *Agathangelus and of *Faustus of Byzantium. He also composed a long letter to the governor Vahan Mamikonian, in which he defends himself from accusations of heresy and irregular conduct leveled at him by a group of rival clerics.

Bardenhewer V, 187-189; Patrologia V, 603; R.W. Thomson, The History of Łazar P'arpec'i (Occasional Papers and Proceedings), Atlanta 1991; B. Owlowbabyan, Łazar P'arpec'i, Hayocʻpatmowtʻyoun; Tʻowłtʻ Mamikonyanin (Lazzaro di Parp, Storia degli armeni; Lettera a Mamikonean) (Erevani Petakan hamalsaran), Erevan 1982; V. Langlois, Collection des historiens anciens et modernes de l'Arménie, II, Paris 1869, 253-368.

S.J. Voicu

LEANDER of Seville. A Latin ecclesiastical writer (Cartagena ca. 545–Seville ca. 600), Leander, on the death of his father, became the head of his family, taking care of the education of his younger brother *Isidore. After embracing religious life, he strove to spread Catholicism among the *Visigoths, succeeding in converting Hermengild, son of king *Leovigild, who in 582 took up arms against his rebel son and had him killed and ordered that Leander be exiled to *Constantinople. (There Leander met *Gregory the Great, who dedicated the Moralia in Iob to him.) A little later, however, Leovigild repented and recalled the bishops exiled by him, and entrusted his son

*Recared to Leander (from 584 archbishop of Seville), in order that he guide him in the difficult succession and initiate him into the Catholic faith. The new Sevillian bishop called the 3rd Council of Toledo (589), which, among other things, officially ratified the conversion of King Recared.

His epistolary and the anti-*Arian works have been lost. Only two writings have reached us: the closing discourse of the 3rd Toledan Council (In laudem Ecclesiae) and a monastic rule (De institutione virginum) dedicated to his sister Florentina, a significant work in the context of ascetic literature and valuable for the familiar tone and the acute observations contained in it.

Taking part in the opposition between Hispano-Roman and barbarian culture, between the Catholicism of the dominated and the Arianism of the dominators, Leander found himself at the roots of that evolutive process which would make of Spain a unitary state both on the religious and the political level. The importance of Leander's historic role was recognized less by his brother Isidore than by Pope Gregory the Great, whose friendship and esteem led him to carry out decisive actions in the events of Spain in the 2nd half of the 6th c. The conversion of the Visigoths, brought about under Leander, opened a new phase of Spanish history: the racial, cultural and religious fusion would be very rapid, and in the successive centuries the Hispano-Roman aristocracy would boast of their descent from the Goths.

At the time, Leander saw only the positive aspects of the event: this is clear not only from his closing discourse at the Council of Toledo but also from the response of Gregory the Great to one of Leander's letters in which he informed him about the conversion of the king and the council itself (Greg. M., Reg. Ep. 1,41). The eloquence of Leander has been compared, with obvious exaggeration, to that of *John Chrysostom: the bishop of Seville, buoyed by the successes of the present, raised a hymn to the unity of the church, neglecting to point out the policy of Recared which tended to absorb the church into the state, a policy that would give rise to the established Visigothic church centrifugal thrust from Rome.

Leander passed the last decade of his life rather in shadow. Information about it is almost nonexistent. Dying around 600, he left the contest with Arianism successfully concluded, but that between church and state as unresolved as ever.

CPL 1183-1184; PL 72, 873-898; 84, 360-361; A.C. Vega, El "De institutione virginum" de S. Leandro de Sevilla, El Escorial 1948; J. Madoz, De inst. virg.: AB 67 (1949) 407-424; J. Campos - J. Roca, Santos Padres Españoles, II: San Leandro, San Isidoro, San Fructuoso. Reglas monásticas de la España visigoda, Madrid 1971; J. Madoz, Varios enigmas de la "Regla" de San Leandro descifrados por el estudio de suas fuentes: Misc. G. Mercati I, Rome 1946, 265-295; A. Mundò, Il monachesimo nella penisola iberica: Sett. Studi Spoleto IV, 1957, 73-108; K. Schäferdiek, Die Kirche in den Reichen der Westgoten . . . , Berlin 1967; E.A. Thompson, The Goths in Spain, Oxford 1969; B. Jiménez Duque, La espiritualidad romano visigoda y mozárabe, Madrid 1977; R. García-Villoslada, ed., Historia de la Iglesia en España, I, Madrid 1979; L. Navarra, Interventi di Leandro di Siviglia negli sviluppi storici e religiosi della Spagna visigotica: aspetti positivi e limiti: SSR 4 (1980) 123-134; Id., *In margine a due citazioni di Isaia nell'*Homilia in laudem Ecclesiae di Leandro di Siviglia: SMSR 11 (1987) 199-204; J. Velázquez Arenas, Index grammaticus del De Inst. Virg. de san L. de S.: Faventia 10, 1-2 (1988) 81-102; Id., Las citas bíblicas del De inst. virg. de san L. de S.: Mélanges V. Bejarano, II, Barcelona 1991, 799-811; U. Domínguez del Val, Historia de la antigua literatura latina hispano-cristiana, II, Madrid 1998, 431-478; Leandri Hispalensis Episcopi De inst. virg. et contemptu mundi: léxico Latino-Español, M. Martínez Pastor (ed.), Hildesheim-Zürich 1998; A. Gómez Cobo, La Homelia in laude Ecclesiae de Leandro de Sevilla: estudio y valoración, Murcia 1999.

L. NAVARRA

LECTIO DIVINA. This expression of the Rule of St. Benedict (48,5) indicates a monastic exercise of great spiritual and cultural importance, the daily application of several hours to the reading of the Bible and (Rule, ch. 73) to the greatest monuments of the tradition of the Fathers. This is the effect and the cause of the monastic libraries, with a well-regulated substantial plan, with alternating prayers (esp. liturgy) and work (permeated with *meditation which prolongs reading and prayer). In the Middle Ages an entire humanism derived from this, which is today not lacking in appeal. Lectio divina is not properly study; it is linked to a synthesis of the love of letters and the desire for God; literary delight for its own sake is felt as a guilty distraction, but its subordination to true piety favors and legitimizes authentic taste, the spiritual sense of beauty and openness of the person to the maturity of brotherhood and to whatever related to the Word of God, starting from grammar and music (psalmody). What had damaged the classical pretensions to culture had been the cult of form, of convention, as well as the vanity of the rhetor; humility, sincerity and the search for God were the remedy which allowed recovering what was valuable in it.

Long before the appearance of the Benedictine formula, this private exercise can be recognized in the spread of the communitarian lectio of the Bible. Some psalms, such as 19 (18) and esp. 119 (118), were already not only its subject matter, but also its means of expression, as was a large part of the Wisdom literature. Whatever the veneration of the Greek philologians for Homer, of the philosophers for Plato or Pythagoras, their lectio of the authors was never able to create within an audience the same disposition to listen. One might, with better reason, compare the Christian lectio with the Buddhist or Islamic familiarity with the sacred texts, despite the many differences which should be attentively observed. Within the church the first group in which a continual and devout reading of the Bible can be found is probably that of the disciples of *Origen; his extraordinary influence on preaching and theology is well known. Certainly they practiced, on a grand scale, textual criticism (see *Hexapla) and philosophical reflection; but when these sciences are subordinated to an encounter with God and a reading of faith, do they perhaps counter lectio divina? To judge from the results, one might believe that also *Tertullian, *Cyprian, *Hilary and other teachers had an analogous familiarity with the sacred books; for *Ambrose and *Augustine the fact is well documented.

The texts concerning Egyptian hermits seem to suppose that they read little, meditated continually on texts heard in liturgical events or learned by heart, and gave voluntarily to the poor the price of their only book. But in this point of view there is perhaps something systematic and excessive. In *Pachomian monasticism a rule foresaw a penance for whoever left his own book open, at noon, to the sun; and the catecheses of the superiors are full of various biblical citations, esp. of the prophets and the sapiential books. At a perhaps modest level, they appear to live completely apart from secular culture, as it seems. But do hagiographic documents tell all? The so-called gnostic library of *Nag Hammadi must have belonged to Pachomians, as documents found in their bindings demonstrate. Was this still lectio divina?

The direct heir of the Origenist tradition would be *Jerome (and his friends, like *Rufinus). D. Gorce has brought out remarkably the enthusiasm displayed by the the circle of devout women from within the Roman aristocracy for biblical culture and the spirituality which promoted the multiple editions and translations of this group. In contact with the Greek Christian libraries, this enthusiasm demonstrated a breadth of views much larger than the purely monastic environments, thus constituting a reserve which the West would draw on for centuries. It must moreover be confessed that the munificence of the holy noblewomen permitted the reservation of much time for study and assured furthermore the multiplication of the copyists. *Basilian monasticism, with its insistence on labor and on charitable works, left perhaps less space for intellectual activities. The intellectual stature of the Cappadocians or of *Evagrius seem to constitute an exception in this environment. As the Byzantine world suffered less decline than the West, the monks did not see themselves constrained to collect secular culture and join it with the spiritual and liturgical tradition. Nevertheless, ascetic and hagiographic literature, christological controversies and sacred poetry found in the Byzantine monasteries also implies a field which supposed a real cultural quality.

In the churches of Syria and of Armenia, one of the most fertile and intelligent occupations was the translation and assimilation of Greek Christian literature; an osmosis followed which would last longer than in the West.

Without identifying it with lectio divina, the artistic vitality in the various regions of the Christian world manifested in turn the breadth of knowledge, their perfect assimilation, the human equilibrium reached by a Christian culture of which this was, with its voluntary (and involuntary) renunciations, the principal instrument.

DSp 9, 470-487; D. Gorce, La "lectio divina." S. Jérôme et la lecture sacrée, Paris 1925; H. de Lubac, Histoire et esprit, Paris 1950.

J. Gribomont

LENT. The term Lent derives from the Latin quadragesima, which in turn corresponds to the Greek noun tessarakostē—i.e., "a period of forty days/the fortieth day." This term was used in the 4th c. with two distinct meanings; it can refer to (1) the period that unites *Easter to the Feast of the Ascension, or the very day of the *Ascension; (2) a period of *asceticism that precedes Easter. The latter is the meaning drawn from the majority of its occurrences, esp. in the 1st half of the 4th c. To emphasize the framework of issues that concern the origin and meaning of Lent, it would be good to present a few preliminary clarifications. In the first place, one should emphasize that different terms can also refer to Lent from tessarakostē, e.g., to tessarakonthēmeros askēsis, a phrase that appears in *Eusebius of Caesarea's De solemnitate paschali. Second, one should note that two occurrences of the term have raised many questions among scholars and are actually excluded by the majority of scholars from those that are useful for reconstructing the history of Lent: (1) the occurrence in *Origen's Homilies on Leviticus (X, 2), in which he emphasizes that Christians have different periods of fasting, Lent included (habemus enim quadragesimae dies ieiuniis consecratos, habemus quartam et sextam septimanae diem ["we have days consecrated to fasting for Lent, we have the fourth and sixth day of the week"]), a claim that is considered by many to have been *Rufinus's interpolation into Origen's text; (2) that of the 5th canon of the Council of *Nicaea (325), which recommends that church authorities hold the first of two annual synods before the "tessarakostē of Easter," an expression which, from a quick comparison with the conciliar practice of the 4th and 5th c., seems to be interpreted in reference to the Ascension. Last, obstacles to the reconstruction of this period's understanding of asceticism have been posed by the disconcerting varieties of Lenten practice such as one attested to by *Socrates (HE V, 22), when he affirmed that at *Rome fasting was done for three weeks, with the exception of Saturday and Sunday (which seems to be erroneous); that the Christians of Illyricum, *Greece and *Alexandria prolong the period for the six weeks that preceded Easter. Others, however, though they began seven weeks before Easter, fast three weeks, each for five days. Having completed this imprecise list of Lenten practices, he asks how such diverse practices could pass under the same name of tessarakostē, a quandary that was also shared by *Sozomen (HE VII, 19,7-9), who added a very significant detail for us; namely, that at *Constantinople Lent lasted seven weeks.

As one can see, this period of asceticism has raised not a few problems since antiquity as well as the practice and meaning to which modern research has added a few more problems: the question of its genetic relationship to the period of prepaschal fasting; the relationship between its content and the variety of its practice; and last, its original position in the calendar of the liturgical year. The idea that Lent was an expansion of fasts of the Paschal Triduum or Holy Week today does not find supporters, because it is clear from the sources that Lent was qualitatively different and, even with respect to its content, cannot be reduced to these. However, to better address such questions it is helpful to deal briefly with the first reliable evidence with respect to the practice of Lent that we have, such as that provided by *Eusebius of Caesarea in his De solemnitate paschali, a work edited some time after the Council of Nicaea, which refers to a period of six weeks, probably including Holy Week; by the festal letters of St. *Athanasius, the chronology of which, recently established, allows one to maintain that Athanasius was not only familiar with the observance of Lent at Rome during his second exile (starting from 339/340), as was believed for a long time, but was actually aware of it a few years earlier, in the initial phase of his episcopate, if not entirely before. Both authors did not understand by the term Lent a fast that lasted forty days, but a forty-day period of asceticism that included fasting as its central element, along with prayer, vigils, acts of charity and the welcoming of strangers. From Athanasius we gather that fasting must be interrupted on Saturday and Sunday and that the last week of Lent coincides with Holy Week. Both in the writings of Athanasius and in Eusebius, Lent has as a model the fasting of *Moses and *Elijah, while the reference to *Jesus' fasting in the desert appears only later in the writings of other authors. From these early testimonies, one can conclude that originally there was no mathematical correspondence between the "forty days" of the Lenten period and the number of days of actual fasting: rather, it was a period of asceticism that included fasting, among others practices (V. Peri).

There are various theories with regard to the origin of Lent and its place in the calendar of the liturgical year. Precisely in relation to Athanasius's Festal Letters (acc. to the old chronology) and the practice of baptism in *Alexandria, a new hypothesis has been proposed that has found great success among scholars in liturgical studies. R.-G. Coquin has collected a series of statements offered by medieval Egyptian authors, from the 9th to the 14th c., who attempted to describe the original order of the liturgical time starting from *Epiphany, the feast of Jesus' baptism: acc. to such authors, Lent in ancient times was observed starting from the day after Epiphany, in conscientious imitation of Christ who, once baptized, went into the desert, and that Lent concluded with the conferral of baptism on catechumens, although the week of Easter was celebrated separately and without baptism; only at a later time did Lent join with Easter week. Coquin hypothesized that this information can have some foundation, and he connected this liturgical reform to the paschal question debated during the Council of Nicaea. T.J. Talley followed Coquin on this path but with a very different conclusion. Talley emphasized the fact that there is no evidence concerning the paschal celebration of baptism at Alexandria: this absence, strengthened by other arguments, lends credence to the post-Epiphany placement of the original Lent. Despite the success of this hypothesis, it has been demonstrated that some of its most important elements lack any substantial foundation. The evidence of the aforementioned medieval Egyptian authors derives this from a totally abstract form of reasoning worked out by the same authors: because in *Egypt the baptism of Jesus was celebrated on 6 Jan, from this fact the medieval authors could conclude that the original Lent, conceived precisely as a memory of Jesus' fasting in the desert after his baptism, must be practiced starting from 7 Jan. The other factor that makes this hypothesis less convincing is that there is no lack of evidence concerning the conferral of baptism in Egypt during Easter.

According to other authors, Lent was instead a period of fasting—arising in some areas between the 3rd and 4th c. and made official at Nicaea or shortly after—that would always be, by its nature, tied to the chronologically adjustable feast of Easter. More recently, C. Renoux maintained, based on a hypothesis concerning the chronology of the Homilies on Samuel preached by Origen at Jerusalem and the information of the lectionaries that can be attributed to the same city, that there had to exist in the diocese a cycle of readings read, we do not know with what frequency, for a period of forty days. In sum, *Jerusalem, and nearby Caesarea of which Eusebius spoke in his work on Easter, could have been at the origin of a liturgical period that, characterized by specific biblical readings and conceived as a time of repentance and conversion, would have then been enriched by numerous ascetical practices, in particular, fasting. Nevertheless, H. Buchinger has raised a few doubts on this reconstruction.

It is precisely the contradiction noticed between the terms tessarakostē and the actual number of days of fasting, generally less, as well as the push toward ever more demanding forms of asceticism that catalyzed already in the 2nd half of the 4th c. this stiffening of Lenten practice. In the East, e.g., at Constantinople and *Antioch, the six weeks did not include Holy Week, but preceded it, thus altogether forming a period of seven weeks. Later, during the Byzantine era, this cycle of seven weeks was made to be preceded by an eighth week, in which a partial form of fasting was begun that only took into consideration abstention from meat. At *Jerusalem, on the explicit evidence of the Peregrinatio Egeriae (27,1), as early as the end of the 4th c. the Lenten period would last eight weeks even if subsequent evidence attests that in the 5th c. it consisted of seven weeks (or was reduced to this number). In Egypt, the passage from a length of six weeks to eight occurred in the 1st quarter of the 7th c., shortly before the Arab invasion. At Rome, the typical six weeks of the Alexandrian model were not prolonged by a few days, and the interruption of fasting occurred only on Sunday, and not also on Saturday, although *Milan even in this regard seems to have followed the Alexandrian model more closely.

C. Callewaert, La durée et le caractère du carême ancien dans l'Église latine, in Id., Sacris Erudiri: fragmenta liturgica collecta, Steenbrugge 1940, 449-506; A. Chavasse, La préparation de la Pâque à Rome, avant le Vᵉ siècle, jeûne et organisation liturgique, in Mémorial J. Chaine, V, Lyon 1950, 61-80; Id., La structure du carême et les lectures des messes quadragésimales dans la liturgie romaine: La MaisonD 31 (1952) 76-119; V. Peri, Lo stato degli studi intorno alla origine della Quaresima: Aevum 34 (1960) 525-555; R.-G. Coquin, Une réforme liturgique du Concile de Nicée (325)?, in Académie des inscriptions et Belles-lettres - Comptes rendus, Paris 1967, 178-192; E. Lanne, Catéchèse et initiation chrétienne dans la tradition pachômienne, in Mystagogie. Pensée liturgique d'aujourd'hui et liturgie ancienne, Conférences Saint Serge, 39ᵉ Semaine d'Études liturgiques, Paris 1990 (It. ed. A.M. Triacca - A. Pistoia, Rome 1993, 145-162); T.J. Talley, Le origini dell'anno liturgico, Brescia 1991; A. Camplani, La Quaresima egiziana nel VII secolo: note di cronologia su Mon. Epiph. 77, Manchester Ryland Suppl. 47-48, P. Grenf. II 112, P. Berol. 10677, P. Köln 215 e un'omelia copta: Augustinianum 32 (1992) 423-432; Id., Sull'origine della Quaresima in Egitto, in Acts of the Fifth International Congress of Coptic Studies, Rome 1993, II, 107-121; M. Metzger, Le lien du carême à Pâques dans les Constitutions apostoliques: Ecclesia Orans 14 (1997) 71-77; C. Renoux, Origène dans la liturgie de l'Église de Jérusalem: Adamantius 5 (1999) 37-52; P.F. Bradshaw, The Search for the Origins of Christian Worship: Sources and Methods for the Study of Early Liturgy, Oxford ²2002, 183-185; H. Buchinger, Origenes und die Quadragesima in Jerusalem. Ein Diskussionbeitrag: Adamantius 13 (2007) 174-217; Id., Zur Frühgeschichte der Quadragesima: Ein neuer Blick auf ein altes Problem und seine Lösungsvoschläge: Archiv f. Liturgiew. (2005); S.J. Voicu, Da "Digiuni Santi" a "Grande Settimana": mutamenti terminologici nelle Lettere festali di Atanasio: Augustinianum 47, 2 (2007) 283-297; D.M. Gwynn, Athanasius of Alexandria: Bishop, Theologian, Ascetic, Father, Oxford 2012.

A. Camplani

LEO I, emperor of the East (401–474). Born in Thrace in 400, he was a soldier; he had obtained the rank of tribune and commanded a garrison of little importance in Selymbria, when the influential Alan general Aspar had him proclaimed emperor in 457. Leo was the first emperor of the East to be crowned by the patriarch of *Constantinople. He married Verina, the sister of *Basiliscus. After his ascent to the throne, he raised Ricimer to the dignity of patricius and Maiorianus to the dignity of magister militum; he sought to affirm his sovereignty over the empire of the West and to establish its unity with the empire of the East. He did not succeed, however, in advancing this political line very far. He proved his orthodoxy (for which the Byzantine chroniclers called him the Great) in the defense of the decisions of the Council of Chalcedon (451) against the Egyptian *Timothy Aelurus, aspirant to the episcopacy, and against the pretensions of Aspar. To counterbalance the strength of Aspar, Leo had founded, as early as 460, a new militia composed mostly of Isaurians, the excubitores. In 471 Aspar was defeated. An expedition against the kingdom of the *Vandals in *Africa, organized in 468 with great expenditure of means, failed through the ineptitude of Basiliscus, who held its supreme command. In the capital, meanwhile, the Isaurian influence had grown in place of the Germanic influence that up until then predominated. The Isaurian chief *Zeno, who had married Ariadne, daughter of Leo, became in 474 coregent with his son Leo II, and then emperor when the latter, in the autumn of the same year, died.

The emperor Leo I was above all a soldier, far from theological disputes; the dispute with his powerful patron Aspar gave him enough to do; therefore, he gave only a little attention to questions concerning the Council of Chalcedon. Timothy Aelurus thought that he could demand from Leo that he call a new council to revise the decision of Chalcedon. His insistences did not have success, inasmuch as the emperor ordered an inquiry tasked with clarifying whether Timothy Aelurus should be recognized as legitimate patriarch of *Alexandria and whether the deliberations of Chalcedon should be vigorously maintained. The responses to these requests, contained in the Codex Encyclius, pronounced against the recognition of Timothy, and only one of these rejected the Council of Chalcedon. Leo, however, applied a policy of delay and perhaps on the suggestion of the general Aspar maintained Timothy in the see of Alexandria, although the pope was pushing him to act against him. Only in 460 did the emperor decide to exile Timothy first to Paphlagonia and later to the Crimea and installed in his place *Timothy Salofaciolus, who did not succeed in restoring ecclesial unity in Egypt.

PWK 12, 1947-196. Ἐ. Καραγιαννόπουλος, Ἱστορία βυζαντινοῦ κράτους, 1, Thessaloniki 1978, 283-297; H. Jedin, Storia della Chiesa, III, Milan 1983, 4-6; K. Bihlmeyer - H. Tuechle, Storia della Chiesa, 1, Brescia 1989, 334-335.

J. Irmscher - C. Dell'Osso

LEO I, pope (440–461). Called "the Great" by posterity, Leo was bishop of Rome under rather difficult political and ecclesiastical conditions. The W part of the Roman Empire was about to collapse under barbarian invasions. Despite the external threats, the court of *Ravenna still preserved a certain authority. The situation of the court of *Constantinople was much better, but nonetheless rather confused at certain moments. Within the Christian community, in addition to the imposition of the principle of traditional orthodoxy, a life was affirmed whose forms, both liturgical and disciplinary, were organized by fixed formularies and precise canons, and theology was taking stock on the most fundamental questions; i.e., the *incarnation and the relationship between divine grace and human liberty. Cultural life was still flowering, as in particular the contemporary monuments of Ravenna and Rome itself demonstrate.

In contrast with the historical importance of the Late Antique period in which Leo lived, his biography is poorly known, esp. the years prior to his episcopate. Biographical information, rather scarce, emerges from some hints in the Liber pontificalis,* from some references of *Augustine, *Prosper and *John Cassian and esp. from the letters emanating from the pontifical chancellery. From these documents his Tuscan origin is clear and that he received, probably at Rome, an optimal education. As a young cleric, it seems, he was sent in 418 to *Carthage. Named archdeacon around 430, he carried out an important activity at the Roman episcopal curia. He induced John Cassian to refute the *Christology of *Nestorius. He convinced the bishop of Rome to engage more in the battle against *Julian of Eclanum and even contacted *Cyril of Alexandria in this matter. Sent on diplomatic mission to Gaul, he learned there that he had been elected successor of *Sixtus III. He was ordained bishop of Rome 29 Sept 440. His episcopal ministry, to which he applied himself from the beginning with all pastoral care, took place on different levels. In the first place, Leo acted as bishop of the Roman community: in his preaching, and in the organization of the liturgy and monastic life. In particular he took a position against the *Manichees, present in Rome, obtaining against them in 445 from *Valentinian III the renewal of the old anti-Manichean laws. He also embellished houses of worship, as the inscriptions of the Lateran basilica and on the triumphal arch of St. Paul still attest today.

His activity for orthodoxy and ecclesiastical discipline in the W part of the Roman Empire was no less important. This is attested by the letters written to different bishops on the date of baptism (Ep. 16), on the conditions of clerical life and the administration of ecclesiastical property, the interventions against *Pelagianism (Ep. 1 and 2) and *Priscillianism (Ep. 15), as well as the epistles which concern the relationships both with *Arles and with *Thessalonica.

The relationships with the Eastern churches took place almost exclusively on the level of universal communion in the faith, more exactly concerning the controversies before and after the Council of *Chalcedon (451) and at the same council (Ep. found in the conciliar acts). Among these letters stand out esp. Ep. 28, the so-called Tomus ad Flavianum* (449); Ep. 102-106, 114, in which Leo congratulates the Eastern authorities and the synodal fathers for the success of the council and communicates its results to the Western bishops; Ep. 124 in which he admonishes the Palestinian monks to accept fully the faith of Chalcedon; and Ep. 165 in which, writing to the emperor Leo, he defends the synodal decisions as conforming to the *Nicene faith and the entire tradition (458).

Fighting almost his entire life for orthodoxy and the peace of the church, Leo never ceased acting also on the political plane, as the situation of the "imperial church" of that time demanded. In the West he did not limit himself just to working for the unity of the faith, foundational as it was for political unity. He acted also for his fellow citizens menaced by the *Hun and *Vandal invaders. In the relationships with the civil authorities he encountered a favorable attitude at the court of Ravenna (v. Ep. 11). The relationships with the court of Constantinople were rather different. In the ecclesiastical field itself Leo had to leave the initiative largely to the imperial authorities. He did not hesitate to recognize even a certain sacerdotal dignity to the emperor, whose duty was to exert himself for the concordia of the churches in the interest of the empire itself. Nevertheless, refusing can. 28 of Chalcedon, Leo did not fail to remind *Marcian of the distinction between religion and the state, demanding liberty of action for the church and affirming with vigor the primacy of the apostolic see. All this pastoral action was always animated by a lively awareness of papal dignity and authority. Requesting acknowledgment of his high mission in service of all the churches, he never forgot his total dependence on Christ, true Lord of the church. This dialectic, which has been described as moderatio (H. Rahner), characterized his attitude toward his high calling that directed his entire life, both on the practical and on the doctrinal plane.

The documentation to which we owe our knowledge of the life and thought of Leo consists essentially of letters and sermons. These writings are distinguished by refined style, by rhythmic prose, by purity of language, by concise expression and clarity of ideas. In them, by means of Latin rhetoric, he reaches a perfect coalescence between theological and spiritual content. It is in fact a characteristic of Leo to be able to express acc. to the Roman style the Christian ideas which were dear to him and which he had taken above all from *Ambrose and *Augustine. The letters, in the composition of which the apostolic chancellery obviously collaborated, have been preserved in different canonical collections, whose beginnings date back certainly to the times of Leo himself. This fact, which includes many problems of authenticity and of textual criticism, should not be neglected, if one desires to reach a just evaluation of Leo's papacy itself. Unfortunately a complete critical edition of Leo's letters is still lacking. The sermons, however, which concern the entire liturgical year of the Roman community of that time, are today accessible in a modern critical edition, in which some sources are indicated (Augustine, *Chromatius, *Gaudentius etc.) as well as their use in the letters of Leo himself. Further study of their relationships with the liturgy and the Bible, as well as Roman rhetoric, is, however, necessary.

Despite their clear and exquisite form, the writings of Leo could not be said to contain a very original theology. Nevertheless, thanks to their concise character they allow a better affirmation of certain ideas of the Latin theological tradition, esp. of Augustinian thought. This is true in his methodological approach to interpreting the narratio of the facts of salvation history and to undersanding the relationship between reading of the Bible and liturgical celebration. In his dogmatic approach, two aspects are fundamental. On the one hand, Leo developed a synodal practice that could be understood both on the local and Western level and on the universal level. He recognized in particular the right of the emperor to call and direct the universal synod and sanction its decisions. Despite accepting the singular authority of the Council of Nicaea he was open to conciliar pluralism. Defending the authority of Chalcedon, he put the council of 451 on the level of that of Nicaea (Sieben). On the other hand, he confirmed his dogmatic positions using patristic texts, attributing a particular authority to the fathers of the church (cf. Ep. 165,10; see *argumentation, patristic). As for the doctrinal content, although following the tradition strictly, adhering both to the consensus omnium, as well as the norma vetustatis, Leo was able to provide extensive evidence for certain fundamental doctrines. In the christological field, partially using Eastern sources as well, he reached a notable equilibrium between the duality of the natures and the unity of the person. Nevertheless, he did not succeed in making explicit how the unity of Christ is founded on the fact that only the second person of the *Trinity was incarnated (Serm. 64,2). When he presented his Christology in a liturgical context, he was able, in contrast, to emphasize in the clearest way possible its soteriological implications. This is true even in the sense that he returned continually to speak of the presence of Christ, Lord and Savior, in the church. United intimately to its head, the church never ceases to be a communion of saints, built and nourished by the sacraments, rendered effective by the priesthood of Christ himself (Ep. 80,2; 108,2). The presence of Christ is finally the raison d'être of the universal ministry of the bishop of Rome. Being the vicar and heir of Peter, united in a unique way to Christ, the pope guarantees the integritas of the church, both on the level of the communio sacramentorum and on that of the societas sanctorum. However, he does it also in the concordia sacerdotum (Ep. 14,11), together with the collegium caritatis (Ep. 5,2; 6,1; 12,2). Finally, it is obvious that Leo has developed in a Roman way precisely this doctrine concerning the trilogy of Christ, Peter and pope. He demonstrates in this field his moderatio, resting the authority of the bishop of Rome on the Nicene canons as they had been received by the Roman tradition (corpus romanum of *Serdica) and considering the favorable result of the Council of Chalcedon as a new epiphany of Christ.

Posterity has venerated Leo as a fascinating preacher and an organizer of the Roman liturgy. Above all, it has seen in him the great ancient promoter of the Roman primacy and the pope of the council of 451. According to E. Caspar, Leo, attached to the ecclesiastical tradition, earned the title of "Great" less than *Gregory I, oriented toward the future. H. Rahner, in contrast, underlines his singular moderatio.

CPL 1656-1661; PL 54-56; PLS 111, 329-350; A. Chavasse, S. Leonis M.R.P. tractatus septem et nonaginta: CCL 138 and 138A (1973). For the partial ed. of the letters and the modern tr., see Patrologia III, 566; It. tr., ed. M. Naldini et al., 6 vols., Florence 1997–. BS 7, 1232-1278; HDG III/2a, 200-212. E. Caspar, Geschichte des Papsttums 1, Tübingen 1930; T. Jalland, The Life and Times of St. Leo the Great, London 1941; A. Lauras, Études sur S. Léon le Grand: RSR 49 (1961) 481-499 (review bibl.); Patrologia III, 557-578 (large bibl.); J. Fellermayr, Tradition und Sukzession im Lichte des römisch-antiken Erbdenkens, Munich 1979; P.A. McShane, La Romanitas et le Pape Léon le Grand, Paris 1979; H.J. Sieben, Die Konzilsidee der Alten Kirche, Paderborn 1979; P. Stockmeier, Leo: M. Greschat (ed.), GK 11, Stuttgart 1985, 56-70; B. Studer, Una persona in Christo: AugR 25 (1985) 453-487; Id.: TRE 20 (1990) 737-741; W. Blümer, Rerum eloquentia, Frankfurt 1991; M. Naldini (ed.), I sermoni di Leone Magno fra storia e teologia I, Florence 1997, bibl., ed. G.M. Vian, 215-244; L. Casula, La cristologia di san Leone Magno. Il fondamento dottrinale e soteriologico, Milan 2000 (bibl.); LACL (2002) 447-449; M. Ronconi, A maiestate humilitas*: il rilievo della retorica nella teologia di Leone Magno*, Rome 2005.

B. Studer

LEO II, pope (682–683). A Sicilian like his predecessor *Agatho (678–681), he was consecrated a year and a half after the death of the latter, after the return to *Rome of the delegates of the 6th ecumenical council at *Constantinople and the confirmation of the papal election on the part of the emperor Constantine IV Pogonatos. Leo ratified the decrees of the council, which included the condemnation both of *monothelitism and of Pope *Honorius I (625–638), judged guilty of negligence for not having stifled the monothelite heresy in its infancy. In a letter to the emperor the pope does not, however, consider Honorius a heretic, as in contrast the anathemas of the council declared. Other letters of Leo refer to conciliar decisions, aimed at illustrating and spreading them. With this pontifex a period of understanding and harmony with the Byzantine court and the church of the East began for Rome and Latin Christianity, after preceding tensions and misunderstandings. Leo also took care of propagating in the West the Acts of Constantinople, sending the "regionary notary" Peter to Spain so that he might consign them to the king and Hispanic clergy for their approval and implementation. At Rome Leo rebuilt the ancient diaconia of St. George in Velabro and restored the church of St. Bibiana. The Liber pontificalis records his eloquence and knowledge of the Scriptures, of Greek and of chant, together with his charitable efforts for the poor.

CPL 1738; PL 96, 399-420; Mansi 11, 1050-1058; LP I, 359-362; Jaffé I, 240-41; Hfl-Lecl 3, 512-515; H. Quentin, Les originaux latins des lettres des papes Honorius, S. Agathon et Léon II relatives au monothélisme, Misc. Amelli, Montecassino 1920, 71-76; DTC 9/1, 301-304; BS 7, 1280-1282 (P. Rabikauskas); J.N.D. Kelly, Oxford Dictionary of Popes, Oxford-New York 1986, 78-79; Dizionario storico del Papato (Ph. Levillain), II, Milan 1996, 848-849; LTK[3] 6, 822 (G. Schwaiger); EPapi I, 617-620 (E. Susi).

M. Spinelli

LEO III the Isaurian. Emperor of Constantinople (717–741). Of Syrian (and not Isaurian) origin, he was born in a humble family at Germanicia (Commagene), from where, around 690, he moved with his parents to Thrace. Made prōtospatharios by Justinian II (705–711), he was promoted to stratēgos of the Anatolians by Anastasius II (713–715), whose succession he usurped (18 April 716), having himself crowned at Hagia Sophia 25 March 717. Victorious over the Arabs with the help of the Bulgars (siege of *Constantinople, winter 717–718) and over the Khazars (in Asia Minor in 740), he tried twice to depose, even assassinate, Pope *Gregory II, who opposed his fiscal measures. His name is above all linked to the opening, in 726, of the struggle against the sacred images (iconoclasm) following the volcanic eruption of Thera (Santorini) interpreted as a divine warning. After the deposition of the patriarch St. *Germanus (January 730), Leo replied to the resistance of *Gregory III with the annexation of E Illyricum, Byzantine Italy and Sicily to the patriarchate of Constantinople, thus opening a serious schism with the Roman church.

In 711–712 he issued an edict which constrained the Jews to receive Christian baptism. In 740 he promulgated a new codex, the Ecloga. He died 18 June 741.

EC 7, 1137-1138; Cath 7, 745-746; D. Stein, Der Beginn der byzantinischen Bilderstreiten und seine Entwicklung bis die 40. Jahre des 8. Jahrhunderts, Munich 1980; ODB 2, 1208; K. Schenk, Kaiser Leon III, Halle 1880; S. Gero, Byzantine Iconoclasm During the Reign of Leo III, Leuven 1973.

D. Stiernon

LEO of Bourges (d. after 453). Bishop of Bourges in the middle of the 5th c., he composed, with Victorius bishop of Lemans and Eustochius bishop of Tours a letter ad episcopos et presbyteros infra tertiam provinciam constitutos. The three prelates had just participated in the Council of *Angers, 4 Oct 453, and gave notice of their common decision to forbid to clerics recourse to civil tribunals.

CPL 483; PL 54, 1239-1240 (in the critical ed. of Quesnel it is inserted among the Ep. Leonis). Sirmond reprinted it and restored it to Leo of Bourges: Concilia Galliae, CCL 148, 136; Duchesne, Fastes, II, 244-245; E. Griffe, La Gaule chrétienne, II, Paris 1966, 142; Patrologia III, 496-497.

A. Hamman

LEO of Sens (d. before 541). Bishop of Sens, represented by Orbatus at the Council of Orléans in 533, he personally intervened in the council of 538. He wrote a letter to Childebert (d. 538), in which he requested that the bishop of Meaux (CPL 1075) be placed under him, while the city was found in the dominion of Theudebert. He is also identified with that Bishop Leo who, with Heraclius of Paris and Theodosius of Auxerre, sent a letter to *Remigius of Reims, in 512, to protest against an overly light sanction adopted toward a priest. We possess the reply of Remigius (PL 65,966). Leo is mentioned in the Hieronymian and Roman Martyrology. His feast is celebrated 24 April.

Ep. ad Childebertum: CPL 1075; PL 68, 11; MGH, Ep. 3, 437-438; CCL 117, 489-491; BS 7, 1227-1228.

A. Hamman

LEODEGAR of Autun (d. 678). A highly regarded person with great prestige, he was elected bishop of *Autun after 660. In a council held at Autun after this date he prescribed to the monks who depended on him to follow the rule of St. Benedict. He had a role of first importance in the intricate political events of his time and for this reason entered into conflict with the master of the palace Ebroin, who had him ferociously tortured, deposed from the episcopal dignity and then killed (678). He was immediately venerated as a martyr, and his popularity was attested by a flowering of texts concerning his martyrdom. Under his name there is an extant letter, in which he, about to die, consoles his mother in tones reflecting a deep, sincere Christian faith.

CPL 1077-1079b; CCL 117, 503-508; BS 7, 1190-1193; R.E. Reynolds, Bischof Leodegar und das Konzil von Autun, in H. Mordek (ed.), Aus Archiven und Bibliotheken - Festschrift für Raymond Kottje zum 65. Geburtstag, Frankfurt 1992, 71-92; I.N. Wood, The Merovingian Kingdoms 450-751, London 1994, 113-115, 225-242; Patrologia IV, 346-347.

M. Simonetti

LEONARD, saint (6th–10th c.?; feast 6 Nov). A hermit at Nobiliacum (= S. Léonard de Noblet, Limousin), about whom there is no historical information, but only legends of the 11th c. (BHL 4862-4879). Folk veneration concerning him is rather colorful. He is regarded as the patron of the imprisoned and of peasants.

J. Gribomont

LEONIDES (2nd–3rd c.). Father of *Origen. Among the victims of the persecution of *Septimius Severus, *Eusebius (HE VI, 1-2) mentions Leonides (an Ionic form, not Leonidas which would be a Doric form), "who is called the father of Origen." Does this expression mean that Eusebius was not sure if this was really the name of the father of Origen, or that he owed his own notoriety to his son? He was decapitated, which allows us to suppose that he was a Roman citizen. Father of seven children of whom Origen was the oldest, he had instructed him in both Greek letters and in sacred letters. His martyrdom indicates that he was an important personality in the church of *Alexandria. Perhaps he was a professor of grammar (literature), and perhaps it was precisely his teaching which the son took on after his martyrdom. The latter, who in a letter to his father in prison exhorts him to courageously confess the faith, refers to his martyrdom in Hom. Ez. IV, 8.

A. Rousselle, La persécution des chrétiens à Alexandrie au III^e siècle: RD 52 (1974) 222-251; P: Nautin, Origène. Sa vie et son oeuvre, Paris 1977; E. Norelli, in Origene, ed. A. Monaci Castagno, Rome 2000, 293-294.

H. Crouzel

LEONTIUS, Armenian (d. 454). Martyr. Leontius (Łewondios or Łewondes), Vanandēcʻi, priest and disciple of *Mesrob and *Sahak: we have information about him from *Koriun (Vita di Mesrob), *Lazarus of Pharp (Armenian History 39-42), *Elisaeus (History of the Armenian War and of Vardan III, 5-8). He dedicated himself to sacred studies at *Constantinople, where he was the bearer of a letter of the Armenian bishops and priests to the patriarch *Proclus, a letter of which he is perhaps the author, on the writings of *Theodore of Mopsuestia (the letter survives in Syriac translation, ed. P. Bedjan, Le livre d'Héraclide de Damas, Paris-Leipzig 1910, 594-596; a Greek retranslation ACO IV, 2 [1914] XXXVII-XXXVIII; Fr. tr. in R. Devreesse, Le début de la querelle des Trois Chapitres: RSR 11 [1931] 550-551). Having returned home, he attended to the translation of the Scripture and of ecclesiastical authors. At the synod of *Artaxata (449) he was one of the principal supporters of the resistance to the de-Christianization decree issued by the king of Persia Yazdegerd II. After the battle of Avarair (451) he was captured together with the principal representatives of the Armenian nobility and clergy, and tried at the court of the king. Imprisoned with his companions, in 454 in a second trial together with them he refused to abjure, and suffered martyrdom after atrocious tortures. The feast of Leontius and of his companions, called "Leontian martyrs" (the catholicos Joseph, Isaac bishop of Rstunik, the priests Muse and Arsen, the deacon Kagiag), is celebrated by the Armenian church in the week after Septuagesima Sunday.

EC 7, 1169f.; BS 7, 1328-1332.

F. Scorza Barcellona

LEONTIUS, Armenian (2nd half of the 8th c.). Priest and historian, author of a History of Mahomet and of His Successors and of Their Conquests, Especially in Armenia, in which he describes the Arab occupation between 635 and 789. For the first part Leontius follows the history of *Sebeos; for the second part he presents himself as eyewitness.

Patrologia V, 604-605; G. Chahnazarian, Histoire des guerres et des conquêtes des arabes en Arménie par . . . Ghévond, vardabed arménien, Paris 1856; G. Chahnazarian, Aršavank "Arabac" i Hays arareal Łevond vardapeti Hayocʻ, Paris 1857; [K. Ezeanc'], Patmowtʻiwn Łevondeay meci vardapeti Hayocʻ, Sanktpeterburg 21887; [K. Patkan'jan], Istorija Khalifov vardapeta Gevonda, Sanktpeterburg 1862; E. Filler, Quaestiones de Leontii armenii Historia, Leipzig 1903; Z. Arzoumanian, History of Lewond the Eminent Vardapet of the Armenians, Los Angeles 1982.

S.J. Voicu

LEONTIUS, hegumen (8th c.). Hegumen monk of the Roman monastery of St. *Sabas on the Aventine and author of the biography, not very reliable with numerous anachronisms, of Bishop *Gregory of Agrigentum (BHG 707-707 and PG 98, 549-716, today edited by Berger). According to Berger it was written between 750 and 830, although there was a Leontius who took part in the Lateran council of 649. The author knew the city of Agrigentum (Vita Greg. 1: PG 98, 551); like so many other Greeks, he lived at *Rome (see PG 98, 545: the list of the abbots of St. Sabas redacted by Morcelli). According to Leontius, Gregory was born in the vicinity of Agrigentum; through papal nomination, he became bishop of Agrigentum; however, Leontius does not give the chronological coordinates to date him and not even the name of the pope in the period of the trial launched against Gregory. The text of the biography of Gregory has been abridged notably by Simeon Metaphrastes (PG 116, 189-269).

PG 98, 549-716; Leontios Presbyteros von Rom, Das Leben des heiligen Gregorios von Agrigent., crit. ed., tr and comm, A. Berger (Berliner Byzantinistische Arbeiten 60), Berlin 1994; BS 7, 169-173; Cath 5, 231-232; Patrologia V, 169-70; Leonzio, Vita di S. Gregorio Agrigentino. Intr., It. tr. and notes by D. De Gregorio, Agrigento 2000; Y. de Andia, Le monastère de Saint-Sabas à Rome: Relations théologiques entre l'Orient et l'Occident aux VIIe et VIIIe siècles: POC 50 (2000) 279-296.

A. Di Berardino

LEONTIUS, presbyter of Jerusalem (6th c.?). Some Greek MSS transmit under the name of Leontius of Jerusalem two homilies published among the spurious ones of *John Chrysostom. The two works are different in style, since In Samaritanam (PG 59, 535-542) raises literary pretensions absent from In parabolam Samaritani (PG 62, 755-758), which departs little from the *allegorical *exegesis of the parable. It is therefore probable that they are treatises of two authors of the same name. Due to their provincial MS transmission the two homilies must be prior to 700. Since it alludes to the definition of *Chalcedon, In Samaritanam must be later than the 5th c. Occasionally the homily 3, In ramos palmarum, of *Leontius of Constantinople has been attributed to Leontius of Jerusalem.

CPG 7911-7912; M. Richard, (rec. a B. Marx, Procliana . . . , 1940): Mélanges de science religieuse 1 (1944) 189, n. 4; M. Aubineau, Une enquête dans les manuscrits chrysostomiens: opportunité, difficultés, premier bilan: RHE 63 (1968) 5-26; CCSG 17, 110 and 151.

S.J. Voicu

LEONTIUS of Antioch (d. 358). Of Phrygian origin, disciple of *Lucian of Antioch. Remaining faithful to the doctrine of the master (Philost., HE 2,15), he had pro-*Arian sympathies. He was elected bishop of *Antioch in 344, after the deposition of Stephen because of a scandal. *Athanasius, who mentions him multiple times among his bitterest enemies, holds against him castration and cohabitation with the virgo subintroducta Eustolium. In 350 he presided over a council at Antioch which decreed not to communicate with Athanasius, who had returned to Alexandria, but only with George. His sympathy for Arianism reached the point that he, around 355, ordained *Aetius, leader of the radical Arians, as deacon; but faced with the reaction of the people he recalled him from office. In general he maintained a prudent attitude so as not to exacerbate the conflicts between the factions which divided Antiochene Christianity.

DCB 3, 688; F. Martin, Athanase d'Alexandrie et l'Église d'Égypte au IV[e] siècle (328-373), Rome 1996, 439 and passim.

M. Simonetti

LEONTIUS of Arabissus (today Yarpuz, in E Turkey). Bishop around 600. Two of his homilies survive on the resurrection of *Lazarus: one transmitted with lacunae, the other cited by *Photius.

P. Henry, Photius, Bibliothèque, VIII: ("Codices" 257-280), Paris 1977, cod. 272; K.-H. Uthemann, Die Lazarus-Predigt des Leontios von Arabissos (BHG 2219u): Byzantion 69 (1989) 291-353 (text and tr.: 332-353; intro.: 320-328).

S. Voicu

LEONTIUS of Arles (5th c.). Bishop of *Arles from ca. 461 to 475, after *Ravennius. In 473 (or 475) he called the Council of Arles to condemn the errors of the presbyter *Lucidus, concerning *grace and *predestination, which *Faustus of Riez had pointed out to him in Ep. 1. Pope *Hilarus wrote him various letters (Ep. 4-7. 9 = PL 58, 20-24 and 27; Jaffé 552, 553, 554, 556, 562), to resolve some cases of ecclesiastical discipline. A letter of Leontius to Hilarus is a falsification of J. Vignier (d. 1661) (PL 58, 22-23).

CPL 653a, 1662; Duchesne, Fastes I, 120-133, 257; Cath 7, 381-382 (bibl.); É. Griffe, La Gaule chrétienne, II, Paris 1966, 92, 97, 163-164 and passim.

M. Maritano

LEONTIUS of Byzantium (d. ca. 543). The problem of identifying this author remains open in our day due to the fact that the patristic sources mention various persons who in the 1st half of the 6th c. bore this name and because we do not yet have a critical edition of the works commonly ascribed to him; i.e., the Contra Nestorianos et Eutychianos (first book of the collection edited by the same author and improperly said to be his), the Dialogus contra Aphthartodocetas (the second book of the collection), the Deprehensio et triumphus super Nestorianos (the third book of the same collection), the Solutio argumentorum a Severo obiectorum and the Triginta capita contra Severum.

From the works we know that he was a "monk," "ascetic," "hermit" and named "abba Leontius"; furthermore, in the exordium of the third book of his collection the author affirms having been a young member of a thiasos of followers of *Diodorus of Tarsus and of *Theodore of Mopsuestia, from whom he later distanced himself due to the work of "heavenly grace" and with the help of some "inspired men."

Scholars generally identify Leontius of Byzantium with the monk of the same name mentioned in some documents of the era of *Justinian and in the biographies of the ascetics of the 6th c. of *Cyril of Scythopolis, acc. to which Leontius was a monk of the New Laura near *Jerusalem, disciple of *Nonnus and one of the heads of the *Origenist party in *Palestine; in 531 he accompanied *Sabas to *Constantinople on a mission to the emperor, and there he was discovered and condemned by the old man of God for having revealed his own Origenist convictions. However, his clever defense of the Council of Chalcedon won for him acclaim by authoritative persons in the court. Between 537 and 540 he was again in Palestine to support the forces of the Origenists and to favor their hegemony. In 540 he was at the head of a band of Origenist monks, who attacked with rudimentary arms the Great Laura. Only an eclipse prevented them from reducing to ruins the monastery of St. Sabas. According to Cyril of Scythopolis, he died a little after the promulgation in Palestine of the edict of Justinian against *Origen (Feb 543).

This presentation of Leontius of Byzantium as a strong Origenist activist has been questioned recently by various scholars. In this sense both the identification of Leontius with the "monk and *apocrisarius of the fathers of Jerusalem" (ACO IV, 2, 170, 5-6), present in 532 at the conference of union with the *Severians (Collatio cum Severianis) following *Hypatius of Ephesus, and the other which identifies him with the homonymous *hegumen and representative of the desert monks registered among the participants of the antimonophysite synod of 536 (ACO III, 130,24) underline the antimonophysite and pro-Chalcedonian activity of Leontius, so that this author would be located in the Constantinopolitan area, working hand-in-hand with the action which the *acoemete monks, custodians of the acts of the Council of Chalcedon and supporters of the Chalcedonian *Christology, carried out in the same area. In other words, he should be considered one of those theologians defined as "strict Chalcedonians."

Leontius left various controversial writings which reflect themes and preoccupations proper to the contemporary christological debate. To the polemic against the *monophysites are dedicated the Contra Nestorianos et Euthychianos, in which he proposes to refute the "two opposed extremes": *Eutychianism and *Nestorianism, but in reality it is a fundamentally anti-Severian work, the Solutio argumentorum a Severo obiectorum, in which he replies to the objections raised to the preceding work, and the Triginta Capita contra Severum. The second book of the collection composed by him—i.e., the Dialogus contra Aphthartodocetas, is directed against those who shared the ideas of *Julian of Halicarnassus, maintaining the incorruptibility (aphtharsia) of the human nature of Christ; while the third book, Deprehensio et triumphus super Nestorianos, is a refutation of the thought of Theodore of Mopsuestia. His authorship of the Adversus fraudes Apollinaristarum remains uncertain, in which the falsifications of some patristic texts used by the monophysites are denounced, in reality traceable to *Apollinaris of Laodicea and his disciples, while it is today certain that the De Sectis cannot be attributed to Leontius due to the strong doctrinal differences with his other writings.

The nature of the theological convictions of Leontius has been the object of different studies, and ideas have been changing along with the research procedures through the course of the 20th c., with contrasting results: from *Cyrillian and *Neochalcedonian positions (Loofs) scholars have passed, after having clearly distinguished him from Leontius of Jerusalem, to acknowledging his rigorously *dyophysite orientation (Richard, Moeller); subsequently the Origenism of his theology has been emphasized to the point of considering it heterodox and *Evagrian (Evans), to later return again to positions of orthodoxy acc. to the strict Chalcedonians (Dell'Osso).

Even if the character of polemical writings imposes a certain caution on the systematic reconstruction of Leontius's thought, it is certain that logical rigor and the controversial capacity which mark it make him one of the most important interpreters of the 6th c.; in him we find almost all the themes of the Christology of his time: from the defense of the formula of Chalcedon, which accents the permanence and the distinction of the two natures, to the mode of the union of the two natures, which happens κατ' οὐσίαν, maintaining that the end of this union is the *hypostasis of Jesus Christ, who is the effect of the essential union of the two natures just as a single human individual is the result of the union of the soul and body, it remaining true that the subject of this union is the Logos. For this Leontius focuses on the historical concreteness of the person of Jesus Christ in all the complexity of his mystery. In this research effort he finds sustenance in the reflection of the Cappadocian Fathers and not that of Cyril of Alexandria, in contrast to the *Neochalcedonian theologians who were his contemporaries. Keeping in mind the symmetrical presentation of the two natures, following the teaching of *Leo the Great, it does not seem possible to claim that the two natures of Christ are united in a tertium quid, which would be individuated in the νοῦς of Evagrius.

There have also been different interpretations regarding the term ἐνυπόστατον which in relation with ὑπόστασις offers the conceptual model for understanding the rapport between human and divine nature in the Logos: from the attribution of a dynamic value to the prefix en by which the term would express a direction through which two independent substances enter into an existential relationship (Loofs), to the more widespread interpretation acc. to which with ἐνυπόστατον Leontius meant "that which is concretely existing" in the Logos—i.e., the human nature of Christ—which would then be "*enhypostatized" in the hypostasis of the Logos (Daley, Grillmeier). Recently a new interpretation has been proposed through which this term would mean "the essential qualities of the two natures" which coexist perfectly in the unique "hypostatic" or personal reality of Jesus Christ (Dell'Osso), therefore the so-called doctrine of the enhypostasia of human nature in the divine hypostasis of the Logos should not be assigned to him. The accentuation of the full and perfect humanity of Christ in contrast with those who maintain the incorruptibility (aphtharsia) of the assumed flesh is confirmed by the soteriological doctrine of Leontius. In fact, the identity of nature and the way of suffering of the Kyrios not only make him a model to imitate but also create the possibility of imitating him on the part of all people.

CPG 6813-6820; PG 86, 1268-1396, 1901-1976; F. Diekamp, Doctrina Patrum, Münster 1907, 155-164. Critical ed. in prep. for CCG (B.E. Daley); It. tr. Leonzio di Bisanzio, Le opere, ed. C.

Dell'Osso, (CTP 161), Rome 2001. F. Loofs, Leontias von Byzanz und die gleichnamigen Schriftsteller der griechischen Kirche (TU 3, 1-2), Leipzig 1887; J.P. Junglas, Leontius von Byzanz. Studien zu seinen Schriften, Quellen und Anschauungen, Paderborn 1908; DTC 9, 400-426; R. Devreesse, Le florilège de Léonce de Byzance: RSR 10 (1930) 545-576; E. Schwartz, Kyrillos von Skythopolis (TU 49, 2), Leipzig 1939; M. Richard, Léonce de Jérusalem et Léonce de Byzance: MSR 1 (1944) 35-88; Id., Léonce de Byzance était-il origéniste?: REByz 5 (1947) 31-66; Ch. Moeller, Le chalcédonisme et le néo chalcédonisme en Orient de 451 à la fin du VI^e siècle: CGG I, 637-720; S. Helmer, Der Neuchalkedonismus. Geschichte, Berechtigung und Bedeutung eines dogmengeschichtlichen Begriffes (diss.), Bonn 1962; S. Otto, Person and Subsistenz. Die philosophische Anthropologie des Leontios von Byzanz, Munich 1968; S. Rees, The Literary Activity of Leontius of Byzantium: JTS 19 (1968) 229-242; D.B. Evans, Leontius of Byzantium: An Origenist Christology, Washington, D.C. 1970; J.J. Lynch, Leontius of Byzantium: A Cyrillian Christology: ThS 36 (1975) 455-471; B.E. Daley, The Origenism of Leontius of Byzantium: JTS 27 (1976) 333-369; P.T.R. Gray, The Defence of Chalcedon in the East (451-553), Leiden 1979; L. Perrone, La chiesa di Palestina e le controversie cristologiche. Dal concilio di Efeso (431) al secondo concilio di Costantinopoli (553), Brescia 1980; Id., Il "Dialogo contro gli aftartodoceti" di Leonzio di Bisanzio e Severo di Antiochia: Cristianesimo nella storia 1 (1980) 441-442; H. Stickelberger, Substanz und Akzidens bei Leontius von Byzanz: ThZ 36 (1980) 153-161; I. Fracea, Ho Leontios Byzantios. Bios kai syngrammata. Kritikē theōrēsēe, Athens 1984; A. Tuillier, Remarques sur les fraudes des Apollinaristes et des Monophysites, in Texte und Textkritik, Berlin 1987, 581-590; A. Grillmeier, II, 2, 190-241, Freiburg 1989; D.B. Evans, Leontius von Byzanz: TRE 21 (1991) 5-10; B. Kettern, Leontios von Byzanz: BBKL 4, 1494-1498; B.E. Daley, "A Richer Union." Leontius of Byzantium and the Relationship of Human and Divine in Christ, Leuven 1993, 239-265; J.C. Lamoreaux, An Arabic Version of Leontius of Byzantium's Thirty Chapters: Muséon 108 (1995) 343-365; B.E. Daley, Leontios von Byzanz: LTK³ 6, 838; K.-H. Uthemann, Definitionen und Paradigmen in der Rezeption des Dogmas von Chalkedon bis in die Zeit Kaiser Justinians, in Chalkedon: Geschichte und Aktualität. Studien zu Rezeption der christologischen Formel von Chalkedon, ed. J. Van Oort - J. Roldanus, Leuven 1997, 95-106; K.-H. Uthemann, Kaiser Justinian als Kirchen Politiker und Theologe: Augustinianum 39 (1999) 5-83; D. Hombergen, The Second Origenist Controversy: A New Perspective on Cyril of Scythopolis' Monastic Biographies as Historical Sources for Sixth-Century Origenism, Pontificio Ateneo S. Anselmo, Rome 2001; C. Dell'Osso, Still on the Concept of Enhypostaton: Augustinianum 43 (2003) 63-80; C. Dell'Osso, Il calcedonismo: Leonzio di Bisanzio, Monopoli 2003.

C. Dell'Osso

LEONTIUS of Caesarea (d. after 325). Seventh known bishop of *Caesarea of *Cappadocia. In the synod held at Caesarea in 314 he consecrated bishop *Gregory the Illuminator, apostle of *Armenia. He was present at the Councils of *Neocaesarea and of *Ancyra. In 325, at Nazianzus, while he was traveling to *Nicaea to assist at the council, he received Gregory's father as a catechumen (PG 35, 1000). He played an important role during the Council of Nicaea together with Eupsychius of *Tyana (Mansi 2, 835; 858-9; 863; 867; 870-1). He was charged with transmitting the conciliar decisions in Cappadocia and the neighboring provinces (Mansi 2,882). His fame and orthodox doctrine are attested by *Athanasius in a letter to the Egyptian bishops (PG 25, 556). In the 9th c. the memory of Leontius was still alive in his city; the testimony of the priest Gregory of Caesarea proves it, acc. to whom the relics of the bishop were preserved intact. This led Baronius to insert him in the Roman Martyrology on the date of 13 Jan, although his name does not appear in other calendars.

Martyrologium Romanum, Rome 1586, 26-27; AASS Ian., I, Anversa 1643, 781-782; EOMIA passim (see index), 53.10; G. Garitte, Documents pour l'étude du livre d'Agathange (ST 127), Vatican City 1946; P. Ananian, La data e le circostanze della consacrazione di S. Gregorio Illuminatore: Muséon 74 (1961) 43-73, 317-360; G. Garitte, La Vie grecque inédite de S. Grégoire d'Arménie (Ms 4 d'Ochrida): AB 83 (1965) 233-290; Cath 7, 375-377; BS 7, 1314-1315; M.-M. Hauser-Meury, Prosopographie zu den Schriften Gregors v. Naz., Bonn 1960, 111-112; Fedalto 1, 20.

L. Perrone

LEONTIUS of Constantinople (6th c.). Presbyter, author of at least 37 homilies, some of which are still unpublished. The only chronological indication which can be inferred from his work is the mention of an earthquake, identified as that of Constantinople in 557 (hom. 1). The number of his homilies is debated (14 for C. Datema and P. Allen; 25 for M. Sachot; 37 for S.J. Voicu, Dieci omelie), which have been "published" under different names (Leontius and *John Chrysostom, but also *Amphilochius of Iconium, *Athanasius of Alexandria, *Cyril of Alexandria, *Hippolytus of Rome, *Proclus of Constantinople, *Severian of Gabala, *Timothy of Jerusalem or of Antioch). Almost all of the homilies were delivered for important feasts: birth of *John the Baptist (hom. 1 and 22), Christmas (hom. 12 and 36), Holy *Innocents (hom. 29 and 35), *Epiphany (hom. 15 and 27), *Presentation in the Temple (hom. 20, 23 and 25), *Lent (hom. 30), *Lazarus Saturday (hom. 2 and 26, perhaps 16), Palm Sunday (hom. 3 and 31), Holy Week (hom. 4-7, perhaps 28 and 32), *Easter (hom. 8-9 and 33), *Mid-Pentecost (homm. 10 and 18), Sunday of the man born blind (hom. 24), Pentecost (hom. 11 and 13), Transfiguration (hom. 14 and 21), Exaltation of the Cross (hom. 34), beheading of John the Baptist (hom. 37); the context of the hom. 17 (In Psalmum 92) and 19 (In lacum Genesareth) is uncertain. From these texts, little studied, Leontius appears as a cultivator of rhetoric and ornate prose, coiner of neologisms and lover of fictitious dialogues. His polemic against the Jews is constant, but, as with that against paganism, not very original. The explicit antiheretical ideas are directed against local groups (Marathonians: hom. 8 and 13; Novatians: hom. 30; Sabatians: hom. 9) or else they are anachronistic (Arians: hom. 2, 8, 14). His Mariology was little developed; clear references to the controversies after the Councils of *Ephesus (431) and of Chalcedon (451) are missing, as if Leontius adhered to the positions promoted by the Henoticon. The identification of some of his sources (Asterius Sophist, Pseudo-Chrysostom, Physiologus) reinforces the impression that Leontius was more a follower than an original thinker.

CPG 7887-7900; C. Datema, When Did Leontius, Presbyter of Constantinople, Preach?: VCh 35 (1981) 346-351; S.J. Voicu, Dieci omelie di Leonzio di Costantinopoli: Studi sull'oriente cristiano 5,1 (2001) 165-190 (p. 186-189: list of the homilies); C. Datema - P. Allen, Leontii presbyteri Constantinopolitani Homiliae, CCG 17, Turnhout-Leuven 1987 (hom. 1-14); J. Noret - Cetedoc, Thesaurus Leontii Presbyteri Constantinopolitani. Enumeratio lemmatum cum concordantiis (Corpus Christianorum. Thesaurus Patrum Graecorum), Turnhout 1992 (homm. 1-14).

Partial editions and studies: B. Capelle, Les homélies liturgiques du prétendu Timothée de Jérusalem: EphLit 63 (1949) 5-26; M. Aubineau, Hésychius de Jérusalem, Basile de Séleucie, Jean de Béryte, Pseudo-Chrysostome, Léonce de Constantinople: Homélies pascales . . . (SC 187), Paris 1972, 339-468 (homm. 8-9); M. Sachot, Les homélies de Léonce, prêtre de Constantinople: RecSR 51 (1977) 234-243; P. Allen - C. Datema, Leontius, Presbyter of Constantinople—A Compiler?: JÖByz 29 (1980) 9-20; M. Sachot, L'homélie pseudo-chrysostomienne sur la Transfiguration CPG 4724, BHG 1975: Contextes liturgiques, restitution à Léonce, prêtre de Constantinople, édition critique et commentée, traduction et études connexes (Publications Universitaires Européennes s. XXIII: Théologie 151), Frankfurt a.M.-Bern 1981 (hom. 14); F. Scorza Barcellona, Un'omelia pseudocrisostomica inedita sui santi Innocenti (BHG 827c = CPG 5075), Rome 1984 (hom. 35); C. Datema - P. Allen, Leontius, Presbyter of Constantinople and an Unpublished Homily of Ps. Chrysostom on Christmas (BHGa 1914i/1914k): JÖByz 39 (1989) 65-84 (hom. 36); S.J. Voicu, Pseudoippolito, In sancta theophania (CPG 1917; BHG 1940) e Leonzio di Costantinopoli, in Nuove ricerche su Ippolito (SEA 30), Rome 1989, 137-146 (hom. 27); W. Kinzig, Erbin Kirche. Die Auslegung von Psalm 5,1 in den Psalmenhomilien des Asterius und in der Alten Kirche (Abhandlungen der Heidelberger Akademie der Wissenschaften. Philos.-hist. Kl. 1990, 2), Heidelberg 1990, 96-102; S.J. Voicu, Due testi pseudocrisostomici per l'epifania (BHGn 1944t e CPG 4522) e Leonzio di Costantinopoli: Bollettino della Badia Greca di Grottaferrata 44 (1990) 271-279 (hom. 15); P. Allen - C. Datema, Leontius, Presbyter of Constantinople, Fourteen Homilies Translated, Introduced and Annotated (Byzantina Australiensia 9), Brisbane 1991; J.H. Barkhuizen, Amphilochius of Iconium, Homily 3: On the Four-Day [dead] Lazarus: An Essay in Interpretation: Acta Patristica et Byzantina 5 (1994) 1-11 (hom. 26); P. Allen, Reconstructing Pre-Paschal Liturgies in Constantinople: Some Sixth Century Evidence, in Philohistôr. Miscellanea in honorem Caroli Laga septuagenarii, ed. A. Schoors - P. Van Deun (Orientalia Lovaniensia Analecta 60), Leuven 1994, 217-228; S.J. Voicu, Pseudo-Anfilochio e Leonzio di Costantinopoli: Orpheus 25 (2004) 101-112.

S.J. Voicu

LEONTIUS of Jerusalem (6th c.). Monk and polemicist generally dated to the 6th c. He is considered the most organic interpreter of *Neochalcedonianism. His theological stature grows in proportion with the lessening of that of *Leontius of Byzantium, with whom he has been confused in the past. Nothing is known of his life: his identification with the homonymous monk of Palestine, present at *Constantinople at the conference with the *monophysites in 532 and at the synod of 536, is contested along with that of Leontius of Byzantium. A new examination of the historical indications which can be gathered from the writings leads, however, to the conclusion of a later date, putting his activity between 614 and 640 (Krausmüller). He is the author of two polemical works against the traditional adversaries of the Chalcedonian theologians, composed one after the other: the Contra Monophysitas, a collection of 63 aporias, with a patristic *florilegium, which has reached us in fragments; and the Contra Nestorianos, a voluminous treatise in 8 books, the last of which is missing. The principal polemical target is represented in every case by the *Christology of *Antiochene origin. His reflection unites in the most completed form the typical elements of Neochalcedonian Christology: the authority of *Cyril of Alexandria taken globally, with the consequent use of a double terminology, both monophysite and *dyophysite, the acceptance of the theopaschite formula and the doctrine of the enhypostasis of the human nature of Christ in the *hypostasis of the Logos. In fact, the relationship between nature and hypostasis in Leontius of Jerusalem presents elements of both novelty and contradiction. In the ontological analysis, on the one hand, next to the definition of the hypostasis as "separately existing," the notion seems to persist of "nature endowed with individual properties" taken from the trinitarian theology of the Cappadocians. On the other hand, he sought to overcome the limits of the concept of φύσις as nature in an abstract and generic sense, introducing the term φύσις ἰδική, a nature with "idioms" ("attributes") both for the humanity and for the divinity of Christ. The union of the two natures, concretely existing in the hypostasis of the Logos, leads therefore to a σύνθεσις or greater composition of their "idioms." His furtherance of the anthropological paradigm—the conjunction of soul and body in human beings—as a model of the union in Christ reflects the accentuation of the unity in the hypostasis. This also profoundly influences the soteriological conception, dominated by the theme of θέωσις: the divinization, which because of the *hypostatic union envelops the humanity of Christ (the Κυριακὸς ἄνθρωπος, acc. to a characteristic expression of Leontius of Jerusalem), extends through his humanity to all people and in the final analysis to all nature.

CPG 6917-6918; PG 86, 1400-1901. Critical ed. in prep. per CCG (P.T.R. Gray). F. Loofs, Leontius von Byzanz und die gleichnamigen Schriftsteller der griechischen Kirche (TU 3, 1-2), Leipzig 1887; M. Richard, Léonce de Jérusalem et Léonce de Byzance: MSR 1 (1944) 35-88; Ch. Moeller, Textes "monophysites" de Léonce de Jérusalem: EThL 27 (1951) 467-482; S. Helmer, Der Neuchalkedonismus. Geschichte, Berechtigung und Bedeutung eines dogmengeschichtlichen Begriffes, diss., Bonn 1962; S. Otto, Person und Subsistenz. Die philosophische Anthropologie des Leontios von Byzanz, Munich 1968; A. Basdekis, Die Christologie des Leontius von Jerusalem. Seine Logoslehre, diss., Münster 1974; A. Grillmeier, Ὁ Κυριακὸς ἄνθρωπος. Eine Studie zu einer christologischen Bezeichnung der Väterzeit: Traditio 33 (1977) 1-63; P.T.R. Gray, The Defence of Chalcedon in the East (451-553), Leiden 1979; L. Perrone, La chiesa di Palestina e le controversie cristologiche. Dal concilio di Efeso (431) al secondo concilio di Costantinopoli (553), Brescia 1980; L. Abramowski, Ein nestorianischer Traktat bei Leontius von Jerusalem, in III Symposium Syriacum, ed. R. Lavenant, Rome 1983, 43-55; P.T.R. Gray, Leontius of Jerusalem's Case of a "Synthetic" Union in Christ, SP 18/1, Kalamazoo 1985, 151-154; K.P. Wesche, The Christology of Leontius of Jerusalem: Monophysite or Chalcedonian?: St. Vladimir's Theological Quarterly 31 (1987) 65-95; Grillmeier II/2, 286-327; P.T.R. Gray, Through the Tunnel with Leontius of Jerusalem: The Sixth-Century Transformation of Theology, in P. Allen - E. Jeffreys (eds.), The Sixth Century: End or Beginning?, Brisbane 1996, 186-196; K.-H. Uthemann, Definitionen und Paradigmen in der Rezeption des Dogmas von Chalkedon bis in die Zeit Kaiser Justinians, in Chalkedon: Geschichte und Aktualität. Studien zur Rezeption der christologischen Formel von Chalkedon, ed. J. van Oort - J. Roldanus, Leuven 1997, 54-122; J. MacDonald, Leontius of Jerusalem's "Against the Monophysites" as a Possible Source for Justinian's "Letter to the Alexandrian Monks": Byzantion 67 (1997) 375-382; D. Krausmüller, Leontius of Jerusalem, A Theologian of the Seventh Century: JTS 52 (2001) 637-657; C. Dell'Osso, Leonzio di Bisanzio, Rome 2001.

L. Perrone

LEONTIUS of Neapolis (590–ca. 650). Little is known of the life of Leontius, bishop of Neapolis (the modern Limassol) on *Cyprus, in the first half of the 7th c.; perhaps he should be identified with the Leontius of Neapolis present at the council of the Lateran in 649. He is primarily known as a hagiographer, having written the lives of two saints of his native Cyprus: (1) *Life of John the Almsgiver (CPG 7882) patriarch of *Alexandria in 610–620, personally known to him. This biography, which gives a valuable description of life of Alexandria in the 2nd decade of the 7th c., has reached us in three versions in different languages, and was translated into *Latin by Anastasius Bibliotecarius; (2) Life of Saint Spiridon of Tremithous (CPG 7884; BHG 1648a), the bishop in the 4th c. of Tremithous on Cyprus. Today it is thought that this work has been lost, although it has been affirmed by Garitte that an anonymous Vita preserved in a MS at Florence (Laur. XI, 9), which is based on a lost Vita of St. Spiridon in iambic verses, is actually the Vita of Leontius. Furthermore he wrote the Life of Simeon the Fool (CPG 7883; BHG 1677-1677bb), a Syrian saint, born at *Edessa and who passed the last part of his life at *Emesa. In this Vita, as he himself explains, Leontius used both written and oral sources: scholars are in disagreement as to who these sources were, even if it has recently been affirmed, by Krueger, that the written source was none other than the account contained in Evagrius's History of the Church of (IV, 34). The Vita of Leontius is important because it is the first of the genre of a "fool for love of Christ" (see *saints, foolish), a type of saint that was to become popular in Byzantine society. There are also two homilies preserved: one on the prophet Simeon and the other on the *Mid-Pentecost (CPG 7880-7881). Both *John of Damascus and the fathers of the seventh ecumenical council cite long passages from Leontius's fifth book (or homily) against the Jews, in which he defends the veneration of the cross, images and the relics of the saints against the Jewish accusation of idolatry (CPG 7885). The arguments of Leontius are based on the OT and the examples it gives of veneration of people and things, esp. in the context of the adoration in the temple.

H. Gelzer, Leontios' von Neapolis, Leben des heiligen Johannes des Barmherzigen, Erzbischofs von Alexandrien, Freiburg i.B.-Leipzig 1893; P. van den Ven, La Légende de S. Spyridon, évêque de Trimithonte, Louvain 1953, 104-128; G. Garitte, L'édition des Vies de saint Spyridon par M. van den Ven: RHE 50 (1955) 125-140, esp. 136-139; N.H. Baynes, The Icons before Iconoclasm: HTR 44 (1951) 93-106; L. Rydén, Bemerkungen zum Leben des heiligen Narren Symeon von Leontios von Neapolis, Uppsala 1970; A.J. Festugière - L. Rydén, Léontios de Néapolis, Vie de Syméon le Fou et Vie de Jean de Chypre, Paris 1974; O. Kresten, Leontios von Neapolis als Tachygraph? Hagiographische Texte als Quellen zu Schriftlichkeit und Buchkultur im 6. und 7. Jahrhundert: Scrittura e civiltà 1 (1977) 155-175; L. Rydén, The Holy Fool, in S. Hackel (ed.), The Byzantine Saint, London 1981, 106-113; R. Browning, The "Low Level" Saint's Life in the Early Byzantine World, in S. Hackel (ed.), The Byzantine Saint, London 1981, 117-127 (= Id., History, Language, and Literacy in the Byzantine World, London 1989, no. VIII); V. Fazzo, Giovanni Damasceno, Difesa delle immagini sacre, Rome 1983, 75-80 and 163-167; V. Déroche, L'Authenticité de l'"Apologie contre les Juifs" de Léontios de Néapolis: BCH 110 (1986) 655-669; J. Hofstra, Leontius van Neapolis als Hagiograaf, in A. Hilhorst (ed.), De heiligenverering in de eerste eeuwen van het christendom, Nijmegen 1988, 186-192; H.G. Thümmel, Die Frühgeschichte der ostkirchlichen Bilderlehre (TU 139), Berlin 1992, 340-353; D. Krueger, The "Life of Symeon the Fool" and the Cynic Tradition: JECS 1 (1993) 423-442; D. Krueger, Symeon the Holy Fool. Leontius's Life and the Late Antique City, Berkeley, CA 1996; Vedere l'invisibile.

Nicea e lo statuto dell'immagine, ed. L. Russo, Palermo 1997, 39-43; Patrologia V, 244-248.

A. Louth

LEONTIUS of Tripoli, martyr (d. 304). We know the cult of this martyr better than his life. In the 5th c. he is mentioned by *Theodoret of Cyrrhus (SC 57, 335); Melania the Younger in 417 visited his sanctuary in Tripoli (SC 90, 226-228), which replaced a pagan temple (BHO 563) and had become a center of pilgrimage in Phoenicia (the practice of incubatio). Also *Peter the Iberian (BHO 955), *Severus patriarch of Antioch (who recounts the legend of the saint in his homilies, 27 and 50, delivered 18 June 513 and 514: PO 35, 358-367; PO 36, 558-573; cf. PO 2, 79 and 92), and the *anonymous pilgrim of Piacenza (CCL 175, 129) visited this site. The legend developed in three stages: (1) A first Passio of the soldier Leontius and the monk Publius (under *Diocletian) of the 5th c., composed in Greek and today lost in its original language, preserved only in a *Syriac translation (BHO 563) and a *Georgian one (Kekelidze, Monumenta 2, 62-63), accentuates the epic character of the personage; it is attested 18 June 513 and 514, by the homilies 27 and 50 of Severus. (2) A 9th-c. Passio of the soldiers Leontius, Hypatius (Hypatus) and Theodulus executed under *Vespasian (BHG 986-987d), to which the synaxaria refer. (3) A third Passio makes Leontius an Arab martyr, of whom Egyptian and Coptic sources speak (BHO 1170). At *Constantinople his feast was celebrated 18 June in two churches with his name; at *Jerusalem 14 Nov in the Aphthonion, near Gethsemane. The mentions in the Mart. hier. (19.3, 22.11, 24.12) are uncertain; Baronius inserted him in the Mart. rom. 18 June.

BS 7, 1325-1328; K. Kekelidze, Monumenta Hagiographica Georgica 2, Tiflis 1946; G. Garitte, Textes hagiographiques orientaux relatifs à Saint Léonce de Tripoli: Muséon 78 (1965) 313-348; 79 (1966) 335-386; 81 (1968) 415-440; P. Maraval, Lieux saints et pèlerinages d'Orient, Paris 1985.

S. Heid

LEONTIUS Scholasticus (De Sectis) (6th/7th c.). In the MS tradition of the De sectis, a work of heresiological and controversial character composed between the 6th and the beginning of the 7th c., the name of Leontius Scholasticus is found, who might be either the true author or, keeping to the tenor of the introductory heading, the one who transcribed the oral teachings of an "abbot Theodore." M. Richard was the first to propose associating him with *Theodore of Raithu, author of the Proparaskeuē. The theses of Richard have encountered agreement esp. concerning the relationship between the De sectis and Leontius of Byzantium: important differences in the use of key terms such as enhypostatos and hypostasis* and a reserved attitude toward the appeal to the anthropological paradigm (on the contrary amply used by Leontius of Byzantium), lead to differentiating the author of the De sectis from his Constantinopolitan homonym. It is therefore not possible to consider the De sectis as the reworking of a prior work of Leontius of Byzantium (a thesis maintained in his time by Loofs), although it takes into account some of his writings and more generally shares with the latter a line of strict *Chalcedonianism, far from contemporary Neochalcedonian solutions.

The text includes ten "lessons" (praxeis), which from the formal point of view recall the lecture notes of the commentators of *Aristotle. The first defines the concepts of "substance," "nature," "*hypostasis," "person," putting after this the exposition of "theology" and the "economy." It is a summary of the Bible and of the historical-salvific plan up to the *incarnation. In relationship with the "faith" of the church it then denounces the principal trinitarian (*Sabellianism and *Arianism) and *christological (*Nestorianism and *monophysitism) heresies. Opposing the ecclesiastical doctrine to these errors, the author underlines how this occupies a middle position. The second lesson has for its subject the biblical canon and the theological errors of the Jews and Samaritans who both maintain the mia physis and the mia hypostasis in God. The third lesson delineates Christian eras from the *Nativity to *Constantine and later, listing the fathers of the church and the heresies combated by them. It should be pointed out that for the author the Council of Chalcedon constitutes the decisive moment of the second period. The fourth lesson illustrates the heresies of *Macedonius, *Apollinaris, Nestorius and *Eutyches, and records the reasons for the exile of *Dioscorus (his support for Eutyches). It should be noted here how the text can barely hide its sympathy for two "great men," *Diodore of Tarsus and *Theodore of Mopsuestia. The fifth lesson introduces the factions created following the Council of Chalcedon and recalls the new problem of tritheism. From the sixth to the ninth lesson the author responds to the criticisms of those who for reasons of historical, philosophical or patristic character were refusing to accept the Council of Chalcedon, while in the tenth he deals with the more recent errors of the *Gaianites, *Agnoetae and *Origenists. He dedicates particular attention to the first, showing again significant points of contact with the argumentation developed by Leontius of Byzantium in the Dialogus contra Aphthartodocetas, but without reproposing his identification of Julianism as a radical monophysitism.

CPG 6823; PG 86, 1193-1268; M. Waegeman, Het traktaat de sectis (Ps. Leontius Byzantinus). Textkritische uitgave en vertaling, diss., Gent 1982; F. Loofs, Leontius von Byzanz und die gleichnamigen Schriftsteller der griechischen Kirche, Leipzig 1887; J.P. Junglas, Leontius von Byzanz, Paderborn 1908, 5-20; S. Rees, The "De Sectis": A Treatise Attributed to Leontius of Byzantium: JTS 40 (1939) 346-360; M. Richard, Le traité "De sectis" et Léonce de Byzance: RHE 35 (1939) 695-723 (= Opera Minora II, Turnhout-Leuven 1977, n. 55); Id., ΑΠΟ ΦΩΝΗΣ: Byzantion 20 (1950) 191-222 (= Opera Minora III, n. 60); J. Speigl, Der Autor der Schrift über die Konzilien und die Religionspolitik Justinians: AHC 2 (1970) 207-230; M. Waegemann, The Text Tradition of the Treatise De Sectis (Ps. Leontius Byzantinus: L'antiquité classique 45 (1976) 190-196; Id., The Old Testament Canon in the Treatise De Sectis: L'antiquité classique 50 (1981) 813-818; M. van Esbroeck, Le De Sectis attribué à Léonce de Byzance (CPG 6823) dans la version géorgienne d'Arsène Iqaltoeli: Bedi Kartlisa 42 (1984) 35-52; Id., La date et l'auteur du De sectis attribué à Léonce de Byzance, in After Chalcedon: Studies in Theology and Church History Offered to Prof. A. van Roey, Leuven 1985, 415-424; Grillmeier II/2, 514-523.

L. Perrone

LEOVIGILD (d. 586). King of *Visigothic *Spain from 567, and after the death of Liuva in 572, the only Visigothic king in the Iberian Peninsula. He improved his fortunes both by annexing, at the expense of the Byzantines, to his kingdom the contiguous kingdom of the Suebians of *Gallaecia (585) and by taming the N populations. He also fought in *Gaul. Very early he joined his two sons, Hermengild and *Recared, to his reign. Under him the Iberian Peninsula was unified. The rebellion of his son Hermengild (580–584), who had converted from *Arianism, traditional among the Visigoths, to Catholicism and who was defeated and killed, pushed Leovigild to adopt anti-Catholic measures, sanctioned by an Arian council held at *Toledo in 580. To facilitate the passage of the Catholics to Arianism, he exempted them from being rebaptized—as was the custom until then—imposing on them only the imposition of hands. In the final analysis he sought to create better relationships with the majority of the population, who were Catholic. The fruits of this policy were gathered by Recared, who converted to Catholicism in contrast to his father. Leovigild improved the Codex of Euricus, annulling the law which prohibited marriage between *Goths and Romans.

K. Schäferdiek, Die Kirche in den Reichen der Westgoten und Suewen, Berlin 1967; B. Saitta, Un momento della disgregazione del regno visigoto di Spagna: la rivolta di Ermenegildo: Quaderni Catanesi 1 (1979) 81-134; A. Maya, De Leovigildo perseguidor y Masona mártir: Emerita 62 (1994) 167-186; A. Ferreiro, The Visigoths in Gaul and Spain A.D. 418-711: A Bibliography, Leiden 1988; Id., The Visigoths: Studies in Culture and Society, Leiden 1999; R.L. Stocking, Bishops, Councils, and Consensus in the Visigothic Kingdom, 589-633, Ann Arbor, MI 2000.

M. Simonetti

LEPER (iconography). Iconography concerning the healing of lepers (Mt 8:2-4 // Mk 1:40 // Lk 5:12-16; Lk 17:11-19) appears almost nonexistent, or at least difficult to identify, given that, as happens in the representations of Job, the effect of the wounds produced by the malady is not expressed figuratively, and because that in these scenes the event is shown with the healing having already taken place, alluding obviously to the overcoming not only of physical but also of spiritual imperfection.

However, some paintings in the catacombs of *Rome have been interpreted in this sense: two in the cemetery of Sts. Marcellinus and Peter (Wp 129,2; Wp 68,3), one in the hypogeum of Nunziatella (Wp 74,2), one in *Domitilla (Nestori 1993, 125, n. 31) and one in an anonymous hypogeum of the Via Latina (Wp 265). All these paintings can be placed in a time period from the end of the 3rd c. to the middle of the 4th. Of these, only for Nunziatella does this reading seem admissible, if it is referred to the gospel passage which recalls the incident in which one of the ten healed lepers returns to offer thanks; in this scene, in fact, a kneeling man with raised hands is visible next to Christ.

It does not seem, in contrast, that the miracle should be recognized in one of the polychrome slabs preserved in the Museo Nazionale Romano, as Wilpert supposes (Ws II, 302). The episode is expressed in a clearer and more defined manner in 5th-c. ivories and miniatures; see a clarifying example in a diptych preserved at London (Age of Spirituality, 500, n. 450).

J. Wilpert, Ein Cyclus christologischer Gemälde aus der Katakombe der heiligen Petrus und Marcellinus, Freiburg i.Br. 1891; E. Dassmann, Sündenvergebung durch Taufe, Busse und Martyrerfürbitte in den Zeugnissen frühchristlicher Frommigkeit und Kunst, Münster 1973, 73, 300, 368, 441; var. aus., Age of Spirituality, New York 1979, 500; F. Bisconti, Contributo all'interpretazione dell'atteggiamento di orante: VetChr 17 (1980) 17-27; Id., Sull'unità del linguaggio biblico nella pittura cimiteriale romana: Miscell. S. Cipriani, Brescia 1981, 45ff.; E. Dinkler, Christus und Asklepios, Heidelberg 1980, 15ff.

F. Bisconti

LEPORIUS (d. after 428/431). Leporius, called the precursor of *Nestorius in the West, was a monk at

*Marseille. Because of his christological errors—he had difficulty admitting that God was born and died; therefore, he defended an overly forced christological dualism—he was expelled by *Proculus, his bishop. He took refuge in *Africa with *Augustine (ca. 418). The latter succeeded in putting him back on the path of orthodoxy. The Libellus emendationis in which Leporius retracted his erroneous opinions was sent, together with a benevolent letter of Augustine (Ep. 219, in 426 or 421), to Proculus. This document, of Augustinian stamp, offers valuable evidence of the Latin *Christology which, at that time, accepted two natures and one person in Christ. While *John Cassian spoke out severely against Leporius, Augustine showed himself more indulgent, indicating that such cases should be resolved in a fraternal dialogue.

CPL 515; CCL 64, 94-123; F. Gori: AugR 34 (1994) 201-206; P. Glorieux, Prénestorianisme en Occident, Tournai 1959 (with other documents, regarding the case of Leporius); A. Grillmeier, Jesus der Christus im Glauben der Kirche, Freiburg 1979, 661-665 (bibl.); F. Gori, "De Trinitate" pseudoatanasiano nel Lib.: AugR 31 (1991) 361-380; V. Grossi: Lat 58 (1992) 11-45; LTK³ 6, 844; LACL (2002); T. Krannich, Von Leporius bis zu Leo der Grossen, Tübingen 2005.

B. Studer

LEPTIS MAGNA. Leptis Magna (Lepcis Magna; modern Lebda, Libya), Roman from 25 BC, colonia under *Trajan, fatherland of *Septimius Severus (193–211), was decorated in the 2nd c. with magnificent monuments: forums, baths, secular basilicas, circuses, amphitheaters, aqueducts. Because of the combined effect of the barbarian incursions and the advance of the sand, it began to decline in the 4th c., and fell completely into ruin with the Arab invasion. The systematic excavations conducted after 1920 by P. Romanelli and R. Bartoncini have brought to light, in addition to profane monuments, some Christian sanctuaries: a small three-aisled basilica, with semicircular presbyterial bench and altar protruding into the nave, surrounded by a balustrade; on the side a baptistery of quadratic plan with a circular basin; a second basilica, inserted at the time of *Justinian in the profane basilica ordered built by Severus, and dedicated to the Virgin (Procop., Aedif. 6,4), this too with a baptistery to the side. We know little of the Christian history of Leptis Magna. Under the name Archias Leptitanus (PG 5, 1489-1490) a small fragment has been published on the celebration of Easter fixed on Sunday. Audollent believed it to be authentic (DHGE 3,1528); however, it is certainly to be attributed to *Irenaeus of Lyons (H. Jordan, Wer war Archaeus?: ZNTW 13 [1912] 157-160). Therefore, this bishop should be deleted from the list of Leptis Magna. The first certain bishop is Dioga, who was represented by his colleague from Oea at the Council of Carthage of 1 Sept 256 (Sent. Ep. 83-85). Other known bishops are Victorinus (393), the *Donatist Salvianus and Callipedes (484).

EC 7, 1190-1191; LTK² 6, 973; R. Bartoncini, Una chiesa cristiana nel Vecchio Foro di Lepcis: RivAC 8 (1931) 23-52; Atti del IV Congresso Internazionale di Archeologia cristiana, Studi di antichità cristiana 16, Vatican City 1940, 264-270; EAA 4, 572-594; J.B. Ward-Perkins, The Several Buildings of Lepcis Magna: An Architectural Survey, London 1993; E. Savino, Città di frontiera nell'Impero romano: forme della romanizzazione da Augusto ai Severi, Bari 1999.

V. Saxer

LÉRIDA. The correspondence between *Consentius and St. *Augustine informs us concerning the contamination of this church by *Priscillianism, at least in the person of its bishop, Siagrius. Bishops: Sagitius (d. 419), Andrew (d. 540), Februarius (d. 546), Polypius (d. 589), Julian (d. 592), Aemelius (d. 599), Fructuosus (d. 633-638), Euredus (d. 683). In the year 546 (the date 524 should be rejected) a council was convened, presided over by the metropolitan Sergius of *Tarragona; its Acts bear the signatures of seven other bishops and a presbyter representing another bishop. It promulgated sixteen canons, which show influences from the Gallican councils of *Agde (506) and Orleáns (511), and which intend to affirm ecclesiastical discipline. These canons bring out the problems provoked by the coexistence of *Arians and *Catholics, the difficulties in the relationship between the hierarchy and the monks, and finally the disagreement between Christian morality and the life of the laypeople and the clerics, including the realm of sexual matters.

Aug., Ep. 11 (Divjak); M. Moreau, Lecture de la lettre 11 de Consentius à Augustin. Un pastiche hagiographique, in Les lettres de saint Augustin découvertes par J. Divjak, Paris 1983, 215-223; Mansilla, Geografía I, 279-280; Vives, Concilios, 50-60; G. Martínez Díez, La colección canónica hispana, IV, Madrid 1984, 287-311; Orlandís, Concilios, 124-131; J. Yeguas i Gassó, El concili provincial visigótic de Lleida en el 546: AST 67/2 (1994) 525-535; M. Guallar Pérez, Los concilios tarraconenses celebrados en Lérida, Lérida 1975.

P. de Luis

LÉRINS. In ancient times Lerina or Lerinus or also Planasia (due to its flat topography), archipelago between Cannes and Antibes composed of two principal islands (Sainte-Marguerite and Saint-Honorat) and two tiny ones (Tradelière and St-Féréol). The archipelago was inhabited in antiquity, first by the Ligurians and later on during the Roman period. The smaller of the two principal islands (the perimeter is ca. 3 km [1.9 mi]) of the Provençal coast became, in the first years of the 400s, seat of a monastery—a small monastic center, among the oldest in the West—founded by *Honoratus, later bishop of *Arles. Today it bears his name: Saint-Honorat. In the succeeding decades ascetics of great personality and mostly of aristocratic extraction flowed there, even from distant regions; they made of it the most active and prestigious ascetic center of Provence and created new forms of teaching and of Christian and monastic spirituality there, sometimes considered—falsely—infected by the so-called *semi-Pelagian heresy. Of an ancient Lerinian rule, dating back to the founder himself, about which there have been multiple hypotheses, no certain testimonies remain. According to A. de Vogüé (SC 297, 21-177) this should be identified with the Regula quattuor Patrum, the first and largest of the Regulae SS. Patrum, a collection of five short writings, sometimes extremely short, which have reached us anonymously and without any indication of either time or place of redaction. The Regula quattuor Patrum is composed of four discourses (five, in a later redaction), attributed to famous Egyptian ascetics (*Serapion, *Macarius, *Paphnutius and again Macarius), under whose names Honoratus, Caprasius, his companion in the first ascetic wanderings and later in the settlement at Lérins, and the diocesan bishop Leontius of Fréjus are celebrated. Lérins provided a large number of bishops to central-southern *Gaul in the 5th and 6th c., among whom, in addition to Honoratus himself, we can mention *Eucherius of Lyons, his son *Salonius of Geneva, *Maximus and *Faustus of Riez, *Hilary of Arles, *Lupus of Troyes, *Caesarius and Virgilius of Arles. Some of them, and others like *Salvian of Marseille (see Pricoco: Siculorum Gymnasium 29 [1976] 351-368) and *Vincent, the author of the Commonitorium, were among the most notable ecclesiastical writers of their time. In the 7th c. the abbot Aigulf replaced their rule with that of St. Benedict, but he was killed for this act. In the following centuries, through the changed conditions of the region and the Saracen incursions, the monastery declined. It seems that in the 8th c. the abbot Porcarius II and the monks were massacred by the Saracens. Lérins was sacked multiple times by pirates of diverse origins. During the French Revolution the island was confiscated and sold at auction. Repurchased in 1859 by the bishop of Fréjus, it is today the seat of a Cistercian abbey with about thirty monks of various nationalities.

L. Alliez, Histoire du monastère de Lérins, Paris 1862; H. Moris, L'Abbaye de Lérins. Histoire et monuments, Paris 1909; A.C. Cooper-Marsdin, The History of the Islands of the Lerins, Cambridge 1913; L. Cristiani, Lérins et ses Fondateurs, S. Wandrille 1946; F. Prinz, Frühes Mönchtum im Frankenreich, Munich 1965, 47-87; S. Pricoco, Modelli di santità a Lerino: Siculorum Gymnasium 27 (1974) 54-88; Id., L'isola dei santi. Il cenobio di Lerino e le origini del monachesimo gallico, Rome 1978; A. de Vogüé, Les Règles des Saints Pères. Intr., Texte, tr. et notes, SC 297-298, Paris 1982; Id., Aux origines de Lérins: la règle de saint Basile?: StudMon 31 (1989) 259-266; F. Prinz, Frühes Mönchtum im Frankenreich, Darmstadt [2]1988; R. Nouailhat, Saints et Patrons. Les premiers moines de Lérins, Paris 1988; R. Nürnberg, Askese als sozialer Impuls. Monastische-asketische Spiritualität als Wurzel und Triebfeder sozialer Ideen und Aktivitäten der Kirche in Sudgallien im 5. Jahrhundert, Bonn 1988; M. Clavel-Lévêque - R. Nouailhat, Les premiers moines de Lérins: régulation et normalisation du christianisme, in Mélanges Pierre Lévêque, Paris 1990, IV, 99-113; C.M. Kasper, Theologie und Askese: die Spiritualität des Inselmönchtums von Lérins im 5. Jahrhundert, Münster 1991; M. Labrousse, Saint Honorat fondateur de Lérins et évêque d'Arles: étude et traduction de textes d'Hilaire d'Arles, Fauste de Riez et Césaire d'Arles, Abbaye de Bellefontaine 1995; P. Moret, Planesiai, îles erratiques de l'Occident grec: REG 110 (1997) 25-56; C. Leyser, "This Sainted Isle": Panegyric, Nostalgia and the Invention of Lerinian Monasticism, in W.E. Klingshim - M. Vessey (eds.), Essays on Late Antique Thought and Culture in Honor of R.A. Markus, Ann Arbor, MI 1999, 188-206; C. Scherliess, Literatur und "conversio": literarische Formen im monastischen Umkreis des Klosters von Lérins, Bern 2000; F. Prinz, Zur neuesten Forschungsgeschichte von Lérins, in Munera amicitiae. Studi offerti a S. Pricoco, Soveria Mannelli 2003, 372-378.

S. Pricoco

LETTER (Epistle). Born in the immediacy of real life, early letters had no literary pretensions, serving an intermediary function, putting two persons separated by distance into communication with one another (epistula sermo absentium: Ambr., Ep. 66,1 and 47,4). The private letter is therefore as old as writing itself; while the transformation of the letter into a literary genre occurred much later, taking place with the composition of the first epistolaries, which were indeed collections of private letters, but destined for publication. According to the circumstances and the subject matter, the letter was then set into well-defined rhetorical modules, respecting a whole series of precise rules, as is testified by the epistolaries of Cicero and of Seneca, and codified in the treatise of Julius Victor (Ars rhet. 27). The distinction between private letters (litterae), addressed to a specific person in a personal form as a means of simple communication, and public letters (epistulae), composed with a view toward publication in an intentionally literary tone, is already clear in the epistolary of Cicero (Fam. XV, 21,4) and deepens later in Christian literature. However, very many private letters, theoretically confidential, have also reached us, sometimes published by the authors themselves, who gathered them into collections.

In the Christian society of the first centuries, epistolography, characterized by essentially practical goals in comparison with the contemporary pagan literature, was cultivated with attention and special care, often being the only method of keeping the contacts alive between the pastor and the distant Christian community. This is the case, e.g., of the letters included in the NT, originally addressed to a particular community, then circulated throughout the Christian world for the edification and support of the faithful; and of some writings of the subapostolic era, such as the letter sent by *Clement of *Rome to the church of Corinth around 96, in which the form and the style reflect a first attempt at literary elaboration; or the corpus of the seven *Ignatian letters, in which the thirst for martyrdom and the profound religious enthusiasm are translated into lyrical and powerfully original language. The internal organization of the church soon required the development of an ample epistolary correspondence of official tenor (the episcopal letters), intended to safeguard the purity of doctrine and to offer to the Christian community the normative criteria for the preservation of orthodox faith. These are true and proper "open letters," informational and instructional writings which have only the epistolary form in common with the letter; the form has furthermore become an accessory ornament, in which the mention of an addressee serves as a mere literary pretext to develop a theme of general interest. Apart from the case of the letter to the Hebrews, in which every reference of a personal character is missing, it is enough to cite the *Epistle of Ps.-Barnabas, a true and proper doctrinal treatise with strong moral preoccupations, engaged in anti-Jewish polemic on the basis of *allegorical *exegesis; the Letter to Diognetus, one of the highest examples of Christian apologetic, which illustrates to the pagan addressee the superiority of the new religion in prose animated by a burning faith and supported by a perfect knowledge of rhetoric; the gnostic Ptolemy's Letter to Flora is a clever work of heretical propaganda preserved by *Epiphanius (PG 41, 558-568), written in a prose of admirable formal elegance.

Christian epistolography, both in Greek and Latin environments, developed in an entirely particular way between the 3rd and 5th c., strongly reflecting the influences of the rhetorical schools; the letter as a literary genre took on, then, all the formal characteristics of artistic prose, practiced as the most appropriate means of putting one's own literary talent to the test. Ep. 51 of *Gregory of Nazianzus to Nicobolus can be considered a true and proper epistolographic treatise, a testimony to the lively interest for the genre in his time, in which with lucid clarity the criteria are enumerated which should inform the composition of a letter. The formal preoccupations are particularly evident in the great Christian epistolaries of the 4th c.: the three Cappadocians and *John Chrysostom among the Greeks prove it, as do *Ambrose, *Jerome and *Augustine among the Latins. In these epistolary collections—whose publication was often undertaken by the author or while the author was still alive—there is place for both the familiares letters, intimate correspondence in which Christian friendship often produced moments of lyrical effusion, and the negotiales letters, official correspondence in which the most varied doctrinal and disciplinary questions are faced; these letters are always valuable historical documents, which throw light on the political-religious events of the era, offering precise information on incidents, persons and situations otherwise unknown to us.

Let us mention finally that, on the example of the rhetor Ausonius who was his teacher, *Paulinus of Nola introduced into Christian literature the artistic form of the epistle in verse, of epithalamic and consolatory content, in which the alternation of meters and the frequent Virgilian reminiscences testify to the strict dependence on the classical tradition.

Some kinds of Christian letters have a specific goal: (1) The festal letters, typical of the Alexandrian church; i.e., the letters concerning the correct date of the celebration of Easter, sent at the beginning of the year by the bishop of Alexandria to all the dioceses depending on him and some sees around the Mediterranean. These letters—starting from *Dionysus in the 3rd c. until the 8th—were reproduced in many copies in the episcopal chancellery in the original Greek. In reality they did not limit themselves to an announcement, but also confronted contemporary themes. Other sees, also, such as Rome, wrote letters to indicate the date of the next Easter, but they never had a similar importance. (2) The litterae communionis, which had different purposes: their bearer had obtained an attestation from his bishop, who guaranteed his orthodoxy and therefore his acceptance on the part of other Christian communities. (3) Synodal letters redacted by a synod to announce the results to the faithful and to other bishops. (4) Letters of recommendation of various kinds, such as the letters of intercession to the civil authorities to request mercy toward some disgraced unfortunate.

The letter was easy to falsify, a very delicate problem, and they were in fact falsified. Very different is *pseudepigraphy, when the true author attributes the text to another personage of the past. (For this problem, see *falsification.) St. Paul affirmed that letters were circulating under his name (2 Th 2:2), and Jerome lamented that letters were attributed to him which were not his (Apologia 3,25).

DACL 8, 2683-2885; PWK Suppl. V, 186-220 (Stuttgart 1931); RAC 2, 564-585; AL 2, 893-1057; G. Ghedini, Lettere cristiane dai papiri greci del III e IV secolo, Milan 1923; D. Gorce, Les voyages, l'hospitalité et le port des lettres dans le monde chrétien des IV[e] et V[e] siècles, Paris 1925; A. von Harnack, Die Briefsammlung des Apostel Paulus und die anderen vorkonstantinischen christ. Briefsammlungen, Leipzig 1926; A.H.R. Bastiaensen, Le Cérémonial épistolaire des chrétiens latins, Nijmegen 1964; G. Scarpat, Epistolografia. Introduzione allo Studio della Cultura classica, I, Milan 1972, 475-512; G. Tibiletti, Le lettere private nei papiri greci del III e IV sec. d.C. Tra paganesimo e cristianesimo, Milan 1979; Chan-Hie Kim, Form and Structure of Greek Familiar Letter of Recommendation, Ann Arbor, MI 1985; A.J. Malherbe, Ancient Epistolary Theorists, Atlanta, GA 1988; P. Cugusi, L'epistolografia, in Lo spazio letterario di Roma antica, II, Rome 1989, 379-441; L. Mondin, Per la storia dell'epistolografia latina tardoantica: le lettere di Ausonio, in Miscellanea di studi in occasione del 50° anniversario di fondazione dell'Istituto, Rome 1990, 107-149; S. Rebenich, Hieronymus und seiner Kreis: prosopographische und sozialgeschichtliche Untersuchungen, Stuttgart 1992; Ph. Bruggisser, Symmaque ou le rituel épistolaire de l'amitié littéraire, Fribourg 1993; F. Morenzoni, Epistolografia e "artes dictandi," in Lo spazio letterario del Medioevo, Rome 1994, II, 443-463; M. Zelzer, Der Brief in der Spätantike: Überlegungen zu einem literarischen Genos am Beispiel der Briefsammlung des Sidonius Apollinaris: WS 107/108 (1994-1995) 541-551; M. Naldini, Il cristianesimo in Egitto. Lettere private nei papiri dei secoli II-IV, Florence 1998; Letters of Condolence in Greek Papyri, ed. and tr. J. Chapa, Florence 1998; C. Conybeare, Paulinus Noster—Self and Symbols in the Letters of Paulinus of Nola, Oxford 2000; B. Conring, Hieronymus als Briefschreiber: Ein Beitrag zur spätantiken Epistolographie, Tübingen 2001; Il "Liber epistolarum" della cancelleria austrasica (sec. V-VI), text, It. tr. and comm. by E. Malaspina, Rome 2001; E. Giannarelli, Un genere letterario senza confini: l'epistolografia negli autori cristiani di IV e V secolo, in Forme letterarie nella produzione latina di IV e V secolo, ed. F.E. Consolino, Rome 2003, 33-52.

M.P. Ciccarese

LETTER About SUNDAY. Sunday is the center of the Christian liturgical celebration; festive repose is not required, but only worship; the imperial laws imposed that on this day there be no spectacles. In the 5th c. the law on the sabbath repose began to be applied to Sunday. In the context of this evolution is located the Letter About Sunday, which was supposedly sent by Christ and fell from the sky (at *Rome in St. Peter's or at *Jerusalem or at *Bethlehem, acc. to the redactions). This prescribes that every baptized person should honor and celebrate Sunday, while "the man is cursed who does not honor the holy day of Sunday from the ninth hour of Saturday until dawn on Monday" (Erbetta, 117). The original of the text must have been Greek, but it had enormous diffusion in a constellation of translations in various languages, revisions and adjustments. The *Latin version was strongly condemned by Licinianus of Cartagena (d. around 602). Presumably the letter was written between the 5th and 6th c.; acc. to the opinion of van Esbroeck it was written in Jerusalem in the middle of the 5th c.

CANT 311; F. Stegmüller, Repertorium Biblicum Medii Aevi, Madrid 1940, I, 121-123; Erbetta 3, 11-118; M. Bittner, Der vom Himmel gefallene Brief Christi in seinem morgenländischen Versionen und Rezensionen, Vienna 1906; A. de Santos Otero, Los Evangelios apócrifos, Madrid 1963, 664-679; DACL 3, 1434-1546; M. van Esbroeck, La lettre sur le dimanche, descendue du ciel: AB 107 (1989) 267-287.

A. Di Berardino

LETTER of LENTULUS (so-called). A fragment of a chronicle transformed into a letter (both forms exist) of an unknown Lentulus, who describes the exterior form of Christ, completing therefore the gospels and the apocrypha. This description is not the first (a list is in E. von Dobschütz) but the most popular in the West, and it survives until today in popular culture. The text comes from the 12th–14th c., linked to the cult of the humanity of Christ, developed in this period. The text was published for the first time by Ludolf of Saxony (d. 1378) in his Life of Jesus. There are translations into various languages: Greek, *Syriac, *Armenian, Irish, paleo-Slavic etc.

CANT 310; BHL 4151-2; E. v. Dobschütz, Christusbilder: TU 18 (1898) 308-330; Tr.: Eng. Elliott 542; It. Erbetta 3, 137; Moraldi 3, 11-20; Pol.: Starowieyski 3, 112-114; J.N. Pérès, Untersuchungen im Zusammenhang mit der sogenannten "Epistula Lentuli": Apocrypha 11 (2000) 59-75.

M. Starowieyski

LETTER of the CHURCH of LYONS and VIENNE. A summary and large sections of this letter have been preserved by *Eusebius (HE 5, 1-4). It was written a little after the persecution of 177, in the name of the Christians of *Vienne and *Lyons, very likely by *Irenaeus (see SC 100, 260-261), who was himself originally from *Smyrna. It was addressed to the churches of *Asia and *Phrygia and contained a long account of the passion of the martyrs of Lyons. It has often been believed that it was written exclusively for this purpose, but the summary which Eusebius gives of the conclusion of the letter (HE 5, 3-4) demonstrates that it was intended to intervene in a conflict which had originated in those churches on the question of whether the lapsi should be pardoned or not; it showed, on the example of the martyrs of Lyons, that indulgence should be exercised. This suggests that the church of Lyons had received messengers from the churches of Asia who had come to report the controversy and to request help. The letter was accompanied by a note written by the martyrs themselves and by a list of them (preserved by *Gregory of Tours).

P. Nautin, Lettres et écrivains chrétiens, Paris 1961, 33-64; A. Audion - T.D. Barnes et al., Les martyrs de Lyon, Paris 1978, 129-133, 155-166, 249-256; J. Pouilloux (ed.), Les martyrs de Lyon (177), Paris 1978.

P. Nautin

LETTER TO SIGEBERT III or CLOVIS II (ca. 645). Living in 7th-c. Gaul, an anonymous author wrote a letter ca. 645 to King Sigebert III (d. 656) or his brother Clovis II (d. 657) in a typically Merovingian Latin, exhorting him to govern always bearing in mind the fundamental values of the Christian ruler as displayed in the biblical kings *David and *Solomon, as well as in his ancestors Childebert I (d. 558) and *Chlothar I (d. 561).

CPL 1306; PL 87, 653-658; W. Gundlach, ed., MGH, Epp. III, Berlin 1892, 457-460; repr. in CCL 117, Turnhout 1957, 491-496; Patrologia IV, 350.

P. Marone

LETTERS (apocryphal). Among the apocrypha of the NT is a group of writings called "Letters." Some of these letters are treatises (Epistle of Ps.-Titus, Letter of the Apostles), fragments of works (Letter of Lentulus*), historical accounts (Letters of Pilate and Herod), reports (Anaphora Pilati) and finally texts in the form of true and proper letters such as the correspondence of Christ and Abgar, of Seneca and Paul, the letter of St. Paul to the Alexandrians, to the Laodiceans or even the correspondence of St. Paul with the Corinthians. Some of these letters make up part of another apocrypha. (The correspondence with the Corinthians is part of the Acts of Paul; the correspondence of Christ and Abgar is linked with the Acts of Thaddeus.) Some letters are found in multiple apocrypha: the letter of Pilate to Claudius is found in the Cura sanitatis Tiberii, in the Gospel of Nicodemus, in the Acts of Peter and Paul etc. Some letters are orthodox, others not, as e.g., the gnostic letters in the collection of texts of *Nag Hammadi (letters of James). The letters can be employed as introductory texts (the letters of Jerome and Heliodorus in the Gospel of Ps.-Matthew, the letters of Peter and Clement in the Ps.-Clementines). The Letter About Sunday* makes a special case—a letter sent by God himself. In the collections of apocrypha normally medieval letters too are found, such as those of Mary (to the inhabitants of Florence or Messina) or also the so-called Letter of Lentulus*.

CANT 305-311; see also the part dedicated to the apocryphal letters of the great collections of apocrypha: of Schneemelcher (vol. 2), Elliott, Erbetta (vol. 3), Moraldi (vol. 3), Starowieyski (vol. 3) and the crit. ed. of the texts in which they are inserted.

M. Starowieyski

LETTERS of COMMUNION

I. Letters of communion among the churches - II. Letters of communion for Christians who travel from their own church to another - III. The varied names of the letters of communion.

As *Ignatius of Antioch said (Ep. ad Smyrn. 8,2) already at the beginning of the 2nd c., where there is a bishop, a local church exists, with its autonomy and its episcopal monarchy. In reality the different churches did not coexist juxtaposed among themselves, but they were united through a unique communion which joined in itself hundreds of bishops—with their churches—into a great body. Words such as κοινωνία, εἰρήνη, ἀγάπη, communio, communicatio or pax, together with many others, allude to the same concept of unity, manifested fundamentally in the eucharistic communion, although there are also links of belonging to the catechumenate or the ordo paenitentium. To preserve the unity of all the churches, formed in communion, the church—or, better put, the episcopate—took advantage, from the beginning, of documents of an epistolary character, both to validate the communion between the churches—or between the different bishops—and to guarantee communion to Christians, lay or ecclesiastical, who transferred from one church to another.

I. Letters of communion among the churches. *Tertullian (De praescr. 36,4) uses the verbal form contessero to refer to the full cohesion and connection existing between the Roman church and the African churches: the use of classical legal language relative to the contracted bonds of association is adapted to express the belonging to the same faith and the same society. *Cyprian (Ep. 59,9) notifies his colleague Cornelius of the names of the orthodox African bishops so that not only the Roman but also the other bishops might know whom they should deal with for the reception and dispatch of letters of communion. The Council of *Antioch (268) informed Pope *Dionysius and Bishop *Maximus of Alexandria that the successor of *Paul of Samosata was *Domnus, so that the latter might receive letters of communion from the two great sees. These testimonies show how, in communion, the apostolic churches—and esp. the Roman—were, for a long time, a clear reference for the others; this because the communio had two aspects, the sacramental and the legal-customary. As a matter of fact, a church that was in communion with Rome was also in communion with the entire *Catholic Church; *Ambrose (Ep. 5 [extra coll.], 4) formulated this principle clearly in affirming that the rights of communion come from the Roman church. This communion which has its vertebral column at *Rome was employed, with force, in the different religious and political conflicts, particularly in *Africa divided between Catholics and *Donatists: Optatus (C. Parm. Donat. 2,3) says that through an exchange of letters all the bishops lived in communion with the bishop of Rome and each other.

Even if it is not possible to specify their frequency, the interecclesial letters of communion must have been written above all when changes in the possession of the sees took place: Cyprian (Ep. 45,1) informs the African bishops of the election of Cornelius and invites them to send letters to the Roman bishop; *Theophilus of Alexandria (apud Jerome, Ep. 98,26) notifies the episcopate of his patriarchate of the names of the new Egyptian bishops so that they might exchange letters of communion with one another. In general terms, the bishops had to be up to date on who their legitimate colleagues in other sees were. In principle, every titulary of an episcopal see should have had available a list of bishops who were in communion with him; this was true, at least, for the most important churches, esp. for the Roman and, starting from the 4th c., for the metropolitan churches.

II. Letters of communion for Christians who travel from their own church to another. As happened for any integrated social group in the Roman Empire, each local church had to keep, in normal circumstances, a register of its members. For the functioning of the entire church the correct distribution of the Christians within a territory was fundamental, from the catechumens to the bishop—with two great groups, the baptized and the clerics—including the categories which corresponded to irregular situations—e.g., that of penitents—all of which normally brought with them the loss of communion. This register, actualized or reproduced in the diptychs or liturgical books, was the axis around which the life and religious practice of the members of any society turned. The Christians who, for whatever reason, left their church—in which they had received baptism or were still to receive it—and went to another had to demonstrate both their communion and their category in order to maintain their rank with the functions which were proper to them and, in addition, assure themselves of material assistance in case of necessity.

The first canon on this subject belongs to the first Council of *Arles (314): baptized provincial governors had to obtain letters of communion before arriving in the place where they were to exercise their charge (can. 7). The Council of *Antioch (341) also alludes to the obligation of these "passports": no stranger can be received ἄνευ εἰρηνικῶν (can. 7). The individual letters of communion were, without doubt, used long before these canons were formulated, in which the importance appears reflected which these documents had for the episcopate. There are some brief missives of communion, on papyrus or parchment, preserved in the Egyptian desert and dated, by paleography, between the middle of the 3rd and the beginning of the 5th c., which were written between ecclesiastics to recommend the baptized and the catechumens who traveled from one place to another. This Egyptian correspondence demonstrates how both the presbyters—or, perhaps, also the deacons—and the bishops could grant or receive such letters when the travelers were laypeople. In accordance with what was established at the Council of Antioch, concerning the stipulation of the canon through which the rural priests could not grant letters of communion, nothing is said about urban priests or those closer to the bishop. Passing on to the 4th c., the wish is evident to consider the concession of letters of communion as a special competence of the bishop: so stipulates can. 7 of a Carthaginian council (345–348), in reference both to laypeople and to clerics. The later synodal or papal decisions in this regard, with exclusive reference to ecclesiastics or to the people, insist that it should be the corresponding bishop who gives the letters of communion. However, from the end of the 4th c., some African councils established that the bishops could not travel without letters attesting their rank: this practice was still alive, in general terms in the *Gaul of the 5th and 6th c., considering that some pontiffs—and in particular *Zosimus and *Pelagius I—wanted to centralize to the supermetropolitan bishops or their vicars the concession of letters of communion to any cleric.

The progressive increase of this control is also made evident by the fact that some resolutions imposed, from the beginning of the 5th c., that in the letters of communion there be present, together with the signature, the date of Easter of the year in question, with the adaptation of the paschal calculation in use in the imperial chancellery. Repeated disputes of a normative character allude to the consideration that this habit must have grown in the receiving churches in order to avoid possible deceptions—the Council of *Nîmes (394 or 396) or the Ep. 129 of *Basil of Caesarea reveal that frauds were habitual. In the Canones apostolorum (can. 33) it is prohibited to receive foreign bishops, priests and deacons without letters, and it is decreed that, if they should have the letters with them, they must exhibit them to avoid every possible trickery, although it then specifies that the fact of not having such letters is sufficient to motivate the exclusion from communion, but not from physical provisioning. In this regard, *Gregory of Nazianzus (Orat. 4; C. Iul. 1,111) and *Sozomen (Hist. eccl. 5,16) recount that Julian wanted to gain the goodwill of foreigners through a sort of imitation of the Christian practice of the letters of communion.

III. The varied names of the letters of communion. In relation with the letters of communion, can. 11 of the Council of *Chalcedon (451) stipulates that only the poor should receive εἰρηνικαί, and that the συστατικαί should be conceded to persons of note. This distinction in the quality of the bearer, between simple letters of communion and letters of recommendation—the latter more personal and less stereotypical—reveals how much the letters granted to travelers could present, among themselves, notable differences as to their redaction, extension and content, although all had a common principle in demonstrating that their bearer was in communion with their own church and, therefore, in requesting to obtain communion—lay or ecclesiastical—in the receiving church. In all cases they were letters of communion to be included despite how short or long they might be, in the great and varied group of the letters of recommendation or of introduction. In other words, the letters of communion were always of recommendation (συστατικαί), and many letters of recommendation were at the same time letters of communion (εἰρηνικαί).

This aspect explains why the letters of communion are referred to by Greek patristic and conciliar sources with the terms εἰρηνικαί, κοινωνικαί and συστατικαί. However, it is at the same time evident how every letter of communion is, in its turn, included in the larger category of canonical letters, the reason for which said letters are also, with a certain frequency, designated as κανονικαί. These terms have, logically, their Latin equivalents: pacificae, communicatoriae, commendaticiae and canonicae. Another very common Latin designation is formatae, an adjective derived from formo, and alluding, therefore, to the fact that the letters of communion usually conformed to a predetermined disposition, redaction or form, a fact already demonstrated in the Egyptian letters discussed above. It is necessary nonetheless to point out another consideration linked to the fact that in some Gallican councils the term apostolia emerges, an expression which probably alludes to the apostolic communion. In addition, the letters of communion are designated, sometimes, through the generic terms litterae or epistolae—epistolia furthermore appears in some Latin texts—in the same manner as the Greek sources, where, often, they are simply mentioned with the term ἐπιστολαί or another similar word.

From this vocabulary a technical or specific use of the same cannot be recognized, certainly: the use of these designations does not allow us to differentiate modalities or categories within the letters of communion. All the Greek designations listed above are documented during the first half of the 4th c. The same thing does not seem, however, to happen in the Latin environment; the term pacificae appears from the time of *Damasus and canonicae in Latin translations of Greek canons. As for the adjective commendaticiae—the exact translation of συστατικαί—it is not attested in canons originating in Latin until the 2nd half of the 5th c. On the other hand, communicatoriae exists in Latin texts from the beginning of the 4th c. until the times of *Augustine; from the end of the 4th c. in the West the term apostolia is documented, although the verbal adjective formatae, much used starting from the Theodosian era, imposed itself clearly.

C. Fabricius, Die Litterae Formatae im Frühmittelalter: Archiv für Urkundenforschung 9 (1926) 39-86, 168-194; H. Leclercq, Litterae commendatitiae et formatae: DACL 9, 2, 1571-1576; L. Hertling, Communio. Chiesa e papato nell'Antichitá cristiana, Rome 1961; M. Naldini, Il cristianesimo in Egitto. Lettere private nei papiri dei secoli II-IV, Fiesole [2]1998; T.M. Teeter, Letters of Recommendation or Letters of Peace?, in Akten des 21. Internationalen Papyrologenkongresses, II, Berlin 1997 (Archiv für Papyrusforschung, Beiheft 3), 954-960; J. Vilella, In alia plebe*: las cartas de comunión en las iglesias de la Antigüedad*, in Correspondances, Documents pour l'Histoire de l'Antiquité Tardive, Lyons 2009.

J. Vilella

LEUCIUS CARINUS (3rd c.?). A person otherwise unknown, *Epiphanius speaks of one Leucius, disciple of John and enemy of the gnostic *Cerinthus (Adv. Haer. V, 1,6: PG 41, 897) and therefore among the orthodox (see *Pacian of Barcelona, PL 13). However, some apocryphal Acts circulated under his name as early as the 4th c., which were used in *Africa by the *Manicheans, and not accepted by the *Catholics (Augustine, C. Faustum 30,4; Acta disp. cum Felice 2,6: PL 41, 539; De fide c. man. 38: PL 41, 1150; *Filaster, Haer. 88,6; Pope *Innocent, Ep. 1,6). These texts may have been composed in the 3rd c. They were known also in the East (Epiphanius, Adv. haer. 2,6: PG 41, 898). Turibius speaks only of the Acta Johannis attributed to Leucius (PL 54, 694). The Decretum gelasianum* condemns the libri omnes, quos fecit Leucius, discipulus diaboli (Mansi 8, 150) without offering a list of them. Ps.-Melito, living in the 5th–6th c., identified the writer Leucius with the disciple of John (De transitu Mariae, prol.). The Acts of Pilate consider Leucius and Carinus as different people. At the time of *Photius the two names were united to refer to one person; in fact, he speaks of having read a volume of Leucius Carinus containing The Travels of the Apostles, i.e., of Peter, John, Andrew, Thomas and Paul (Bibl., cod. 114). Photius's judgment on the content and the style of the work is markedly negative.

Erbetta 2, 16-20; E. Junod - J.-D. Kaestli, Histoire des Actes apocryphes des apôtres du III^e au IX^e siècles: le cas des Actes de Jean, Geneva 1982, 137-143; New Testament Apocrypha, ed. W. Scheneemelcher, Westminster 1992, II, 87-100.

A. Di Berardino

LEX ROMANA BURGUNDIONUM. This compilation was issued by the king Gundobad of Burgundy (474–516), perhaps after his defeat at the hands of Clovis, for the Roman subjects of his kingdom. It applied to the Burgundians as the Lex Romana Visigothorum applied to the *Visigoth kingdom. It was also based on Roman statutes: the Gregorian, Hermogenian and Theodosian Codes, the sentences of Paul, and the institutes of Gaius. Its sources are reworked in a unitary text that is frequently based on interpretationes that are either identical or very close to those that accompany the text of the Roman-Visigothic law. The collection, however, is not so important or useful as the Lex Romana Visigothorum, neither from the point of view of knowledge of Roman law, nor from that of the history of medieval law.

CPL 1803; MGH, Leges III, 525; B. Saitta, I Burgundi (413-534), Catania 1977, G.L. Falchi, La codificazione del diritto romano nel V e VI secolo, Rome 1989; A. De Palma, Lessico della Lex Romana Burgundionum, in collaboration with G. Melillo - C. Pennacchio, Naples 1992, 11-247; G. Bauer-Gerland, Das Erbrecht der Lex Romana Burgundionum, Berlin 1995.

A. Di Berardino

LEX ROMANA VISIGOTHORUM – Breviarium Alaricianum. A compilation of Roman leges and iura, made on order of Alaric II (484–507), son of *Euric, in *Gaul and promulgated on 2 Feb 506. Before the start of the 16th c. it was called Lex Romana Visigothorum, but today more commonly Breviarium Alaricianum. Alaric had it compiled for the Roman subjects of his kingdom, but not for the Goths, because he did not want Gothic law to apply to the Romans. The compilation was approved and confirmed by the bishops. A copy was sent to every comes (ut in foro tuo nulla alia lex neque iuris formula proferri vel recipe praesumatur), while the original was kept in the capital, *Toulouse.

The authors of this collection (bishops and nobles) were interested solely in legislation relevant to them, and so overlooked texts no longer topical. They drew esp. from CTh, from the Novellae in that code, from the Gregorian and Hermogenian codes, from the sentences of Paul, from the Epitome of Gaius etc. The laws are accompanied by an interpretatio, to make them comprehensible. The breviarium is very important for the knowledge of Roman law and had great importance in medieval Europe.

CPL 1800; M.-B. Brugguière, Littérature et Droit dans la Gaule du V^e siècle, Paris 1974; G.L. Falchi, La codificazione del diritto romano nel V e VI secolo, Rome 1989; R. Lambertini, La codificazione di Alarico II, Turin 1990, 1991² (IURA 41 [1990] 163-168); R.W. Mathisen, The "Second Council of Arles" and the Spirit of Compilation and Codification in Late Roman Gaul: JECS 5 (1997) 511-554.

A. Di Berardino

LIBANIUS (314–393/404). Greek rhetorician and sophist, pagan, born at *Antioch of Syria in 314. He studied rhetoric in Athens at the school of the African Diophantus, alongside *Basil the Great and *Gregory of Nazianzus. He taught at *Constantinople, at *Nicomedia and finally in Antioch (354), where he died (393 or 404). He was an admirer and friend of the emperor *Julian, whom he had known at Nicomedia and whom he supported in his attempt to restore pagan Hellenism. At Antioch he had among his pupils *Amphilochius of Iconium, *Theodore of Mopsuestia and perhaps *John Chrysostom (Soz., HE VIII, 2,5ff.); of this last he was a great admirer (Soz., HE VIII, 2,2; Isid. Pel., Ep. II, 42), although Chrysostom rebutted Or. 60 of Libanius with his De s. Babyla (ch. 1.8ff.) and in 21 discourses On the Statues dealt in the opposite way with the same question which Libanius treated in his defense of the citizens of Antioch before the Emperor *Theodosius I (Or. 19-23). Libanius left a great quantity of works: discourses (of which eight, Or. 12-18 and 24, relate to Emperor Julian), declamations, oratorical exercises and letters; in all these an interest in the form prevails. The authenticity of his correspondence with Basil (Foerster XI, 572-597; PG 32, 1077-1100) is the object of many discussions.

Libanii opera, ed. R. Foerster, 12 vols., Leipzig 1903-1923; PWK 12, 2485-2551; P. Petit, Libanius et la vie municipale à Antioche au IVe siècle après J.-C., Paris 1955; A.J. Festugière, Antioche païenne et chrétienne, Paris 1959; H.-U. Wiemer, Libanios und Julian: Studien zum Verhältnis von Rhetorik und Politik im vierten Jahrhundert n. Chr., Munich 1995; KLP 3, 612-615 (bibl.).

A. Pollastri

LIBELLI MIRACULORUM. Brief contemporary narrative accounts of miracles, written or related by those directly affected by them, or by eyewitnesses. The start of the tradition is linked to the spread of the cult of St. *Stephen. The first example may be reckoned the letter of *Severus of Minorca (BHL 7859; PL 41,833-854; dated 3 Feb 418), which recounts several miracles that occurred on the island, bringing about the conversion of Jews. The second is the *De miraculis Sancti Stephani, a collection of accounts of healing miracles worked through the relics of the saint, which is contained in two small books dating from about 425. *Augustine of Hippo, desiring to gather together and publicize miracles of his day, called for the preparation of libelli to be read publicly to the people for their edification. Many of these miracles were recounted in the De civitate Dei (22,8). The strategy of reading the libelli miraculorum publicly, favored by Augustine and widespread in the other African churches, created a climate of expectation and enthusiasm; sometimes they were read in the presence of those cured, so that everyone could see, touch and hear them (Sermon 319,8). In Hippo alone, in the space of less than two years, about seventy physical healings were recorded, with Augustine certain even then that "not many of the miracles have been written down" (Civ. Dei 22,8). The collection of miracles continued also in the following centuries (see Vuolo).

H. Delehaye, Les premiers 'libelli miraculorum': AB 29 (1910) 427-434; Id., Les recueils antiques des miracles des saints: AB 43 (1925) 5-85; 305-325; BA 37,835-837; A. Vuolo, I "libelli miraculorum" tra religiosià e politica (Napoli, sec. IX-XII), Naples 1990; Id., Yvette Duval, Sur la genèse des Libelli miraculorum: REAug 52 (2006) 97-12 ; J. Meyers, Les miracles de saint Etienne. Recherches sur le recueil pseudo-augustinien (BHL 7860-7861), avec édition critique, traduction et commentaire, Turnhout 2006.

A. Di Berardino

LIBELLUS. The term libellus has a great variety of meanings, extending from the diminutive of liber (book), to that of a piece of defamatory writing, to that of a bill of indictment. As a technical term it indicates an act or a document relating to the exercise of authority, in either a petition made to someone in authority or a certificate released by that authority. In the specifically Christian context, we can distinguish three types of libelli: (1) a libellus in the form of a certificate, (2) libellus pacis, (3) libellus missarum.

1. Libellus. A certificate released, during the *Decian persecution, by the Roman authorities, in which it is attested that a certain person had sacrificed to the gods (often obtained by paying). In its structure it followed a formulary typical of a rescript: the text of the petitioner who affirmed having offered the sacrifice, the names of the witnesses and the signature of the competent official of the place. Many libelli have been found, since 1893 onward, in the Egyptian desert (see DACL 6, 317-332; 9, 80-85), the last published in 1991. In general, they were issued to everyone. However, *Cyprian gives the name libellatici to those Christians who had obtained the libellus either by paying or by other means, without having actually made the cultic act to the gods, as had the thurificati and the sacrificati, who had thus formally committed apostasy (see Cypr., Ep. 20,2: CSEL 3, 527; Ep. 55 [passim]: CSEL 3, 624-648). The fault of the libellatici was considered less serious than the other two categories, but was still a fault which had to be expiated by penance (*see lapsi, problem of the).

2. Libellus pacis. During the Decian persecution those who had apostatized in some way had to undergo canonical penance; some, however, wanted to be reconciled immediately (see Cypr., Ep. 19,2: CSEL 3, 525; Ep. 34,1: CSEL 3, 566; Ep. 55,4: CSEL 3, 626). In these circumstances the martyres or confessores (terms at the time interchangeable) passed letters of recommendation for the lapsi to the leaders of the community, acc. to a practice by then well established. However, at least in this case, certain abuses emerged: collective recommendations (see Cypr., Ep. 23: CSEL 3, 536); letters given without specifying who was to be reconciled (Cypr., Ep. 15,4: CSEL 3, 516); letters granting reconciliation independently, disregarding the bishops, etc. The contention of Cyprian—a position common among bishops, while recognizing the value of the libelli pacis properly issued—was that all the lapsi had to undergo public penance.

ThLL 7, 1262-1270; Cath 7, 542-544; PO IV, 112-124; XVIII, 354-379 (with bibl., 354 and 379); J.-R. Knipfing, The Libelli of the Decian Persecution: HTR 16 (1923) 45-90; P. Roasenda, Decio e i libellatici: Didaskal. 5 (1927) 31-68; V. Saxer, Vie liturgique et quotidienne à Carthage vers le milieu du III[e] siècle, Vatican City 1969; J.R.P. Keresztes, The Decian Libelli and Contemporary Literature: Latomus 34 (1975) 761-781; W.L. Leadbetter, A Libellus of the Decian Persecution: Horsely, New Documents . . . II (1982) 185-186; G.W. Clarke, The Letters of Cyprian of Carthage, III-IV, New York 1986-89, IV (see index); J.R. Rea, The Oxyrhinchus Papyri, LVIII, London 1991, n. 3929; R. Selinger, Die Religionspolitik des Kaisers Decius, Anatomie einer Christenverfolgung, Frankfurt a.M. 1994.

A. Di Berardino

3. Libelli missarum. The more complex liturgical books, like the sacramentaries, found their preparatory phase in the so-called libelli missarum, booklets that contained liturgical formulas of various types for a particular diocese or locality, but not the canon, which was fixed, nor the readings or sung parts; they were intended for a specific feast of a community, for votive Masses, or for texts of a particular type (antiphons, prayers, responsories). These were an intermediary stage between extemporary celebrations and the fixed formulas of the sacramentary. Many of these forms subsequently found their way into much larger collections. For example, the Sacramentarium veronense (or leonianum), composed between 558 and 590, is a collection of these libelli. They were written for the most part in times of controversy. Those which are extant belong to the 4th–7th c. In the various rites, they circulated freely and permitted an exchange of liturgical forms among the various churches, so favoring the process of liturgical unification, both within the individual rites themselves and among them.

CPL 171a-174; 199; 656; 667; 775b (778); 813; 1358; 1493; 1600 (169°); 1690; 2018; 2284; C. Vogel, Introduction aux sources de l'histoire du culte chrétien au moyen âge, Spoleto 1964, 30-42.

E. Romero Pose

LIBER DIURNUS. This text, which bears a title that is not original (Liber diurnus Romanorum Pontificum), was formed from a collection of formularies used in ecclesiastical documents. The collection is not very extensive: the formulas are contained in three codices, all approximately of the same length: 99 are found in in the so-called Codex V; 100 in Codex C; and 106 in Codex A. All originate from across an extended period, beginning with some pre-Gregorian formulas. The greater part of them, however, belong to the period from the pontificate of *Gregory the Great (590–604) to that of Hadrian I (772–795). According to some scholars the formularies were in use in the pontifical chancery, perhaps to indicate the usual beginnings and conclusions of the various letters sent by the pontiffs. More recently it has been suggested that the source is indeed of Italian tradition, but that the codices available to us are in fact private copies, prepared for the use of schools and with a scope, both in nature and interest, purely canonical.

CPL 1626; PL 105, 9-120; DACL 9, 243-244; EC 7, 1262-1267; Altaner 504; H. Foerster, Liber Diurnus Romanorum Pontificum, Bern 1958; L. Santifaller, Liber diurnus. Studien und Forschungen, Stuttgart 1976; Id., Liber Diurnus, Vatican City 1981; M. Palma, L'origine del codice Vaticano del Liber Diurnus: Scrittura e civiltà 4 (1980) 295-310; T. Frenz, I documenti pontifici nel Medioevo e nell'Età moderna, Vatican City 1989, 45-47; Repertorium 7, 260-263 (extensive bibl.)

L. Dattrino

LIBER GENEALOGUS. Work of an anonymous chronographer, the Liber Genealogus (or De Genealogiis Patriarcharum or Origo humani generis acc. to the various recensions) enumerates and illustrates with concise notes the generations of the human race from Adam to Christ, having as its main source the texts of the canonical Scriptures, but sometimes also apocryphal texts, such as the Libri Generationis, the chronological schema inspired by the Chronica attributed to *Hippolytus. The work seems to have been composed in Roman *Africa at the beginning of the 5th c., between 405 and 427; recension B at least seems to be the work of a *Donatist. Some brief chronological notes, by a different author, have been added subsequently covering the period from Christ to year XVI (455) or XXIV (463), acc. to the different recensions, of *Genseric, who is presented as the antichrist in the first edition.

CPL 2254; PL 59, 523; Th. Mommsen, Chronica minora, I, Berlin 1892, 154-196; C. Frick, Chronica minora, I, Leipzig 1893, 2-27, 133-152; P. de Lagarde, Septuaginta-Studien, II, Göttingen 1892, 5-41. Monceaux IV, 101ff.; T. Ayuso Marazuela, Los elementos extrabíblicos de la Vulgata: EB 2 (1943) 152-160; B. Fischer, Algunas observaciones sobre el Codex Gothicus de la R.C. de S. Isidoro de León y sobre la tradición española de la Vulgata: Arch. Leon. 5 (1961) 5-47; H. Inglebert, Les romains chrétiens face à l'histoire de Rome, Paris 1996, 599-604.

V. Loi - B. Amata

LIBER GRADUUM. A collection of ascetical discourses written in an elegant form of *Syriac, contained in their entirety in the 12th-c. cod. Syr 201 of the National Library of Paris, which attributes the Liber Graduum to a Syriac author not far in time from the apostles. Other codices (in the British Museum), containing only a number of the discourses, ascribe them to *Evagrius of Pontus or to the monk *John of Lycopolis or the hermit Philo. The work in fact presumably comes from the last years of the long period of persecution initiated by *Diocletian (303) and concluding with the death of *Licinius (324). There are frequent references to a persecution said to be inhuman in its ferocity, which could certainly be that of Diocletian rather than the ones begun from 344 onward by the Persian kings. The author of the work presents the different types and styles of life which correspond to different forms of union with God. A distinction among humans is made between the just (those who do not renounce the world) and the perfect (those who renounce the world, marriage and the good things of the world, and are admitted into immediate union with God). These last follow the hard ways (humility, poverty, chastity of heart and of body), while the others follow easy paths running parallel to the hard way, which, while not bringing them directly to the city of God, at least save them from eternal death. The work is not so much didactic or dogmatic as it is homiletic and exhortatory, and presents a form of theological and religious syncretism of which it is not always easy to identify the components (*gnosticism, *Neoplatonism, *Messalianism or Euchitism).

M. Kmosko, Liber graduum, PS I, 3, Paris 1926; DSp 9, 749-754; R. Terzoli, Il tema della beatitudine nei Padri siri, Brescia 1972, 149-177; A. Guillaumont, Situation et signification du "Liber Graduum" dans la spiritualité syriaque: OCA 197 (1974) 311-322; DIP 5, 641-642; A. Kowalski, Perfezione e giustizia di Adamo nel Liber Graduum, Rome 1989; L. Wickham, Liber Graduum Revisited: OCA 247 (1994) 177-187; D. Juhl, Die Askese im Liber Graduum und bei Afrahat: eine vergleichende Studie zur frühsyrischen Frömmigkeit, Wiesbaden 1996; LACL (2002) 455.

M.G. Bianco

LIBER MONSTRORUM. A collection dedicated to the description of creatures from Greco-Roman mythology; it begins: Primo namque de his ad ortum sermo (or: De oculto orbis terrarum situ). The unknown author, addressing himself to an equally unknown reader, describes thus the subject matter of his work: De occulto orbis terrarum situ interrogasti, et si tanta monstrorum essent genera credenda. . . . Some of the titles, illustrating the contents of the work, are as follows: From book 1: 8. De hypocentauris; 18. De barbosis hominibus; 22. De barbosis mulieribus; 23. De pigmeis. From book 2: 23. De belua quae abuit bina capita; 33. De tauris ignem flantibus. Among the various hypotheses of the date of composition the most probable seems to be that of Backx, who dates the work from the 2nd half of the 7th c. into the 8th. The author may be Anglo-Saxon (or possibly Irish), and is acquainted with the Rhine estuary and its legends.

CPL 1124; M. Haupt, Opuscula, II, Leipzig 1876, 218-252; C. Bologna, Liber monstrorum, Milan 1977 (with It. tr.); A. Thomas, Un manuscrit inutilisé du "Liber monstrorum": ALMA I (1924) 232-245; S. Backx: Latomus 3 (1939) 61; F. Porsia, Note per una riedizione ed una rilettura del "Liber monstrorum": Annali Fac. Lett. Bari 15 (1972) 315-338; C. Bologna, La tradizione manoscr. Del Liber monstr.: appunti per l'edizione critica: Cultura neolatina 34 (1974) 337-346; A. Knock, The "Liber monstrorum": An Unpublished Manuscript and Some Reconsiderations: Scriptorium 32 (1978) 19-28; M. Lapidge, Liber monstruorum: SM n.s. 23 (1982) 151-192; P. Lendinara, Il "Liber monstruorum" e i glossari anglosassoni, in L'immaginario nelle letterature germaniche del Medioevo, Milan 1985, 203-225; A. Orchard, The Sources and Meaning of the "Liber monstruorum," in I "Monstra" nell'Inferno Dantesco, Spoleto 1997, 73-105.

L. Dattrino

LIBER ORATIONUM PSALMOGRAPHUS. The only evidence of the ancient psalmographus that has been preserved is a double page only just readable, currently in the Archivo Histórico Nacional di Madrid (folder n. 7, frag. 1484B).

We know, however, that the psalmographus was a book that contained psalm collects, which were used in the cathedral Office, esp. when the Office was not festal. Most of the texts of the psalmographus may be found either in Psalters that contain psalm collects along with antiphons, or in the misticus codices, which reproduce ferial days, de quotidiano; a certain number of psalm collects are found incorporated into the festal prayer book, and finally, into the liber horarum. The psalmographus is not properly a liturgical book, nor was it ever compiled as such. It was always considered as a collection of texts from which each small local church could choose prayers day by day, corresponding to the psalms that were recited in the Office. The literary and doctrinal influence of the collects of the psalmographus on the other euchological repertoire of the Office was significant.

The author, whom we can identify with *Lazarus of Seville, had wanted to follow a tradition that had produced consummate texts, such as the so-called Visita nos, an African series, and the Italian Effice nos. His great models, however, were solely literary texts: no liturgy had incorporated them into the celebration of the Hours. The Spanish collects, however, were officially accepted into the *Hispanic liturgy, and opened a new path to local liturgical creativity.

An author of the Carolingian era—who knew at least the Italian series, the most widespread in that period—using the Spanish collects of the psalmographus, produced another series of collects Domine apud quem, which, although it remained incomplete, spread to *Gaul, Great *Britain and *Germany. This Carolingian series, published by Wilmart-Brou, reflects in a very irregular way the original Spanish texts.

A. Wilmart - L. Brou, The Psalter Collects from V-VI Century Sources, London 1949; P. Verbraken, Oraisons sur les 150 psaumes, Paris 1967; J. Pinell, Liber Orationum Psalmographus. Colectas de salmos del antiguo rito hispánico. Recomposición y edición critica, Barcelona-Madrid 1972; Id., Fragmentos de códices del antiguo rito hispanico. III-IV-V: Reliquias del Psalmographus: Hispania Sacra 25 (1972) 185-208; M.S. Gros, El fragment del "Liber Psalmorum" hispànic Vic. Mas. Ep. mas 259: Rev. Catalana de Teologia 2 (1977) 437-452; V. Viguesa, El concepto de fe en las oraciones sálmicas leandrianas: RET 28 (1968) 297-318; J. Aldazábal, Influencia de Gregorio de Elvira y de Justo de Urgel en el Liber Orationum Psalmographus: Fons Vivus Misc. E. Vismara, Zürich 1971, 143-161; J. Pinell, Le collette salmiche: Liturgia delle Ore: Quaderni di Rivista Liturgica 14 (1972) 269-286; J. Aldazábal, Doctrina eclesiológica del Liber Orationum Salmógrafo. La Iglesia como "posesión adquirida por Cristo" y "nave de salvación": RET 32 (1972) 3-45; Id., La doctrina eclesiológica del Liber Orationum Psalmographus, Rome 1974; D. Borobio, La doctrina penitencial en el Liber Orationum Psalmographus, Bilbao 1977; J. Madoz, Escritos inéditos: San Leandro de Sevilla: EstEcl 56 (1981) 415-453; F. Segala, Immagini della beatitudine del "Liber Orationum Psalmographus": studio analitico-dottrinale, Pontificio Istituto S. Anselmo, Rome 1984.

J. Pinelli

LIBER PONTIFICALIS (Gesta romanorum pontificum). The Liber pontificalis consists of a series of mainly biographical details, of varying value, relating to the bishops of Rome. The archaeological, topographical and liturgical notes are far and away its most important and interesting component. The Liber pontificalis, properly so-called, and available in the second edition (the first has been lost), begins with information about *Peter and finishes with fragmentary details of Stephen V (885–886). It is necessary to distinguish several redactional strands: that which goes from Vita Petri to Pope *Silverius (536–537) was compiled under Pope *Vigilius (537–555). From this period and until the fragment of the Vita of Stephen V, the contents have been written by contemporaries, except the Vitae which cover the years from 537 to 579, written by an author who probably lived under *Pelagius II (579–590).

The Liber pontificalis, again properly so-called, was then extended until the pontificate of Honorius II (d. 1130) inclusive, along with somewhat meager lists which often give only the duration of the pontificate, and which vary in tenor from one MS to another. The classification of these MSS is very difficult. The best works containing extensions of the Liber pontificalis, and also bearing its name, are those of Pandulf (Vat. lat. 3762), called also the Liber pontificalis of Petrus Guillermus, the librarian of the abbey of Saint-Gilles (Gard, France), who had made a copy of it, and the Liber pontificalis edited in 1925 by J. March acc. to a codex Dertusensis (Tortosa, Spain). The Liber pontificalis proper was preceded by a list of the Depositiones episcoporum Romanorum* (255–352), contained in the Chronography* of 354, as well as by two catalogs, of which the most important is the Liberian Catalog (composed under Pope *Liberius, 352–366).

L. Duchesne LP, 2 vols., Paris 1886-1892, anastatic reprint, ibid. 1955, completed by a 3rd vol. ed. C. Vogel, ibid. 1957; T. Mommsen, in MGH, Berlin 1898 (up to AD 715); DACL 9, 355-466; O. Bertolini, Il "Liber Pontificalis," in La storiografia altomedievale, Spoleto 1970, 387-455; C. Vogel, Le Liber Pontificalis dans l'édition de L. Duchesne. État de la question, in Mons. Duchesne et son temps, Rome 1975, 99-127; H. Geertman, More veterum. Il "Liber Pontificalis" e gli edifici ecclesiastici di Roma nella Tarda Antichità e nell'Alto Medioevo, Groningen 1975; Th.F.X. Noble, A New Look at the Liber Pontificalis: Archivum Hist. Pont. 23 (1985) 347-358; R. Davis, The Book of Pontiffs (Liber pontificalis to AD 725), The Ancient Biographies of the First Ninety Roman Bishops to AD 715, trans. with intro., Liverpool 1989 ([2]2000); R. Davis, The Lives of the Eighth-Century Popes: (Liber Pontificalis): The Ancient Biographies of Nine Popes from AD 715 to AD 817, trans. with intro. and comm., Liverpool 1992; R. Davis, The Lives of the Ninth-Century Popes (Liber Pontificalis), Liverpool 1995; Patrologia IV, 148ff.; H. Geertman, Hic fecit basilicam: studi sul "Liber Pontificalis" e gli edifici ecclesiastici di Roma da Silvestro a Silverio, Leuven 2004.

C. Vogel

LIBER XXI SENTENTIARUM. The Liber XXI sententiarum is in the group of works that surrounds the figure of *Augustine of Hippo. It is a very complex document, comprising reading notes, philosophical discussions, a letter, a brief poem and reflections on writings composed before his election to the episcopate. According to the definition of F. Dolbeau, the Liber is a "doubtful" work: not apocryphal because it does not contradict at all the thought of Augustine, on the contrary having close points of connection with his works, but neither authentic, because neither Augustine during his life nor his disciples after his death were involved in its composition; most probably, this composite work is a mixture of authentic elements of the bishop of Hippo with the texts of his disciples.

F. Dolbeau has dealt with the historical problems of this text, analyzed its themes, provided information about the principal editors who have occupied themselves with it and prepared a working text.

The sententiae are of different length, although they are mostly quite brief; for the most part they are in prose (the only exceptions being 2b and 16, the last a brief poem, in verses); sententia 3 gives almost in its entirety a passage of Augustine already known (Letter 246, in the sententia only the final salutation is missing); there are many references to other authors, of which Dolbeau gives detailed information.

The Sacred Scriptures have an important role in a number of the sententiae: the sententiae show that the paschal lamb of the exodus is a figure of Christ, as well as explaining the significance of certain numbers which recur in the sacred text (2a, 5). Theology too is drawn upon to explain the superiority of God over all creation and his existence before all ages, as well as providing reflection on the *Trinity and defining the work of the *Holy Spirit in the remission of sins (17b, 18, 20b, 21b). Specifically Christian themes are addressed in the sententiae on the resurrection and on risen bodies (7, 10). The nature of the soul is also considered: humanity is distinguished from the animals on account of it, the most excellent humans being those whose souls understand God; the intelligible and intellectual soul is defined; and the necessity of the simultaneous presence of faith, hope and charity in the human soul explained. Human thoughts are explained in terms of the soul's movement (6, 8, 15a, 19a). Then, next to properly moral themes, we find more generic and less specifically religious questions: The propensity to the blessed life, the teaching that wise pagans can work wonders, the divisions and subdivisions of philosophy, an invitation not to sin, the attempt to explain logically that which does not come from God, the nearness of humanity to the rest of creation, including the angels, the definition of the will, a list with an explanation of the types of virtues, the joy fully appreciated which comes after having suffered, and the inclination toward God always present in those who obey him (1, 4, 9, 11, 12, 13, 14a, 14b, 15a, 16, 17a, 21a).

PL XL 725-732; CPL 373; F. Dolbeau, Un poème philosophique de l'Antiquité tardive: De pulchritudine mundi. Remarques sur le Liber XXI sententiarum (CPL 373): RecAug 42 (1996) 21-43; Id., Le liber XXI Sententiarum (CPL 373): édition d'un texte de travail: RecAug 30 (1997) 113-165.

D. Nuzzo

LIBERATUS of Carthage (6th c.). A Carthaginian deacon who wrote, around 560–565, a Breviarium causae nestorianorum et eutychianorum. Making succinct use of various records, some of which had been gathered firsthand, but also inserting certain documents in full, Liberatus tells the story of the christological controversies from *Nestorius to *Justinian, in order to justify the position of the Africans hostile to the condemnation of the *Three Chapters. The work is a mine of information esp. for the last phase of the controversy, in which the author was directly involved, even if his argument is clearly one-sided in defense of his own position.

CPL 865; PL 68, 969-1052; ACO II, 5, 98-141; Moricca III, 2, 1480-1482; A. Grillmeier, Jesus im Glauben der Kirche, II, 2, Freiburg 1989 (cf. index); Patrologia IV, 38-40.

M. Simonetti

LIBERIUS, pope (352–366). At the beginning of 350 the political situation of the empire was radically altered. With *Constans assassinated, *Constantius II defeated the usurper Magnentius, becoming the only emperor. Not understanding the new conditions, Liberius intended to continue the synodal politics of *Julius I, which had seemed so promising in the period of the partitio imperii. Appealed to by Eastern bishops and certain Egyptian opponents of *Athanasius of Alexandria, he convened a synod at *Rome to address the issue of Athanasius. Not succeeding, he asked the emperor to call a council at *Aquileia. However, Athanasius was condemned by both the Synod of Arles (353) and that of *Milan (355). The emperor even tried to win Liberius over to his own policies. Because the pope did not consent, the emperor made him come to Milan and then in 357 sent him into exile in *Thrace. Cowed by suffering in a cold and distant country, Liberius gave way little by little to the will of the emperor, as his four letters attest, preserved for us by *Hilary of Poitiers (Frag. Hist. 4,6). Constantius permitted him to return: first to *Sirmium (358), then to Rome, where the people welcomed him as the true bishop, obliging *Felix II (antipope), who had succeeded him, to leave the city. Even if Liberius probably did sign the Sirmium formula of 351, which was fundamentally orthodox, and not that of 357 (see Simonetti, 236), his yielding to the emperor was in any case considered by his contemporaries, such as Athanasius and Hilary, as a grave failure. After the death of Constantius, when *Julian's policy of political tolerance opened up the way for theological developments, Liberius manifested himself clearly in favor of the *Nicene faith in a letter to the bishops of *Italy (362–363) and in a response to the Eastern bishops (366). His name lived on in the basilica of S. Maria Maggiore, called the Liberian basilica, although we cannot be sure that the church built by him was in the same place (Pietri, Roma Christiana, 25-28). The difficulties which emerged after his death show how his weak governing had caused a relaxation in the ecclesiastical discipline in the community of Rome.

CPL 1628-1631; CCL 9, 121-123; CSEL 14, 320-321; 327-331; CSEL 65, 89-93; 155ff.; 164-173; CSEL 71, 423-426; BS 8, 17-22; Ch. Pietri, Roma Christiana, Rome 1976, esp. 237-268; J. Ulrich, Die Anfänge der abendländischen Rezeption des Nizänums, PTS 39, Berlin 1994, 231-243; T.D. Barnes, The Capitulation of Liberius and Hilary of Poitiers, in Id., From Eusebius to Augustinus, Aldershot 1994; J. Doignon, in Herzog 5, § 592; E. dal Covolo - R. Uglione - G.M. Vian (eds.), Eusebio di Vercelli e il suo tempo, Rome 1997 (491); LTK³ 6, 894-895; LACL (2002) 456-457.

B. Studer

LIBERTAS MONACHORUM. The collection of an anonymous compiler (a monk from France or S *Italy, probably early medieval). The texts, as we have them, are presented as sententiae of the Council of *Carthage of 525 or as additions to that of 535. Two letters are also inserted: one of *Gregory the Great, the other by ps.-Gregory. Among the codices, the Vat. lat. 5845 and 428 of the National Library in Madrid are recommended.

H. Mordek, Libertas monachorum. Eine kleine Sammlung afrikanischer Konzilstexte des 6. Jahrhunderts: ZRGKan 72 (1986) 1-16; S. Kuttener, The Council of Carthage 535: A Supplementary Note: ZRGKan 77 (1987) 346-351 (adds other MSS).

A. Di Berardino

LIBRARIES, Christian. Ranked among the greatest centers of Christian theological culture during the late 2nd and 1st half of the 3rd c. were, first, *Alexandria in Egypt, then *Caesarea in *Palestine and *Jerusalem. *Clement and *Origen taught at Alexandria, where a scriptorium and a library were attached to the school; Origen also founded the *school of Caesarea.

The library of Jerusalem was founded by the city's bishop *Alexander, who also contributed to the school of Caesarea, where the library was famous for its abundance of volumes, on which *Eusebius drew when compiling his History. In *cenobia founded in the East from the 2nd half of the 4th c.—esp. in Egypt, but also in Palestine—there were also important libraries. In the West (e.g., in *Gaul), esp. through the influence of *Martin of Tours, collections of books—the indispensable equipment of educational organizations—were gathered in cenobitic institutions.

Notable among private libraries was that of *Augustine, which the city of Hippo preserved until the *Vandal irruptions. There is not a wealth of information on the history of the origins of the Roman ecclesiastical libraries. Until *Innocent I, in fact, data on the formation of archives yields little light, though the information itself goes back to the pontificate of *Anterus (235–236). This lack of information is due in part to the destruction of the archives themselves, esp. during the time of *Diocletian's persecution. In any event, the library of the apostolic see must have been well stocked with materials for some time—and not just this library—if, shortly after the mid-5th c., Pope *Hilary was occupied with creating two new libraries ex novo, probably in the cloister of S. Lorenzo al Verano. In Rome, from the late 5th through the 6th c., the organization of the archive of the apostolic see underwent continual improvements, already begun with *Julius I's organization in the 1st half of the 4th c. and the reorganization in the 2nd half of the same century by *Damasus, with *Jerome's help. At the Lateran there is a clear distinction between the archive and the library: they are located in different places. Popes like *Gelasius I (492–496), under whose name was issued the decree De libris recipiendis et non recipiendis, and *Agapetus I (535–536), creator of the library near the slope of Scaurus on the Caelian Hill, gave a considerable boost to the establishment of theological and humanistic culture in the city. Finally, the reuniting of the papal libraries at the Lateran, accomplished by *Gregory the Great in the late 6th and early 7th c., increased the importance of the pontifical library of the apostolic see among all Roman libraries; the first certain mention of this library, however, attesting its existence at the time of *Sergius I (687–701), is from the pontificate of *Gregory II (715–731).

In the 7th c., moreover, Rome became a center of cultural attraction of undoubted importance; the young frequented its schools and the book trade flourished, with a lively contribution from Greek culture. Between the 6th and 7th c. in the West, thanks esp. to the monks of the Benedictine order, schools, scriptoria and libraries became ever more numerous. In *Italy there was *Cassiodorus's monastery at *Vivarium in Calabria, closely tied to St. *Benedict. At Bobbio St. *Columbanus, thanks in part to the valuable contribution of the *Longobard (Lombard) kings (the barbarians, beginning with *Odoacer and then with *Theodoric, had never neglected the organization of education in their territories), founded an abbey which quickly became famous for its school of writing and its valuable library. New libraries were also founded in *Gaul; *Spain owed its strongest cultural boost to the work of St. *Isidore, whose library was in the archiepisco-pal palace of *Seville, and whose bibliographical knowledge was so vast as to suggest an immense collection of materials in loco for consultation. Finally, the libraries of St. *Columba's numerous monasteries in Scotland and the very important library at the cloisters of Iona, and the libraries at Lindisfarne, in NE England, and at Canterbury and Jarrow, also in England, and those at centers such as Fulda and Mainz in Germany, and at St. Gall in Switzerland do not exhaust a subject that really requires much fuller treatment.

E. Edwards, Libraries and Founders of Libraries, London 1865; T. Gottlieb, Über mittelalterliche Bibliotheken, Leipzig 1890; L. Perotti, Dizionario statistico geografico delle biblioteche italiane, Cremona 1907; G.H. Hörle, Frühmittelalterliche Mönchs und Klerikerbildung in Italien, Freiburg im Br. 1914; A. Hessel, Geschichte der Bibliotheken, Göttingen 1925; F. Milkau - G. Ley, Handbuch der Bibliothekwissenschaft, Leipzig 1940; G. Massimo, Il portico e la torre di Papa Zaccaria: considerazioni sull'episcopio lateranense: Alma Roma 1 (gennaio-aprile 2001) 3-40 (a larger and revised contribution on the subject by the same author is currently being printed in the "Rivista dell'Istituto Nazionale di Archeologia e Storia dell'Arte").

M. Cecchelli

LIBYA

I. Origins of Christianity - II. Archaeology.

I. Origins of Christianity. Libya is the coastal region of N *Africa. In ancient times the designation, attested at least as far back as the 3rd millennium BC, referred to the whole of Africa as it was then known, from the Nile to the Atlantic (Herod., II, 10; Plin., Nat. hist. V. 1), acc. to the tripartite vision of the world—Europe, Libya and Asia—known also by Christian historians (Eus., De vita Const. III, 7; Theod., HE I, 25,12; V, 1,2). In the patristic period, however, the term refers to a much more restricted area, in fact even more restricted than is present-day Libya, owing to the exclusion of Tripolitania, which belonged to Roman Africa: i.e., the part of the Diocesis Aegyptiaca territory situated between *Egypt and the more southerly curve of the Great Sirte (Gulf of Sidra). The city of Arae Philaenorum was the boundary between the two partes of the Roman Empire, the W one with its *Latin language, and the E (Byzantine) one which used *Greek (Eus., Mart. Palaest. XIII, 11; Philost., HE V, 10 and 12; Soz. HE I, 1,2 and II, 2,5). *Ammianus Marcellinus writes that "in ancient times" Libya constituted the last of the three parts of Egypt, along with Egypt properly so-called, and *Thebaid, adding that, in a previous epoch—perhaps he is alluding to the division of the Diocesis Aegyptiaca by *Diocletian in 297—the *Pentapolis was separated off from Libya sicca. So he distinguishes between the following:

1. Libya Pentapolis with Cyrene, civitas antiqua sed deserta (from Cyrene, in the classical sources, the name of Cyrenaica was given to the province) and the other cities: Tolmeta, Arsinoe, Taucheira, Darnis and Berenice; Apollonia, the port of Cyrene, is missing, which in the Hellenistic period—along with Berenice, Arsinoe, Ptolemais (Tolmeta) and Cyrene had made up the Cyrenaic Pentapolis (Plin., Nat. hist. V, 5, writes that Arsinoe was also called Taucheira; cf. Strab., XVII, 3,20).

2. Lybia Sicca (called Mareotis Libya or Marmarica elsewhere) with the municipia pauca et brevia of Paraetonium, Chaerecla and Neapolis (Res gestae XXII, 16,4-5; ed. W. Seyfarth, 288).

In the Synekdemos of Hierocles (527–528), taken up again in the 7th c. by George of Cyprus, we find Libya ἄνω, i.e., upper (a term which appears also in the patristic sources: Athan., De sententia Dionysii 5; Hist. Arian. 8 and 71: PG 25, 713C, 485C, 777D; Philost., HE I, 8: PG 139, 1368B), made up of the above-named cities of the Pentapolis (Sozusa, named first, refers to ancient Apollonia, and Adriana to Darnis) and Libya κάτω, i.e., lower, with the cities of Paraetonium, Zygra, Zagylis, Pedonia, Antiphrae, Darnis (removed from the Pentapolis) and Ammoniace (ed. Honigmann, 47-48, nn. 732[8]-733[5]).

In the Bible, Libyan Jews coming from Cyrene and the surrounding area appear repeatedly (Mt 27:32; Mk 15:21; Lk 23:26; Acts 2:10; 6:9; 11:20; 13:1). Later tradition attributes the early preaching of the gospel there to Simon of Cyrene, to the disciple Lebbaeus (Thaddaeus), to the witnesses of the *Pentecost glossolalia (Acts 2:10) or to St. Mark. We lack precise details of the initial spread of Christianity in Libya, where ecclesiastical authority, exercised from *Alexandria, seems to have left little space for the autonomy of bishops of the Metropolitan cities.

*Dionysius of Alexandria wrote a letter to Ammonius of Berenice against *Sabellius, who was of Libyan origin, and another to *Basilides, bishop of the Christian community (paroikon) of the Pentapolis. The first of these bishops was sent into exile in the Libyan desert under *Decius, the second under *Valerian (Eus., HE VII, 26,1 and 3; XII, 11,5.10.23). Libya also had martyrs (Eus., Mart. Palest. XIII, 11), among whom we should note Macarius under Decius (Eus., HE VI, 41,17), and Theodore of Cyrene under Diocletian (BS 12, 245-248). Libya was the cradle of Sabellianism, and also in some sense of Arianism because it was the homeland of *Arius, who counted among the Libyan bishops no fewer than six of his supporters, for the most part of the Pentapolis (Philost., HE I, 8: PG 139, 1368B); among these, his most determined advocates were Secundus of Pentapolis, bishop of Ptolemais, and Theonas of Marmarica, who were condemned to exile with him at the Council of *Nicaea of 325. As well as the orthodox Serapion of Antipyrgus and Titus of Paraetonium, some other bishops who had previously compromised with the heresy also participated in the council; i.e., Zopyrus of Barca (the port of Tolmeta) and Dachios of Berenice (E. Honigmann, La liste originale des Pères de Nicée: Byzantion 14 [1939] 45, nn. 15-18; cf. 31-32). Canon 6 of the council confirms the traditional authority (jurisdiction) of the bishop of *Alexandria over Libya and over the Pentapolis (COeD 8).

In the ecclesiastical documents this last province is not always clearly distinguished from Libya without qualification (Athan., Apol. c. Arian. 37; Socr., HE II, 24,7; Soz., HE III, 21,1 and 3; VII, 19,7 etc.) or is included in the appellation—in the plural—the Libyas (Athan., Hist. Arian. 70; Apol. c. Arian. 56; Pro fuga sua; Ad Const. 27: PG 25, 557. 777A. 557B. 653A. 629B; Ep. syn. Sard.: PG 25, 352A etc.). Among the 94 "Egyptian" bishops present at the Council of *Serdica (ca. 343) we can include almost the entire Libyan episcopate (Athan., Apol. c. Arian. 50: PG 25, 337C–339B; Mansi 3, 68), with the exception of Piso of Darnis, who was with the Eastern bishops gathered at Philippopolis (Mansi 3, 198B). Under *Constantius II (after 350), *Athanasius's Libyan supporters were exiled to the Great Oasis or the Upper Oasis, and those from Thebaid to Ammoniace, in Libya (Athan., Apol. ad Constantium 32; De fuga 7; Hist. Arian. 14: PG 25, 637C. 653A. 387B. 380A). Arius of Petra and *Asterius of Arabia were banished to Upper Libya (Athan., Hist. Arian. 8: PG 25, 713C).

An *anomoian synod gathered at *Constantinople under *Julian (361–363) had bishops who took part "from both Libyas": Serras of Paraetonium, Stephen of Ptolemais and Heliodorus of Sozusa (Philost., HE VII, 6; VIII, 2). At the same time (the spring of 362) the Nicene bishops Gaius of Paraetonium and Marcus of Zygra were present at the Athanasian synod of Alexandria (Athan., Tom. ad Antioch. 10: PG 26, 808B). In the sphere of Libyan monasticism, Stephen and Moses stand out (Pall., Hist. Laus. XXIV, 1 [= XXX] e LXXXVIII, 1 [= XXXIX, 4]: PG 34, 1089C, 1195C; cf. Philost., HE VI, 28,3; VI, 39,20).

The second canon of the Council of Constantinople (381) alludes to the Libyan hierarchy under the generic name of the Egyptian bishops (COeD 27). At the Constantinopolitan synod of 394 (the case of Bagadius and Agapius) we find Probatius of Berenice (Gerland-Laurent, Corpus notitiarum episcopatuum, I, 1, Bucharest 1935, 8).

The most noted personality of the Libyan Pentapolis is without doubt *Synesius of Cyrene, bishop of Ptolemais, whose correspondence (above all letters 67 and 76 to *Theophilus of Alexandria) and the Catastasis are of great importance for the history of both secular (barbarian incursions) and religious (events in the diocese of Erythron) Cyrenaica in the first decade of the 5th c. In the acts of the ecumenical Council of Ephesus (431) we find the names of bishops from the Pentapolis, of Olbia, Dysthis, Barca and Taucheira, and that of their coworker from Lower Libya Daniel of Darnis associated with Sopater, bishop of the unidentified Septimiace in Libya (Gerland-Laurent, Corpus notit., I, 94, 95, nn. 267-272). In the so-called *Latrocinium Ephesinum (the Robber Council) of 449, Dioscurus of Alexandria enjoyed the support of the bishops of Erythrum, Taucheira, Sozusa, Tisila (?), Barca and Cyrene, in the Pentapolis, and of Antiphrae, Zygra and Zagylis in Lower Libya (E. Honigmann, The Original Lists of the Members . . . of the Robber-Synod and the Council of Chalcedon: Byzantion 16 [1942-1943] 37, nn. 128, 129, 133-139, 141, 144).

Dioscurus was accused of having diverted the grain destined for the Libyan churches (Mansi 6, 1013, 1025), a charge made by the Council of Chalcedon (451), at which Theophilus of Erythrum, together with twelve Egyptian bishops, refused to condemn *Eutyches (Mansi 7, 49B; ACO II, 1,2,111, n. 11).

Apollonius of Antiphrae and Maximus of Zagylis, having taking refuge in Constantinople with other Egyptian bishops after the killing of *Proterius of Alexandria (457), signed a petition to the emperor *Leo I (Mansi VII, 530BD) and took part in a patriarchal synod (458–459) against *simony (PG 85, 1620CD).

John of Zagylis, a determined opponent of Chalcedon, took up the controversy in 482 (or shortly afterward) with the patriarch of Alexandria Peter Mongus, over the Henoticon (Liber., Breviarium 18: PL 68, 1025AB).

At the second Council of Constantinople (553), we find George of Ptolemais and also Emilianus of Antipyrgus (Mansi 9, 176AB. 191B. 392AC; ACO IV, $7,6^{14}$, 22^{27}, . . . 227^{32}). Under the patriarchate of *Eulogius of Alexandria (580–608) we read of Theodore, bishop of Darnis, and Leontius of Apamea, bishop of Cyrene (John Moschus, Prat. spir. 148 and 195: PG 87, 3012C, 3077A). Further, a Theodore "metropolitan of the Libyan Pentapolis" is mentioned in a document of the 7th c. (J. Maspéro, Papyrus grecs d'époque byzantine, III, Le Caire 1915, n. 67168). In Libya, therefore, as in Egypt, we can note a certain duplication of the hierarchy after the advent of *monophysitism.

The walls of the principal Libyan cities, damaged by barbarian incursions, were restored by *Justinian, who also transformed a church into a synagogue and two monasteries into citadels (Procop. Ces., De aedif. VI, 2; ed. Haury, III, 173-174). During this era, the jurisdiction of the Alexandrian patriarchate extended to *Carthage, "great metropolis of W Libya" (Notitia Alexandrina [fictitious]: ByzZ 2 [1893] 26). Nevertheless, Libya did not long resist the Arab invasion (643) that precipitated the decline of Christianity in the region.

Le Quien, Oriens christianus, II, Paris 1740, 618-638; PWK 23, 156-169; DACL 3, 3220-3227; DB 2, 1177-1184; EI 10, 417-432; 11, 52-62; F. Rovere, Il cristianesimo in Cirenaica: Libia 3 (1955) 43-52; Enc. Univ. dell'arte 1, 81-85; RBK 1, 218-227; LTK[2] 6, 702-703; KLP 3, 410-411, 628-632, 1040-1041; A.H.M. Jones, The Cities of the Eastern Roman Provinces, Oxford [3]1971, 349-362, 495-498; F. Tordeur, Libye, royaume des sables, Geneva 1970; G.F. Paci, Bibliografia archeologica della Libia 1974-1977 e 1978-1979: Quaderni di archeol. della Libia 10 (1979) 105-118; 11 (1980) 139-146; E. Alföldi Rosenbaum—J. Ward Perkins, Justinianic Mosaic Pavements in Cyrenaican Churches, Rome 1980; P. Testini, Archeologia cristiana, Bari [2]1980, 707.710.830; J.M. Reynolds, Byzantine Buildings, Justinian and Procopius in "Libya Inferior" and "Libya Superior": Antiquité Tardive 8 (2000) 169-176.

D. Stiernon

II. Archaeology. After the earthquake of 365 there is evidence of an increased intensity of construction work, even if from the 4th and 5th c. there is little remaining: some Christian structures were rebuilt over the existing ones. The *Justinian era, however, saw a richer growth, particularly in mosaic floors, of which outstanding examples are still extant, reflecting their particular historical-political context. It is still difficult to date certain buildings, partly because they were worked on subsequently. About fifty churches and six baptisteries have been identified: three are at Apollonia, two are at Cyrene, one at Ras el Hilal, two at Latrun, two at Qasr el Lebia, one at Tolmeta, one at Taucheira and one at Benghazi (Berenice). The religious architecture of Cyrenaica is distinctive, with impressive façades, particularly outside the built-up area, and very solidly constructed. Influences are varied, but liturgical exigencies have naturally shaped the form of buildings dedicated to Christian worship.

Among the oldest buildings we should note the W basilica I (constructed over a previous one) and the E basilica of Apollonia (from the 5th c., owing to the apse mosaic), the port of Cyrene, and the E basilica of Tocra, ancient Taucheira (see Stucchi, Architettura cirenaica), which have in common certain architectural features peculiar to the region, particularly apses enclosed within rectilinear walls and pastophoria. I am not convinced by the hypothesis of a trussed roof, implying the use of wood, because the normal supports used in this area are pillars, correlated with the barrel vault: the use of columns is less frequent, and, in any case, the span is modest. The structure was therefore built to sustain a heavy roof, usually made of local stone, as is demonstrated by the W basilica II of Tolmeta and that of Siret el Rheim. This was the only material used in buildings in this area, rather than brick, which needed kilns and therefore wood. The use of blocks of stone for wall construction has created a very particular architectural style, in which longitudinal plans dominate, and buildings with a centralized plan—in general baptisteries or martyria—are of a limited size. This has restricted the iconographic variety which characterized other regions of the Mediterranean. The apertures are few and small: Cyrenaic architecture values volumetric compactness over chromatic effects. Against this background we should note some important historical developments; in particular the "cathedral" of Cyrene, built in the 5th c. with an apse at the E, but then added to in the 6th c. by a second apse at the W, in the vestibule, making the building part of the substantial group of African churches with apses opposite each other (see Duval, Églises). In this case, as is more common, the second apse has been inserted subsequently. Here too we have one of the rare examples of N African influence on Cyrenaic architecture, since for historical reasons the Cyrenaic church fell more within the Alexandrian orbit, resulting in more explicit references to Christian Egyptian architecture.

Among recent discoveries, there is the fortified basilica of Sidi Khrebish (see Lloyd-Sear, Sidi Khrebish Excavations, 5-12) and other Christian buildings mentioned by S. Stucchi, some still awaiting excavation. Some of these churches, we may note, have small baptisteries (see Goodchild, Chiese e battisteri, 205-223), frequently following a centralized plan, quadrangular or triconchal, like that of the E basilica of Apollonia; however, differing from the greater number of baptisteries of the Mediterranean, the surviving baptisteries of Cyrenaica are always contained within the church itself, without really giving them a separate autonomy, and so corresponding in this respect to a tradition found in Egypt and Palestine. An interesting aspect of the Cyrenaic architecture from the proto-Byzantine period is to be found in the civil sphere, of which certain outstanding examples remain: we should note the so-called triconch house of Tolmeta (see Stucchi, Architettura cirenaica), part of a complex containing numerous different rooms. This ancient practice of inserting a triconchal hall, usually fulfilling the role of an audience room, can be found in numerous buildings across different parts of the empire, in both civil (see the cases in Constantinople, Qasr ibn Wardan in Syria etc.) and religious (e.g., the episcopal palace of Bosra, in S Syria) contexts. However, the triconch style was widely used at the time and did not have a certain fixed function, but was adapted rather for various types of buildings regardless of their function.

Another interesting example is that of the so-called palace of the dux at Apollonia (see Goodchild, Fortificazioni e palazzo bizantini, 225-250), where the arrangement of the (remaining) rooms of the lower floor recall the structure of the palace of the Byzantine governor at *Ephesus (see Vetters, Ephesos).

Little remains of decorations and capitals, but important finds include Proconnesian marble, such as the columns and capitals at the E basilica of Latrun (ancient Erythrum), while at the W basilica on the same site the marble is probably Thasian. The most common capitals are the so-called Theodosian, which we find, e.g., in the basilica at Apollonia (see Widrig-Goodchild, The West Church, 70-90): examples of this form, typical of the mid-5th c., were sometimes reused in later reconstructions of previous churches, for which they had originally been made.

Along with mosaic flooring we also find opus sectile of the highest quality, a fact which emerges from examination of remaining fragments: I refer particularly to the pieces from the basilica in Apollonia (W church) (see Widrig-Goodchild, The West Church, 70-90), and of Ras el Hilal (see Harrison, A Sixth Century Church, 1-20), very similar to each other, probably made by the same artisans at about the same period (it is likely that both are pre-Justinian).

In mosaic flooring, large mosaic carpets are the norm, following a unitary and often highly precise design with symbolic motifs: in this complex and developing field, which has aroused great interest, special mention must be made of the mosaic floor of the church of Qasr el Lebia (ancient Olbia), dated to 540 by an inscription which mentions the city of Olbia, which was partly reconstructed in the time of Justinian with the name of Nea Teodorais. The catechetical interpretation that has been advanced for this mosaic (see Guarducci, La più antica catechesi) is in my opinion somewhat forced, as are some supposed architectural references which in fact are purely generic (e.g., the façade of a gabled building which has been linked, purely hypothetically, to the western-style façade of the Theodosian Hagia Sophia, which did not even exist in 540, having been destroyed during the Nika revolt of 532: rebuilt under Justinian, it was solemnly dedicated on 27 Dec 537.

In my judgment the Qasr el Lebia mosaics, considering their typological themes, show great affinity with the Nebo mosaics (not forgetting that a comparison with the Gerasa mosaics has already been made by E. Alföldi Rosenbaum and J. Ward Perkins): in this case, Egypt, usually a constant reference point for the Cyrenaic area, gives us very little material for comparison, as its remaining mosaic floors are fragmentary and indeed few in number.

The Justinian era (527–565) is the golden age of Cyrenaic art: after the Arab invasions of 642 the Christian artistic tradition never recovered, as the sources attest. In any case, in this interesting area of proto-Byzantine art we lack any comprehensive study, covering not only architecture but also the arrangement of cities, architectural sculpture and sculpture more broadly, and the historical, documentary and epigraphic sources: work on the mosaic floors of the Justinian era should lead us to hope that similarly in-depth study will also take place in other fields. The excavations undertaken, both before and after World War II, have been somewhat patchy, meaning that we cannot easily determine the history of the buildings. The article of Duval (Les monuments) summarizes our knowledge of the Christian remains of Cyrenaica.

J.B. Ward Perkins - R.G. Goodchild, The Christian Antiquities of Tripolitania, London 1953; W.M. Widrig - R.G. Goodchild, The West Church at Apollonia in Cyrenaica: PBSR 28 (1960) 70-90; R.M. Harrison, A Sixth-Century Church at Ras el Hilal in Cyrenaica: PBSR 32 (1964) 1-20; R.G. Goodchild, Chiese e battisteri bizantini della Cirenaica: CCAB 13 (1966) 205-223; Id., Fortificazioni e palazzo bizantini in Tripolitania e Cirenaica: ibid., 225-250; H. Vetters, Zum Byzantinischen Ephesos: JÖBG 15 (1966) 273-287; S. Stucchi, Cirenaica (Christian period): EAA Suppl., Rome 1970, 219-221; N. Duval, Les églises africaines à deux absides, II, Paris 1973, 287ff. (Cyrene); M. Guarducci, La più antica catechesi figurata: il grande mosaico della basilica di Gasr Elbia in Cirenaica: MAL 18/7 (1975) 659-686; S. Stucchi, Architettura cirenaica, Rome 1975; J.A. Lloyd - F. Sear, Sidi Khrebish Excavations, Benghazi: Society for Libyan St. 6th An. Rep. 1974-1975, 5-12; E. Alföldi Rosenbaum - J. Ward Perkins, Justinianic Mosaic Pavements in Cyrenaican Churches, Rome 1980; D.E.L. Haynes, An Archaeological and Historical Guide to the pre-Islamic Antiquities of Tripolitania, Tripoli Department of Antiquities [4]1981; Cyrenaica in Antiquity, ed. G. Barker - J. Lloyd - J. Reynolds, Oxford 1985; Sidi Khrebish: Excavations at Sidi Khrebish Benghazi (Berenice), London 1985; N. Duval, Les monuments d'époque chrétienne en Cyrénaïque à la lumière des recherches récentes, Actes du XI[e] Congrès international d'archéologie chrétienne, Rome 1989, III, 2743-2796; D.J. Mattingly, Tripolitania, London 1995.

M. Falla Castelfranchi

LICENTIUS (d. after 395). Born like *Augustine at *Thagaste (Aug., De beata vita 1,5), and his disciple and friend; son of *Romanianus, the benefactor of Augustine, and relative of *Alypius (Ep. 27,5-6). He was also at Cassiciacum in 386, despite his young age, taking part in the philosophical discussions at the retreat. He is an interlocutor of Augustine in Contra Acad., in De beata vita and in De ordine. He converted to Christianity with his master, but when he was baptized is not known to us. For a time he lived at *Rome in order to undertake the cursus honorum. He loved poetry. One of his poems, containing 154 hexameters, is found among the works of Augustine, to whom he describes his difficulty in reading Varro, his happy memories of time spent together and his hopes for the future. Augustine (Ep. 26) and *Paulinus of Nola (Ep. 8 and a carmen) wrote to him, exhorting him to live a better life.

PL 33, 103-107; Poetae lat. minores, Leipzig 1886, VI, 413-420; M. Zelzner, De carmine Licentii ad Aug., Arnsberg 1915; G. Bardy, Un élève de saint Aug.: L'Année Théol. Aug. 14 (1954) 55-79; Patrologia III, 292-294; PCBE 1, 640ff.; U. Pizzani, Il "Carmen Licentii ad Augustinum" e i "Disciplinarum libri" di Varrone reatino: Helmantica 44 (1993) 497-515; Id., Presenze classiche nel "Carmen Licentii ad Augustinum," in La poesia tardoantica e medievale, Atti del I Convegno Internazionale di Studi, Macerata, 4-5 May 1998, ed. M. Salvadore, Alessandria 2001, 85-125; Licentii Carmen ad Augustinum, intro., text, trans. and comm., ed. M. Cutino, Catania 2000.

A. DI BERARDINO

LICINIANUS of Cartagena (d. after 600). Friend of *Severus of Málaga and *Eutropius of Valencia, and in all probability shared his early formation with them at the monastery of Servitanum. He was also a friend of *Leander of Seville. Bishop of Cartagena, he had difficult relations with the Byzantines who dominated in the region. He was engaged in theological problems connected with the *Arian heresy. He died at *Constantinople some time after 600, probably poisoned. Rigorist, relatively well educated in literary terms, he wrote numerous letters (Isid., Vir. ill. 29). Of these we have only three: one is addressed to Pope *Gregory the Great, asking for a copy of his Moralia, a second to the deacon Epiphanius, considering in some detail the immortality of the soul, and the third to Vincentius, bishop of Ibiza, admonishing him for having believed in the authenticity of a letter of Christ supposed to have fallen from heaven.

CPL 1097: Díaz 44-46; PL 72, 689-700; J. Madoz, Liciniano de Cartagena y sus cartas, Madrid 1948; J. Madoz, Un caso de materialismo en España en el siglo VI: RET 8 (1948) 203-230; M.J. Aguilar Amat, Licinanea Gallicana: Carthaginensia 3 (1987) 306-310; U. Domínguez del Val, Historia de la antigua literatura latina hispano-lusitana, II, Madrid 1998, 332-346.

M. DÍAZ Y DÍAZ

LICINIUS (d. 324). Valerius Licinianus Licinius, a native of Dacia, an officer who had distinguished himself in Galerius's Persian campaign of 296–298, was named Augustus in 308 at the conference of Carnuntum, without having first held the position of Caesar, contrary to the constitutional principle of the tetrarchy created by *Diocletian. After the death of *Galerius and the elimination of the "usurper" *Maxentius, in 313 *Constantine and Licinius granted liberty to the Christian religion, the so-called *Edict of Milan. It was on the occasion of their meeting in *Milan that Licinius married Constantia, the half sister of Constantine: Valerius Licinianus Licinius was born of this marriage. In April 313 at Campus Ergenus he defeated *Maximinus Daia, who died the same year. Hostility between Licinius and Constantine began as early as 314 (Cibalae in Pannonia) and dragged on for a decade, originating both in power conflicts and in political-religious disagreements: Licinius, who at first had been favorable to the integration of the Christians in the religious life of the empire, began to rely increasingly on the pagan power base of the pars Orientis, and had begun to promulgate laws hostile to the Christians. The decisive encounter was at Chrysopolis in 324, concluding in the complete defeat of Licinius, and leaving Constantine sole emperor.

O. Seeck: PWK XIII, 1, 1926, 222-231; H. Feld, Der Kaiser Licinius, diss., Saarbrücken 1962; S. Mazzarino, L'impero romano, Bari [2]1973, 590ff.; T.D. Barnes, The New Empire of Diocletian and Constantine, Cambridge 1982; D. Kienast, Römische Kaisertabelle: Grundzüge einer römischen Kaiserchronologie, Darmstadt 1990, 294-297.

M. FORLIN PATRUCCO

LICINIUS of Tours (d. 520). Bishop of the metropolitan see of *Tours from 508 to 520, signatory of the First Council of Orléans (Mansi VIII, 356) and with the bishops Melanius of Rennes and Eustochius of Angers sent a letter to two priests of Breton Armorica, Lovocatus and Catihernus, warning them of certain abuses committed by priests who went from house to house celebrating Mass, and by women called conhospitae (cohabitants with the clergy) who assisted at the eucharistic celebrations.

CPL 1000a; PLS 3, 1256-1257; L. Duchesne, Lovocat et Catihern, prêtres bretons du temps de saint Mélaine: Revue de Bretagne et de Vendée (1885) 3-16; N. Chadwick, The Colonisation of Brit- tany from Celtic Britain: Proceedings of the British Academy 51 (1965) 235-299; L. Pietri, La ville de Tours du IVe au VIe siècle. Naissance d'une cité chrétienne, Rome 1983, 188-190; G. Muschiol, Famula Dei. Zur Liturgie im merowingischen Frauenklöster, Münster 1994, 217-218.

P. Marone

LIFE

I. Types of life - II. Life as a philosophical concept.

God is living (Josh 3:10; Ps 42:2), the source of life (Ps 36:9). *Jesus is also life (Jn 14:6) and gives us life in abundance (Jn 10:10). The person who believes in him crosses from death to life (Jn 5:24). The Fathers were aware that the calling to "eternal life" (ζωή in contradistinction to βίος, life in time) signifies participating in the divine life, being "divinized" and "deified." This corresponds to the internal logic of God's "humanization" (Iren., Adv. haer. III, 19,1). As a result the "spiritual life" is life in the *Holy Spirit, who becomes the third constituent element of the Christian's personality (the trichotomia of the Greek Fathers). "The perfect human being is composed of three elements, flesh, soul and spirit" (Iren., Adv. haer. V, 9,1: Harvey, vol. 2, p. 342). The spiritual life is, therefore, a participation in the trinitarian life.

The *Bible easily crosses from the concept of life to that of the soul. The key term, therefore, of monastic spirituality, "the salvation of the soul," signifies, as in *Scripture, the victory of eternal life (see 1 Pet 1:9; Heb 10:39). It comes to its fullness in the future age. The term life, then, in the writings of the Fathers, is essentially eschatological. Inasmuch as it is more contemplative, the Eastern tradition is more eschatological, setting forth the end of life already in this land, the theoria, the vision of God.

I. Types of life. In contradistinction to the term zōē, the Greek word bios signifies an established way of living and the concrete realization of life. (The distinction is lacking, however, in Latin and the term vita signifies both things.) Hence the difficulty of the "types of life," whose treatment goes back already to the Republic (519c-520c) and *Plato's other dialogues, *Aristotle (EN X, 7-10) and the *pagan culture of the Hellenistic age, which was then adopted by Latin thinkers and poets (Lucretius and Horace). This difficulty is foreign to the world of the NT, but Christian writers deduce it from the pagan world, just as they do other elements of ethics. *Clement of Alexandria described the journey that must lead from praxis to gnosis, and the one who is the only pedagogue, i.e., the Logos, who became flesh, shows that virtue is simultaneously practical and theoretical (Pedagogue III, 9,4). Elsewhere (Strom. IV, 23,152,3) Clement describes the contemplative life as "the mode of the existence in which we deal with ourselves, rendering worship to God and through sincere purification contemplating the holy God in a holy manner." For the relationship between "contemplation" and gnosis, one should examine Clement's teaching on the matter. *Origen seems to have been the first to identify the figure of the active and contemplative life in the two persons of Martha and *Mary, Rachel and Leah. He also sets forth a tripartition: ethics, physics and epoptika, which corresponds to the three biblical books of Proverbs, Ecclesiastes and *Song of Songs (Commentary on the Song of Songs, prol.: SC 375, 128).

*Evagrius of Pontus adopted this division, even though he was also aware of the bipartition of practical life and gnostic life; the gnostic life is divided in turn into physikē (spiritual knowledge of natures, the logoi of things: an idea that would be adopted by *Maximus the Confessor), theologikē, i.e., contemplation of the *Trinity (see Practical Treatise: SC 70-71, and Gnostic Treatise: SC 356). *Gregory of Nazianzus in many of his poems (e.g., Comparatio vitarum) describes the opposition between theoretical and practical life, and sets forth an intermediary way between that of the solitaries and that of those who are mixed within the world, by deciding to meditate as the first and to make himself useful as the second (Autobiography 280-312); praxis is also necessary because it is the preliminary step that leads to theoria, contemplation.

*Augustine knew of two schema, namely, those that go back to pagan philosophy. In the summary of the history of philosophy found in Civ. Dei VIII, 1-8, he affirms that the study of wisdom is carried out in the exercise of contemplation. *Socrates was great in active life; Pythagoras, in the contemplative; Plato united both and divided them into ethics, physics and logic; logic teaches us to distinguish truth from falsehood and to draw near to contemplation. Plato, therefore, discovered the ratio intellegendi and the ordo vivendi (VIII, 4). Later (XIX, 1); he distinguishes between vita otiosa and vita negotiosa and vita ex utroque genere temperata. Among these virtues, Varro (whom Augustine follows at this point) affirms that Antiochus of Ascalon gave preference to the third. In XIX, 19 Augustine gives a Christian interpretation to this tripartition, accepting it substantially, even though he emphasizes that each one of the three can equally lead to beatitude. One must observe that this third genus is not so much a "mixed" life as much as it is a composite life of the two preceding types. Not even the monks, therefore, must withdraw from the duties of the church (Ep. 48,1-2), while the bishops in their ministry must not fear to "get their hands dirty" (Tractates on John 57,3-4). The distinction, therefore, between active and contemplative life does not imply any opposition. The contemplative life is "preferable" only because it recalls and anticipates eternal life; true contemplation will be reserved, in the final analysis, to the celestial life because it will be fully realized only in that condition (Contra Faustum XXII, 52-58; Trin. I, 10,20; Serm. 169,14,17; 103; 104,7 etc.). Moreover, the active life assumes its entire value in following Christ (Serm. 78).

Similarly, *John Cassian, whose writings were esp. read during the Middle Ages, faces the problem, but his Collationes follow a more rigorous logic. In Collatio XIV he treats, following the influence of Evagrius's terminology, the scientia actualis—i.e., praktikē—and the scientia spiritalis, which is the theoretikē. According to John Cassian, one cannot truly reach the contemplative life without first having passed through the active life: the active life can exist without the other, but the same does not hold the opposite way, because the active life implies the elimination of vices and the acquisition of virtues (XIV, 2-3). The active life is divided into many "professions," such as those of the life in the desert and the purity of heart, although others seek the cure and direction of their brothers within the cenobium, just as the abbot John of Thmuis. Similarly, others dedicate themselves to the service of charity in the hospitals or in the houses established for the reception of the poor and the suffering, as did Macarius, who built a hospice at *Alexandria. Cassian then exhorts one to stay resolved in the choice that has been made and assures us that all must become perfect (XIV, 5-6). Perfection is based, in effect, on charity, just as Paul had also taught (XXIII, 5, which cites Rom 9:3-4). Holiness, therefore, is not the sole prerogative of the *anchorites.

Scientia spiritalis or theoretical scientia requires the interpretation of the Scriptures, acc. to history and the Spirit, in conformity to the traditional distinction of *exegesis. The question is asked whether this scientia spiritalis belongs solely to the anchorites, but those whom John Cassian presents do not belong simply to the "absolute" anchorites because they gather at more or less frequent intervals for the collationes and probably the Sunday synaxes (XIV, 4). Cassian, moreover, maintained that the fight with the vices was exercised at each level of the spiritual life, and thus in practical life, which is therefore not transcended when one reaches the theoretical life. Given this, Cassian recognizes that the monks who have made the secret of the desert and the purity of heart the objective of their life (XIV, 4) have reached the apex of charity in the habitual exercise of scientia spiritalis. Having been delivered from numerous concerns, they already anticipate in their earthly life the final end of the Christian life.

Even *Gregory the Great (who having also exercised a very large influence on medieval spirituality) emphasized the importance of the contemplative life (Mor. VI, 37,56-57; X, 8,13; XXII, 6,11; XXVIII, 13,33; In Hiez. I, 3,9-13; 5,12; II, 2,7-11; Reg. I, 4,9; 2,7). In Cant. 9, Gregory adopts Origen's tripartition, which was mentioned above, but he also insists on the union of the two types of life in the activity of the men of the church, the rectores or the praedicatores; for this reason scholars are uncertain whether Gregory maintained the primacy of the contemplative life or the next life, even though the term vita mixta is lacking from his writings. In any case the two lives both have their place in the reality of the church; the active life has the objective of love of neighbor, although the contemplative life seeks love in the presence of God: for this reason, in and of itself, the contemplative life is better, but it cannot eliminate the other; both have been produced by the grace of God, and Christ has provided the example of both. There exists a mutual relationship between the two, and both remain imperfect in this life because the same contemplation will reach its complete deployment in the heavenly state. Gregory's primary interest is, therefore, esp. directed to the union of the two lives, their interaction; certainly, both lives cannot be exercised at the same time, but the temporal intervals dedicated at one point to one and at another to another are less important than the intention of the mind, when animated by the love of God and neighbor. Gregory's position, therefore, seems similar to that of Augustine.

II. Life as a philosophical concept. This theme appears in Origen's writings as a Christian transformation of the *Platonism that was contemporaneous to him. Origen does not take his point of departure from the philosophical idea of being, but rather from the biblical concept of life. Christ is life in and of itself, he states with a lexical formulation that was typically *Middle Platonist, although the Father is above life, such that, from a conceptual point of view, Christ is the source of life; he does not exist through participation in life but is life inasmuch as he generates life, which is in relationship to those who exist, and these exist thanks to participation in him (Comm. on John frag. 2).

The concept of life is more developed in the philosophy of *Marius Victorinus. According to Victorinus, the triad of being, life and thought is situated within the intelligence, i.e., the second Plotinian hypostasis, and represents its various aspects in which it is manifested. Such a reality, which sets itself forth in and of itself, is developed, therefore, in three distinct moments; moments, so to speak, of a unique movement, which is the dynamism of intelligence; given that these three elements are at the same time "each one also one" (Enn. VI, 2,8,32), thanks to the interpenetration of unity and otherness. What is heavily emphasized is the sphere of life and movement. Victorinus, in this regard, mixes this idea with that of Aristotle, who affirms (Met. 1072 b27) that being and thought are both life. Nevertheless, for *Plotinus the movement of life or the soul is self-propelled, and, as such, being lives and thinks "in and of itself"; i.e., it is precisely life and thought, immovable, directed toward themselves, and in a state superior to that in which they will find themselves when they are manifested. Adopting the use Plotinus made of the three terms that would subsequently constitute the triad being-life-thought, one must first observe the opposition between the unity of the first hypostasis, the One, and the multiplicity of the second, i.e., the intelligence, which from within presents itself in the triple form of being (rest), life (movement of exteriorization) and thought (movement of return to being).

With *Porphyry one perceives a further elaboration of the triadic schema imposed by his teacher Plotinus, even if we are not, however, able to affirm that he reached the point of hypostasizing the moments of being, life and thought, given that we do not possess his entire philosophical literary production. On the basis of some testimonies of later *Neoplatonist philosophers, Porphyry showed himself to be less faithful to the teaching of his master, inasmuch as he came to the point of identifying the Father of the triad with the First Principle, or rather, the One; for the "orthodox" Neoplatonists, however, the triad was assimilated to the figure of the one-many, i.e., the second One, on the basis of the exegesis of the Parmenides. In the writings of Porphyry, one does not have a "vertical," or rather "hierarchized," triad, but a horizontal triad, in which all the members are at the same level. Already in frag. 27 of the Chaldean Oracles, which can be compared to Comm. in Parm. IX, 1ff., he presents the triad, but it is directed by a monad. The Chaldean Oracles at various times present formulations in which the Father, the Power and the Intelligence appear connected in various ways among each other, as three members of a triad (frag. 4 and frag. 26). The author of the Commentary on the Parmenides, therefore, anticipated the triad understood in the theological sense, for whom being becomes understandable in act: both Marius Victorinus and the Cappadocian Fathers—primarily *Gregory of Nyssa—were able to adapt the trinitarian teaching to the Neoplatonist concept of the One: Porphyry showed the way. The great opponent of Christians, at least on this point, obtained approval from the best thinkers in the Christian church, although he was rejected by his own Neoplatonist followers.

TWNT 2, 833-844, 850-853, 856-874 (TDNT 2, 832-843, 849-851, 855-872); DSp 3, 1376-1398; 4, 1257-1272; 6, 808-872; H. Biedermann, Der eschatologische Zug in der ostkirchlichen Frömmigkeit, Würzburg 1949; G. Gruber, ΖΩΗ. Wesen, Stufen und Mitteilung des wahren Lebens bei Origenes, Munich 1962; T. Špidlík, La spiritualité de l'Orient chrétien. Manuel systématique, OCA 206, Rome 1978, 29ff., 49ff., 66ff.; C. Moreschini, Storia della filosofia patristica, Brescia 2004.

C. Moreschini

LIGHT (symbolism). The theme of "light" is very common, albeit with very different meanings and uses, across the religious spectrum to refer to the divine nature and its manifestation in mystical experiences, understood as an "illumination." In the OT tradition the symbolism of light occurs in relation to the idea of the revelation of God and knowledge of him on the part of humanity (see Ps 36:9: "In your light do we see light"). This is developed in late Jewish apocalyptic literature and finds one of its most significant expressions in the doctrine of the *Qumran community. Here, the theme of light, contrasted with that of darkness, is used in an ethical sense as a figure of the good, of truth and of adherence to the covenant with God. "Prince of Lights" is the name given to the angel placed over the good, contrasted with Belial, the "Prince of Darkness," chief of the bad angels and of those who follow his example.

In the NT literature it is the gospel of John above all which makes use of this symbolism to express acceptance of the incarnate Word, who himself is the "Light which enlightens every person." The opposite image of darkness represents hostility and humanity's rejection, a choosing to remain in sin. The idea of a light seen after the immersion of Jesus at his baptism in the Jordan, a motif which appears in the *Gospel of the Ebionites and the Diatessaron of *Tatian, seems to be connected with the revelation of his divinity, thus a parallel with the transfiguration. The idea of light as the expression of a divine event is present in Lk 2:9 in relation to the nativity, where it is said that "the glory of the Lord shone" (περιέλαμψεν) on the shepherds. It is to this symbolism that the ancient definition of baptism as "illumination" (φώτισμα, φωτισμός) refers, which appears in *Justin (1 Apol. 61,12) and *Clement of Alexandria (Paedag. I, 6,26), and already underlies Heb 6:4 and 10:32, where the baptized are called the "enlightened" (φωτισθέντες). Although the reasons for this designation for baptism are not entirely clear, the hypothesis of Daniélou is not without justification (Théologie du Judéo-christianisme, It. trans, 323), acc. to which it is linked with primitive baptismal practice which connected the baptism of Jesus with the manifestation of light. The image of "eternal light" expresses the idea of eternal heavenly beatitude reserved for the just. In the tradition of the Eastern church the symbolism of light is fundamental in the sphere of mystical experience, as a sign of the intimate union of the soul with God and of its knowledge of him.

H. Leclercq, see entry Lumière: DACL 9, 2698-2702; V. Lossky, Théologie mystique de l'Église d'Orient, Paris 1944; J. Daniélou, Théologie du Judéo-christianisme (Histoire des doctrines avant Nicée I), Tournai 1958 (It. trans. Bologna 1964); S. Agrelo, Algunos precedentes culturales de la simbología cristiana de la luz: Antonianum 47 (1972) 96-121; D. Brenner, Licht und Dunkel in der frühgriechischen Dichtung. Interpretationen zur Vorgeschichte der Lichtmetaphysik, Bonn 1976; M.-M. Davy - A. Abécassis - M. Mokri - J.-P. Renneteau, Le thème de la lumière dans le judaïsme, le christianisme et l'Islam, Paris 1976; G. Filoramo, Luce e Gnosi, Rome 1980; Id., Pneuma e luce in alcuni testi gnostici: Augustinianum 20 (1980) 595-613; S. Poque, Le langage symbolique dans la prédication d'Augustin, Paris 1984; D. Masson, L'Eau, le Feu, la lumière, Paris 1985; H.H. Malmede, Die Lichtsymbolik im Neuen Testament, Wiesbaden 1986; M.-M. Davy - J.P. Renneteau, La lumière dans le christianisme, Paris 1989; W. Röttger, Studien zur Lichtmotiv bei Iuvencus, Münster 1996; L. Gosserez, Poésie de lumière. Une lecture de Prudence, Leuven 2001.

G. Sfameni Gasparro

LIGHTHOUSE. This symbol of the final approach to harbor, of peace and of tranquility, which is reached after the stormy voyage of life, is an image well known to ancient funerary art, by which it is generally portrayed, following the suggestion of the form of the lighthouses of Ostia and of Alexandria, as a tower of three or four receding stories (sometimes with a bridge on the lower story and windows on upper stories), with the shining flame at the summit (Reddé, La représentation des phares, 845-872); among the most famous examples, the representation occurring in a mosaic of the Isola Sacra should be mentioned (G. Calza, La necropoli del Porto di Roma nell'Isola Sacra, Rome 1940, 169-170). This iconography and this expression of the classical tradition are inherited by Christianity, within which the image of the lighthouse acquires new meanings: it symbolizes the divine harbor of salvation which the soul of the deceased hopes to reach, guided by the divine light of Christ (echoes of this concept in Hermas, Vis. III, 2,4 and 3,3-5; Clem. Alex., Protr. VIII, 84,1-2; Id., Paedag. III, 9,59,1; Orig., In Gen hom. IX, 1; Cypr., Mort. 26; Greg. Nyss., Vita Moysis = PG 44, 301c. On Christ-sun, Christ-light, see F. Dölger, Sol Salutis etc., Münster in Westfalen 1925 and, recently, Guarducci, La più antica catechesi, 673-674). With this meaning we find it in a notable number of funeral monuments—esp. epigraphs—sometimes alone (ICUR III, 7350c; IV, 10804), sometime alongside of the inscription (ICUR I, 2003, 3888; II, 4616, 5973; J. Wilpert, Beiträge zur christlichen Archäologie: RQA 20 [1906] 15, tv. 5, n. 6), sometimes associated with a ship, i.e., with the means with which the voyage toward the celestial harbor is completed (ICUR VI, 15609; VII, 19729; Stuhlfauth, Der Leuchtturm, 153, fig. 6). The inscription ICUR IV, 12088 presents the name of the deceased, Adeodata, curiously engraved on the inside of the building. The image of the lighthouse seems to occur, even if mutilated, in two fragments of *sarcophagi of the 4th c., one preserved in the Museo Pio Cristiano (Rep 134) (where the famous figure of the ship-church, with Christ and the evangelists on board, is represented), the other at S. Maria in Trastevere (Rep 750), in which the lighthouse provides the background for a scene involving Jonah. In the same figurative context the lighthouse is also represented in a lid of the Museo Nazionale Romano (Rep 794b). The image of a lighthouse represented on a life of the Museo della Catacombe di Pretestato (ICUR V, 15259) must allude, in all likelihood, to the business career exercised by the deceased, as can be deduced from the presence, alongside the building, of two cargo ships loaded with amphorae, for which the artist has taken care to reveal, in a macroscopic way (evidently for immediate comprehension), the form—the Dressel 20—characteristic of the oil-bearing amphorae coming from S *Spain. The figure of the lighthouse still occurs, in lamps of the Late Antique era (Stuhlfauth, Der Leuchtturm, 159-162) and, in mosaic, in the floor of the basilica of Gasr Elbia in Cyrenaica, from the *Justinian period (Guarducci, La più antica catechesi, 672-674).

G. Stuhlfauth, Der Leuchtturm von Ostia: MDAI (R) 53 (1938) 139-163; H. Leclercq, s.v. Phare: DACL XIV, 671673; G. Stuhlfauth, Das Schiff als Symbol der altchristlichen Kunst: RivAC 19 (1942) 111-141; H. Rahner, Symbole der Kirche. Die Ekklesiologie der Väter, Salzburg 1964, 551-552; M. Guarducci, La più antica catechesi figurata: il grande mosaico della basilica di Gasr Elbia in Cirenaica: MAL 18 (1975) 659-686; M. Reddé, La représentation des phares à l'époque romaine: MEFR (Ant) 91 (1979) 845-872; M. Bonino, Barche, navi e simboli navali nel cimitero di Priscilla: RivAC 59 (1983) 307-309; F. Bisconti, Arte e artigianato nella cultura figurativa paleocristiana, in Res Christiana. Temi interdisciplinari di Patrologia, Rome 1999, 74-76; L. Gambassi, s.v. Faro: TIP, 177-180; D.L. Balch C. Osiek (ed.), Early Christian Families in Context: An Interdisciplinary Dialogue, Grand Rapids, MI 2003.

V. Fiocchi Nicolai

LIGNO CRUCIS, De. A brief poem of 69 hexameters. Its attribution to a poet of the name of Victorinus (CPL 1458) is very doubtful, as we know nothing for certain of him. It is better to consider it as anonymous, from the 4th or 5th c., and *Gaul as its place of origin. This allegorical and didactic text depicts Golgotha, from which the tree of life (Christ) rises; its top reaches to the heavens; its branches extend over all the earth, symbolizing the twelve apostles, whose preaching has given new life to the world. The second part describes the mass of humanity coming forward to purify itself, and quench its thirst, at the spring (*baptism) that bursts out from the foot of the tree. The poet concludes on a moral note: for many salvation is assured, but not for all, because not all will persevere: Hoc lignum vitae cunctis credentibus (v. 69). Other titles have often been substituted for the now-preferred title: De Pascha, De Cruce, De ligno vitae.

CPL 1458; PL 2, 1113-1114; CSEL III, 3, 305-308; Poésie latine chrétienne du Moyen Âge, IIIe-XVe siècles (Textes recueillis par H. Spitzmuller), Bruges 1971, 1170-1173; EC 4, 1288; A. Roncoroni, Ps. Cipriano, De ligno crucis: RSLR 12 (1976) 380-390; Patrologia III, 320; CPPM 2, 544.

L. Dattrino

LINUS, pope (67?–76?). *Irenaeus of Lyons and *Eusebius of Caesarea, giving the first list of bishops of Rome (Adv. haer. III, 3; HE V, 6,1; cf. III, 2 and 4), present Linus, in 67, as the first successor of *Peter. According to Irenaeus it was Peter and *Paul who consecrated Linus, identifying him with the Linus mentioned in 2 Tim 4:21. The LP informs us that Linus was born in Volterra in Tuscia, and says that his pontificate lasted nine years, up to the year 76. He exercised his office in difficult times, under the emperors *Nero, Galba, Vitellius and *Vespasian, and among other things helped the Jewish Christians who took refuge in *Rome after the fall of *Jerusalem in 70. He laid down that women should cover their heads in church, and consecrated twelve bishops and ordained eighteen priests. The liturgical documents of the Roman church number him among the martyrs, remembering him on 23 Sept. Certain works have been ascribed to him without foundation, among which are Martyrium beati Petri apostoli a Lino conscriptum and a similar work on the apostle *Paul.

LP III, 321; Martyrium beati Petri apostoli a Lino episcopo conscriptum (BHL 2, Brussels 1900-1901, n. 6655); Martyrium beati Pauli apostoli a Lino conscriptum (Bibliotheca Hagiografica Latina, II, n. 6570); DACL 9, Paris 1930, 1195-1198; DTC 9, 772 (E. Amann); E. Caspar, Geschichte des Papsttums I, Tübingen 1930, 1-18; BS 8, 56-58 (A. Amore - C. Moccheggiani Carpano); LTK3 6, 946; EPapi I, 194-197 (F. Scorza Barcellona).

M. Spinelli

LITURGICAL DIALOGUE and DIDASCALIA. Liturgical dialogue consists in the invitation or instruction of the priest or deacon to which the assembly responds. Its solemn form, that which opens the eucharistic prayer, goes back to the time of the Traditio Apostolica, which gives its three elements: Dominus vobiscum—Et cum spiritu tuo, Sursum corda—Habemus ad Dominum, Gratias agamus Domino—Dignum et iustum est (Botte [ed.], La Tradition apostolique . . . LQF 39, 12).

The first element, Dominus vobiscum with the response Et cum spiritu tuo, is found in other parts of the Mass and in other liturgical celebrations. Basically a greeting that opens the eucharistic celebration, it is like the greetings found at the beginning and end of *Paul's epistles and that were used in the East (Const. Apost. VIII, 12,4: ed. Funk, 497; Anaph. in Cat. Myst. VI Theod. Mopsuest.: Hänggi-Pahl [ed.], Prex Eucharistica, 214; Anaph. Ioan. Chrys., ibid., 225). *Augustine explains Dominus vobiscum as a familiar greeting to the assembly: Post salutationem quam nostis, id est Dominus vobiscum, audistis . . . a sacerdote: Sursum cor (Trin. XIV, 12: CCL 50/A, 444). The response Et cum spiritu tuo was probably inspired by the Pauline doctrine on the spiritual nature of the Christian. *John Chrysostom explains it acc. to the indwelling of the *Holy Spirit in the souls of Christians, the Spirit who assists both the assembly and (et) the priest in the participation and ministry of the eucharistic celebration (Ep. 2 ad Tim. Hom. X, 3: PG 62, 659; De sancta Pent. Hom. I, 4: PG 50, 458).

The second element is proper to *Rome and *Milan, while *Africa sometimes used Sursum cor. The Eastern liturgies have more varied formulations, but all are related to the formula of the Trad. Apost.: Sursum mentem (Apos. Con. VIII, 12,4: Funk, 497), Sursum mentem et corda, at *Antioch (John Chrys., De poenit. hom. 9: PG 49, 345; spurious and late), Sursum in excelsis sint cogitationes et mentes mostrae (Anaph. Cyrilli Hier. seu Alex.: Hänggi-Pahl, Prex Eucharistica, 285), Sursum sint mentes, intellectus et corda omnium nostrum (Anaph. Xysti, ibid., 311), Sursum habete corda vestra cum timore divino (Anaph. Cyrilli Alex., ibid., 337), Attollamus mentem et corda, at Jerusalem (Eutymni testimonium: B. de Montfaucon, Analecta Graeca, 62), Attollite corda vestra, in the Ethiopian church (Anaph. Patrum nostr. Apostolorum: Hänggi-Pahl, 114) and Sursum corda habeamus (Anaph. I. Chrys., ibid., 225). Only the Spanish formulation is different: Aures ad Dominum (Missale Mixtum I: PL 85, 1155). The Fathers explain the expression Sursum corda as an exhortation from the outset to a worthy participation in the sacred mysteries: thus in *Cyprian (De orat. dom. 31: CSEL 3/1, 289), Augustine (De ver. relig. III, 5: CSEL 77,8), *Caesarius of Arles (Sermo 22,4: PL 39, 1969), *John Cassian (Conlatio 9 de oratiome: PL 49, 786), *Cyril of Jerusalem (Cat. Myst. V, 4: PG 33, 1111) and John Chrysostom (De poenit. hom. 9: PG 49, 345; spurious and late). A reference by Augustine to this exhortation is interesting: Illud quod inter sacra mysteria cor habere sursum iubemur, ipso adiuvante id valemus, quo iubente admonemur (De bono viduit. 16: CSEL 41,328). The people's response Habemus ad Dominum, acc. to Cyril of Jerusalem, should correspond to the reality of those who are in relationship with the Lord: and if this is not possible continuously, at least at this moment they should make an effort to do so (Cat. Myst. V, 4: SC 126,152). The same idea is found in Augustine: Non lingua sonet, et conscientia neget, et quia hoc ipsum, ut sursum habeatis cor (Serm. IV 3: PL 46, 836). In the Trad. Apost. the second element of the dialogue and its response are reserved to the eucharistic celebration; in the rite of lighting the lamps during the common meal, therefore, he says that Sursum corda is not said quia in oblatione dicitur (Botte, La Tradition apostolique, 64).

The third element of the liturgical dialogue, Gratias agamus Domino—Dignum et iustum est, is a combination of Jewish and Greco-Roman formulas. According to the Mishnah, the Jewish head of the family must invite participants, after the blessing of the cup, to give thanks to God (Danby, The Mishnah, I divis., Zeraim, Berakoth 7,3,8). The assembly's response, however, is taken from the acclamation used by Greeks and Romans: Dignum et iustum est or ἄξιον καὶ δίκαιον, esp. for the election of the emperor. Some scholars, however, trace the origin of this response to Jewish morning prayer (Elbogen, Der jüdische Gottesdienst, 22-25). The formula appears, with slight variations, in all the Eastern anaphorae (Cyr. Jer., Cat. Myst. V, 5: PG 33, 1114; John Chrys., In Matthaeum hom. 25,3-4: PG 57, 331-332; Aug., Ep. 213,1-6: PL 33, 966-968; Serm. 68,5: PL 38, 439): in each case the idea is to give the whole prayer a solemn eucharistic dimension. The response, explains Cyril of Jerusalem, shows that our giving thanks is ἄξιον πρᾶγμα καὶ δίκαιον, although God's action toward us goes beyond the dictates of justice: ὑπὲρ τὸ δίκαιον.

The didascalia, or instructions, are invitations to prayer or to perform certain gestures or movements during a liturgical celebration. The earliest examples are Sursum corda and Gratias agamus Domino, discussed above. Normally the Roman liturgy assigns the didascalia to the priest, as we see in the prayer of Good Friday or in the invitations to the Lord's Prayer or the orations of the one who presides. Both Eastern and Western liturgies abound in examples of instructions, esp. regarding the assembly's bodily position or movements during the celebration. Some examples: Flectamus genua, Levate, humiliate capita vestra Deo; offerte vobis pacem; aspicite ad Orientem; ὀρθοί πρόσκωμεν, στῶμεν καλῶς, στῶμεν μετὰ φόβου (Mohlberg, Liber sacramentorum, 64; Ἡ θεία λειτουργία, 70, 100). Other instructions concern the dismissal of the assembly at the end of the Mass, such as Ite, missa est, and that of catechumens after the gospel and the homily. Until the 12th c. the Ambrosian liturgy preserved the formula: Si quis catechumenus, si quis Iudaeus, procedat; cuius cura non est, procedat. Still today in the Byzantine liturgy the deacon pronounces the formula dismissing the catechumens after the gospel (see Ἡ θεία λειτουργία, 78). At the time of Caesarius of Arles, the people either did not understand the deacon's didascalia or ignored them, and Caesarius complains: Rogo et admoneo vos, fratres carissimi, ut quotiescum—que iuxta altarium a clericis oratur, aut oratio diacono clamante indicitur, non solum corda sed etiam corpora fideliter inclinatis. Nam dum frequenter sicut oportet, et diligenter adtendo, diacono clamante "Flectamus genua" maximam partem populi velut columnas erectos stare conspicio (Serm. 77: CCL 103,319).

Under the influence of the liturgical movement, which had used the didascalia as a catechetical tool for explaining the parts of the liturgy, the Sacred Congregation of Rites (Instr. 3 Sept. 1958: AAS 50 [1958] 657) officially recognized the role of the modern "commentator," who now shares responsibility for the didascalia with the president of the assembly.

Liturgical dialogue: C. Bouman, Variants in the Introduction to the Eucharistic Prayer: VChr 4 (1950) 94-115; I. Elbogen, Der jüdische Gottesdienst in seiner geschichtlichen Entwicklung, Hildesheim 1962; A. Hänggi - I. Pahl (eds.), Prex Eucharistica, Fribourg (CH) 1968 (Spicil. Friburg., 12); B. Margansky, Praefatio precis eucharisticae (In luce Patrum et Scriptorum Ecclesiasticorum considerata), Rome 1971; H. Danby, The Mishnah, Oxford [12]1977.

Didascalia: A. Martimort (ed.), L'Église en prière, Tournai 1961 (It. tr. Rome [2]1966), 132-133; Η ΘΕΙΑ ΛΕΙΤΟΥΡΓΙΑ ΤΟΥ ΕΝ ΑΓΙΟΙΣ ΠΑΤΡΟΣ ΗΜΩΝ ΙΟΑΝΝΟΥ ΧΡΥΣΟΣΤΟΜΟΥ, Rome 1967; L.C. Mohlberg, Liber sacramentorum romanae aecclesiae ordinis anni circuli, Rome 1960, 219-268; M. Pellegrino, Sursum cor nelle opere di sant'Agostino: RechAug 3 (1965) 179-206; R. Taft, The Dialogue Before the Anaphora in Byzantine Eucharistic Liturgy: OCP 52 (1986) 299-324; Th. Maas-Ewerd, Brevissimis verbis in die Messfeier einführen: Zu einer Frage liturgischer Praxis: Klerusblatt 67 (1987) 321-326; A. Gelston, Theodore of Mopsuestia: The Anaphora and Mystagogical Catechesis 16: SP 26 (1991) 21-33.

A. Chupungco

LITURGICAL FURNISHINGS. The expression liturgical furnishings refers to the whole complex of elements, fixed or movable, suitable for the specific functions and use of every kind of church building. Movable furnishings include those pertaining to ritual, such as vessels, patens, amulae, books for reading or singing and furniture.

Fixed liturgical furnishings refers to all those elements that divide the sanctuary from its vestibule and annexes and delineate the spaces for clergy and faithful, including those pertaining more directly to the altar, readings and homily. All elements of fixed worship furnishings were executed in masonry, marble, marble and metal, wood or metal (esp. silver and bronze).

Most of these furnishings, esp. soleae or balustrades, were fashioned with masonry elements of modest height and normally adorned with pictorial decoration. Often handwork in stone or marble was used for the same purpose, such as plutei, chancel screens, or small columns at intervals, often embellished by simple (or sometimes elaborate) decoration.

In Christian churches typically the areas whose functions were plainly recognizable and in which fixed liturgical furnishings were mainly used were the vestibule, the main body of the church (and pastophoria, if any), crypts, entry narthex, baptistery, and catechumenon and chrismarion, if present.

Starting from the vestibule: typically in buildings with four porticos a fountain was installed in the center for ablutions; at times there were more than one basin, for the same purpose. When a separation of the exonarthex from the portico was desired, metal gates were often used, or a masonry fence. In the main body of the church, around the base of the apse, in addition to wooden chairs there were also masonry steps as in an amphitheater (subsellia) for the presbyters, with the bishop's seat at the center, which might also be of stone, marble, wood or ivory; it was often adorned with floral, animal or cruciform decoration, or with scenes taken esp. from the OT and NT and the apocryphal gospels, as on the famous cathedra of Bishop *Maximian of Ravenna. Ordinarily in the early Christian period there was only one altar; the reason for the seven altars of the Roman Lateran basilica is not yet known. An altar was also set up in the crypt. In martyrial basilicas there could also be more than one altar, as, e.g., to St. Valentinus on the Via Flaminia, in the Roman suburb. A ciborium was placed on the altar, to indicate the focal point of the ceremony. The altar, when not of masonry, could also consist of a marble table or an assemblage of plutei or decorated chancel screens, or of a sarcophagus, acc. to a choice dictated also by the placement of its relics. Regarding ciboria, we have information on the use of wooden ciboria, like that cited in the Roman Liber pontificalis in the early Christian church of St. Susanna at Rome, but more often elements of marble ciboria have been preserved, esp. from the Early Medieval period. Ciboria or baldachins might cover the altar like a pavilion set on small columns, or rest directly on the latter (as, e.g., over the cemetery chamber of St. Alessandro on the Via Nomentana). Other articles, coordinated with the altar, were used to hold offerings or lamps.

The presbyteral area was delimited by a balustrade made of plutei and topped by an iconostasis replete with statues and protected by gates, sometimes in silver. Access to the presbyteral area was only through the central aisle, at times even more narrowly marked off by parapets or low masonry elements that formed the so-called solea (probably one of the first soleae, if not the oldest known, was that of the Lateran basilica).

Tables and cathedrae were also set up in annexes, e.g., in baptisteries or chrismarions. A silver stag that gushed water for the execution of the rite was sometimes placed in baptismal basins, also delimited by sculpted parapets; they were also covered with a marble baldachin held up by columns. (The roofs of these baldachins were often covered with silver leaf.) Another important element of fixed liturgical furnishing was the ambo; for our period there are examples of notable quality in Asia Minor, often datable to the time of *Justinian.

Regarding movable liturgical furnishings, for ease of reference we will list all the best-known types alphabetically, clarifying their function where necessary and giving some well-known examples from our period.

Amae—amulae. Containers for wine or water; amulae were similar to contemporary Mass cruets (Greg. Gr., Ep. I, 42). There are also examples of metal amulae. Some 5th-c. examples are preserved at the Vatican Museum.

Antependia. Related to modern altar frontals; we have late examples of them.

Basins. For water (DACL, II, 602-608): the priest used them to wash his hands during the Mass and before the consecration (Tertull., Apol. 39). Often confused with patens, basins are more concave and sometimes have a handle. The Stûma paten is a basin.

Bells—handbells. The latter were common in Celtic monasteries; in the 8th c. abbots used them to call the monks (DACL, III, 2, 1954-1982; 1982-1991). We have late examples of the former.

Book. See *book.

Cathedra. See *cathedra.

Censer or thurible. Similar to the modern container in which incense is burned. In old inventories it is often given the Greek name θυμιατήριον or the Latin names thuribulum or acerra. Examples are in the Cyprus treasure (7th c.). Round or polygonal, with or without foot, but always with chain.

Chalices. Initially, it is probable that a common poculum (drinking vessel) was used for the eucharistic consecration; this was sometimes in the form of a goblet or a glass or silver cantharus without handles. Later we have (1) chalices for consecration or oblation (scyphi or calices maiores), like that offered by the empress Theodora in the mosaic of St. Vitale, Ravenna; (2) chalices for the Communion of bishop and faithful (calices minores and calices ministeriales); (3) calices baptismales, whose form is not documented but which are mentioned as early as *Innocent I (LP I, 221), to contain milk and honey after the Communion of neophytes. There are possible examples of these objects in the Vatican Museum collections (G. Cecchelli, Vita di Roma, 156). We must bear in mind that the various chalices are not always recognized, esp. when they are not goblet-shaped with a more or less tall stem and so are not those used by the priest. Chalices in the form of a wide cup with handles and short stem were probably more suitable for offering to the faithful. Among calices minores is that of Amiens (5th–6th c.), of glass with two handles; the famous *Antioch chalice seems more suited to offerings or to the distribution of Communion than to use by the priest (Braun, Altar, tv. X, 4,30).

Colum—colatorium—colum vinarium. Strainers used for the purification of wine before the Eucharist. The Canoscio treasure (5th–6th c.) has a fine example in the form of a perforated spoon (F. Volbach, Canoscio, 310).

Comb. Before approaching the altar, the priest said a particular prayer and tidied his hair with a suitable comb. These were of wood, ivory or bone, even decorated with secular subjects.

Coronae (lit. "crowns"). Legend says that those around the ciborium of Hagia Sophia at *Constantinople were donated by Constantine. They had a votive character and were hung from the ciborium, of gold and silver with precious stones and pendant cross at the center, acc. to Early Medieval examples. Those of the museums of Cluny and Madrid were part of the treasure of the *Visigothic church of Guarrazar in Spain. At Monza are *Longobard and Carolingian examples (DACL VI, 2,1842-1859; XI, 2,2769-2770; Schlunk, 3 11-20).

Cross. See *cross - crucifix.

Diptych. See *diptych.

Eucharistic dove. Boxes in the shape of a dove used to keep bread for the Eucharist. Since citations in the LP are unclear, our sure examples all postdate 1000, though we have ancient pyxes with a dove mounted on top.

Ewers. These objects must be connected with the baptismal liturgy and with the pelvis baptismi mentioned more than once in the LP, since we have no mention of any washing of hands. For this operation the larger amae could serve (see above).

Fans. Used to keep insects away from the sacred elements, circular with gilded decoration, sometimes in relief, as at *Aquileia, or with ivory framework (DACL V, 2,1923; 16 10-25).

Host-irons. Used for the unblessed unleavened bread (DACL V, 1,1366-1368).

Icon. See *iconography - iconology.

Lamp. According to the Testamentum Domini, every part of the church must be illuminated (I, 19). We distinguish two types of *lamps: (l) fixed and (2) movable or portable.

1. Fixed lamps. We know that from the 4th c. great metal circles (coronae) were used, from which glass oil lamps were hung (one of these, perhaps 8th c., was found in St. Saba, Rome, suspended from an iron hook: Cecchelli, Vita di Roma, 159, fig.). We also have small Coptic examples: either a tall circle with an arm to hold the glass bulb inside it, or a flat circle pierced so as to be able to insert the same bulbs. *Egeria saw something similar in the Holy Sepulchre (Itin. 24,4); *Prudentius (Cath. V, 141-144) mentions lights hanging from the ceiling by ropes, which may be related to the type mentioned above. At any rate, the LP speaks of heavy expenses for the servitium luminum. The names for lamps are various: fara, phara, fara canthara, fara coronata, coronae, regna buttae, butrones or buttones, and then gabatae which could be in the form of a canistrum like that of S. Martino ai Monti, Rome (5th c.). Circular lamps often had the christological monogram and cross, and a plate with dedicatory inscription. A fine example, perhaps 5th c., is in the Museo delle Terme, Rome (C. Cecchelli, Vita di Roma, 93). A hanging lamp in the form of a basilica was found at Orléansville (DACL, II, fig. 1443-1444).

2. Movable lamps. These served esp. to illuminate the altar. The names vary acc. to type: candelabra, cereostata, cereofala, candelae, lucernae, and apply to candles with molded stem and base with feet, or oil lamps with one or more spouts. Among examples of the latter from the early Christian period with Christian subjects (though not always found in churches), we would highlight that in the Uffizi, Florence, and another in the Florentine Archaeological Museum (C. Cecchelli, Vita di Roma, 92; 68, fig. 49). The material of these lamps could be bronze or terracotta, but also silver, iron, brass or glass. Their forms also varied, even drawing on mythological fauna, but were often decorated with Christians symbols or the christological monogram. The name donarium could also be connected with objects for illumination; they were called anathemata signocristata (Lat. gift/offering marked with a crest) if they had the christological monogram.

Knife, eucharistic. Used for the preparation of the bread for the sacrifice (the Greeks use one in the prothesis, in the form of a lancet). Our examples are all late (DACL, VIII, 1,1234-1237).

Lectern. Often connected with the ambo, but could be of wood or metal. Names are: pluteus, lectricium, legitorium, analogium (DACL VII, 2,2493-2496; Braun, Altar, II, 150).

Metretas (LP I, 176, 187). Used to hold oil for lamps. We have no sure examples.

Missorium. Precious plates on which the bread to be consecrated was placed. By their name, they may be connected more with the notion of a gift, quod mittitur, than with the idea of a meal and a plate (classically discus). That of Theodosius, preserved at Madrid, is famous. Generally round, but sometimes rectangular, their decoration could also be inspired by secular subjects (DACL IV, 1,1173-1191).

Organ. We have some figurative evidence of these, but the church did not use them, using only vocal singing (illustrations in the Utrecht Psalter notwithstanding) (DACL VII, 1,1161-1169).

Pails (small and large). Some of these were used for holy water (G. Cecchelli, Vita di Roma, 94).

Parasol, liturgical (Lat. Umbella). A famous papal parasol was that of John VII (8th c.), now lost, with subjects drawn by Grimaldi.

Paten. In earthenware, metal or glass, a fairly deep plate, sometimes with a handle, to better distribute the Eucharist. The LP also mentions gold and silver patenae chrismales for the chrism of baptism and confirmation. There are numerous examples, including the well-known patens of Riha and Stûma, but for the latter, see above: basin.

Pax. Identified with tablets decorated with images for the kiss of the faithful; examples are late.

Pyx. Also called turris, arthoforion, buxis, this was a container for the eucharistic species. Also used for relics (Braun, Reliquiäre, 47-55).

Reliquary. Saints' remains were preserved in arcellae or capsellae. Various types of reliquaries are preserved in the chapel of the Sancta Sanctorum in the Lateran. We will point out the best-known forms, noting that sarcophagi could be used for the same purpose. (1) Pyxes. See above. Capsae, derived from funerary urns, are often confused with pyxes. Their forms and materials vary. The early Christian ones of Brivio (oval) and Brescia (ivory) are well known. (2) Reliquary vases. That there was such a use is demonstrated by that with the head of St. Sebastian, though the deposition of that relic dates from the 9th c. (3) Staurothecae. For the relics of the cross, sometimes in the form of a cross, like that of Justin II. The encolpion, which had an individual use and consisted of a pectoral cross containing a relic, may be considered a reduction of this type. (4) Ostensorium. Should not be confused with staurothecae, whose contents were exposed to the faithful only on extraordinary occasions. It is recorded that some reliquaries could, in turn, be provided with a protective case.

Spoon. Generally consisted of a stem, to the end of which was attached a spatula, sometimes very shallow. Could also be of bone, with incisions and decorations (Braun, Altar, 265). The Vatican Museum has some early Christian silver spoons (C. Cecchelli, Vita di Roma, 300).

Stoup for holy water. Part of the fixed rather than the movable furnishings, and examples are late, but there were vessels for holy water that could be moved (DACL II, 1,758-771; Righetti, Storia lit., I, 463-468).

Tabernacle. Portable tabernacle for holding the reserved sacrament to be taken to the sick, recalling the OT tabernacle in which the presence of the Lord resided.

Theca for hosts. Typically in the form of a box with sliding cover, found after 1000.

A very ample bibliographical view of the subject until 1960 is in C. Cecchelli, Vita di Roma nel Medio Evo. Le arti minori e il costume, Rome 1960. Among later studies, see esp. W.F. Volbach, Il tesoro di Canoscio: ricerche sull'Umbria tardo-antica e preromanica. Atti del II Convegno di Studi Umbri - Gubbio 24-28 maggio 1964, Perugia 1965; J. Braun, Der christliche Altar, Munich 1924; Id., Die Reliquiäre des christlich. Kultus, Freiburg 1940; Th. Mathews, An Early Roman Chancel Arrangement and Its Liturgical Uses: RivAC 38 (1962) 73-95; S. De Blauw, Architecture and Liturgy in Late Antiquity and Middle Age: Traditions and Trends in Modern Scholarship: Archiv für Liturgiewissenschaft 33 (1991) 1-34; S. De Blauw, Cultus et decor. Liturgia e architettura nella Roma tardoantica e medievale. Basilica Salvatoris. Sanctae Mariae. Sancti Petri, voll. I-II, Vatican City 1994; H. Geertman, More veterum. Il Liber Pontificalis e gli edifici di Roma nella tarda antichità e nell'alto Medioevo, Groningen 1975; H. Geertman, Nota sul Liber Pontificalis come fonte archeologica, in Quaeritur inventus colitur. Miscellanea in honore di p. U.M. Fasola, vol. I, Rome 1989, 349-361; F. Guidobaldi, Strutture liturgiche a Roma tra IV e VII secolo, in Materiali e tecniche dell'edilizia paleocristiana a Roma, ed. M. Cecchelli, Rome 2001, 171-190.

M. Cecchelli

LITURGICAL YEAR

I. The primitive nucleus of Easter - II. Development of the Easter cycle - III. The Christmas feasts and cycle - IV. Ordinary time.

The point of departure of the liturgical year is the death of Jesus on a Friday, and his resurrection on "Sunday." The "the Lord's day" thus became the oldest and most authentic feast (see *Sunday). The liturgical year contains feasts with provenance both Jewish (Easter, Pentecost) and pagan (Christmas, Epiphany). With its Sundays and its cycles of Easter and Christmas, the liturgical year was also called temporale/proprium de tempore, arranged acc. to the feasts of the martyrs and saints sanctorale/proprium de sanctis. The movable cycle of Easter formed around the primitive nucleus of Easter, based on its date. A second, later nucleus comprised the connected feasts of Christmas and Epiphany, which pulled into their orbit the feasts of the saints already in existence to form a new cycle, this time fixed. The remaining periods of the year outside the two cycles were divided into the quatuor tempora.

I. The primitive nucleus of Easter. The first Christians celebrated *Easter acc. to Jewish practice for Passover and, like the Jews, observed Easter/Passover on 14 Nisan, in memory of the exodus, but with the difference that the new and true Paschal Lamb was Christ (1 Cor 5:7). Because the date of the Hebrew feast of Passover did not always fall on a Sunday, but varied, the Christians also celebrated Easter from year to year on different days of the week. It was quickly established, however, that the day of the resurrection would fall each year on a Sunday, obvious as it was that, like the weekly Easter, the annual Easter should also be moved to coincide with a Sunday, in this case the Sunday following 14 Nisan. Detached from its Jewish roots, the Christian Easter had its own rites: mourning over the death of Christ and joy for the resurrection, both motives celebrated during the Easter vigil until dawn. Two days of complete fasting preceded the Easter vigil, followed by fifty days of rejoicing. The Easter vigil was a day consecrated to the commemoration of the twofold event: Pascha staurōsimon, Pascha anastasimon. This closely followed the primitive Sunday vigils (DACL 15, 3108-3113), and like them was composed of alternating readings and chants, though it was distinguished from them by the celebration of *baptism and the eucharistic synaxis, which were by antonomasia the sacraments of the Lord's Pasch.

II. Development of the Easter cycle. From the 4th c. the feast of Easter acquired such importance as to become the hinge of a cycle which prepared for and completed it. This development followed two basic tendencies: one historical and the other pastoral. The historical tendency related the Easter cycle to the historical stages of the passion and resurrection of Christ; the pastoral used the liturgy for the spiritual edification of the faithful.

1. The "historicization." The 4th-c. stational liturgy of *Jerusalem led to the historicization of the Easter cycle, which spread to all countries via pilgrims. The particular characteristic of the liturgy of Jerusalem was the fact that all the accounts recorded in the gospels concerning the Lord's sufferings, from the day before Palm Sunday until the visit of the women to the tomb, were recalled in Masses dedicated to those events. These celebrations and the related readings were adapted "exactly to the place and time" (concept of mimesis). The celebration at the sacred places led to a lengthening of the one Easter celebration, which now embraced all aspects of the redemption through the celebration of the preceding days, the events of which are recounted in the gospels. Elsewhere also, toward the end of the 4th c., the Easter vigil was being lengthened into a Triduum Sacrum, with the three paschal days of Holy Thursday, Good Friday and Holy Saturday dedicated to the memory of the passion, death and resurrection. *Ambrose and *Augustine already speak of the Triduum Sacrum of the crucified, buried and risen Christ, even though for them also, Easter in a proper sense was the Easter vigil, which Augustine calls mater omnium vigiliarum. Things were similar in late 4th-c. Asia Minor, when *Gregory of Nyssa preached the "three holy days" during the Easter vigil.

2. The Easter vigil. Around the basic rites of the vigil—which remain baptism and *Eucharist—revolve other rites that serve to highlight these two. The blessing of the paschal candle (laus cerei) is attested from 384 by *Jerome, in his letter to the deacon Praesidius of Piacenza; the Exultet of the Roman liturgy almost certainly goes back to Ambrose of Milan. Doubtless the readings and prophecies underwent variation in number and length, but they correspond to the primitive usage of the Sunday vigils. The blessing of the baptismal water, which became general in the 3rd c., presupposes that the practice of baptizing in running water had fallen out of use. The accompanying prayer draws its themes from biblical *typology; that of the Roman liturgy may go back to the 3rd–4th c. The formulary of the Mass, whose structure preserves some primitive traits, is only attested from the period of the first sacramentaries.

3. The period of preparation. Christians prepared for the feast during a preliminary period that gradually lengthened, in the first instance for pastoral reasons (RAC 7, 512-518). Other than the fast on Friday and Saturday before Easter, for the earliest period it is difficult to say what else might have occurred. At the beginning of the 4th c. the fast before Easter lasted six days in the East, three weeks at Rome. *Athanasius of Alexandria introduced the Lenten fast in 334 in Egypt (Ep. fest. 6,13), already known to *Eusebius (Solemn. pasch. 4) and practiced also in the West (Rome). Toward 381–384 *Egeria mentions this regarding Jerusalem. Jerome mentions it regarding Rome ca. 384 (Ep. 24), Ambrose tells us of the practice in Milan. By the late 4th and early 5th c. *Lent was generally known: its observance advanced with the transformation of the Easter vigil into the great annual baptismal celebration, and with the institutionalization of the catechumenate and the illumination, the 40-day period of immediate preparation for baptism, which was celebrated on the eve of Easter (baptismal catecheses of *Cyril of Jerusalem). From the 5th c., the reconciliation of public sinners centered on the end of Lent—Holy Thursday at Rome—since the heaviest part of the penitential practice took place during Lent. The entire community united with the two groups, catechumens and penitents, who were most involved in Lent, so as to prepare for Easter with penance, fasting, religious practices and liturgical celebrations. In the end, Lent (Quadragesima) was lengthened to the Sexagesima (in the 6th c.) and the Septuagesima (in the 7th c.), the Sexagesima referring to the approx. 60 (actually 57) days before Easter and Septuagesima referring to the approx. 70 (actually 64) days before Easter. They followed Quinquagesima (50 days), the last Sunday before Lent.

4. The post-Easter period. Easter week was entirely dedicated to the deeper instruction of the neophytes (mystagogical catecheses of [ps.-]Cyril of Jerusalem, Ambrose, *Theodore of Mopsuestia). On Sunday in albis the neophytes left off their white garments and resumed their normal dress, and left the places reserved for them near the altar. Pentecost day and the period of 50 days of liturgical joy between Easter and Pentecost both go back to the Jewish tradition (Acts 2:1). From the beginning, the day of Pentecost was celebrated like the weekly day of the resurrection of Christ, whereas the period of 50 days of joy is expressly attested only from the 2nd c. (Ep. apost.). The linking of the day of Pentecost with the celebration of the descent of the *Holy Spirit was done perhaps in the 3rd c. Pentecost was originally the solemn conclusion of the period of 50 days of joy which, acc. to Ambrose, "must be celebrated like Easter," given that they "are like a single Sunday" (in Luc. 8,25). In Asia Minor, Syria and Palestine (Jerome, Egeria, Doctr. Addai), the *ascension of Christ was celebrated on the 50th day along with the sending of the Spirit, until, toward the end of the 4th c., the event was historicized and the ascension alone was celebrated on the fortieth day, thus separating it from the complex of the paschal event, as also occurred with the sending of the Spirit.

III. The Christmas feasts and cycle. The date of Christ's birth was unknown, and thus at their origin, the feasts of his coming to humanity were not aimed at celebrating an anniversary but at opposing the pagan feasts of the winter solstice, fixed at 6 Jan in Egypt and Arabia, and 25 Dec at Rome. To these were added old and new feasts to form a second, fixed cycle.

*1. Epiphany. Celebrated 6 Jan, the name attesting an Eastern origin, Epiphany arose in Egypt in the 2nd c. but did not spread until the 4th c. C. Mohrmann considers it "a typically ideological feast," celebrating the various manifestations of our Lord: his birth, the adoration of the shepherds and magi, his baptism, the miracle at Cana. It is marked by the blessing of the waters and is called τὰ φῶτα in the East, where, when the Roman feast of Christmas spread, it essentially commemorated the baptism of Christ. In the West Epiphany essentially became the feast of the adoration of the magi.

2. Christmas*. Christmas is of Roman origin: it appears in the Chronography of 354*, where the civil calendar cites it as 25 Dec: Natale Invicti (Solis), in the Depositio martyrum*, of 336: VIII kal. ian. natus Christus in Bethleem Iudeae. The oldest *iconographical depictions of the adoration of the shepherds and the magi are also Roman, because originally Christmas, like Epiphany in the East, was the feast of the birth of Christ along with his adoration by the shepherds and the magi, a meaning still preserved in *Africa at the time of *Optatus of Milevis. The feast was introduced in the East simultaneously with the spread of Epiphany in the West. The three Masses of Christmas are attested at the time of *Gregory the Great.

3. The Christmas cycle. Includes in the first place the octave of the feast. In the East, as attested by the *Syriac calendar of 411, St. Stephen was celebrated 26 Dec, Sts. John and James the 27th, and Sts. Peter and Paul the 28th; in the West, acc. to the Mart. hier., St. Stephen the 26th, St. John the Evangelist and St. James, brother of the Lord the 27th, the Holy Innocents the 28th. 1 Jan, as the eighth day after Christmas, had to oppose the pagan New Year celebrations; as the feast of the Circumcision (in *Gaul from the 6th c., from the 10th c. at Rome), it was in keeping with the historicizing tendency of the liturgy. Forty days after Epiphany, 14 Feb, the Hypapante was celebrated at Jerusalem (Peregr. Egeriae 26), the meeting of the Lord with his people, the latter symbolized by Simeon and Anna (Lk 2:21-40). After the introduction of Christmas the feast was moved to 2 Feb, definitively from 561–562 by a law of Justinian. In the 5th c. the feast was connected to a procession of lights from *Bethlehem to Jerusalem, similar to an official act in which the population of a city sets out to receive an important person with candles and torches. Introduced at Rome in the 7th c., this feast, with its procession from St. Hadrian to S. Maria Maggiore, replaced the pagan tradition of the amburbale (RAC 16, 946-956).

4. Advent (RAC 1, 118-125). Begun in Gaul and *Spain, from the 4th/5th c., for ascetical reasons: as a preparation for both Epiphany (the date of baptism!) and Christmas. The Councils of *Tours in 563 and Mâcon in 581 and some passages of *Gregory of Tours (d. 594) attest a kind of "Lent" in preparation for Christmas. From the 6th c. we find the formularies de adventu Domini in the Roman sacramentaries; they emphasize the expectation of the eschatological coming, and the awaiting of God as King. The length of this period has varied: four weeks acc. to *Bede's homiliary, five acc. to the Gelasian Sacramentary, Amalarius and *Paul the Deacon. In the *Hispanic liturgy Advent began 17 Nov; in the *Ambrosian liturgy 11 Nov. The liturgical formulary for the period and its significance were fixed with the Carolingian reform. Advent above all commemorates the coming on earth of the Messiah, with a particular emphasis on the role played in this by the Virgin Mary. This explains the many readings and Marian formulas of the Masses; of particular note in the Hispanic calendars is the feast of the Expectatio partus B.M.V., 18 Dec.

IV. Ordinary Time. The greater part of the liturgical year falls outside of the cycles of Easter and Christmas, and received an order based on different criteria and at different times.

1. The quatuor tempora are weeks of fasting, prayer and penance: the weeks after Pentecost, after the third Sunday of September, after the third Sunday of Advent and after the first Sunday of Lent (from the 7th c.). The pagans had various celebrations corresponding to the four seasons as moments in agricultural life. According to Janini the quatuor tempora are seasonal celebrations, going back to Pope *Siricius (384–399), on the occasion of the controversies over fasting; their regulation was a compromise between the continual fasting practiced by the ascetics and the attacks made on them by *Jovinian (condemned in 390). According to Morin, the establishment of these fasts in correspondence with the four seasons was to have the fast of Pentecost coincide with the feriae messis, that of September with the feriae vindemiales, and that of December with the feriae sementinae.

2. In the ancient liturgy the Sundays per annum after Epiphany and Pentecost were designated by different expressions: in the Liber commicus Hispanic dominici quotidiani, in the Sélestat Lectionary (dominicae) cottidianae. The Roman liturgical books related them to the feasts of the most important saints: post natale apostolorum, post s. Laurentii, post s. Angeli. The Gallican books of the 8th–9th c. introduced the continuous numbering of 24 Sundays after Pentecost.

CPG vol. 5, 147-151 (index liturgicus); RAC 7, 756-763; 16, 1109-1118; M. Righetti, Manuale di Storia liturgica 2, Milan [3]1969; Handbuch der Ostkirchenkunde 2, Düsseldorf 1989, 65-87, and 97-99 (bibl.); H. Auf der Maur, Feiern im Rhythmus der Zeit 1, Regensburg 1983; Th. Klauser, La Liturgia nella Chiesa occidentale. Sintesi storica e riflessioni, It. tr., Turin (n.d. but 1972), 118-126; H.R. Drobner, Die drei Tage zwischen Tod und Auferstehung unseres Herrn Jesus Christus, Leiden 1982; C. Vogel, Medieval Liturgy, Portland 1986, 304-314 (liturgical readings); J.F. Baldovin, The Urban Character of Christian Worship: The Origins, Development, and Meaning of Stational Liturgy, Rome 1987; Ch. Jones et al. (eds.), The Study of Liturgy, New York [2]1992, 455-472; M. Kunzler, La Liturgia della Chiesa, Milan 1996, 507-593; A.J. Chupungco (ed.), Scientia Liturgica 5, Casale Monf. ²2000, 169-370; FCh 20, 84-104 (Egeria); PO 35,1 (Armenian lectionary).

V. Saxer - S. Heid

LITURGY

I. Christian liturgy - II. Liturgy and the Fathers - III. Liturgy and tradition - IV. Liturgical language - V. Improvisational prayer - VI. Liturgy of the Hours - VII. Monastic liturgy - VIII. Eastern liturgical books - IX. Western liturgical books.

I. Christian liturgy

1. Vocabulary. Derived originally from the Greek via its Latinized form, the term liturgy etymologically means public service (λήϊτος ἔργον), and its uses are many and diverse in ancient Greek, "worship service" not being, by any means, the most common meaning. Its use in the LXX to translate the Hebrew terms shereth and avodah, when these designate worship and its ministers, guided the meaning which it took in Christian Greek and above all in the NT. From the 4th c. λειτουργία refers more specifically to the eucharistic celebration; its religious value is often reinforced by means of the qualifying adjective divine liturgy. Translated in Latin by servitium, ministerium and above all officium, from the Renaissance onward the Greek word is often transcribed as a technical term to indicate Christian worship organized under the jurisdiction of the ecclesiastical authorities, and, as public acts of the church, regulated by them. This use became more general, however, only from the 19th c. onward, and not until 1947 did the magisterium of the Catholic Church propose a doctrinal definition of the term (Mediator Dei 20), taken up and refined by Vatican II (Sacrosanctum Concilium 7).

2. Specific character of the Christian liturgy. The principal resonances of the pre-Christian Greek term, adopted as it had been by the LXX to indicate acts of worship, were well adapted to indicate the specific nature of Christian worship; i.e., its public character, involving the ecclesial community as such and not only a limited number of "ministers of worship" as found in other religions. It must be associated with the term ecclesia, which, as much for the meaning which it had received in the cities of ancient Greece as for its etymology (from καλέω: "call, convoke"), designates a task, and indeed a responsibility, of the community. The ecclesia is a community gathered together by the Word of God—and more precisely by Christ, who is this Word incarnate—to constitute an "assembly" (qahal) whose primary function is to fulfill a sacerdotal ministry (Ex 19:6). The moments and ritual acts which properly make up the liturgy are supremely expressive of what happens in the entire life of the ecclesial community, for in them, the agency of Christ working through his Spirit realizes that "sign and instrument of a very closely knit union with God and the unity of the whole human race" (Lumen Gentium 1), which is none other than "the church as the universal sacrament of salvation" (ibid., 48). Every Christian liturgy may be called "sacramental," in the technical sense that the word sacrament has taken on—i.e., a visible sign in which the "mystery of salvation" is both symbolized and made present, that mystery which is the return to God, in the form of sacrifice, of the whole creation. Therefore, acc. to the diversity of its various expressions, all Christian liturgy is fundamentally paschal, finding its roots and its orientation in the "Pasch" of Christ, accomplished and manifested above all in his passion and resurrection.

3. The Christian liturgy in the patristic period. Two acts of the Christian community are characteristic and constitutive of the liturgy from its origin: *baptism and the caena Domini ("Lord's Supper"/ *Eucharist). Together these represent "Christian initiation" as we find it expressed in the great "mystagogical catecheses" of the 4th c. (*Cyril of Jerusalem, *John Chrysostom, *Theodore of Mopsuestia, *Ambrose of Milan) and spoken of in many tractates and sermons, from the De baptismo of Tertullian onward. The oldest collection of liturgical texts together with accompanying directives of the church is the Apostolic Tradition attributed to *Hippolytus (beginning of 3rd c.), which had a great influence in both East and West, containing also rites for the ordination of bishops, priests and deacons, some formulas of benediction, and various prayers. All this was taken up and developed in the region of Antioch in about 380 in the vast compilation known as the Apostolic Constitutions, as it was in other ancient documents: the Didache* (perhaps the beginning of the 2nd c.), the Didascalia Apostolorum* (originating from N Syria, start of 3rd c.) and a Jewish Christian euchologion. At the end of the 4th c. a new feature emerges, previously little known: a service of psalms and prayers for morning and evening. This tradition, which developed in the monasteries, grew into the Liturgy of the Hours: an act of praise, and also of meditation, increasingly adding poetic texts alongside scriptural and patristic readings, thus enriching the psalmody. Much more time would be necessary, well beyond the patristic period properly so-called, for this to take the liturgical form of the seven sacraments, the rites of consecration of persons, churches, and objects, and of funeral rites. Yet progressively, developments in the celebration of the paschal mystery came to constitute the cycle of the liturgical year, including its preparation in Lent and unfolding in Pentecost, the multiplication of commemorations and anniversaries, and in the West the celebration, prolonged for several weeks, of the manifestation of Christ the Lord, including expectation (Advent), *Nativity and then the *Epiphany. All these developments, however, do no more than draw out the many and various aspects of the one "paschal mystery" from which springs the whole Christian liturgy.

A. Romeo, Il termine λειτουργία nella grecità biblica: Misc. Mohlberg, II, Rome 1949, 467-519; C. Vagaggini, Il senso teologico della liturgia, Rome 1957, Cinisello Balsamo [6]1999; J.-A. Jungmann, Early Liturgy, Notre Dame, IN 1959; H. Schmidt, Introductio in liturgiam occidentalem, Rome 1960; O. Casel, Il mistero del culto cristiano, Turin 1966; P. Fernández Rodríguez, El término liturgia. Su etimología y su uso: Ciencia Tom. 97 (1970) 143-163; J.T. Burtchael, From Synagogue to Church: Public Services and Offices in the Earliest Christian Communities, Cambridge 1992; S. Rosso, Un popolo di sacerdoti. Saggio di liturgia fondamentale, Rome 1999; Liturgia, ed. D. Sartore - A.M. Triacca - C. Cibien, Cinisello Balsamo 2001, 1037-1054.

I.-H. Dalmais

II. Liturgy and the Fathers

1. The Fathers as witnesses (and sources?) of the liturgy. If and how the Fathers may be considered sources for the elaboration of liturgical texts is a question that can only be considered by studying particular texts of individual Fathers. That they are special witnesses of the liturgy as used in the different churches of their time is clear from an examination of their writings on the subject: The Didache,* the first Apologia of *Justin (ch. 61), the tracts of *Tertullian on *baptism, *penance and *prayer, and that on prayer by Cyprian, the Apostolic Tradition attributed to Hippolytus, the Didascalia Apostolorum and the Apostolic Constitutions,* the catecheses of *Cyril and of *John II of Jerusalem, of *Theodore of Mopsuestia, *John Chrysostom, the *Festal (or Easter) Letters of *Athanasius, the Euchologion of Serapion of Thmuis, the De mysteriis and De sacramentis of *Ambrose of Milan, and the instructions to the neophytes of *Gaudentius of Brescia, *Zeno of Verona and *Augustine of Hippo (see *mystagogy).

We can find from time to time important evidence of texts and other liturgical details in the writings of the Fathers, e.g., in biblical commentary on the liturgical texts of the Bible (e.g., Jn 6; 1 Cor 11; Mt 28:19-20); in Augustine's commentary on the *Lord's Prayer, Ep. 54 (on criteria for liturgical practice) and in his frequent allusions to the Sursum corda that introduces the eucharistic prayer, as well as in his reference to the significance of the *kiss as a reminder of fraternal sharing and communion.

2. Liturgy as norm of life. The examples just mentioned indicate clearly how the Fathers understood the liturgy not only as an act of worship but also as a norm of Christian life, esp. in the preaching of the Easter mystery. Other examples can easily be added, such as the insistence of Augustine on forgiveness and reconciliation in speaking about the Pater noster that precedes Communion. In a broader sense, the link that the Fathers constantly affirm between liturgy and the Christian life may be seen particularly in two recurring themes: prayer, while being an expression of faith and of religious sentiment, must be translated into works—in this sense, says Augustine, we can carry out the precept to pray always; second, that the celebration of the Eucharist is communion not only with Christ, who gives us his body to eat, but also with our brothers and sisters, with whom we make up the one body of the Lord. We also find exhortations to that purity of spirit and body required for participation in the Eucharist, and an invitation to offer oneself in sacrifice in union with Christ; this is esp. true in the Acts of *martyrs and in the literature on martyrdom more broadly.

In a broader sense, the impact of the liturgy on the Christian life is shown in the instruction to catechumens and neophytes on the fundamental duties of a Christian, in the Fathers' explanation of the significance of the baptismal liturgy.

3. The liturgy as norm of belief. The first to consider this was B. Capelle in a paper given at the 1st International Conference on Patristic Studies (published in 1954) on "the authority of the liturgy in the Fathers," which should be referred to for a full treatment of the subject: here we will consider only its key points (see *argumentation, patristic).

This "authority" was stated by *Prosper of Aquitaine in a celebrated formula: legem credendi statuat lex supplicandi, that, applied first by its author to the controversy with the *Semi-Pelagians, was then elevated into an absolute principle, making "the liturgy a governing criterion in matters of faith" (Capelle, 6). In this Prosper is in debt to his master Augustine, who himself used this criterion in his dispute with the *Donatists and against the *Pelagian Celestius in connection with the exorcisms in the baptism of infants. Believed to be of apostolic origin, the norm may without doubt be dated early, certainly to the Didache, and then is continuously present in the texts that regard the place of the liturgy in the context of the discipline and organization of the community: the Apostolic Tradition, the Syriac Di- dascalia of the apostles, as well as the Apostolic Constitutions all manifest this idea in different ways. Among the Fathers who took inspiration from this criterion *Origen should be mentioned: using it in an arbitrary way, he attributed later practices to the apostles and invested them with mysterious symbolic meanings. In the Dialogue of Origen with Heraclides, a work only discovered in 1941, Origen founds his trinitarian doctrine on the eucharistic prayer and also discusses prayer directed to Christ. Further he begins a tradition of "double" exegesis that comments on the liturgy as it does on the Bible. Subsequently, Tertullian elaborated a theory of consuetudo, also basing it uncritically on an apostolic tradition that made it obligatory. Elsewhere, however, he denies the value of the tradition, as does *Cyprian of Carthage in his dispute over the question of the baptism of heretics with Pope *Stephen, the latter energetically reaffirming the binding nature of the apostolic tradition in force in those churches enjoying particular authority. This had already been the position of *Irenaeus of Lyons in relation to doctrinal matters of primary importance. One aspect of the liturgy on which the Fathers laid great emphasis, beginning with Origen, was the questioning on the faith which preceded baptism, regarding the mystery of the *Trinity; this also applies to other liturgical formulas such as the doxologies and the eucharistic *anaphoras. In this respect the testimony of St. *Basil is esp. significant. Thus the liturgy, present as a dynamic force giving life to the tradition, became a locus theologicus. More than this, it worked by means of "ritual acts, with their essentially sacred character: putting into action the Christian mystery, bearers of divine grace, organs of prayer, they direct the whole of life and guide the religious perspectives of the faithful" (Capelle, 20).

Finally, the Fathers see the liturgy as "a sure testimony of doctrine, and so, by virtue of this same function, an official witness to its developments," an expression of the truth that should be received by the Christian faithful (ibid.). The historical process which we have outlined was not a uniformly happy one: an empiricism springing from polemic, an overly mystical approach which did not take into account the nature of development over time, and the literary form of the hieratic texts all contributed at times to making the witness of the Fathers less precise and clear; however, this witness is of considerable importance when it is valued and studied critically.

4. Characteristics of the liturgical piety of the Fathers. Here we summarize some considerations set out in the Dizionario liturgico, in both the first edition and the second of 2001. These characteristics are not exclusive to the Fathers, though they are particularly accentuated and consistent in their writings. The piety of the Fathers as it is expressed in the liturgy is nourished and inspired by familiarity with the Bible, directing their response to the divine mystery, and also shaping the expression of their thoughts and sentiments in preaching or writing. They come to the Bible with varying exegetical criteria, but certain core, and in fact common, features emerge: attention is paid to grasping not only the sense of the words but also the intention of God, indeed God himself; the unity of the OT and of the NT, founded on the unity of the principal Author of the Bible and of the divine plan as it is expressed there in various ways; the centrality of Christ, essential to the understanding of the Bible, and to the liturgy, as Augustine says: per Christum hominem ad Christum Deum (In Io. Ev. tr. 13,4); the centrality of the church, recipient and interpreter of the Word of God, acc. to the famous saying that "the church makes the Eucharist, the Eucharist makes the church," i.e., makes the liturgy. The eucharistic prayers are addressed to the Father through Christ in the *Holy Spirit. Theological discussions of the 4th c. brought as their consequence a greater Christocentrism (see J.A. Jungmann, Die Stellung Christi im liturgischen Gebet, Münster [2]1962). Liturgical piety is dominated by the presence of Christ conjoined with the idea of hodie ("today"), i.e., when celebrating feasts such as Nativity, Epiphany and Easter.

The liturgy was lived and practiced by the Fathers in an attitude of objective piety. This is not to say that the Fathers did not know the intimate fervor of personal contact with God, but in the sense that liturgical piety is founded on faith in the revealed mystery and learned from the Bible and the tradition of the church, with little concession to an effusion of sentiment, which would take a greater place in later eras. The contemplation of the mystery orients and stimulates the life of the Christian, so that we may speak of a dynamic sense of the liturgy, from which sprang that ideal of lived faith which inspired the Fathers and which they instilled into the faithful.

Their liturgical piety is also characterized by the place of the community, founded theologically on the reality of the church as body, as Christus totus, placing the Eucharist at the center of the action of worship, celebrated by the bishop in union with his clergy. The same community emphasis is found in the preparation for and celebration of baptism, as it is of prayer in its various forms. The concept of mysterion was applied first to *exegesis, and only later in the 4th c. to the liturgy.

As the Fathers meditate on the history of salvation and on the truths of the faith, we find alive in them a sense of mystery, of that which is sacred and which comes from God, accepted by humanity without fully understanding it, but rather adoring, praising, thanking; this is present both in those Fathers of a more traditionalistic tendency, not knowing or otherwise rejecting a rational examination of the revealed truth, and in those more intrepid ones committed to a more speculative approach. A profound sense of mystery was for them a safeguard of orthodoxy, and of a spirit of faith and of prayer, encouraging an attitude of humble and profound adoration in the liturgy. Finally, in both those Fathers who provide specific evidence of liturgical traditions, such as St. Ambrose, St. *Leo I, and St. *Gregory the Great, and also in those sources characterized by more general themes common to the patristic period, we note a marked emphasis on the word, characteristic of Greco-Roman culture, although varying of course acc. to the background and purpose of the author.

The relevant sources have been collected together by E. Lodi (ed.), Enchiridion euchologicum fontium liturgicorum, Rome 1979; B. Capelle: RTAM 27 (1951) 5-22 (with bibl.); J.A. Jungmann, La liturgie des premiers siècles jusqu'à Grégoire le Grand, Paris 1962; M. Pellegrino: "Sursum cor" nelle opera di sant'Agostino: RecAug 3 (1965) 179-204; Id., Introduzione ai Discorsi di s. Agostino, I, Rome 1979 (NBA 29), XLIX-LII; A.M. Triacca, Liturgia e catechesi nei Padri. Note metodologiche: Salesianum 47 (1979) 257-272; M. Jourjon, Catéchèse et liturgie chez les Pères: La MaisonD 140 (1979) 41-49; Dizionario liturgico, Rome 1981; E. Mazza, La mistagogia. Una teologia della liturgia in epoca patristica, Rome 1988; I Padri della Chiesa e la teologia: in dialogo con Basil Studer, A. Orazzo (ed.), Cinisello Balsamo 1995; B. Studer, Der christliche Gottesdiensteine Mysterienfeier, in Studia Anselmiana 113, Rome 1993, 27-45; Id., Die doppelte Exegese bei Origen, in Origeniana Sexta, Leuven 1995, 303-327; Id., Liturgia e Padri, in A.J. Chupungco (ed.), Scientia liturgica, I, Casale Monf. 1998, 67-106; J. Rexer, Die Festtheologie Gregors von Nyssa: ein Beispiel der reichskirchlichen Heortologie, Frankfurt a.M. 2002.

M. Pellegrino

III. Liturgy and tradition. The tradition (from tradere) is none other than the truth present explicitly and implicitly in Sacred Scripture and considered as dynamically transmitted by means of the church's magisterium. Viewed in this way, the binomial "liturgy and tradition" contains three levels already present in antiquity: the liturgical tradition; the so-called liturgical traditions and the passage of a determinate "deposit of the faith as celebrated" from generation to generation, or even from culture to culture: the tradition of the liturgy.

1. The liturgical tradition. The liturgical tradition is not so much the material transmission of the faith in guaranteed formulas, but rather the depositum fidei present both in the church's self-reflection and in the fabric of its life in a given period, vivified and celebrated by liturgical action. There is a symbiosis and an exchange between the "deposit of faith" and the liturgical actions, which can be summed up in the saying inspired by ch. 8 of the Indiculus de gratia Dei or Capitula Caelestini I (422-432) (PL 51, 205-212) and which is taken up in the De vocatione omnium gentium, I, ch. 12 (PL 51, 774ff.) of *Prosper of Aquitaine (?): legem credendi lex statuat supplicandi. Beyond the varied and sometimes contradictory interpretations of this principle (e.g., Federer and De Clerck), without doubt we celebrate what we believe, and moreover what is celebrated has its impact on faith as lived. So the liturgy is simultaneously the concrete deposit of the celebrated faith and that which, over the course of time, brings about a new and organic development. The liturgical tradition thus means simultaneously vitality and immutability. This prevents a falsification or even betrayal of what is perennial in the deposit of faith, which the church preserves and renews, transmits and celebrates in the liturgy. There is another saying which comes to us from antiquity and which has a liturgical context and object: that of *Stephen I (254–257), preserved in Ep. (74) ad Pompeium of *Cyprian (d. 258), which is usually quoted thus: nihil innovetur, quod traditum est tenete (ed. Hartel, CSEL 3/II, 799; PL 3, 1175A). So the liturgy, as it is a primary part of the Christian tradition, is substantially immutable. Progressively, the liturgical tradition did not leave to chance the choice of rites and words (form and formulas) with which to communicate and vivify its unchanging content. Thus the liturgical tradition is by its essence that which others, elsewhere, in another way, have celebrated or will celebrate. This is of course not forgetting that there are changeable elements, rites and formulas, which are subject to the authority of Christ and of the "transmitters" par excellence: the apostles and their successors. The liturgical tradition (παράδοσις) and the apostolic succession (διαδοχή) are intimately united.

2. The liturgical traditions. Drawing on the great ancient metropolitan sees (*Jerusalem, *Antioch, *Alexandria, *Constantinople; *Rome, *Milan, *Ravenna, *Aquileia etc.), linked as they were to the memory and ever-increasing authority of holy bishops, and because of the necessity of adaptation to different cultures, as well as of different forms and formulas that allowed the liturgical tradition to be authentically preserved in all its vitality, there grew up increasingly different liturgical traditions. Beyond these varying manifestations, the one common (= catholic) liturgical tradition was continued in the new peoples who submitted to the Christian faith. From the primordial unity (the single root of Jewish-Christian worship) with an inherent tendency to living growth and continual deepening of the deposit of faith, we arrive at a multiplicity of liturgical expressions. In other words, the universality of the liturgical tradition is made present in the particular contexts of the different liturgical traditions. Their formation passed through a series of phases. In both East and West, there was a period of gestation characterized by an incipient creativity, both textually and in the way that liturgical periods were structured (the weekly rhythm marked by the dies Domini; the annual one centered on Easter). For different reasons (theological exigencies, enrichment by other cultures, political developments, transmission from one language to another etc.), it gave way to a period of true and proper liturgical creativity, both in respect of texts and the structure of the liturgical cycle, as well as in the celebration of the mysteria/"sacraments," leading to the codification or crystallization of liturgical types and families, also called liturgical traditions.

We customarily divide these, acc. to their geocultural and geocultic expansion, into Eastern (*Africa E of Cyrenaica and the East) and Western (Africa W of Cyrenaica and western Europe).

A. The Eastern liturgies. These have a common feature: they use fixed *anaphoras for the celebration of the "divine liturgy" (= *Eucharist), whatever feast is being celebrated; but every rite, acc. to which the Eastern liturgies are distinguished, possesses a greater or lesser number of anaphoras. The particular rites proper to the Eastern liturgy are separated fundamentally into two groups, corresponding to the two ancient patriarchs of *Antioch and *Alexandria.

(1) The Antiochene group. Here, the structure of the anaphora has a common characteristic: the prayers of intercession for the members of the church (living or dead) conclude the anaphora, and the *epiclesis—i.e., the invocation of the *Holy Spirit to come down upon and consecrate the offering—is placed after the institution narrative and the *anamnesis and memorial. Antioch with its patriarch extended over territories of the Roman Empire and over others subject to the Persians, and, farther, as far as India. Thus the Antiochene group includes two types of rite with features which are more or less marked, but in any case are certainly numerous.

The Eastern-*Syriac type (which has experienced a sort of isolation from the rest of Christianity, given the dominion of the Persians and non-acceptance of the decisions of the Councils of *Ephesus and *Chalcedon) falls under the Nestorian rite (with the anaphoras of *Addai and Mari, *Theodore of Mopsuestia, *Nestorius). The epiclesis is placed shortly after the prayers of intercession, and not before as in the other Syriac rites. It should also be noted that the anaphora of Addai and Mari does not contain an institution narrative. The language is Syriac. This Eastern-Syriac tradition, acc. to the latest evidence, underwent a subsequent branching off into the Chaldean rite and the Syro-Malabar rite. The Eastern-Syriac rites underwent dramatic development which reached its apex in the 6th–7th c. This development was accompanied by intense evangelizing and missionary work, with the spreading of (Nestorian) Christianity as far as *China and Java.

The Western-Syriac type contains four basic rites: that properly called Antiochene, the *Maronite, the *Armenian and the *Byzantine. The Antiochene properly so called has of course Antioch at its fulcrum, which was the first center after *Jerusalem, from which Christianity spread. The liturgical *Greek of Antioch is known from the preaching of John Chrysostom, in part from the Didascalia Apostolorum (3rd c.) and also from the Apostolic Constitutions*. The liturgy of Jerusalem and of *Palestine was very similar to that of Antioch, even if the anaphora of St. James has only come down to us by a later text. Evidence of the Jerusalem liturgy may be found in the catecheses of *Cyril of Jerusalem and of his successor *John, in the Itinerarium Egeriae* (Eteriae), in the Armenian and *Gregorian lectionaries (5th–8th c.), and in the various documents of the *Melkite rite, a variation on the Antiochene tradition but with considerable influence from the Byzantine rite. In fact, after the Council of Chalcedon (451), one part of the Antiochene Church adhered to the rite of the Byzantine emperor. The *monophysite *Jacob Baradaeus (d. 578) strengthened the monophysite hierarchy with the rite named after him, Syriac-Antiochene-*Jacobite. After the invasion of the Arabs under Dionysius Bar-Salibi (d. 1171), the Antiochene rite underwent a restructuring: while the hymnography of *Ephrem was preserved, and also the ancient anaphora of St. James, under Michael the Syrian (12th c.) we find uses unknown in any other rite. With rites extraordinary both in number and quality, we note also a marked attempt at enculturation. A variant of the Syriac rite of Antioch is the Maronite rite, in use from the 7th to the 8th c. in the community of Lebanon, linked to the monastery of the monk John *Maro (known from the correspondence of John Chrysostom). He knows a very archaic anaphora of St. Peter Sarar, related to the Chaldean liturgy of Addai and Mari. After the Crusades this rite was subjected to a pronounced Latinization.

Within the orbit of the Antiochene rite we also find the *Armenian rite. The origins of the church in Armenia date to St. *Gregory the Illuminator, who gathered Christians together coming from Caesarea in Cappadocia. In 384 under the *catholicos *Sahak (Isaac) an Armenian liturgy came into being, under influence from Antioch, but also later from *Constantinople and the Eastern-Syriac tradition. With the Armenian Council of *Dvin (506), the Armenians adhered to monophysitism. Subsequently the Armenian rite opened up to Latin usages.

The *Byzantine rite, connected to Antioch and with notable affinity with the Antiochene Syriac rite, took its form in the imperial city: *Constantinople, the "new Rome." With can. 28 of the Council of Chalcedon (451), Constantinople was recognized as the center of the dioceses of *Asia, *Pontus, *Thrace and all the areas under the barbarians. The prayers of intercession occur after the epiclesis, as in all the liturgies of the Western-Syriac type. When the divine liturgy (Mass) is not celebrated, there is a liturgy of the "*presanctified." Rich in its poetic tradition and hymnography, it accorded great importance to the veneration of images after the victory over iconoclasm. Open to the spiritual traditions of the different peoples using the rite (the subdivisions of the Byzantine rite: Greek, Slavic, Georgian, Ukrainian, Albanian, Italic) resulted in a great theological richness, esp. in relation to the dogmas of the Councils of *Nicaea (325), Ephesus (431) and Chalcedon (451).

(2) The Alexandrian group. Here, the prayers of intercession come before the Sanctus in the anaphora, or rather before the thanksgiving. They possess two epicleses: a brief one before the institution narrative, and a longer one, analogous to that in the Antiochene group, after the *anamnesis or memorial.

The origins of the church in Alexandria are dated back to St. Mark. The first reliable evidence of liturgical practice in Egypt is to be found in writers from the 4th c.: *Athanasius of Alexandria, *Macarius, *Didymus, *Timothy; and even more so in the 5th c.: *Theophilus of Alexandria, *Synesius of Cyrene, *Isidore of Pelusium, *Cyril of Alexandria, *Socrates Scholasticus, *Sozomen and in the so-called Egyptian Church Order. Before the monophysite schism, Egypt shared the common language of Greek, used by the more educated. With the condemnation of Patriarch *Dioscurus at the Council of Chalcedon (451), and the decree of the same council (can. 28) which removed from Alexandria its status immediately after Rome, granting this to Constantinople, a liturgical rivalry grew up: on the one side with the Greek language, shown in the papyrus of Deir-Balizeh (7th c. but the text dates to the 6th c.), the Euchologion attributed to *Serapion (d. 362), bishop of Thmuis and friend of Athanasius, the anaphora of St. Mark, dating from the 3rd–4th c., and in fragments of prayers written on papyrus or pottery (still in the course of being discovered and read); on the other side, a liturgy in the *Coptic language, with three anaphoras: that of St. Cyril, St. *Gregory of Nazianzus and St. *Basil. The Alexandrian group includes the Coptic rite and the *Ethiopian rite. The Coptic rite, a result of the monophysite schism and so following the christological controversies, has its origin in the 5th c. In loyalty to the sometimes ambiguous christological formulas of Cyril while opposing Chalcedon, and promoting the culture of the Coptic-speaking population, it adhered to monophysitism (or more properly from their point of view, miaphysitim) and was subject to influence from the Eastern-Syriac rite. In fact, the anaphoras of St. Cyril (which are traced back to that of St. Mark), of St. Basil (Coptic, not the Byzantine anaphora of the same name) and of St. Gregory are all of the Syriac type. Among influences on the anaphora of St. Mark we should note that of St. James. For the various sacramental rites we find prayers typical of the Syriac tradition. From the 9th c. the Bohairic dialect was the official liturgical language of Alexandria, used by both Greeks and Arabs. In this liturgy there is a notable monastic influence. Among the Alexandrian group we should also count the Ethiopian rite, which is only known to us from late MSS. Ethiopia, evangelized as early as the 4th c. by monks sent from Alexandria (see *Frumentius), developed a poetically inspired version of the liturgy of Alexandria, with some very noteworthy Marian hymns and a collection of eighteen anaphoras, most of which, however, are not Alexandrian by type. The liturgical language of Ethiopia is ge'ez, today almost defunct. Contrary to the use of other liturgies, it employs many apocryphal texts. Other characteristics are four readings at Mass: the Trisagion sung immediately before the gospel; the prayer of intercession inserted before the anaphora; the multiple "Amens" with which the faithful variously intersperse the formula of consecration; the "Our Father" which follows Communion as an act of thanksgiving.

B. The Western liturgies. These include (1) the Roman rite, (2) the African rite, (3) the Ambrosian rite, (4) the Hispanic-Visigothic (Mozarabic) rite, (5) the Gallican-Gothic rite, (6) the Italic rites (Campanian-Beneventan, Aquileian, Ravennan) and (7) the Celtic rite.

(1) The Roman rite. The Roman rite was originally the liturgy in use in the metropolitan see of Rome and her suffragan dioceses. Obviously this had replaced the Greek liturgy common to the Christian world of the first two or three centuries. Typically the formation of the rite is linked to the work of Popes *Damasus (366–384), *Innocent I (402–417), *Gelasius I (492–496), *Vigilius (537–555) and Gregory the Great (590–604), all of whom were saints, and whose pastoral activity was strongly marked by the creation of liturgical texts. From information in the Liber pontificalis where we learn that Damasus decided that Latin should be used in the Roman liturgy, to the work of revising the *Latin translation of the Scriptures that Damasus entrusted to Jerome, to the compilation of the libelli missarum detailed in the so-called Leonine sacramentary (or better, the Veronese Sacramentary) from MS LXXXV of the Chapter library of Verona, to the ancient Gelasian Sacramentary, and then to the Gregorian Sacramentary, we find a great flowering of liturgical compositions that bear witness to the progressive development of the Roman rite. This rite established itself fairly rapidly throughout Italy, and then from the 8th–9th c. also beyond the Alps, first spontaneously, and then, with Charlemagne, by way of imposition. It has a set euchologion, a marked harmony of composition as well as a dense theological content, and only one eucharistic prayer, the "Roman Canon." Beyond this, the system of selecting passages for the celebration of the Word of God, the psalmody and the festal cycle—with an emphasis on the veneration of the martyrs—demonstrate the vitality of the rite. Its truly embryonic phase is visible already in the Apostolic Tradition (215); we find details of its early history in the Liber pontificalis, the formulas of the Liber diurnus and above all the letters of the popes.

(2) The African rite is the liturgy as celebrated in Latin Africa from the time of *Cyprian of Carthage (d. 258) and in the 5th c. with *Augustine (d. 430) subject to some reordering. This may be seen in his Ep. 55 and 56 ad Ianuarium. But with the invasion of the *Vandals and then the advent of the Arabs (Muslims), the African-Latin rite was not able to pass beyond the first phase of gestation to a more definitive formation. Elements of the ancient African rite can be found in the Hispanic-Visigothic and Gallican liturgies. The acts of the martyrs of Scillium (180) and the Passion of Sts. Perpetua and Felicity (203) show how early the liturgy was celebrated in Latin. Its sources are found in the writings of *Tertullian (d. after 220), Cyprian of Carthage and, as well as Augustine, in *Optatus of Milevis (d. 390?), *Victor of Vita (d. after 484), *Ferrandus of Carthage (ca. 523). *Gennadius (ca. 475) names one Voconius, bishop of Castellanum, as author of a sacramentary. The African councils of the 4th and 5th c. speak of liturgical libelli. There was also an important series of psalm prayers in use in Latin Africa.

(3) The Ambrosian rite. From the Liber notitiae sanctorum Mediolani written between 1304 and 1311, which makes use of ancient sources, we learn that Bishop *Simplicianus of Milan (d. 401) had completed the work ubi sanctus Ambrosius non impleverat and that another Milanese bishop, *Eusebius (ca. 449–452), had composed multos cantus ecclesiae following St. *Ambrose (374–397). His biographer, *Paulinus, says that it was under Ambrose (374–397) that antiphonae, hymni ac vigiliae were introduced for the first time. Ambrose made use of popular alternating liturgical chant (see Aug., Confess., 9, 7, 15) and composed other liturgical texts (see Wal. Strab., De reb. eccl. 25,22). The "*Ambrosian liturgy" is therefore that which either nominally or actually goes back to St. Ambrose, and which was used in the metropolitan of Milan (and also extended to the 10th Roman region). Besides, there was always the conviction that Ambrose was, in the Milanese church, the primus, id est maximus, metropolitanam, regens cathedram (MGH, Scrip. VIII, 37). Thus the expression in a sermon (Contra Auxentium 18) of Ambrose on the heritage he had received from his predecessors *Dionysius (ca. 349–ca. 360), *Eustorgius (d. ca. 349) and Merocles (d. ca. 316), atque omnium retro fidelium episcoporum (Ep. 20,18: PL 16, 1055), came after his death to be applied without hesitation to Ambrose himself, so much so that *Gregory the Great (590–604) addressed the clergy of Milan with the expression sancto Ambrosio deservientibus clericis (MGH, Ep. II, 266).

(4) *The Hispanic-Visigothic rite. With the invasion of the Arabs (711), the harmonious development of the Hispanic-Visigothic rite rapidly ended. This rite had two traditions: the N and the S, centered respectively on *Seville-*Toledo and *Tarragona. The tradition of the S focused on the euchological school of Seville, counting among its leaders St. *Leander of Seville (ca. 540–600), and his successor and brother St. *Isidore (d. 636), who at the 4th Council of Toledo (633) succeeded in passing fifteen canons dedicated to the liturgy and its particular local form, defending its autonomy against the Roman rite, restricting the influence of the 2nd Council of *Braga (572), which, with the authority of St. *Martin of Braga (c. 580) and the ruling of can. 12, had begun the liturgical Romanization of the Iberian Peninsula. In fact, both because of political events and owing to the other liturgical center of Toledo, the Hispanic-Visigothic liturgy saw its apogee, including the creation of books proper to the rite. The three great archbishops stand out in the Toledan school: St. *Eugenius II (646–657), St. *Ildefonsus (657–667) and St. *Julian (679–690).

The school of Tarragona in the N had its own euchological production (the oldest series of morning blessings, completuria series etc.) centering particularly on the figure of St. *Justus of Urgel, bishop in the 1st half of the 6th c. More than this, the 7th can. of the Council of *Barcelona (540) gives some evidence of the local liturgical tradition. It has links with the *Gallican liturgy of Provence.

From the 8th to 11th c. the Hispanic rite underwent a particular development (Hispanic-Mozarabic) until its suppression with the measures of the Council of Burgos (1080), called by Alfonso VI, king of Castiglia and Léon, under pressure from the legate of Pope Gregory VII.

(5) The Gallican-Gothic rite. The Gallican-Gothic rite developed in the S of *Gaul from the 5th c. until its disappearance owing to the penetration and imposition of the Roman rite under Charlemagne. It underwent various attempts at codification, shown in its liturgical books (the Gothic Missal, the Gallican Missal etc.) but never arrived at a definitive formulation. It was subject to some Eastern influences (*Lyons had as bishops St. *Pothinus [d. 177] and St. *Irenaeus [d. ca. 202], both from the East; also note the letter from the churches of *Vienne and Lyons to those of *Asia and *Phrygia), as also from Africa (consider influence of the thought of Augustine; the repercussions of African controversies in Provence etc.), and from the liturgy in use in N Italy and in *Spain. We find evidence of the rite in the various liturgical-sacramental decisions of councils and from Fathers of that area. Among them we count *Hilary of *Poitiers (d. 367), who in his Tractatus Mysteriorum (SC 19) gives evidence of special liturgical uses (perhaps found in the Gothic missal?). According to the testimony of *Gennadius of Marseille (d. 505) the presbyter *Museus of Marseille (ca. 459), initially on the order of his bishop Venerius (d. 452) and then of his successor Eustasius of Marseille, prepared a lectionary (lectiones totius anni), a responsorial (responsoria psalmorum capitula) and a sacramentary (sacramentorum egregium non parvum volumen) (see De vir. ill. 79: PL 56, 1103). From a letter of *Sidonius Apollinaris, bishop of Auvergne (Clermont-Ferrand) (d. 480–490) to Bishop Magethius (Ep., Lib. VII, 3: MGH, Auct. ant. 8), we learn that Sidonius had composed contestatiunculae, commonly identified with the Gallican contestationes (prefaces in the Roman liturgy). These would later be brought together in a libellus missarum of *Gregory of Tours (d. 594) (MGH, Scrip. rer. Merov. I, 1, 67-68). In his turn Sidonius Apollinaris says that Claudianus, a priest of Vienne (d. ca. 460), had prepared a selection of readings for liturgical commemorations for the entire year (see MGH, Auct. ant. 8, 63). We can also deduce that *Caesarius of Arles (d. 543) contributed to the formation of the Gallican liturgy. The Expositio orationis dominicae and Expositio symboli of *Venantius Fortunatus, bishop of Poitiers (597–ca. 600), relate to local usages in preparation for Christian initiation (cf. MGH, Auct. ant. 4, 1, 221-229; 253-258). Finally, in the Expositio brevis antiquae liturgiae gallicanae, attributed erroneously to St. *Germanus of Paris (d. 576), and which goes back to the 1st half of the 8th c. (Burgundy), we find the last remnants of a Gallican liturgy, now almost completely Romanized.

(6) The Italic rites. Other than the Roman and Ambrosian rites, ancient Italy had its own proper liturgical traditions, linked to particular Fathers. In the S we have the Campanian, tracing itself to *Paulinus of Nola (d. 431) (educated in Gaul and author of a Liber Sacramentorum: PL 58, 1087), characterized by a system of proper readings; as in the case of nearby *Capua, with its famous Codex Fuldensis, with set gospel pericopes, that date back to the edition prepared under *Victor, bishop of Capua, between 541 and 546. Similarly we find local uses at Benevento and at Naples. In N Italy, apart from the Ambrosian rite, we find the Aquileian rite, linked to *Rufinus (345–410), who was born and lived at Aquileia and who handed on a special form of the baptismal Credo; and to Fortunatian (d. after 360), who is said to have composed a list of passages titulis ordinatis (acc. to De vir. ill. 97 of Jerome); and also to Valerian, who wrote to Ambrose, alexandrinae ecclesiae semper ordinem dispositionemque tenuimus (PL 16, 949); and finally to the pastoral-liturgical work of *Chromatius of Aquileia (d. 407–408). This liturgy, as in the case of the other Italic rites, is still being studied, and we do not yet know what treasures may be hidden there. Gravitating around the exarchate and with its center of influence in *Ravenna, we have the Ravennan rite: attested in the Rotulus of Ravenna, it finds its high points in the work of *Peter Chrysologus (ca. 425–ca. 451) and in the Liber Sacramentorum of *Maximian (546–556).

(7) The Celtic rite. In the 6th and 7th c. the progressive Christianization of Ireland and the missionary activity of monks on the island of Great *Britain and then afterward on the Continent (see *Columbanus) were accompanied by special liturgical usages, contained in normative sources (Antiphonary of Bangor etc.) that indicate links with three other rites: the liturgies of Rome, Milan and Gaul (esp. the Missale Bobbiense). The only typically Irish-Celtic liturgical texts are the hymns, where the influence of the local poetic tradition is evident.

This great flowering of liturgical traditions in Christian Antiquity (of East and West) gave way to a process of standardization in the East (with progressive enculturation and adaptation—the activity of the brothers Cyril and Methodius, 9th c.) and in the West a diversification of various proper usages in dioceses and religious orders, at the same time moving toward unification with the Roman liturgy (the Ambrosian being an exception). In light of this, we must recognize the important creative liturgical work of the church fathers who, in faithfulness to their community in Christ, had the remarkable gift of combining a fidelity—built on prayer—to the depositum fidei, with a dynamic understanding of the concrete needs of peoples and cultures.

3. The tradition of the liturgy. The transmission of the one perennial liturgical tradition through different and changeable liturgical traditions from one generation of the faithful to another—more apparent in ages more distant from our own—saw the phenomenon of liturgical self-determination in vogue, which explains the marked proliferation of different traditions. In other words, the local churches of the larger metropolitan sees saw a progressive and organic formulation of the deposit of faith expressed in a concrete liturgical context, and lived by successive generations of Christians in these ecclesiae spread throughout the world. The faith thus celebrated had been received from the "fathers in the faith," constantly renewed by means of the Spirit of God, who renews the treasure contained in a sound vessel, but renews too the vessel and those who use it (Iren., Adv. haer. III, 24.1)

K. Federer, Liturgie und Glaube. "Legem credendi lex statuat supplicandi" (Tiro Prosper von Aquitanien). Eine Theologiegeschichtliche Untersuchung, Freiburg (Sv.) 1950; A. Baumstark, Liturgie comparée. Principes et méthodes pour l'étude historique des liturgies chrétiennes, Chevetogne-Paris [3]1953; Y.M.-J. Congar, Tradition and Traditions (Eng. tr.), New York 1967; C. Vagaggini, Il senso teologico della liturgia, Rome [4]1965, 496-508; B. Botte, Riti e Famiglie liturgiche, in A.G. Martimort (ed.), La Chiesa in preghiera. Introduzione alla liturgia, Rome [2]1966, 16-36; A.M. Triacca - S. Marsili, Introductionis generalis in liturgiam quaestiones selectae, Rome 1968, 5-42; A.M. Triacca, Introduzione generale alla liturgia, Pont. At. Ans., Rome 1971-1972, 16-27; P. De Clerck, "Lex orandi, lex credendi." Sens originel et avatars historiques d'un adage équivoque: Questions liturgiques 59 (1978) 193-212; the work contained in A.M. Triacca - A. Pistoia (eds.), La liturgie expression de la foi, Rome 1979; R.A. Taft, The Byzantine Rite, Collegeville, MN 1992; Essays on Early Eastern Eucharistic Prayers, ed. P.F. Bradshaw, Collegeville, MN 1997; A.J. Chupungco, Liturgia e inculturazione, in Scientia liturgica, Casale Monf. 1998, 345-388; S. Ferguson, Visita Nos. Reception, Rhetoric, and Prayer in a North African Monastery, New York 1999; C. Alzati, Ambrosianum mysterium: la Chiesa di Milano e la sua tradizione liturgica, Milan 2000; Liturgia, ed. D. Sartore - A.M. Triacca - C. Cibien, Cinisello Balsamo 2001 (different entries: bizantina, gallicana, liturgie locali antiche, orientali [liturgie]); E. Mazza, La celebrazione eucaristica, Bologna 2003; M. Smyth, La liturgie oubliée. La prière eucharistique en Gaule antique et dans l'Occident non romain, Paris 2003.

IV. Liturgical language. The faith of believers in Christ has had and has its supreme expression in worship, its own language and rites making up the communal liturgical celebration which has its fulcrum in the commemoration of the Lord's Supper. The offering of thanks to God—Eucharist—has always been an act at the heart of the Christian life from the very beginning of the church. Spontaneous creativity and religious enthusiasm necessarily characterized paleo-Christian assemblies, giving birth to particular forms of prayer, such as acclamations, doxologies, hymns and litanies, which were subsequently institutionalized in the rituals and sacramentaries. The origin of these forms in spontaneous prayer and their developments in the oral tradition may be glimpsed in the formulas, fixed for the first time in the Apostolic Tradition. It seems certain that the oldest Christian community had at its disposal a great number of prayers and religious songs from the biblical tradition, in the first place the Pater noster (see *Lord's Prayer) and the psalms, along with the songs and various prayers spread throughout the texts of the OT and NT. NT exegesis has of course highlighted the existence of community hymns in the letters of St. Paul, who in passages following a hymnic structure (Phil 2:6-11; Col 1:15-20; Eph 2:14-16) were inspired by hymns used in the liturgy. *Tertullian, writing at the very end of the 2nd c., says that during liturgical assemblies improvised songs were sung under the inspiration of the *Holy Spirit, or springing from the creative genius of those present (Apol. 39,18). The liturgical refrains "Amen" and "Alleluia" (we find an implicit reflection of this latter cry of exultation and joy in Rev. 9:1ff.), the Kyrie eleison (see Ps. 6:2; 9:13 etc) and the Trisagion ("Holy, Holy, Holy, Lord God of Sabaoth!" (see Is 6:3) all take their origin from the OT tradition. Scripture also inspired Christian doxologies, expressions of praise which in the Hebrew tradition concluded certain prayers, and which were adopted by the earliest Christians for use in euchological contexts, as well as hymns, psalms, litanies and eucharistic *anaphoras. It was for the president, in the early Christian tradition, to improvise prayers addressed to God in the name of the community, drawing on religious sentiment, charismatic inspiration and the enthusiasm of the community in choosing the most appropriate words adapted to the particular celebration. The Apostolic Tradition is the first evidence of normative written euchological liturgical formulas, but it is thought that for a long time the written text provided only a commonly received guideline on which to base personal formulations, which were continually adapted to the assemblies and the individual circumstances. Adoration and prayer were promoted in this shaping of liturgical language acc. to the biblical and ecclesiastical background. Looking at the euchological formulas of the Apostolic Tradition and in other liturgical compilations, we can identify some common traits of liturgical language as such:

1. A tendency toward conservatism, inspired by the biblical tradition, with recourse to euchological and doxological formulas derived from both OT and NT, and by images and metaphors from that tradition; the adoption of particular terms of the biblical and Christian tradition. (In other words, every religious culture based on religious texts tends to make "sacred" the languages in which that text is written: this is the case with Hebrew in the synagogue liturgy in the Jewish Diaspora, with Greek in the LXX or the books of the NT, and with Byzantine Greek or Old Church Slavonic in the Eastern churches.)

2. The use of foreign vocabulary that in the traditions of the community had acquired some particular religious significance. (In the Greek and Latin liturgical languages, for instance, we find maranatha, hosanna, alleluia, amen, sabaoth, Kyrie.)

3. Stylization in the structure of sentences and figures of speech, with a predilection for both synonymous and antithetical parallelism, the anaphora, paronomasia. The first generation of Western Christians used Greek, and only in the 4th c. did the church of Rome substitute Greek with Latin in the anaphora of the Mass in those parts of the liturgical celebration directed at the ethical-religious instruction or edification of the faithful. So it was the didactic parts of the celebration (readings, homilies, litanies, standard repeated phrases) that were first Latinized. In these parts of the liturgy, doxologies, acclamations and hymns in the Latin language were therefore formed with their roots in the Bible and the language of the Christian communities. But a tendency was very quickly established to base the euchological formulas, properly so called, on solemn hieratic texts, traditional in ancient Roman prayer. In the canon of the Mass cited in *Ambrose of Milan's De Sacramentis one can clearly identify the tendency to use stylistic devices from old Roman sacred language; but it is above all in the so-called Sacramentarium gelasianum that the stylistic forms of this prayer are applied systematically, determining that style of solemn hieratic prayer that would shape the euchological forms of the Roman liturgy for centuries: i.e., a liking for precise juridical formularies, a constant striving for measured cadences in the structure of sentences, a tendency to build up synonyms, the presence of antithetic and synonymous parallelism, and an attempt to make the language sonorous by alliteration and rhyme. But if the stylistic structure of the prayer was influenced by the sacral tradition of Rome, the vocabulary and images of the Christian liturgical language were combined with the tradition of ancient Christian prayer, so that liturgical Latin remained faithful to Christian Latin, in fact becoming an important form of it. Only when paganism was definitively defeated and little more than a historical memory, without ethical or religious or indeed affective resonances, was liturgical Latin conformed to the classical tradition, accepting both terms and metaphors originally peculiar to pagan religion.

Latin liturgy may be divided into three groups: (1) the biblical Latin of the different versions of the Scriptures in that language, translated from Hebrew or Greek, keeping so close to the Latin original, sometimes resulting in somewhat forced syntax; (2) ritual Latin, used in the texts for the administration of the sacraments, in the celebration of Mass, in other rites and blessings, in the celebration of the divine office or Liturgy of the Hours, of the carmina, with a great variety of expression and effort to express the sublime reality of the religio nova; and (3) martyrological, hagiographical Latin, found in the Acts and passion accounts of the martyrs, or in the Lives of the saints: this can with reason be considered part of liturgical Latin because these acts and legends in general could also be read in communal worship, concluded with appropriate doxologies and acclamations. Liturgical Latin may therefore be seen as the finest offering of Christian Latin. Its language is always simple but reaches high points of perfection and musicality in its prefaces and collects, where the words are skillfully chosen and used to obtain the correct rhythm or the phrase or cursus, called planus ("level") if of the type sèrvitus tènet, omnìpotens Dèus, règna caelòrum, i.e., a pentasyllabic line as if a cretic followed by a trochee; called tardus ("late"), if of the type èsse cognòvimus, i.e., a six-syllable line as if composed of two cretics; called velox ("quick") if of the type glòriam perducàmur, Dòminum confitémur, i.e., a seven-syllable line as if with a cretic followed by two trochees/spondees; and called trispondaic if of the type tèrra veneràtur; dùce revelàsti, i.e., a six-syllable line as if formed by a paeon followed by a trochee.

In liturgical Latin we very frequently find the rhetorical device of the hyperbaton put to musical effect: Da, quaesumus, omnipotens Deus, hanc tuis fidelibus voluntatem; accepta reddantur officia; perpetuo, Deus, Ecclesiam tuam pio tuere favore; ad resurrectionis perveniat claritatem. Anaphora is also employed: digna omnes intellegentia comprehendant, quo lavacro abluti, quo spiritu regenerati, quo sanguine sunt redempti (2nd Sunday after Easter). Equally frequent is the chiasmus: Deus, per quem nobis et redemptio venit et praestatur adoptio (5th Sunday after Easter).

On the great tradition of liturgical Latin we may paraphrase what Paul VI said with regard to the restored Divine Office in the Constitution Laudis canticum: "The church has continued to raise up on the earth, with constancy and faithfulness which stretch across the centuries, with a marvelous variety of forms, that song of praise which is sung without end in heaven and which has been brought to earth by Christ, the High Priest."

G. Manz, Ausdrucksformen der lateinischen Liturgiesprache, Freiburg i.Br. 1941; M. Righetti, Storia Liturgica, I, Milan 1945; Chr. Mohrmann, Quelques observations sur l'évolution stylistique du Canon de la Messe romaine: VChr 4 (1950) 1-19; Id., Le latin liturgique: La MaisonD 23 (1950) 5-30; Id., Sakralsprache und Umgangssprache: Archiv für Liturgiewis 10 (1968) 344-354; F. Di Capua, Il ritmo nella prosa liturgica e il "Praeconium Paschale," in Scritti Minori, I, Rome 1959, 441-459; Id., Preghiere liturgiche. Poesia ed Eloquenza, in ibid. II, Rome 1959, 86-115; A. Quacquarelli, Retorica e liturgia antenicena, Rome 1960; L. Leone, Latinità cristiana, Lecce 1971, 85-108; A. Bastiaensen, Sur quelques oraisons du Missel Romain, in Mélanges Christine Mohrmann. Nouveau recueil, Utrecht 1973, 140-163; Ph. Bernard, Les latins de la liturgie (antiquité tardive et Moyen-Âge): Vingt-cinq années de recherches (1978-2002): ALMA 60 (2002) 77-170.

V. Loi - B. Amata

V. Improvisational prayer. In respect to the formulation of prayers (= euchology) and rites, the paleo-Christian era has two basic tendencies, which in turn relate to different periods: that of creativity, spontaneity and liberty of liturgical expression, followed by a gradual linguistic and ritual formulization resulting in fixed forms and formulas. Of course the two periods cannot be clearly distinguished. The first period (1st–3rd/4th c.) saw improvisational prayer, spontaneous creativity and varied forms of proliferation of rites. Although the different traditions all came from a common Jewish-Christian origin, in adapting to new cultures into which Christianity came they took shape under the influence of the particular religious instincts of the converted peoples. Similarly, creativity in prayer, with the movement from Aramaic to *Greek, to *Coptic and *Syriac, and with that from Greek to *Latin, progressively gave way—for various reasons—to a period of compilation and standardization of written formulas. This then is the second period (3rd/4th–6th/7th c.), that of the production of set prayers, in the context of the great Latin-Roman and Greek-Eastern literary traditions, the influence of the great Eastern Fathers (*Basil, *John Chrysostom etc.) and Western (*Ambrose of Milan = *Ambrosian liturgy; *Leander = Hispanic-Visigothic liturgy; *Leo, *Gelasius, *Gregory = Roman liturgy; *Peter Chrysologus = Ravennan liturgy; *Chromatius = Aquileian liturgy), as well as of the principal metropolitan sees (*Jerusalem, *Antioch, *Alexandria, *Constantinople; *Rome, *Milan, *Seville, *Lyons, etc). We obviously have nothing more than indirect evidence of the existence of improvisational prayer. We read of "glossolalia" (see 1 Cor 14:1-33), a free form of spontaneous formulation of prayer in (liturgical?) assemblies; of traditional forms of Jewish origin, but adopted now in a new spirit (see Eph 5:18-20). These forms completely free of set schema gave way over time to fixed forms, as seen in the (hymn) texts of prayers found in the NT (see Lk 1–2; Eph 1:5-14; Phil 2:5-11). While the Scriptures remained the main source of liturgical prayer (= scriptural *centonization—see also Eus., Vita Constantini IV, 34-37: PG 20, 1182-1187; GCS I, 130-132), "prophets" were allowed to give thanks for as long as they wished (Didache 10, 7 as against 1 Cor 14:26, 32-33). We should not understand that such spontaneity was absolute. It seems that Jewish formulas provided a certain inspiration (Shema; Shemoneh Eshreh; the berakoth; see Mt 11:25-26; Jn 1:41; 1 Cor 14:16) as the times of prayer proper to the synagogue were observed (see Acts 2:46; 3:1; 10:9; 16:25). We may be quite sure that the first fixed formulas, varied as they were, took their root from the symbola fidei used in a liturgical-baptismal context (see DS 1-76). The same may be said of doxologies and acclamations (see E. Norden, Agnostos Theos, 240-250) and fragments of early liturgical formulas in the "Acts of the Martyrs," in inscriptions and in the works of the Fathers. The first legal document we have describing Christian worship is the Apostolic Tradition* (ed. Botte = LQF, 39) (ca. 215), which after giving a text for an *anaphora (ch. 4) adds (ch. 9): "The bishop should give praise as we have indicated. But it is not necessary that he says the very words we have provided, as if he had to recall them from memory, when he is giving thanks to God. Each should pray acc. to his own capacity. If someone succeeds in praying solemnly and at length, it is good. If another prays briefly, he is not to be prevented from doing so, provided his prayer is right and conforms to orthodoxy."

It was indeed the question of orthodoxy which played a decisive part in bringing improvisation in liturgical prayers to an end in favor of fixed formulas.

It is common to find canonical norms presented as attempts to suppress improvisation in liturgical prayer, in the first place those from the Council of *Hippo of 393, dispositions included later in those of the Council of Carthage in 397 (can. 21-28; Mansi 3, 922-933). In the same tone we find those from the 2nd Council of Milevis of 416 (can. 12; Mansi 4, 330). That the practice of improvisation continued even while the first liturgical libelli were circulating (e.g., those mentioned in the so-called Sacramentarium Veronense [Leonianum]) we learn from, e.g., the Vita of *Gregory of Tours written by *Sidonius Apollinaris (d. 480). Gregory, finding himself without a libellus for the celebration, instead improvised and by so doing aroused the amazement of those present, not so much by his improvising (which must have still been a common practice) but because to those assisting it seemed like hearing an angel (MGH, Script. rer. Merov. I, 1, 67-68; see another episode in PL 71, 1074-1077). It is thus better to see in the African canonical rulings not so much a desire to put an end to improvisation but rather to regulate a practice implemented and recognized as good, from both pastoral and dogmatic points of view; so that only a bishop or priest who was a frater instructior (can. 21: Council of Carthage), prudentior (can. 12: Council of Milevis) or doctior (Aug., Bapt. VI, 25,47: CSEL 51, 323; see also Id., Contra litt. Petil. 2,30,68: CSEL 52, 2, 58) could improvise compositions which were competent in literary terms, as well as dogmatically orthodox and acceptable stylistically. The composition of prayers thus remained linked to authors whose "words" were conformed to the "holy words" with which the sacra must be celebrated. The anonymity which surrounds the majority of ancient liturgical compositions and the fact that they were often referred to the great Fathers (Ambrose, John Chrysostom, Leo, Gelasius, Gregory) (thus the law of excellence) reflect the same perspective that we find in the canonical dispositions.

Considering this fact of improvisation and the progressive movement to a fixing of forms and formulas, we recognize an aspect of the early liturgy which, without its being realized, followed a practice already typical in the synagogue. At the same time, the biblical inspiration of the first fixed texts reflects a Jewish practice adopted by primitive Christianity. However, improvisation also indicates the process of taking formulas out of their Jewish context, granting them in the Christian community a new meaning "in spirit and truth." This phenomenon, then, was intended both to preserve and advance the authentic Christian tradition. At the beginning this was done by apparently self-contradictory references to "improvisation" at the same time as "faithfulness to the biblical text." This is because, contemporaneous with enculturation of the deposit of faith, there was the exigency of being faithful to the tradition. This was in fact the motivation both for improvisation and for the process of establishing fixed normative texts.

E. Bourque, Étude sur les sacramentaires romains. I. Les textes primitifs, Rome 1948, 1-77; T. Klauser, Kleine Abendländische Liturgiegeschichte, Bonn 1965, 11-48; 180-182; A.M. Triacca, "Improvvisazione" o "fissismo" eucologico. Asterisco ad un periodico episodio di pastorale liturgica: Salesianum 32 (1970) 149-164; L. Bouyer, L'improvisation liturgique dans l'Église Ancienne: La MaisonD 111 (1972) 7-19; C. Vogel, Introduction aux sources de l'histoire du Culte Chrétien au Moyen Âge, Spoleto [2]1975, 20-42; E. Cattaneo, Il culto cristiano in Occidente. Note storiche, Rome [3]1978, 17-183; H.A.J. Wegman, Geschichte der Liturgie im Westen und Osten, Regensburg 1979, 15-46; B. Neunheuser, Storia della liturgia attraverso le epoche culturali, Rome [2]1983, 15-55; A. Budde, Improvisation im Eucharistiegebet. Zur Technik freien Betens in der Alten Kirch: JbAC 44 (2001) 127-141.

A.M. Triacca

VI. Liturgy of the Hours. The prayer of the Hours is witnessed to in the daily life of Christians, in the organization of monastic communities and in certain sanctuaries.

Precise evidence of the Liturgy of the Hours as recommended or imposed on all Christians goes back to the beginning of the 3rd c. *Tertullian speaks of morning or evening prayer as legitimae orationes—i.e., as prayers which conform to a law, or at least to an established usage. He also makes mention of the prayer of Terce, Sext and None (De oratione 24-45). At the same period, the Apostolic Tradition* offers a true timetable of daily prayer: prayer in the morning, imposed on all the faithful, the prayers of Terce, Sext and None, corresponding to the crucifixion and death of Christ, the evening prayer before the night's rest, and then the prayer during the course of the night itself, linked with the idea of the "rest" of the whole universe (Tr. Apost. 41). A little later, *Cyprian of Carthage gives a spiritual theology of the times of prayer: acc. to him, the triple series of Terce, Sext and None evokes not only the moments of the crucifixion but also the mystery of the *Trinity; morning and evening prayer accompany the rising and the setting of the sun, because for the Christian "Christ is the true son and the true day"; finally, prayer during the night responds to the gospel call to stay awake (De oratione 34-36). In this way, over the course of the 3rd c. the Western church was already establishing, at least for fervent Christians, an orarium of prayer, connected to the natural cycle of day and night, to the paschal mystery and, to a certain extent, to the trinitarian mystery. For the East we find similar evidence in *Clement of Alexandria (Strom. 7,7) and *Origen (De orat. 12).

Nascent monasticism, which attempted to realize the Christian ideal to the most perfect extent possible, took up and then expanded this orarium. On the one hand, eremitic monks were striving, in meditation and prayer, to live according to the recommendation of St. Paul to "pray constantly," and therefore had no need to keep to certain hours of prayer. As the abbot Isidore declared: "When I was young, in my cell, there were no limits to prayer: day and night were my times of prayer" (Isid., Apophthegmata 4: PG 65, 220). *Cenobitic monasticism, on the other hand, required a structured approach. In the monastery of *Pachomius, as we learn from the rule translated by *Jerome, the brothers came together to pray in the morning, at midday and in the evening; before going to bed, they recited in each "house" an office which contained six prayers and psalms; finally, in the course of the night, everyone came together for a solemn synaxis, including psalmody, prayers and readings (Regula 20-28; ed. A. Boon, Pacomiana Latina, Louvain 1932, 17-20).

St. *Basil, whose system of the cenobitic life was largely inspired by the Pachomian rule, expanded the pattern of conventual prayer, with eight offices, rather than five; after the first prayers at dawn, the monks gathered for Terce, Sext and None; at the end of the day they celebrated a synaxis of thanksgiving; before going to sleep, they recited psalm 90; at midnight they rose for an act of common prayer; they came together again, before dawn, for final evening prayers (Reg. fus. 37,3-5). This importance given to liturgical prayer seems to be a consequence of the centrality of the "social" in Basil's monastic conception: for him the community is not so much the means that allows the spiritual life of each to flourish, but rather the end toward which the activity of each must be directed: the members are at the service of the monastic community.

A monk of the name Alexander lived at first as a hermit on the banks of the Euphrates and then founded in *Constantinople, at the end of the 4th c., a monastery of 300 monks. He may be regarded as the champion of the laus perennis: taking to the letter the command to "pray constantly," he divided his numerous community into three groups who alternated their prayers in the church, and thus established a literally continuous celebration day and night. For this unbroken act of praise these observant monks took the name of "*acoemetae" (those who never sleep).

In the West, the model of St. Benedict is rightly called a balanced form of observance. Choral office held only a limited place in Benedictine monasticism. Each day, in addition to the night vigils, Benedict prescribed the seven hours now traditional: Lauds, Prime, Terce, Sext, None, Vespers, Compline (Regula 16). Each of these day offices contained three or four psalms, a brief reading and a prayer; the vigils were composed of two nocturns, each of which included six psalms and a biblical or patristic reading. Liturgical prayer played an essential role in the life and cohesion of the community; it nourished and expressed the spiritual life of the monk; at the same time, it left time for liberty in private prayer. Thus we see the role played by monasticism in the development of the Liturgy of the Hours. It did not invent a new timetable of prayer, but rather reinforced and organized traditional practices, inspired by both the natural rhythm of day and night and by that of work and sleep; it tested this form of prayer and "canonized" it through its own experience. This prayer of the hours, whose character and breadth correspond well to the monastic life, would later be commended or imposed, without those changes which would prove necessary to the clergy who served in the churches.

About the mid-4th c. some great sanctuaries, visited by numerous pilgrims, instituted a form of liturgical prayer corresponding to the significance of the place, as well as to the desire of the faithful to pray there with special fervor.

Of the daily liturgy of *Jerusalem we are very well informed thanks to the Diary of a Pilgrimage of *Egeria who was in the Holy Land from 393 to 396. Every day in the church of the Holy Sepulchre (Anastasis) four offices were celebrated. Before the cock crowed, there was a vigil office which lasted until daybreak, in which men and women religious, intrepid pilgrims, and a few priests and deacons participated; they alternated psalms, hymns and antiphons; at dawn, the morning hymns were intoned and the bishop arrived with his clergy: he said a prayer, gave his blessing, then concluded the office. Shorter but similar offices were held for Sext and None, also with the bishop present at their conclusion. At the end of the afternoon there was the lucernare: all the faithful carried lit candles and sang psalms; after the arrival of the bishop, a deacon began a long universal prayer; the liturgy concluded at nightfall with a procession to Calvary (Diary, ch. 24).

In 4th-c. Rome, it seems that the Daily Office was celebrated in the then recent basilicas of St. Peter, St. Paul, and in the Lateran, by communities that served those churches and ministered to pilgrims. From the 5th c., monasteries were established next to these great basilicas to celebrate the liturgy solemnly and frequently, responding to the expectations of pilgrims. In the titular and parochial churches, however, only Lauds and Vespers were celebrated, and the Roman clergy protested when, in the 6th c., the pope wanted to impose the daily celebration of Vigils. The clergy of Rome argued, with reason, for a distinction to be made between the office of the monks, that intended for pilgrims and that appropriate for parish priests.

From this brief historical summary we can draw some conclusions. The celebration of the liturgy implies a theology of time: cosmic or universal time, human time, salvific time. The organization of the Daily Office corresponds to the rhythm of life and to the ecclesial function of the particular community that celebrates it. In the time of the Fathers, the Liturgy of the Hours was not understood as a clerical obligation but rather as an activity necessary for every fervent Christian community. In general the Bible and esp. the psalms, notwithstanding their pre-Christian origin, constitute the essential element of this dialogue between humanity and God.

M. Marx, Incessant Prayer in Ancient Monastic Literature, Rome 1946; J.M. Hanssens, Aux origines de la prière liturgique. Nature et genèse de l'office des matines: AG 57, Rome 1952; I. Hausherr, Comment priaient les Pères: RAM 32 (1956) 33-58, 284-296; J. Pinell, El Oficio hispánico-visigótico: Hispania Sacra 10 (1957) 385-427; P. Salmon, L'office divin: histoire de la formation du Bréviaire (Lex Orandi 27), Paris 1959; A. Hamann, Le rythme de la prière chrétienne ancienne: La MaisonD 64 (1960) 6-28; B. Botte, Les heures de prière dans la Tradition Apostolique et les documents dérivés, in La prière des heures (Lex orandi 35), Paris 1963, 101-115; O. Rousseau, La prière des moines au temps de Jean Cassien: ibid., 117-138; B. Capelle, L'Opus Dei dans la Règle de S. Benoît: ibid., 139-147; J. Mateos, L'office monastique à la fin du IVe siècle: Antioche, Palestine, Cappadoce: OC 47 (1963) 53-88; C. Vagaggini - G. Penco, La preghiera nella Bibbia e nella tradizione patristica e monastica, Rome 1964; P. Salmon, La prière des heures (du Ier au Xe s.), in A.G. Martimort, L'Église en prière, Paris [3]1965, 811-858; J. Gelineau, Les Psaumes à l'époque patristique: La MaisonD 135 (1978) 99-116; Ph. Rouillard, Prière et communauté dans la Règle de S. Benoît: Notitiae 16 (1980) 309-318; Id., Tempi e ritmi della preghiera nel monachesimo antico: Vita consacrata 16 (1980) 659-669; R. Taft, La liturgie des heures en Orient et en Occident, Turnhout 1991; M. Ajjoub, Livre d'heures du Sinaï, SC 486, Paris 2004.

PH. ROUILLARD

VII. Monastic liturgy. The term liturgy needs to be understood in the light of the process of historical development, taking many centuries, which led to the clear distinction established by the Council of Trent, and so familiar to us, between liturgical and nonliturgical. In the same way, in using the term monastic we must remember that the form of monasticism in different places and periods varies significantly.

The invitation of Jesus to "pray always" (Lk 18:1) and the Pauline exhortation to "pray constantly" (1 Th 5:17) were applied to the monastic life as a call and invitation to an ideal of continual prayer. Thus to pray constantly was for *Benedict of Nursia as it was for *John Cassian (Conl. 9,2,1) the purpose of the monastic life. This way of understanding and living the practice of prayer we find already in nascent form in the first generations of Christians. A vivid awareness of their koinōnia* ("communion") in Christ was expressed not only in their lives but also in their assemblies of prayer, where the ecclesia manifested—with liberty of form—its own nature and its needs.

In the earliest church, the liturgy consisted mainly of the Eucharist, and until the 4th c. there were no fixed texts, places or vestments. We find the first liturgical formulas in the Didache must be read in the light of the affirmation of *Justin Martyr (1 Apol. 67,5): whoever presides at the liturgical sacrifice (θυσία) must pray "according to his capacities." The formularies of the Apostolic Tradition* (ca. 215) recognize the right of the bishop to use the text as a model, therefore with liberty, rather than as an obligatory formula (n. 10). From the mid-4th c. to the end of the 7th c. formulas came to be fixed, thus bringing into existence the varied liturgies of the East and the West: the Antiochene liturgy, with two different forms in Greek, the Eastern-Syriac and the Western-Syriac, attested in the preaching of *John Chrysostom, Theodore of Mopsuestia, by the Didascalia Apostolorum (3rd c.), and by the Apostolic Constitutions* (the Jerusalem liturgy, very near to the Antiochene, is characterized by pilgrimages to the holy places, as witnessed esp. in the Pilgrimage of Egeria and the catecheses of *Cyril of Jerusalem); the Egyptian liturgy, attested by *Clement of Alexandria, *Origen, *Athanasius, *Cyril of Alexandria and by the Sacramentary of Serapion (4th c.); the Roman rite, attested from the end of the 4th c. and contained in the Leonine, old Gelasian and Gregorian sacramentaries, as well as in the Liber pontificalis; the Ambrosian rite; the Mozarabic rite; the Gallican rite, of which we find details in *Caesarius of Arles and Gregory of Tours.

Apart from the question of the extent of eucharistic participation and corresponding sensibility in the early monks (see E. Dekkers, Les anciens moines cultivaitent-ils la liturgie?: La MaisonD 51 [1957] 31-54), we know that both *anchorites and *cenobites shared the eucharistic faith of the ecclesial community of the time (see Cassian, De inst. coenob. III, 2,1; III, 3,8-10; V, 26,1). The case of *stylites and *dendrites and of monks who passed several decades without human contact did not represent the normal form of monastic life, where there was an invitation to communicate daily (Hist. mon. 8,56-57.59-60). Monastic communities that did not have a priest among their members participated in the Eucharist of the local church: this was the system adopted by *Pachomius at the beginning of the founding of his community, by *Jerome for his community and for the community of *Paula at Bethlehem. Later, in order to overcome the difficulties which arose, priests from among the local clergy were invited to celebrate the Eucharist in monasteries. When priests wanted to become monks, reactions varied: the Rule of the Master and the Rule of the Four Fathers did not accept priests; Pachomius and Benedict did accept them, but it is not clear if they were able to celebrate Mass; sometimes monk-priests would not exercise their priesthood propter verecundiam et humilitatem (Girol., Ep. 51,1). Later we find increasingly that some monks would receive orders, and this practice became general.

The fathers of the church are unanimous in affirming and developing the idea that the whole Christian life should be a prayer (see Tertull., De ieiun. 10; De orat. 23; Cypr., De orat. 35; Clem. Alex., Strom. 6,12; 7,7), but it was also necessary to consecrate particular moments to prayer acc. to the divisions of the day which characterized social life (see Tertull., De orat. 25,23; Clem. Alex., Strom. 7,7; Cypr., De orat. 34). These times of prayer were understood increasingly as connected with the mysteries of the life of Christ (see Apos. Con. 8,34; Athan., De virgin. 12.16.20; Cass., De instit. coenob. 3,3; Basil., Reg. fus. 37), and toward the end of the 4th c. the schema of daily prayer was divided into seven separate services (see Ps 119:164); this practice was recommended in the Apostolic Tradition even for the individual prayer of the laity. Under the determining influence of monasticism this division shaped the structure of the Divine Office (Bened., Reg. 16). The Opus Dei (Bened., Reg. 19) is a servitium sanctum, paying to God his due without expectation of recompense, offering thanksgiving and praise, the soul filled with those sentiments which instinctively well up before the one who is incomprehensible, holy, mysterious, a source of spiritual fascination—sentiments of adoration and compunction, joy and tears, in a word ferventissimus amor, of reverentia sanctissimae Trinitatis. The office was not only a monastic phenomenon; parishes and cathedrals also had their own cursus, acc. to their particular needs. The offices of different churches, existing as early as the 3rd c. in Rome, are amply documented by *Hilary, *Ambrose of Milan, *Augustine of Hippo and *Paulinus. The report we have of the journey of *Egeria tells us of the Jerusalem liturgy at the end of the 4th c., a liturgy in which hymns and antiphons occupy an important place.

O. Casel, Λειτουργία-munus: OC 3,7 (1932) 289-302; E. Raitz von Frentz, Der Weg des Wortes "Liturgie" in der Geschichte: EphLit 55 (1941) 74-80; N. Lewis, Leiturgia and Related Terms: GRBS 3 (1960) 175-184; J. Mateos, L'office monastique à la fin du IV^e^ siècle: Antioche, Palestine, Cappadoce: OC 47 (1963) 53-88; var. aus., La preghiera nella Bibbia e nella tradizione patristica e monastica, Rome 1964; E. von Severus, Monastische Liturgie: Archiv für Liturgiewissenschaft 9 (1965) 278-319; B. Calati, La preghiera nel medioevo monastico occidentale: La preghiera, II, Milan-Rome 1967, 435-503; A. Veilleux, La théologie de l'abbatiat cénobitique et ses implications liturgiques: Vie Spir. suppl. 86 (1968) 351-393; Id., La liturgie dans le cénobitisme pacômien au IV^e^ siècle: SA 57 (1968); E. von Severus, Monastische Liturgie: Archiv für Liturgiewissenschaft 15 (1973) 201-219; J. Gribomont, Rome et les moines: La MaisonD 115 (1973) 135-140; A. de Vogüé, Le prêtre et la communauté monastique dans l'antiquité: La MaisonD 115 (1973) 61-69; A. Hamman, Liturgie, prière et famille dans les trois premiers siècles chrétiens: Questions Liturgiques 2-3 (1976) 81-98; J. Dubois, Office des Heures et Messe dans la Tradition monastique: La MaisonD 135 (1978) 61-82; G. Penco, Il monachesimo fra spiritualità e dottrina, Milan 1991, 125-141; LTK[3] 6, 972-984; Dizionario Enciclopedico del Medioevo 2, 1066-1068 (P.-M. Gy).

M.G. Bianco

VIII. Eastern liturgical books. If by a liturgical book we mean a book containing the official texts for the celebration of public Christian worship, and if a liturgical book of the primitive church is one used up to the first eight or nine centuries of the Christian era, then of such works we possess almost nothing today. This does not mean that we do not know many things about the Eastern rites, or at least of some of them, over the course of those centuries; but few of the sources we have to reconstruct the liturgy of that epoch may truly be classified as liturgical books in the strict sense of the term.

The primitive liturgical prayers were for the most part extempore, improvised for a particular occasion and assembly. From *Justin Martyr we know that the president of the eucharistic assembly improvised the great prayer "according to his capacity." There can be no doubt that this improvisation followed a generally recognized outline and indeed certain rules, the application of which nonetheless was subject to marked variation; and every so often a leitourgos would write down the prayers that he was accustomed to using: examples of this are the *Apostolic Tradition at the beginning of the 3rd c., *Serapion of Thmuis during the 4th c. and the anonymous author of the very old version of the *anaphora known to us as the Eastern Syriac prayer of Sts. *Addai and Mari, probably of the 3rd c. But at first, and then indeed for a long time, these written sources were not "official liturgical texts" in the modern sense, but simply something distinct from the improvisations from which they originated. According to Anton Baumstark, "These improvisations owed their origin to the actions of individuals and did not go beyond the limits of the community. At the most, it might be possible to find in certain communities, as the tradition incontrovertibly attests, editions of liturgical texts which owed their existence to the person who had prepared or edited them. This is not only the case for those responsible for the liturgy in certain metropolitan or patriarchal sees, such as *Basil of Caesarea, *Nestorius of Constantinople or *Severus of Antioch, but also of bishops of smaller cities, like *Serapion of Thmuis, *Theodore of Mopsuestia and *John of Bostra, contemporary of Severus of Antioch. Worship as celebrated in the great ecclesiastical centers continued for a long time to have an exclusively local character; . . . in both Rome in the middle of the 5th c. and in Jerusalem in the 8th c. the liturgical text is so closely linked to the place that it could not have been used elsewhere" (Comp. Lit. 18). The development of a fixed liturgy from that which was extempory, and therefore of the preparation of "official liturgical texts," seems to have been connected with the growing need to delegate to priests the function which had in ancient times belonged to the bishop as president of the assembly. The collection of prayers of Serapion, whatever may be its real origin, is a good example of the type of book which had to be produced in this situation: these would come to be called later by the Greek word euchologion. In the later Byzantine rite, the euchologion contained those parts of the sacramental rites, and other services, required by officiating ministers. The oldest Byzantine euchologion which has survived is the so-called Codex Barberinus (Vat. Barb. Gr. 336 [III, 55]), which almost certainly goes back to the beginning of the 9th c.

From the considerable number of books needed today for the celebration of the Byzantine Divine Office, the horologion, containing the ordinary of the office, and which forms only one part of the Temporale and Sanctorale, may be found in just one MS falling within our period and definition, and that is no older than the 9th c. (Sinai gr. 864: SC 486). The triodion (properly triodion katanyktikon), containing special offices for Lent and Holy Week, is found in three MSS, one certainly of the 10th c. (Crypt. Δ.β. VIII [300]) and two of the 10th or 11th c. (Sinai 734-735 and Sinai 755); the last-cited also contains the pentekostarion (properly triodion charmosynon), which gives the rites for the Easter period. Of the sticherarion (essentially a compendium of antiphons called stichera) there is only one MS which can with certainty be dated before 1000 (Crypt. E.α. VII [292]). Much of the material contained in these and in other similar liturgical books can also be found in older sources, but the more recent certainly cannot be considered as "liturgical books" acc. to our definition.

The kanonarion or typikon (the somewhat later name but much more commonly used) corresponds almost exactly to the Western ordo (in the ancient, not the modern sense): it is a list of liturgical services for the use of those who participate in them, gathering into one book all the rubrics of the various services for each day over the course of the year. As such, it is without doubt the most important of the various liturgical books for the historian trying to reconstruct the early Christian liturgy, and thus demands particular attention. Fortunately it is possible to map the development of the typikon with some precision, despite its complexity, from the end of the 4th c. onward. In the East the original stratum reflects the influence of Jerusalem. We have valuable information on the usage in Jerusalem in the late 4th c. from a document which, although it is not in any sense a liturgical book, is nonetheless important and worthy of mention: the Pilgrimage of Egeria or Travels of Egeria, a classic example of the way in which a great part of our knowledge of ancient liturgy derives from nonliturgical sources.

We have two further documents which are justly described as *Armenian and *Georgian lectionaries. (It would be neither useful nor appropriate to try to distinguish between kanonarion or typikon and a lectionary.) From its appearance, the first would seem to be datable to the 9th or 10th c. (Paris, Bibl. Nat. Arm. 44; and Erévan 985), but the experts agree that these represent much older rites; this applies also to a different MS of 1192 (Codex Jerus. Armen. 121). The same observation applies to the MS of the Georgian lectionary (Paris, Bibl. Nat. Georg. 3, 10th–11th c.; Sinai 37, end of the 10th c.; Mestia 635, 10th c.; Kala, 10th c.).

A MS from *Jerusalem of 1122 (Pat. Hier. Hagios Stauros 43) also clearly reflects rites from a much earlier period. The document also shows the influence upon the Jerusalem liturgy of the Great Church of *Constantinople.

There are two MSS of the oldest version we have of the "Typikon of the Great Church" (of Hagia Sophia in Constantinople): Pat. Hier. Hagios Stauros 40, of the mid-10th c., and Patmos 266, said by Baumstark to be partly from the beginning and partly from the end of the 9th c., but dated by Mateos (and more probably accurately) to the end of the 9th or the beginning of the 10th c. This typikon is of very great importance, being the most substantial individual source we have of the "cathedral" rite of Constantinople. Of the three monastic traditions which had a marked influence on the Byzantine rite—Sabaite, Sinaite and Studite—there is no typikon extant from our period, although much can be reconstructed from later documents if it is connected with older indirect testimony.

Space prevents a detailed examination of the first documents of the Eastern rite beyond the Byzantine, but in any case complete MSS from our period are rare or even nonexistent, and reconstruction work is necessary.

On the MSS, see S.E. Assemani, Bibl. Apost. Vaticanae codicum manuscriptorum catalogus, Rome 1756–1758; var. aus., Codices Vat. Graeci, 4 vols., Vatican City 1923–1950; K.W. Clark, Checklist of Manuscripts in St. Catherine's Monastery, Mount Sinai, Washington, D.C. 1952; Id., Checklist of Manuscripts in the Libraries of the Greek and Armenian Patriarchates in Jerusalem, Washington, D.C. 1953.

General collections and editions of texts: J.A. Assemani, Codex Liturgicus Ecclesiae Universae, 13 vols., Rome 1749–1766; E. Renaudot, Liturgiarum Orientalium Collectio, 2 vols., Paris 1716, reprinted Frankfurt a.M. 1847, anastatic reprint 1970; F.E. Brightman, Liturgies Eastern and Western (only the volume on the Eastern liturgies was published), Oxford 1896; var. aus., Anaphorae Syriacae quotquot in Codicibus repertae sunt, cura Pont. Inst. Studiorum Orientalium editae et latinae versae, Rome 1939–1973; A. Hänggi - I. Pahl, Prex Eucharistica. Textus e Variis Liturgiis Antiquioribus Selecti, Fribourg 1968, [3]1998; E. Lodi, Enchiridion euchologicum fontium liturgicorum, 2 vols., Rome 1979.

General works: Massimiliano, Principe di Sassonia, Ritus Missae Ecclesiarum Orientalium S. Romanae Ecclesiae Unitarum, Regensburg 1907–1908; Id., Praelectiones de liturgiis orientalibus, 2 vols., Freiburg i.Br. 1908–1913; J.M. Hanssens, Institutiones liturgicae de ritibus orientalibus: Missa rituum orientalium, 3 vols., Rome 1930–1932; A. Raes, Introductio in liturgiam orientalem, Rome 1947; A. Baumstark, Liturgie comparée, Chevetogne [3]1953 (Eng. tr. Comparative Liturgy, London 1958), with a vast bibliography. For Egeria, see *Egeria. For Jerusalem and the development of the typikon: A. Smith Lewis, A Palestinian Syriac Lectionary (Studia Sinaitica 6), London 1897; F.C. Conybeare, Rituale Armenorum, Oxford 1905; K. Kekelidze, Ierusalimskij Kanonar VII veka, Tbilisi 1912; F.C. Burkitt, The Old Lectionary of Jerusalem: JTS 24 (1922–1923) 415-424; Id., The Early Syriac Lectionary System: Proceedings of the British Academy 11 (1923) 1-38; J.B. Thibaut, Ordre des offices de la Semaine Sainte à Jérusalem du IV[e] au X[e] siècle, Paris 1926; G. Peradze, Zur vorbyzantinischen Liturgie Georgiens: Muséon 42 (1929) 90-99; Id., Les Monuments Liturgiques Prébyzantins en Langue Géorgienne: Muséon 45 (1932) 255-272; G. Kretschmar, Die frühe Geschichte der Jerusalemer Liturgie: Jahrbuch für Liturgik und Hymnologie 2 (1956) 22-46; G. Garitte, Le Calendrier Palestino-Géorgien du Sinaiticus 34 (X[e] siècle), Brussels 1958; M. Tarchnischvili, Le grand lectionnaire de l'Église de Jérusalem (CSCO 188-189, 204-2055), Louvain 1959–1960; A. Renoux, Un manuscrit du lectionnaire arménien de Jérusalem (Cod. Jerus. Arm. 121): Muséon 74 (1961) 361-385; Id., Un manuscrit du lect. armén. de Jérus. (Cod. Jerus. Arm. 12) - Addenda et corrigenda: Muséon 75 (1962) 385-398; Id., Liturgie de Jérusalem et lectionnaires arméniens. Vigiles et année liturgique, in Cassien-Botte, La Prière des Heures, Paris 1963, 167-199; R. Zerfass, Die Schriftlesung im Kathedral-offizium Jerusalems (LQF 48), Münster i.W. 1968; A. Renoux, Le Codex Arménien Jérusalem 121: I. Introduction aux origines de la liturgie hiérosolymitaine. Lumières nouvelles (PO 35, 1 = 163), Turnhout 1969; Id., Le Codex Erévan 985: une adaptation arménienne du Lectionnaire Hiérosolymitain: Armeniaca. Mélanges d'études arméniennes, Venezia 1969, 45-66. On the Byzantine rite: J. Goar, Euchologion sive Rituale Graecorum, Paris 1647, anastatic reprint Graz 1960; A. Dmitrievskij, Opisanie Liturgičeskikh rukopisei khranjaščikhsja v Bibliotekach Pravoslavnago Vostoka, 3 vols.: Typika I, Kiev 1895; Euchologia, Kiev 1901; Typika II, Petrograd 1917; Id., Typica, Addenda et corrigenda: Trudy Kievskoj Dukhovnoj Akademij 3 (1896) 527-545; H. Delehaye, Synaxarium ecclesiae constantinopolitanae (Propylaeum ad Acta Sanctorum novembris), Brussels 1902; A. Dmitrievskij, Drevneišie Patriaršie Tipikoni: Svjatogrobskij Ierusalimij i Velikosj Konstantinopolskoj Tserkvi, Kiev 1907; I. Karabinov, Postniaja Triod, St. Petersburg 1910; M. Skaballanovič, Tolkovij Tipikon, 2 vols., Kiev 1910-13; V. Beneševič, Opisanie grečeskikh rukopisei monastyria svjiatoi Ekateriny na Sinae, 2 vols., St. Petersburg 1911-17; A. Baumstark, Das Typikon der Patmoshandschrift 266 und die altkonstantinopolitanische Gottesdienstordnung: JLW 6 (1926) 98-111; A. Strittmatter, The "Barberinum S. Marci" of Jacques Goar: EphLiturg 47 (1933) 329-367; N. Cappuyns, Le Triodion. Étude historique sur sa constitution et sa formation (thesis of the Pont. Ist. Or. Stud.), Rome 1935; O. Strunk, The Byzantine Office at Haghia Sophia: DOP 9-10 (1955–1956) 175-202; J. Mateos, Le typicon de la Grande Église. Ms. Sainte-Croix n. 40, X[e] siècle, 2 vols. (OCA 165-166), Rome 1962–1963; A. Kniazeff, La lecture de l'Ancien et du Nouveau Testament dans le rite byzantin, in C. Botte, La prière des Heures, Paris 1963, 201-252; J. Mateos, Un horologion inédit de saint-Sabbas. Le Codex sinaïtique grec 863 (IX[e] siècle): Mélanges Eugène Tisserant 3 (ST 233), Vatican City 1964, 47-76; Id., Évolution historique de la liturgie de saint Jean Chrysostome: POC 15 (1965) 333-351; 16 (1966) 3-18, 131-161; A. Jacob, Histoire du formulaire grec de la liturgie de saint Jean Chrysostome, Louvain 1968; F. van de Paverd, Zur Geschichte der Messliturgie in Antiocheia und Konstantinopel gegen Ende des 4. Jahrhunderts (OCA 187), Rome 1970; C. Kucharek, The Byzantine-Slav Liturgy of St. John Chrysostom: Its Origin and Evolution, Allendale, NJ, no date (1972?); G. Bertonière, The Historical Development of the Easter Vigil and Related Services in the Greek Church (OCA 193), Rome 1972; M. Arranz, Les grandes étapes de la liturgie byzantine: Palestine, Byzance, Russie. Essai d'aperçu historique, in A. Pistoia - A. Triacca, Liturgie de l'Église particulière et liturgie de l'Église universelle (Bib. Eph. Lit., Subsidia 7), Rome 1976, 43-72. For the Eastern rites other than the Byzatine, see bibl. in A. Baumstark, Liturgie comparée, op. cit. On the issue of MSS and the reconstruction of texts, see W.F. Macomber, The Oldest Known Text of the Anaphora of the Apostles Addai and Mari: OCP 32 (1966) 335-371; J.M. Sánchez Caro, Eucaristía e historia de la salvación. Estudio sobre la plegaria eucarística oriental (BAC 439), Madrid 1983; La grande veglia bizantina, tr. with notes by S. Parenti, Padua 1984; R. Taft, The Liturgy of the Hours in East and West, Collegeville, MN [2]1986; P. Yousif (ed.), La bibliographie classifiée de la liturgie syrienne orientale, Rome 1990; Petit Dictionnaire de l'Orient Chrétien (PDOC), J. Assfalg - P. Krüger (eds.), Turnhout 1991; R. Taft, The Byzantine Rite: A Short History, American Essays in Liturgy series, Collegeville, MN 1992; H. Paprocki, Le Mystère de l'Eucharistie, Paris 1993; M. Nin, The Liturgical Heritage of the Eastern Churches, in P. Pallath (ed.), Catholic Eastern Churches: Heritage and Identity, Rome 1994; E. Velkovska, Lo studio dei lezionari bizantini: Ecclesia Orans 13 (1996) 253-272; L'Eucologio Barberini Gr. 336, ed. S. Parenti - E. Velkovska, 2nd ed. revised with It. trans. 2000; Patrologia V, 675-683; Liturgia, ed. D. Sartore - A.M. Triacca - C. Cibien, Cinisello Balsamo 2001, 283-296, 1385-1403; M. Ajjoub, Livre d'heures du Sinaï, SC 486, Paris 2004.

W.J. GRISBROOKE

IX. Western liturgical books. By liturgical book we mean a book which the celebrant uses for carrying out the various acts of worship (sacraments and benedictions) in different historical epochs. Compositions intended for study or private use are therefore not properly speaking liturgical books, even if such texts include contents which in their own right are truly liturgical.

A. The oldest liturgical books are the ordines* and the *sacramentaries, all dating from Gregory the Great onward (d. 604). Before this date we have only the liturgical-canonical collection called the Apostolic Tradition (ca. 220), the lost Greek original of which comes to us only in *Latin translation called the Hauler or Verona fragments (Veronensis 55), a specimen of a Roman ritual translated under *Damasus (ca. 380) and probably intended for a bilingual liturgy. (Rome changed from Greek into Latin at about this time.) From the period before the sacramentaries several eucharistic formularies are extant.

B. The libelli missarum* consist of the formularies of the Mass (collects, prefaces, Hanc Igitur, postcommunio), excluding the canon missae. The only collection we have of these formularies antedating the libri sacramentorum are in Veronensis 85, improperly called the "Leonine Sacramentary," compiled in about 550. (Some parts taken in isolation date from earlier than this.) The unknown author of this work collected together and grouped, acc. to the months of the civil year, certain Mass formularies from the Lateran archive, intended for the bishop of Rome and celebrants in the suburbicarian churches.

C. The ordo (pl. ordines) is a small book of varying dimensions, containing instructions for the carrying out of various liturgical actions (not including the formularies themselves) and meant to be used to guide the celebrant. As such, the ordo was the indispensable counterpart to the sacramentary. The ordines, approximately fifty in number, are available to us only in certain Roman or Franco-Roman collections, dating from between ca. 700–800 to 1000. They describe the ceremony for the *Eucharist, for an imperial coronation, for the dedication of churches (with the ritual for the enshrining of relics and the consecration of altars). There are also directories for the Temporale, the Liturgy of the Hours, monastic meals and for the Diligentia and a directory for liturgical vestments.

D. The sacramentary was a liturgical book for the use of the celebrant, and him alone, covering all the liturgical functions. It contained formularies for different rites, excluding instructions on how to execute the sacred functions. Ancient sacramentaries therefore do not correspond precisely to any of the liturgical books presently in use, not even after the reform of Vatican II, for they contained in some respects more material than the modern missal or pontifical, but in other respects less. These are the principal types:

1. The sacramentary called the Old Gelasian (Vaticanus Regin. lat. 316), transcribed in about 750, not far from Paris, probably in the monastery of Chelles. We have here a French edition of an authentically Roman book, brought from Rome a century before by French pilgrims. The structure of the sacramentary has two characteristics which remain constant in the Gelasian family, different from the Gregorian families: its division into three books, and the separation of the temporale from the sanctorale in two distinct series. The archetype of the Vaticanus Regin. lat. 316, of Roman origin, was composed in all probability between 628 and 715; i.e., between the oldest possible date of the most recent feast (the Exaltatio Crucis on 14 Sep) and the beginning of the pontificate of *Gregory II (715–736), because it does not yet contain the Thursday Lenten Masses instituted by that pope.

2. The Eighth-Century Gelasian Sacramentary, otherwise called the Sacramentary of Pepin the Short, the archetype of which was most probably composed in a Benedictine monastery in Gaul, and in strict relation to the cult of St. Projectus (Prix), perhaps at Volvic (Auvergne) or Flavigny (Burgundy), probably during the period of residence of Pope Stephen II (754–760) with Pepin the Short. Its compiler is unknown (Remigius of Rouen? Chrodegang of Metz?). Its arrangement and overall plan are the same as the Gregorian sacramentary (Masses of the temporale and those of the sanctorale linked together in a single series). The objective of the compiler seems to be fairly clear: to combine together the Old Gelasian sacramentary (Vaticanus Regin. lat. 316) and the Gregorian Paduensis type, thus eliminating local liturgies in favor of the Roman rite, and also to suppress—in areas already Romanized—the rivalry between the supporters of the two different sacramentaries. Its use was very brief (between 705 and 784/791). The intention of the editor was not achieved, and the new book in fact only contributed further to the liturgical anarchy that already reigned.

3. The Gregorian sacramentaries are of two classes and—differing from the Gelasian family—have neither a division into three books nor the distinction between the sanctorale and the temporale.

The Gregorian sacramentary of the Paduan type (Paduensis D. 47), drawn up in about 841–855 in E Belgium (Aix-la-Chapelle? Liège? Cologne?), supposes a Roman prototype compiled between 683 and 687, brought N of the Alps by a French pilgrim who was an admirer of the Roman liturgy, before the reform of Pepin the Short.

The Gregorian sacramentary of the Hadrianum type dates from the epoch of the Carolingian reform. Paul Warnefred (Paulus Grammaticus or Paulus Diaconus) received from the Aachen reformers the mission to petition Pope Hadrian (772–795) for a "pure" (immixtum) Gregorian sacramentary, i.e., free from post- (or extra-) Gregorian additions. In early 786 the pope satisfied Charlemagne by entrusting John of Ravenna with a copy of a Gregorian sacramentary, dating from between 731 and 735—the only one, it seems, in his possession—which was lodged in the Palatine library as an authentic text. The volume sent by Hadrian I into the Frankish kingdom was practically unusable, because it had been composed for the personal use of the bishop of Rome for celebrations on the Stational days in the Roman basilicas. There was therefore a pressing need to complete it.

4. The integrated Sacramentarium Hadrianum. In the years 801–804 the Carolingian reformers (Alcuin? Benedict of Aniane?) added to the Hadrianum a full Supplement, which—as well as filling some lacunae in the Roman original—contained a series of votive Masses and benedictions of Frankish provenance. The integrated Hadrianum represents therefore a hybrid Roman-Frankish liturgy, standing at the origins of what is called the Roman liturgy.

5. The "Gelasianized" or "mixed Gregorian" sacramentaries of the 10th and 11th c. are the result of a fusion of the integrated Hadrianum with the Eighth-Century Gelasian Sacramentary, along different lines: direct, "exuberant," even eccentric.

E. The missal appeared after the end of the 10th c. and combines, for practical reasons, the eucharistic order and eucharistic formulas (= rubrics and formulas). The Plenary Missal contained, further, an epistolary, an evangeliary and an antiphonary of the Mass. This new liturgical book sanctioned the separation of worship from the community, granting to the celebrant all the functions of the community at prayer.

F. The pontifical is a liturgical collection born in theory of the combination of the noneucharistic order with the formulas corresponding to those of the sacramentary. Imperfect specimens appear beginning in the 9th c.; from the 10th c. the number of pontificals multiplies.

1. The Romano-German pontifical of the 10th c., prepared in the scriptorium of the Benedictine monastery of St. Alban's Abbey, Mainz (Germany), between 960 and 961–963, is a dense and complex compilation that unites didactic elements (homilies, expositiones missae, symboli, orationis dominicae) with eucharistic formularies, more properly at home in missals, and with noneucharistic ordines of various periods with their formulas in extenso. The Romano-German pontifical of the 10th c. provided in detail all the sacred functions celebrated in Western churches during the 9th and 10th c. Representing the convergence of old traditions, it also lies at the root of all pontificals of the following centuries, including the Pontificale romanum (in the form antecedent to the changes of the Vatican II). Apart from its very wide dissemination and use in the Western churches, it quickly came to Rome, on the occasion of the residence of the Holy Roman emperor Otto I in Italy (961–965; 966–972) and ended up being considered an authentically Roman book. A copy of the Romano-German Pontifical was certainly in use in the apostolic city from 996 and 1002 (preserved in the Cassinensis 451 and the Vallicellianus D.5).

2. The Roman pontificals. With Gregory VII (1073–1085), the stream of liturgical books from beyond the Alps gradually dried up. Rome took the initiative, and thus ended the epoch in which "the government of our church was given to the Germans" (tempus quo Teutonicis concessum est regimen nostrae Ecclesiae: Gregorio VII, Regula canonica). The Romano-German pontifical remained, however, the common source of the Roman pontificals of the 12th and 13th c.

3. Guillaume Durand, bishop of Mende (ca. 1293–1295), in the S of France, had compiled a Tripartite Pontifical, to which the Western schism, above all under Robert of Geneva (Clement VII: 1378–1409) and Pedro de Luna (Benedict XIII: 1394–1402), assured success in displacing the 13th-c. pontifical or pontifical of the Roman curia which was brought by the popes to Avignon from 1305. The editio princeps of the pontifical, prepared by A. Patrizi Piccolomini and Giovanni Burchard of Strasbourg (Rome, 1485), reproduces ad litteram the tripartite pontifical of Guillaume Durand.

Now that we have reviewed the cycle of sacramentaries, we can consider the progress of the liturgy in the West: (1) from Rome the ordines made their way to the Frankish counties; (2) from the Frankish countries there is a migration toward Austria and the countries of the Rhine, with progressive hybridization; (3) from the Rhine Valley, after the reworking done at St. Alban of Mainz, the Romano-German compilation accompanies the Ottos to Rome; (4) from Rome the pontifical follows the popes to the banks of the Rhone (1305); (5) from Avignon the pontifical returns to Rome iterum; (6) at the dawn of the modern era, after a rich history but under the form which had been definitively given to it by G. Burchard, the pontifical spread throughout the Latin Christian world.

G. The book called the rituale contains the ceremonies, with the corresponding formularies, of the noneucharistic parts of worship celebrated by the priest, but excluding functions reserved to the bishop. The rituale in its pure form appeared in the 11th c. Theoretically the rituale is an extract of the pontifical, but in fact it has a very long and complex history (and even prehistory), starting with small versions for personal use and extending to collections of votive and festal texts, as well as to stand-alone versions.

H. The antiphonaries are of two types: the antiphonary of the Mass and the antiphonary of the Divine Office (breviary) that contain antiphons and responsories, and also, toward the end of the medieval period, psalms, hymns and, in general, the various parts of the graduale.

I. The graduale in the proper sense includes the music for choirs singing at Mass. In the Frankish countries, the graduale contained only the music sung by the cantor alone, on the steps (gradus) of the ambo, therefore corresponding in its function to the Roman cantatorium.

J. The lectionary. From the end of the 5th c. to the beginning of the 6th there were four different systems for indicating pericopes (liturgical readings of determinate length) to accompany the eucharistic celebration, which continued in use up to the 14th c. They were as follows: marginal notes, lists (capitularia), lectionaries properly so called with the text in extenso of the epistles and the gospels, and then lectionaries within the missal (epistolary, evangeliary, then a complete lectionary). In practice and commonly the epistolary refers to the series of readings other than the gospel, either in lists or texts in extenso. The evangeliary refers, analogously, to readings from the gospels. The lectionary of the Mass (as distinguished from the lectionary of the Divine Office) includes at the same time the epistolary and the evangeliary.

K. The Capitularia evangeliorum (lists of gospels passages) may be divided, acc. to the nomenclature of T. Klauser, into four basic groups: type Π (pure Roman, ca. 645), type Λ (pure Roman, ca. 740), type Σ (pure Roman, ca. 755) and type Δ (Frankish-Roman, ca. 650, completed in about 750 in the Frankish kingdoms).

L. The homiliaries are divided into three types: commentaries on the gospel pericopes for Matins; homilies for the readings of the liturgical year; homilies in the form of edifying sermons. These collections are attested in the paleo-Christian era (*Cassiodorus, *Caesarius of Arles, the Arian *Maximinus), as also in the case of *Germanus of Paris and the Venerable *Bede. One of the most important homiliaries is that composed by Warnefred (Paulus Grammaticus or Paul the Deacon) at Montecassino between 786 and 797, on the request of Charlemagne, which in two books provides chosen texts from the Fathers (principally *Augustine of Hippo, *Ambrose of Milan, *Jerome, *Leo I and *Gregory the Great). When the sermons and homilies were inserted in the breviary (II and III nocturns), the homiliaries had outlived their use and disappeared as distinct works.

Editions: M. Andrieu, Les Ordines romani du haut moyen âge, 5 vols., Louvain 1931–1961 (Ordo I-L); Id., Le Pontifical romain au moyen âge (R.P. of 12th–13th c., Pont. of Guillaume Durand), 4 vols., Vatican City 1938–1941; C. Vogel - R. Elze, Le Pontifical romano germanique du X^e^ siècle, 3 vols., Vatican City 1963–1972. The majority of the sacramentaries have been published in the collection of L.C. Mohlberg, Rerum Ecclesiasticarum documenta. Series Maior et Series Minor, Rome 1956–, and in the series of the Henry Bradshaw Society, London 1890–.

Studies: V. Leroquais, Les sacramentaires et les missels manuscrits, 4 vols., Paris 1924; Id., Les Livres d'Heures, 3 vols., Paris 1927; Id., Les Bréviaires, 6 vols., Paris 1934; Id., Les Pontificaux, 4 vols., Paris 1937; Id., Les Psautiers latins, 3 vols., Paris 1940–1941; Id., Supplément, Paris 1934; T. Klauser, Das römische Capitulare Evangeliorum I. Typen, Münster i.W. 1935; K. Gamber, Codices liturgici latini antiquiores (Spic. Friburg. Subsidia I), Fribourg 1963; R. Grégoire, Les Homéliaires du moyen âge, Rome 1966; C. Vogel, Introduction aux sources de l'histoire du culte chrétien au moyen âge, Bibl. Studi medioevali, I, Spoleto-Turin [2]1975; E. Palazzo, Histoire des livres liturgiques: le moyen âge des origines au XIII^e^ siècle, Paris 1993; Scientia Liturgica, ed. A. Chupungco, vol. V, Casale Monf. 1998; Calligrafia di Dio. La miniatura celebra la parola, ed. G. Canova Mariana, Modena 1999.

C. Vogel

LITURGY and the BIBLE. The liturgy and the Bible have been mutual influences upon each other. On the one hand the NT, after it had reached its canonical form, was naturally an influence on the development of the liturgical rites, as was, for that matter, the OT. On the other hand, in earlier periods of church history, the primitive forms of the rites left their own imprint on the formation of the NT. This is most evident in those passages of letters which explicitly discuss contemporary liturgical practice (e.g., 1 Cor 11:17-34); but the influence of the liturgy extends also to less obvious contexts. It is thought with good reason that Paul took certain passages, in the forms of hymns, from liturgical sources (such as the christological hymns of Phil 2:6-11 and Col 1:15-20), as also the prayer "come, Lord," "maranatha" (1 Cor 16:22; cf. Rev 22:20). Probably the same applies to certain professions of faith, such as Rom 1:3-4 and 1 Cor 15:3-7, which seem to derive from baptismal catechesis. The gospels show a similar tendency: thus the formulation of the command to baptize "in the name of the Father, and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit" (Mt 28:19) very likely derives from the baptismal practices of the late 1st c. The oldest practice seems to have been baptism "in the name of Jesus Christ" (see Acts 2:38; 1 Cor 1:13; W.F. Flemington, New Testament Doctrine, 105-109). Moreover, O. Cullman has shown that the probation against "hindering" the children (Mk 10:14; cf. Mt 3:14; Acts 8:36; 10:47; 11:17) echoes a phrase in a baptismal liturgy. Many descriptions of initiation given by Luke in Acts seem to be attempts to show how the church adapted its rites to varying circumstances. The account of the Last Supper in the Synoptics, apparently showing the rite in an earlier stage of development than 1 Cor 11, seems to reflect the liturgical practice at the time of the evangelists. It is also held that the Lord's Prayer, at least in the Matthean version (Mt 6:9-13), represents a contemporary liturgical reworking of the original words of the Lord. F.L. Cross has suggested that 1 Peter is actually the text of a baptismal liturgy, although most scholars prefer to think of it as a baptismal homily which incorporates some material from the liturgy itself. A great part of Revelation is structured in the form of a heavenly liturgy modeled not only on the worship of the Jewish synagogue but also on the Christian practice of the time, esp. in the description of the heavenly court (chs. 4–5), with the elders gathered around the throne, the Lamb (the Eucharist), the hymns, the (eucharistic) prayer of benediction and the reading of the scroll.

The influence of the liturgy on the composition of the NT has also, perhaps, worked at a deeper level. A. Guilding has tried to show how the Fourth Gospel has been composed as a commentary on a cycle of OT readings in Jewish synagogue worship; M.D. Goulder has shown a similar liturgical origin in the case of the gospel of Matthew.

We have also to see how the church has used the Bible in forming its own rites. G. Winkler has proposed that Christian baptism (whether or not the practice of baptism by immersion as a rite of initiation derived from a historical command of Jesus) in its oldest forms was influenced by the desire of the first Christians to imitate the baptism of Jesus himself in the Jordan, implying a sharing in the royal priesthood conferred by his messianic "anointing." Jesus was revealed at the moment of his baptism as "Messiah" (i.e., "anointed"), and his baptism itself could be described as an "anointing" (Acts 10:38): a fact which seems quickly to have led to the association of a rite of anointing with the baptismal liturgy. The interpretation of baptism as union with the death and resurrection of Jesus (Rom 6:3-4) may be explained by recalling that Jesus described his passion as his "baptism" (Mk 10:38; Lk 12:50). Even the Eucharist, which seems to take its origin from the historical command of Jesus, "do this," would not have been given by him as a fully structured rite. L. Bouyer and others have shown that the Eucharist, as celebrated in the ancient church, was modeled on a combination of Jewish thanksgivings for food (berakoth) combined with synagogue worship, with its readings, blessings and prayers. The ritualization of the Eucharist, which came later, never obliterated the traces of its Jewish origins. As the principal meaning of the word Eucharist indicates, its core remains the prayer of thanksgiving (i.e., the blessing of God) which continued to be strictly conformed to Jewish synagogue blessings, introduced by a dialogue ("We give thanks . . .": εὐχαριστήσωμεν) as used in the synagogue (see Bouyer, Eucharistie, 109-118). The Christian church has also taken from Jewish worship the practice of including biblical readings in the liturgy. The synagogue rite of readings included two texts, taken respectively from the Pentateuch and the Prophets, following a fixed calendar. Lk 4:16-21 describes how Jesus read a passage from Isaiah and commented on it in the synagogue at Nazareth; Acts 13:14-16 says that Paul preached in a synagogue "after the reading of the Law and the Prophets." The theory acc. to which the lectionary of readings in Palestine was structured on a three-year cycle is a subject of dispute among scholars. It appears also that the Psalter was cyclically read. From the earliest times Christian worship adopted this Jewish practice. The Pauline author tells Timothy to "attend to the reading [presumably the public reading of Scripture], to preaching, to teaching" (1 Tim 4:13). It is probably the case that the letters of the apostles were intended to be used in a similar liturgical setting (see Col 4:16; 1 Th 5:27).

It is not clear, however, if such public reading was originally separated from the Eucharist. The first clear evidence of a connection between the two is found in the account of the Sunday liturgy given by *Justin Martyr (1 Apol. 67): "The memoirs of the apostles or the writings of the prophets are read, for as long as time permits." Evidently a fixed lectionary had not yet been established. At the time of the Apostolic Constitutions* (from the *Antioch area in the 2nd half of the 4th c.) we find prescribed a "reading of the Law or of the Prophets and of our letters, Acts and gospels" (VIII, 5,11; in another section, II, 7,5, the book of Wisdom is added, along with a rather unclear statement which may mean that two OT readings were sufficient). It seems it was around this period that readings began to be chosen acc. to a lectionary rather than simply at the whim of the celebrant, at first for the Lenten catechesis and then for the whole year. The old *Armenian lectionary gives readings for the entire year as celebrated in 5th-c. *Jerusalem: the catechetical readings coincide almost exactly with those of *Cyril of Jerusalem from the previous century. G.G. Willis has reconstructed the lectionary of Hippo at the time of St. *Augustine. At least at the beginning of the 3rd c. there was a rite of *ordination of readers (Tradizione Apostolica [Botte] 11).

The recitation of psalms was also part of the eucharistic liturgy. It seems it was the common usage to insert a psalm between the readings (Tertull., De anima 9,4; Basil, In Ps. 28,7; Ambr., Ep. 22,4.7). *Basil (ibid. 29,1) and Augustine (Confess. X, 33,49-50) speak of the added fascination of the words of psalms when sung. Psalms were also sung at other moments of the Eucharist, e.g., at the offertory (Aug., Retract.: CSEL, II, 37) and at Communion (Cyril Jer., Cat. Myst. V, 20; Ambr., De Elia 10,34).

The reading of the Scriptures and the recitation of psalms also found a place outside the celebration of the Eucharist. The monastic and cathedral offices had at their heart the recitation of the Psalter acc. to a scheme of lectio continua; biblical songs and readings could also be included in the Office. Toward the end of the 4th c., the pilgrim *Egeria recorded numerous details of the Office in Jerusalem, celebrated in a form which seemed to combine monastic and cathedral elements (Peregr. 24).

Another element of both eucharistic and other celebrations was the singing of hymns. Many of the ancient authors reveal a true poetic talent: among those best known, *Ambrose of Milan owes relatively little to the Scriptures, but *Ephrem the Syrian's works have a much more biblical tone.

Of great importance in the liturgy of the word of the Eucharist were the homilies. Very often they took the form of a commentary on the Scriptures, arranged so as to cover an entire biblical book. Egeria tells us that the bishop of Jerusalem (presumably Cyril) dedicated the first five weeks (perhaps it should be "four"?) of the daily Lenten catechesis to the exposition of "the whole Bible, beginning with Genesis, explaining first the literal sense of each passage, and then interpreting it acc. to the spiritual sense" (Peregr. 46,2). These catecheses have been lost, but we do have the Lenten catechetical discourses of Cyril (the Catecheses and the Mystagogical Catecheses), each of which bears a reference to an appropriate biblical reading.

As was inevitable, the Jewish calendar based on the OT was replaced by a Christian calendar based on the NT. The "Lord's day," the celebration of the *resurrection, took the place of Saturday as the focal point of the week. In the annual cycle, the Christian celebration of *Easter became the principal feast, perhaps even as early as the end of the 1st c. Later, Lent and *Pentecost were linked to it. The *Nativity-*Epiphany cycle owes its origin to the desire to establish a Christian equivalent of the Jewish Feast of Tabernacles, or of the solar festivals of the pagan world, connected with the winter solstice.

The significance of these feasts was increasingly linked with Jewish feasts and the history of Israel. The authors of the NT themselves had already moved in this direction. Christ is "our Passover" (1 Cor 5:7). Baptism is an "antitype" of the salvation of eight persons enclosed in the ark, by water (1 Pet 3:21). The experiences of the exodus (the cloud, the sea, the manna and the water from rock) are described in the language of Christian initiation and the Eucharist (1 Cor 10:1-4). From the 2nd c. there was a growth in preaching on the Pasch (e.g., *Melito, ps.-*Hippolytus, In Sanctum Pascha), which used OT themes in a christological perspective, thus casting light on the meaning of the Christian celebration. It is evidence of the first stage of Christian *exegesis.

The Fathers, following the example of the NT authors, frequently use this typological language to explain the relationship between the Christian sacraments and their OT prefigurations. Historians often distinguish this typological exegesis from the use of allegory. This last is described by J. Daniélou as "Christian philosophy and morals presented through a series of biblical images, as the Stoics did in presenting their philosophy and morals in a series of Homeric images" (Sacramentum futuri, 48). For example, explaining the account of sin in Genesis, Ambrose says that Adam represents the mind and Eve the senses; sin is the mind which gives itself to pleasure, the flood is the correction of the mind through teaching (De Abr. 2,1). A type, on the other hand, is, acc. to Daniélou, "a reference to a historical event meant to give ground for hope in another analogous event" (Sacramentum futuri, 45). The NT authors have based their use of scriptural typology on two different theories. One of these entails a theology of the providence of God working in history: the events of the OT "happened to them τυπικῶς and were written for our instruction" (1 Cor 10:11). The other explanation is metaphysical and framed in terms of a Platonic ontology: the furnishings of the temple are "copies [ὑποδείγματα] of the heavenly things," and the old law is a "shadow of the good things to come" (Heb 9:23; 10:1).

Τύπος means literally "seal," "stamp," and αντίτυπος refers to the impression which corresponds to the original. The Christian writers, using this terminology, extended the meaning but made it less precise. They applied the concept to the relation between the historical Jesus and his continuing communion with the church in the liturgy: the expressions typos and antitypos are sometimes applied indiscriminately to the second term of the relation. Thus Cyril of Jerusalem can call the eucharistic bread both "type" (Cat. Myst. IV, 3) and "antitype" (ibid., V, 20) of the body of Christ. He also uses the terms εἰκών, μίμησις, κοινωνία, ὁμοίωμα, μέτοχος and σύμβολον in the same way as type and antitype to express the typological relation. For example, the anointing of Aaron in the OT occurs τυπικῶς, as σύμβολον of the "reality" (ἀληθῶς) of the Christian sacrament of confirmation (Cat. Myst. III, 6). The sacramental rite (of baptism) is the image or imitation of our participation in the reality of the sufferings of Christ (II, 5); similarly the sacramental species of the Eucharist are the "antitype" of the body and blood of Christ (V, 20). *Theodore of Mopsuestia adds an eschatological dimension, seeing the sacrament as that which confers the type (presumably τύπος is the Greek work underlying the Syriac) of the reality of the resurrection in which we will partake in heaven (Hom. Cat. 13,15). Some Fathers connect their typology so closely to an ontological foundation that, e.g., Ambrose affirms that the Christian sacraments are older than the Jewish ones, because their prefigurations are earlier (De Sacr. I, 23; IV, 10), and that the real dove that Noah sends out from the ark is only an appearance of such if compared to the reality of that "like a dove" which descended on Jesus at the Jordan (De Myst. 25).

Daniélou has written numerous studies on the way that the Fathers used the OT as a source of typology for the Christian liturgy. Many of the ancient homilists, such as *Tertullian, *Dionysius of Alexandria, Cyril of Jerusalem and Ambrose, have put together collections of types of baptism—e.g., the primordial waters of creation, the ark of Noah, the exodus, the water Moses made sweet with his rod and that which he made to spring out of the rock, the baptism of Christ in the Jordan, the water of Cana, the bathing of Naaman in the Jordan, the healing of the paralytic at the sheep gate (Jn 5), and the dove that Noah sent out of the ark. Among the types of the Eucharist are the sacrifice of Abel and of Melchizedek (both mentioned in the ancient eucharistic prayers and represented in art), the manna, the paschal meal, the water that sprang from the rock, the paschal lamb and the "banquet" prepared by the Lord in Ps 23. The Song of Songs was also used frequently in the liturgy and represented a particularly rich source of typology.

O. Cullmann. Die Tauflehre des Neuen Testaments, Zürich 1948; W.F. Flemington, The New Testament Doctrine of Baptism, London 1948; J. Daniélou, Sacramentum Futuri: Études sur les origines de la typologie biblique, Paris 1950; Id., Bible et Liturgie, Paris 1951; F.L. Cross, 1 Peter, A Paschal Liturgy, London 1954; N.M. Denis-Boulet, Le calendrier chrétien, Paris 1959 (Je sais, je crois, 112); A. Guilding, The Fourth Gospel and Jewish Worship, Oxford 1960; G.G. Willis, St. Augustine's Lectionary, London 1962 (Alcuin Club 44); L. Bouyer, Eucharistie: théologie et spiritualité de la prière eucharistique, Tournai 1966; J.A. Lamb, The Place of the Bible in the Liturgy: The Cambridge History of the Bible, I (ed. P.R. Ackroyd - C.E. Evans), Cambridge 1970, 563-586; A. Renoux, Le Codex arménien Jérusalem 121: PO 35 (1969) 1-215; 36 (1971) 143-388; M.D. Goulder, Midrash and Lection in Matthew, London 1974; A.-M., La Bonnardière, La Bible "liturgique" de Saint Augustin, in Jean Chrysostome et Augustin, ed. Ch. Kannengiesser, Paris 1975, 148-160; G. Winkler, The Original Meaning of the Prebaptismal Anointing and Its Implications: Worship 52 (1978) 24-45; G.J. Cuming, The Divine Office: The First Three Centuries, and W.J. Grisbrooke, The Formative Period-Cathedral and Monastic Offices: The Study of Liturgy (eds. C. Jones - G. Wainwright - E. Yarnold), London 1978, 353-369; Le monde grec ancien et la Bible, ed. C. Mondésert, Paris 1984; Le Monde latin antique et la Bible, ed. J. Fontaine - Ch. Pietri, Paris 1985; Saint Augustin et la Bible, ed. A.-M. La Bonnardière, Paris 1986; E.H. van Olst, The Bible and Liturgy, Grand Rapids, MI 1991; J.T. Burtchael, From Synagogue to Church: Public Services and Offices in the Earliest Christian Communities, Cambridge 1992; G.G. Willis, A History of Early Roman Liturgy, Rochester 1994; B. Studer, Die doppelte Exegese bei Origen, in Origeniana Sexta, Leuven 1995, 303-327; Id., Die patristische Exegese, eine Aktualisierung der Heiligen Schrift: REAug 42 (1996) 520-553; C. Vagaggini, Il senso teologico della liturgia, Cinisello Balsamo [6]1999, 428-475; Id., L'esegesi patristica: un incontro con Cristo: Augustinianum 40 (2000) 321-344; A. Stewart-Sykes, From Prophecy to Preaching: A Search for the Origins of the Christian Homily, Leiden 2001; Liturgia, ed. D. Sartore - A.M. Triacca -C. Cibien, Cinisello Balsamo 2001, 256-283.

E. Yarnold

LIUTPRAND (ca. 690–744). Of the more important of the *Longobard kings. He succeeded his father Ansprand in 712. His policies were essentially directed at pacifying a kingdom at that time disrupted by grave internecine conflicts between the Longobards and the Romans. His attachment to the Catholic faith was unshakable: he confirmed the papal patrimonium of the Cottian Alps, built churches and monasteries, and transported the bones of St. *Augustine of Hippo from *Sardinia to Pavia. He brought about a notable increase in private law and in the protection of human life. He set limits to private vendettas within families, adding to the wergild the confiscation of the property of the guilty party. Above all, he showed juridical maturity in requiring evidence of conscious intentionality to prove a crime. From 713 to 715 he pursued his legislative activity which translated into fifteen volumina (divided into 153 chapters) of laws, marked by a strong religious spirit and the principles of natural law, intended above all to integrate the Edict of Rothari.

After some years of rule characterized by peaceful coexistence with the Byzantines, collaboration with the Venetians and the pope, and by his marriage with Guntrud, daughter of the duke of Bavaria (through whom he consolidated his friendship with Charles Martel), there followed years of military exploits after 727. Initially he invaded the Exarchate, then led an offensive in central and S *Italy and then against the duke of Fruili. Pope Gregory II, understanding that these actions could lead to the unification of Italy under the Longobards and to territorial continuity from the N possessions as far as Benevento, preferred to reach an agreement with the Byzantines of *Ravenna, although he was in dispute with them over the iconoclasm question, and so instigated a rebellion of the dukes of Spoleto and Benevento against Liutprand. Liutprand arrived with his forces near Rome but, threatened with excommunication, made an agreement with the pope, giving him Sutri, marking in effect the birth of the temporal power of the papacy. In 739 he fought against Transemund, duke of Spoleto, who took refuge in Rome; Liutprand threatened the city for a second time. Pope Gregory III consequently asked for help from Charles Martel, king of the Franks, without however receiving it, on account of the obligations with Liutprand negotiated when he had given him help against the Arabs. Around 740 Liutprand began talks with the Greeks from which he might have been able to create a new political order in Italy contrary to the interests of the pope, but Pope *Zachariah forced him to sign the Treaties of Terni (742), in which he committed himself to a twenty-year peace and to restoring the conquered territories (certain cities of Umbria). He died in January 744 while preparing for new campaigns of conquest. His body was translated in the 12th c. to the church of St. Peter in Ciel d'Oro in Pavia.

A. Lizier, EI 21, 317; M. Roberti, Liutprando re e longobardo: RIL n.s. 16 (1952) 91-102; B.R. Motz, L'attività guerriera di re Liutprando nei primi quattordici anni di regno, Cagliari 1954; G. Fasoli, I Longobardi in Italia, Bologna 1965; P. Delogu, Il regno longobardo, in G. Galasso, Storia d'Italia, I. Longobardi e Bizantini, Turin 1980.

M.L. Angrisani Sanfilippo

LOMBARDS. See *LONGOBARDS

LONGINUS (d. after 580). First bishop of the Nobatae, *monophysite, died after 580. Longinus was a priest at *Alexandria. His name is found among the first missionaries sent to evangelize the tribe of the Nobatae which had been recently converted to Christianity (536). The first phase of the mission was undertaken by an Alexandrian priest named Julian, between 537 and 545. After this, the Empress *Theodora wanted to consecrate Longinus as bishop of the Nobatae; *Theodosius, the monophysite patriarch of Alexandria, wanted instead to keep him nearby, lending him assistance in his old age. After the death of Theodosius, Longinus was consecrated at *Constantinople (2 June 566), but shortly afterward entered into a dispute with the imperial court and for three years did not succeed in leaving the capital. In the end he fled to the region of the Nobatae in Nubia, where he worked fruitfully for six years (569–575). In this period he ordained *Theodore bishop of Alexandria. He then tried, first in Syria and then in Alexandria, to gain acceptance for Theodore's ordination, but without success: finally he returned to his episcopal see in 577. The new patriarch of Alexandria, *Damian, declared him a heretic and deposed him; the Nobatae remained faithful to their bishop, and the tribe of Alwah was so attached to the person of Longinus that they would only accept conversion from him (John of Ephesus, HE IV, 51-53). This was the last work of Longinus. The tribe which had been Christianized by him was made subject to the see of Alexandria in the person of Theodore, the patriarch he himself had consecrated. We have three fragmentary letters in *Syriac of Longinus: (1) Ep. ad archimandritas; (2) Ep. ad Johannem ex Beth Hanina; (3) Ep. ad Paulum Antiochenum. According to *John of Ephesus (HE IV, 53), Longinus was proud of having healed many from the "disease of the phantasia of *Julian" of Halicarnassus.

CPG III, 7217; CSCO 17, 241-244 (text); 103, 168-170 (Fr. tr.); E. Honigmann, Évêques et évêchés, CSCO 127, 224-229; I.-B. Chabot, CSCO 17, 84-86, 241-244; Id., CSCO 103, 58-59; 168-170; A. van Roey - P. Allen, Monophysite Texts, Louvain 1994, 252-254; A. Grillmeier, Christ in Christian tradition, 2/4, Westminster 1996, 259-289; S.G. Richter, Studien zur Christianiesirung Nubiens, Wiesbaden 2002.

G. Ladocsi

LONGINUS (apocryphal)
1. Longinus (from Gk. lonchē, "lance") is identified in apocryphal texts with the centurion at the foot of the cross (Mt 27:54: Letter of Pilate to Herod), or with the soldier who pierced the side of Christ (Jn 19:34: Acts of Pilate, 10,1), called Petronius in the Gospel of Peter. According to *Gregory of Nyssa (Epist. 17: PG 46, 1061-1064), Longinus was bishop in *Cappadocia, and was martyred by decapitation. The legend of Longinus developed in the medieval period and was connected with the legend of the Holy Grail. His lance was said to have been discovered by the empress *Helena and brought to *Constantinople.

BHG 988-990c; BHL 4965; BHO 685; BS 8, 89-95; LCIK 7, 410-11. Acts: PG 93, 1546-1550; 115, 32-44; Starowieyski 1, 688-90

2. Another Longinus, philosopher and historian, author of the apocryphal correspondence about the magi with the emperor Augustus, in *Syriac and Arabic. The text of the letter was inserted into the chronicles and into Eastern histories.

CANT 309; Starowieyski 349-351; 878 (bibl.). N. Zeegers-Van der Vorst, Quatre pièces apocryphes néotestamentaires en version syriaque, in III Symposium Syriacum 1980: Les contacts du monde syriaque avec les autres cultures, ed. R. Lavenant, OCA 221, Rome 1983, 65-77.

M. Starowieyski

LONGOBARDS (Lombards). A people of Germanic origin, belonging to the W group (Frisians, Angles, Saxons). Their claimed Scandinavian origin, attested in the sources (Paul the Deacon, Hist. Lang. I, 1), is legendary; modern research places their original location in the planes of the lower Elbe (Bardengau). The etymology of the name is unsure: Paul the Deacon calls them Winili, while others link the name Longobards to a custom of wearing a long beard (Isid., Etym. IX, 2,95) or to the use of the halberd (Kögel), which, however, was never their traditional weapon. The events of the prehistoric phase of the Longobards are obscure and uncertain. According to the account given in the sources, the Longobards, guided by the kings Ibor and Aion, emigrated to Scoringa and Mauringa, where they defeated the *Vandals: archaeological research puts this appropriation of territory in the mid-2nd c. BC. Beaten in Germany by Tiberius, in AD 5 (Velleius, Hist. II, 106) the Longobards joined with the Marcomanni and then the Cherusci, led by Arminius (Tacitus, Ann. II, 45), whose nephew they helped to regain the throne (47). In 165, prompted by pressure from other peoples, they made a foray into *Pannonia. Thereafter the sources are silent right up to the 5th c.

The account of Paul records their migration to the lands of the Burgundians, the conflicts with the Vulgares and the Burgundians, their occupation under King Gudeoc of the lands of the Rugii, already beaten by *Odoacer (end of 5th c.) and those of the Huns. The kings Tato and Waccho brought the power of the Longobards to its peak with the victories over the Heruli and the Swabians and the alliance with the Byzantines (Paul the Deacon, Hist. Lang. I, 20; Orig. 3). Following this alliance they engaged with the *Goths in *Italy, obtaining in exchange an annual tribute, and the lands of Noricum and Pannonia (546). They participated in the battle of Tadinae (Gualdo Tadino) which saw the death of Totila (552). As allies of the Byzantines they fought against the Franks and the Persians (for these events the source is Procop., B.G. IV, 18-26). They then defeated the Gepids (567): their king Cunimind was killed, and his daughter Rosamund constrained to marry the victor, Alboin (Paul the Deacon, Hist. Lang. I, 27; Greg. Tours, Hist. Fr. IV, 41).

Shortly afterward, pursued by the Avars, the Longobards entered Italy (568), where they were to become the dominant force for more than two centuries. Alboin created a kingdom with its capital in Pavia. Alongside this a number of dukedoms sprang up, among which the more important were Trent, Tuscia, Spoleto and Benevento, which were almost independent of the central power. Disagreements between the dukes was to weigh heavily on the subsequent history of Longobard rule. Jealous of their independence, the dukes tried to remove themselves from the royal kingdom, thus creating instability and contributing to the progressive disintegration of Longobard hegemony. Alboin, killed in 572 as the result of a plot coordinated by his wife Rosamund, was followed by Cleph (573–575), whose own death gave way to a decade-long interregnum. King *Authari (584–590) strengthened royal authority with the institution of the demanium, the personal dominion of the sovereign; one of his successors, Rothari, introduced the first organic legislation (643). Conflicts with the church as well as the impatience shown by the dukes toward the central power nonetheless resulted in a long period of semianarchy. *Liutprand (712–744) appeared to reaffirm royal sovereignty, but the dispute with the church culminated in political defeat (ceding the city of Sutri, of the exarchate and the Pentapolis). His successor, Aistulf (749–756), was defeated by the Frankish king Pepin, called into Italy by Pope Stephen II; shortly afterward the victories of Charles, son of Pepin, over Desiderius (754–774) at Pavia and over Adelchis at Verona (774) brought the era of Longobard domination to an end.

The political organization of the Longobards always remained rudimentary, despite contacts with the more advanced and complex systems of the Roman world. Its fulcrum was an assembly responsible for the election of the sovereign, who in fact governed increasingly with the assumption of absolute royal power. In possession of military and judicial authority, the king was assisted by his officers, chosen from among the gasindii. The administrative system was based on groups of families (fare) from which the military contingents were chosen. The territory was divided into various administrative areas, governed by dukes appointed by the king. The personal estates of the sovereign were administered by the officials of the court, the gastalds. Longobard law, based initially on ancient custom (Paul the Deacon, Hist. Lang. IV, 44), was reformed with the Edict of Rothari (promulgated 22 Nov 643 at Pavia); from this came the introduction of an indemnity, or wergild, payable to the injured party, and the introduction of the use of documentary proof rather than the barbaric ritual of a duel in penal cases. The fiscal system was equally primitive, based on taxation in kind, particularly affecting Roman landowners (Paul the Deacon, Hist. Lang. II, 32). The economy was based largely on agriculture; commercial activity flourished esp. in *Ravenna and Venice. The units of currency were the soldo, the tremisse and the siliqua (1/20th of a soldo). The division of civil society was based on the different degrees of liberty: the arimanni, who enjoyed all full rights, were followed by the aldii and the massarii, in a state of subjection, as well as the servi regii, servi ecclesiae, servi ministeriales.

We have contemporary information about the culture of the Longobards: in several places Paul the Deacon speaks of sagas and traditional songs. They were notable for the manufacture of furnishings and also jewelry. The language, of which we have only limited evidence, was similar to German. In respect to religion, the Longobards were originally linked to the pagan cults (Odin, Freya) but then welcomed Christianity, probably brought to them by peoples of the East (Rugii, Gepids, Goths), although they embraced the *Arian heresy. The supposed letter of *Justin (548) in which they are declared Catholics is not reliable. In fact, under Christianity Longobards were never unified in religious matters, as the different creeds of their kings attest: the Arian Alboin (murdered in 572), who was married to the catholic Clotsinda and to the Arian Rosamund, was eventually succeeded by Authari (584-590), under whose reign his wife Theodelinda and the pope, *Gregory the Great, began the conversion of the Longobards to Catholicism. The son of *Theodelinda and Authari, Adaloald, was baptized 7 April 603, in the basilica of St. John of Monza. Although held back to some extent by the Arian bishops, Catholicism was successful among the Longobards, one of the results of which was the disappearance of the national language. Nonetheless, there were adherents to Arianism among the Catholic Adaloald's successors, such as Arioald and Rothari. Afterward, the conflict between the catholic and the Arian groupings contributed to hastening the disintegration of the Longobard kingdom.

The principal sources include: Velleius, Hist. II, 106; Tacitus, Germ. 40; Id., Ann. II, 45-46; ibid., XI, 17; Strabo, Geogr. VII, 1,3; Ptolemy, Geogr. II, 16; Origo gentis Langobardorum, MGH, Scriptores rerum Langobardicarum et Italicarum saec. VI-IX; Historia Langobardorum codicis Gothani, ibid.; Paul the Deacon, Historia Langobardorum, ibid.; Edictum ceteraeque Langobardorum leges, MGH, Leges IV; Gregorii I Papae registrum epistolarum, ed. Edwald-Hartmann, 1887-1889; A. Zanella, Paolo Diacono, Storia dei Longobardi, Milan 1991, with bibl.; M. Schönfeld, PWK XII, 678-687; A. Lizier, EI 21, 470-478; F. Cognasso, EC 7, 1518-1528; M. Wallace-Hadrill, The Barbarian West, Oxford 1966; N. Cilento, Italia meridionale longobarda, Milan 1966; E. Bernareggi, Attività economiche e circolazione monetaria in età longobarda nella testimonianza delle Charte: RIN 72 (1970) 117-137; O. Bertolini, Roma e i longobardi, Rome 1972; J. Jarnut, Prosopographische und sozialgeschichtliche Studien zum Langobardenreich in Italien (568-774), Bonn 1972; E. Bernareggi, Struttura economica e monetazione del regno longobardo: NAC 5 (1976) 331-376; H.J. Diesner, Zur Langobardischen Sozialstruktur, Gasindii und Verwandtes: Klio 58 (1976) 141-186; G. Pepe, Il medioevo barbarico in Italia, Turin [6]1977; P. Delogu, Il regno longobardo, in G. Galasso, Storia d'Italia, I. Longobardi e Bizantini, Turin 1980; B. Luiselli, La società longobardica del secolo VIII e Paolo Diacono storiografo tra romanizzazione e nazionalismo longobardico, in Zanella, op. cit., 5-48; Langobardia, ed. S. Gasparri, texts by P. Cammarosano, Udine 1990; N. Christie, The Lombards. The Ancient Longobards, Oxford 1995.

M.L. Angrisani Sanfilippo

LORD'S PRAYER (Our Father). Mt 6:9-13 and Lk 11:2-4 contain the text of the Lord's Prayer in two slightly different forms: *Matthew's is longer and entered liturgical use (e.g., Did. 8,2); *Luke's is shorter but is inserted in a context that presents the occasion in which Jesus taught it (Lk 11:1-2). For centuries, people have asked for reasons accounting for the variants in Luke and Matthew. *Origen poses the question by asking himself if these are the same prayer, first uttered in the longer text, then repeated to one of the disciples, or if the two versions correspond to two different prayers with common parts (De or. 18,2-3); *Augustine believes that Lk 11:2-4 is an abbreviated form of Mt 6:9-13 (Enchir. 30,116).

The Lord's Prayer immediately became a liturgical *prayer and was recited three times a day (Did. 8). Toward the middle of the 4th c., several sources attest to the recitation of the Lord's Prayer during the celebration of the *Eucharist (Cyr. Jer., Catech. 23,11; Ambr., De sacr. 5,4,24; 6,5,24; Jerome, Adv. Pel. 3,15; Aug., Serm. 58,10,12). Moreover, Christian authors immediately made the connection between the Lord's Prayer and *baptism: *Tertullian writes a treatise On Prayer for *catechumens in which he devotes a large amount of space to the Lord's Prayer; *Cyprian writes about this in the De dominica oratione, a treatise that comments on the Lord's Prayer, making explicit references to the condition of the baptized (De domin. or. 9; 10; 18); Augustine attests to the use of the traditio and the redditio orationis dominicae that followed the traditio and redditio symboli during the imminent preparation for baptism (Serm. 56,1,1; 57,1,1; 58,1,1; 59,1,1).

Patristic *commentaries on the Lord's Prayer take Matthew's text as their point of departure, probably because of its connection with liturgical use. We find systematic commentaries on the Lord's Prayer in texts of various literary *genres (Tertull., De orat.; Cypr., De dom. or.; Orig., De orat.; John Cass., Conl. 9,18-25), *catecheses directed to catechumens or *neophytes (Theod. Mops., Hom. catech. XI: ST 145, 281-321; Chrom., Serm. 40; Aug., Serm. 56-59; Peter Chrys., Serm. 67-72; Caes. Arles, Serm. 147), catechetical homilies that explain the eucharistic liturgy (Cyr. Jer., Catech. 23,11-18; Ambr., De sacr. 5,18-30; 5,24), *homilies or treatises primarily devoted to explaining the Lord's Prayer (Greg. Nyss., Or. dom. 2-5; ps.-Quodv., Sermo de dom.or.: PLS 3, 299-303; ps.-John Chrys., Om. de or. dom.: ed. Bouhot: Augustinianum 20 [1980] 69-78; ps.-John Chrys. lat., Sermo 28: PLS 4, 817-821; Max. Conf., Or. dom.; Ven. Fortunatus, Expos. orat; Peter of Laod., Or. dom.), commentaries or homilies on all or part of Matthew (John Chrys., Hom. 19 in Mat. 4-7; Hom. In Mt. 19,3-5; Jerome, In Matth. I,6,9-13; Chrom., In Matth. 28, olim 14; Aug., De Serm. Dom. II,4,15-11,39; Opus imp. in Mt. Hom. 14; ps.-Aug., Serm. 64 and 65: PL 39, 1866-1871), or on Luke (Cyr. Alex., Comm in Lc. 11,2-4, hom. 71-77), texts with different literary features (Augustine, Ep. 130,11,21-23; Enchir. 30; Persev. II,4-VII,15; Sedulius, Carm. pasch. II,231-300; Op. pasch. II,17).

From the initial invocation ("Our Father") to the individual petitions, each commentary reveals the individual commentator's interests, their mutual influence and the situation of the community in which they lived. Thus, e.g., one can sense Tertullian's ardent desire as he awaits the *parousia (De orat. 5), Cyprian's insistence on unity among *brothers, which he considered greater than *martyrdom (De dom. or. 24), Augustine's deep reflection on theological issues such as *sin and *temptation in his long commentary on the fifth and sixth petition of the Lord's Prayer (Serm. 56,7,11–14,19; 57,8,8–12,12; 58,5,6–9,11; Persev. V,8-VII,15). These writers place great importance on certain elements: the adoption as sons of *God (commenting on the initial invocation), the need for the sanctification of Christians which gives *glory to God's *name (1st petition), the connection with the *parable of the debtors (Mt 18:23ff.; 5th petition), the difference between diabolic temptation and the temptation/testing of the faithful believer (6th petition). Most commentators place the "kingdom" of the second petition into the future (Tertull., Cypr., Theod. Mops., Chrom., Aug., Opus imp. in Mt., Sedul., Cyr. Alex., Caes. Arles); others, however, sense the tension between the kingdom as already actualized and the kingdom as not yet fully completed (Orig., Greg. Nyss., Ambr., Peter Chrys.), or they simply place the interpretations side by side (John Chrys., Jerome, Cassian, Venantius Fortunatus). Regarding the petition for "bread" (4th petition), certain writers understand it in an entirely material sense (Greg. Nyss., John Chrys., Theod. Mops., Opus imp. in Mt., ps.-Aug.); others identify it with Christ in the Eucharist (Cyr. Jer., Ambr., John Cass., Peter Chrys., Ven. Fort.); Augustine interprets it as Christ the truth and the Word of God (cf. Caes. Arles): this latter *exegesis was already present in Origen. Numerous *Fathers, furthermore, accept both the material and spiritual meaning of the bread (Tertull., Cypr., Sedul., ps.-Quodv., Peter of Laod.), favoring the first (Cyr. Alex.) or the second (Jerome, Chrom., Max. Conf.).

F.H. Chase, The Lord's Prayer in the Early Church, Texts and Studies 3, Cambridge 1891; J.P. Bock, Die Brotbitte des Vaterunsers. Ein Beitrag zum Verständnis dieses Universalgebetes und einschlägiger patristisch-liturgischer Fragen, Paderborn 1911; G. Walter, Untersuchungen zur Geschichte der griechischen Vaterunser-Exegese, TU 40/3, Leipzig 1914; DBS 6,788-800; C. Vona,

"La quarta petitio dell'oratio dominica nell'interpretazione di antichi scrittori cristiani," in: Convivium Dominicum, Catania 1959, 217-255; A. Hamman, Le Pater expliqué par les Pères, Paris 1962; Le notre Père: La MaisonD 85 (1966) 7-100; J. Carmignac, Recherches sur le "notre Père," Paris 1969; W. Rordorf, "Le "pain quotidien" (Matth. 6,11) dans l'exégèse de Grégoire de Nysse," Augustinianum 17 (1977) 193-199; V. Grossi, Tertulliano-Cipriano-gostino. Il Padre nostro, Rome 1980; DSp 12, 388-413; K.B. Schnurr, Hören und Handeln. Lateinische Auslegungen des Vaterunsers in der Alten Kirche bis zum 5. Jahrhundert, Freiburg B. 1985; S. Sabugal, El padrenuestro en la interpretación catequética antigua y moderna, Salamanca [6]2006 (It. tr.: Il Padrenostro nella catechesi antica e moderna, Palermo [3]1985); M.-B. von Stritzky, Studien zur Überlieferung und Interpretation des Vaterunsers in der frühchristlichen Literatur, Münster 1989; A.G. Hamman, Le Notre Père dans l'Église ancienne: choix de textes des Pères de l'Église, Paris 1995; TRE 34, 504-529 (bibl.); M. Philonenko, Le Notre Père: de la prière de Jésus à la prière des disciples, Paris 2001.

A. Pollastri

LOT (iconography). Lot, the biblical figure and nephew of Abraham, whom he accompanies to the land of Canaan (Gen 12:14ff.), a symbol of the just person who, living righteously among a sinful people, merited escape from the extermination of Sodom (Wis 10:6; 2 Pet 2:6-8). His first iconographic appearance is in the tombs of Via Dino Compagni in Rome (Ferrua, Vita Latina, plate XXX) in the act of fleeing from a flaming Sodom (Gen 19:24-26). On Lot's right is his wife, by now a pillar of salt. The catacomb is dated between 320 and 360. The mosaic panels which adorn the left wall of the central nave of S. Maria Maggiore in Rome represent the only depiction of the separation of Abraham from Lot. These mosaics date from the time of *Sixtus III (1st half of the 5th c.). A single example appears on the homonymous sarcophagus from St. Sebastian (Rep. 188), where Lot appears in tunic and pallium, with a beard, leading his daughters by the hand. Behind him is his wife, already hardened. There follows, to the right, a scene that has been variously interpreted as the entrance of the angels to the house of Lot, or the arrival of Lot at Zoar. The *sarcophagus, which marks the beginning of the so-called beautiful style, can be dated ca. 340. As for illuminated MSS, the scene of Lot may be found in the 6th-c. Vienna Genesis (fol. 9, plate 19), where we also find depicted angels who warn Lot of danger, and also in the Tours Pentateuch (fol. 18), of the early 7th c.

DACL IX, 2521-2527; LCI III, 107-112; L. von Hartel - S. Wickhoff, Die Wiener Genesis, Vienna 1895, pl. IV; L. De Bruyne, Il sarcofago di L. scoperto a S. Sebastiano: RivAC 27 (1951) 111; J. Porcher, in J. Hubert - J. Porcher -W.F. Volbach, L'Europa delle invasioni barbariche, Milan 1968, 128; G. Bovini, Mosaici paleocristiani delle chiese di Roma (secoli III-IV), Bologna 1971, 153; U. Könen, Die brennenden Stadt: Sodom in spätantiken Darstellungen, in Actes du XI^e Congrès Intern. d'Archéologie Chrétienne, II, Vatican City 1989, 1356-1367; TIP 204-205; M. Dulaey, Lot et sa femme, in Id., Le berger divin, in "Des forêts de symboles." L'initiation chrétienne et la Bible (I^er-VI^e siècle), Paris 2001, 229-241.

A.M. Di Nino

LOVE. The Greek terms that can cover different semantic areas of the concept of "love" are ἀγάπη (affection-love), στοργή (parental love), φιλία (friendship-love) and ἔρως (passionate love); in Latin they are basically caritas and amor (less closely, also benevolentia and pietas). In Hesiod's Theogony 120-122 and in the ancient Orphic cosmogonies, Eros, as a cosmic deity, is one of the first beings that appeared, either from Chaos and Gaia, or from Night and Tartarus. In Orphic Hymn 58, still in the 2nd c. AD, Eros is invoked as "the possessor of the keys of all things." Empedocles made of Love (Φιλότης) the cosmic force opposite to Enmity (Νεῖκος). Love becomes a pathos in the Sophists, e.g., in Gorgias's Encomium Helenae, where it is depicted as so powerful as to free its victims from any responsibility. *Plato developed an important and strongly influential theory of love (esp. ἔρως) in his Symposium and, partially, also in his Phaedrus. His "ladder of Eros" describes the progressive ascent of love: from love for a beautiful body to love for the beauty of all bodies, then love for the beauty of all souls, laws, sciences, up to the only science that has absolute beauty as its object, where the soul finds its good and happiness (Symp. 210A-E; Resp. 7,521DE). While vulgar Aphrodite is the love that does not see anything beyond the senses, celestial Aphrodite is the love that transcends sense-perceptible beauty and points to the noetic and eternal (Symp. 180D; Phaedr. 237E). In Diotima's myth of Eros in Plato's Symposium, love's mediating function between time and eternity, human and divine, contingent and absolute, sense-perceptible and intelligible is patent. Eros loves beauty and wisdom, but precisely because it is itself deprived of these. Plato stressed the human side of love, which, even if it is intellectual and spiritual and oriented toward the noblest and purest objects, is always a mark of lacking something; he is not interested in divine love; i.e., God's love for the beings that are inferior to the divine level. Plato's Symposium closely inspired both *Methodius's De virginitate and *Gregory of Nyssa's De anima et resurrectione, which is primarily an imitation of Plato's Phaedo. Indeed, Daniel Boyarin in the collection of essays Toward a Theology of Eros edited by Burrus and Keller criticizes Nygren's interpretation of the Symposium, arguing that Nygren was incorrect to conflate the concept of the "heavenly eros" described in Pausanias's speech with the more asceticized Eros theorized by Diotima, which must also be regarded as Plato's own view on Eros. This distinction has escaped other scholars as well, but is particularly relevant to the present discourse, as, acc. to Boyarin, Platonic love as defined by Diotima is in fact close to Christian love in the conception of ascetics in Late Antiquity. I find this reading convincing: it suggests there is no opposition but rather continuity between Plato's Symposium and Methodius's De virginitate.

*Aristotle did not ascribe love to God, who in his view has no interest in humans, but considered God to be the object of love as a final cause. Moreover, in interpersonal relationships, Aristotle put love as a necessary component in friendship (φιλία), the highest form of which is oriented not to usefulness or to pleasure but to the good of the beloved person. Both the early *Stoics and the Epicureans regarded friendship between wise men as the most important interpersonal relationship. But Middle and Late Stoicism, at least from Antipater of Tarsus onward, valued married love as a common path to virtue, characterized by concord (ὁμόνοια) and love (φιλία). There was a whole literary genre Περὶ γάμου, numbering among its representatives, e.g., Antipater, Hierocles, Seneca, Musonius and Plutarch as the author of Γαμικὰ παραγγέλματα. There were also many works On Passionate Love, Περὶ Ἔρωτος, e.g., by Cleanthes and Chrysippus; Plutarch wrote a Περὶ Ἔρωτος as well, now fragmentary, and an Ἐρωτικός, in which he dealt with the transformation of Eros into philia in marriage. The notion of philia was closely related to that of oikeiōsis, particularly developed by the Stoics, and esp. to the so-called social oikeiōsis* (in turn connected with the theory of "duties," or better, "appropriate acts" [kathēkonta]), the theory of which Hierocles the Stoic offers one of the most remarkable examples. There exists a debate among scholars about the notion of philia in the Greco-Roman world: Konstan has argued that philia was not only a social and formal bond, even of political nature, but also, and above all, a deep spiritual bond, reciprocal, and based on love for the other's virtue.

In the OT, the term ἔρως occurs only twice, in Pr 7:18 and 30:16, and the love terminology rather revolves around the terms ἀγάπη/ἀγαπᾶν. But God's love is directed to Israel as in a spousal relationship, always challenged by Israel's lack of fidelity (Amos). Israel, immediately after the Shema, receives the commandment to "love [ἀγαπήσεις] the Lord your God with all your heart, with all your soul, with all your strength" (Deut 6:5), in that it receives God's love: τὸ ἀγαπᾶν Κύριον ὑμᾶς (Deut 7:8). According to the most widespread interpretation, both Jewish and Christian, God's love for Israel (or the church) or for each human soul finds its highest expression, in the OT, in the Song of Songs. But God's love extends to all creatures: ἀγαπᾷς τὰ ὄντα πάντα, because God created them and keeps them in existence through his Spirit (Wis 11:23-26). In the Psalms, the psalmist, in turn, constantly proclaims his love for God and exhorts all to love God: ἀγαπήσατε τὸν Κύριον (Ps 30:24).

In the NT, the "commandment of love" is central: loving God and one's neighbor is said to subsume the whole Law and all the Prophets, i.e., all of the OT. The Synoptic gospels report Jesus' quotation of the Shema from Deut 6:4-5 in combination with the commandment to love the neighbor as oneself in Mt 22:37-40: "You shall love the Lord your God with all your heart and all your soul and all your mind: this is the main and first commandment. And the second is similar to this: You shall love your neighbor as yourself. It is on these two commandments that the whole Law and the Prophets depend." Likewise in Mk 12:29-33: "The first commandment is: 'Hear, O Israel: the Lord is our God, the Lord is one, and you shall love the Lord your God with all your heart, with all your soul, with all your mind and with all your strength.' And the second is the following: 'You shall love your neighbor as yourself.' There is no commandment greater than these. . . . [They are] more important than all burnt offerings and sacrifices." This combination makes of love the central focus of every relationship to God and other human beings. In Lk, the story of the good Samaritan (10:29-37) is told immediately after the citation of the double-love commandment (Lk 10:27-28). In the same gospel, Jesus extends the love commandment even to one's enemies: "Love [ἀγαπᾶτε] your enemies, do good to those who hate you, bless those who curse you, pray for those who abuse you. . . . Your reward will be great, and you will be children of the Most High, who is kind to the ungrateful and the wicked. Be merciful, just as your Father is merciful" (Lk 6:27-28, 35-36). The commandment of loving even one's enemies is given also in Mt 5:43-45, with a reference to Lev 19:18: "You have heard that it was said: You shall love [ἀγαπήσεις] your neighbor and hate your enemy, but I say to you: Love [ἀγαπᾶτε] your enemies and pray for those who persecute you, that you may be children of your Father who is in heaven, who has his sun shine forth over the wicked and the good, and he pours his rain over the just and the unrighteous." It is clear that the commandment of love for all humans is based on the presence of Christ in each human being (Mt 25:40-45).

In Jn, if possible, love is even more central. God's love is presented as the motive of the whole salvific economy in Jn 3:16: "God so loved [ἠγάπησεν] the world that he gave his only Son, that whoever believes in him should not perish but have eternal life." In Jn 13:1 God's love is transposed to Christ's love: "Jesus, . . . having loved his own who were in the world, he loved them to the end." In Jn 14:31 Jesus' words "I love the Father," ἀγαπῶ τὸν πατέρα, are a true hapax in the whole of Scripture. Of course, in John too the love commandment is expressed, and this with emphasis, in 13:34: "A new commandment I give you, that you love one another [ἀγαπᾶτε ἀλλήλους] even as I have loved you [ἠγάπησα ὑμᾶς]," although this was already said in Lev 19:18. The same commandment is repeated, with an explanation, in Jn 15:12-17: "This is my commandment, that you love [ἀγαπᾶτε] one another just as I have loved [ἠγάπησα] you. No one has greater love [ἀγάπην] than this, to lay down one's life for one's friends." In Jn 15:9-10 Jesus exhorts his disciples: "Abide in my love [ἐν τῇ ἀγάπῃ τῇ ἐμῇ]. If you keep my commandments, you will abide in my love, just as I have kept my Father's commandments and abide in his love [αὐτοῦ ἐν τῇ ἀγάπῃ]." Jn 16:27 is the sole exception in the verbal usage, for it employs φιλέω: "The Father himself loves [φιλεῖ] you, because you have loved [πεφιλήκατε] me." In all of Jn the evangelist is called "the disciple whom Jesus loved [ἠγάπα]," and in Jn 21 Jesus, before handing his sheep to Peter, tests only one thing: his love, and this three times, with three questions that balance Peter's threefold denial: "Simon son of John, do you love me?" Peter's love for Jesus will have as a direct consequence that he will die for him as a martyr, as is foretold in the same chapter.

The same focus on love returns in the first letter of John, where love is the only definition of God: "God is love [ἀγάπη], and those who abide in love abide in God, and God abides in them" (1 Jn 4:16). God is love first of all because love unites the Father, the Son and the Spirit. Our love imitates God's love. Those who say, "I love God," and hate their siblings are liars; for those who do not love a brother or sister whom they have seen, cannot love God, whom they have not seen. Those who love God must also love their brothers and sisters (1 Jn 4:16, 19-21). Both the gospel and the first letter of John particularly insist on the idea of abiding in love, both reciprocal love and God's and Christ's love. The absolute centrality of love in John comes as no surprise on the part of the author, to whom the very definition of God as ἀγάπη is due. Nevertheless, in the Johannine literature the commandment of loving one's enemies appears less stressed.

For Paul, ἀγάπη is the central dimension of Christian existence (see Gal 5:6). It is the greatest of all virtues; a famous hymn is even devoted to it in 1 Cor 13:1-13, acc. to which, if one has everything else, including faith itself, but lacks ἀγάπη, one lacks all. "Love is patient; love is kind; love is not envious or boastful or arrogant or rude. It does not insist on its own way; it is not irritable or resentful; it does not rejoice in wrongdoing, but rejoices in the truth. It bears all things, believes all things, hopes all things, endures all things. Love never falls [ἡ ἀγάπη οὐδέποτε (ἐκ) πίπτει]" (1 Cor 13:4-8). Love never ends, and in the telos only ἀγάπη will remain. Paul is adamant that absolutely nothing will separate us from God's love: "I am convinced that neither death nor life, nor angels, nor rulers, nor things present, nor things to come, nor powers, nor height, nor depth, nor anything else in all creation, will be able to separate us from the love [ἀγάπης] of God in Christ Jesus our Lord" (Rom 8:38-39). Love is eternal like God. And what counts for Christians and their salvation must be πίστις δι' ἀγάπης ἐνεργουμένη, "faith that is active through love."

There can be no doubt that both the LXX and the NT always use ἀγάπη and ἀγαπάω to express both God's (and Christ's) love for us and our love for God and for each other. There is no use of στοργή nor ἔρως (apart from the exception I have already indicated for the OT). But στοργή is implicit in God's parental love, which is present in both the OT and the NT, and in Jesus' love, which is parental as well: he compares himself to a hen or another bird with chicks all gathered under her wings (Mt 23:37: ὃν τρόπον ὄρνις ἐπισυνάγει τὰ νοσσία αὐτῆς ὑπὸ τὰς πτέρυγας; see Lk 13:34) and, esp. in John, calls his disciples "small children," τεκνία, παιδία. Likewise, Paul depicts himself as a father and even a mother of those whom he has converted: he calls himself πατήρ, saying that his disciples may have many teachers but not many fathers, since he is their only father who begot them into the faith. But he also has maternal instincts or σπλάγχνα, generates his spiritual babies, his τεκνία, in a painful childbirth (Gal 4:19), and gives milk to his little children (1 Cor 3:2). In addition to this deep parental love (στοργή), also passionate love or ἔρως is present in the Bible, and is strongly implied in the mystical reading of the Song of Songs and in God's spousal relation to Israel in the prophets, too. So, ἀγάπη is lexically preponderant, but all forms of love are present in God acc. to the Bible. The Fathers will remember this. Moreover, Platonic fathers will have to face a fundamental difference between Plato's conception of love and Christian love:

Platonic Eros is an acquisitive force, whereas Christian love is gift and has its first example in God, who is Love itself, always overflowing, to the point that it offers the Son for the salvation of humanity. God was the first to love us, in a completely gratuitous way, which also explains the creation.

In early Christian literature, the love for God and for one's neighbors is identified with the way of life in opposition to the way of death (e.g., Epistle of Barnabas 19). *Clement of Rome and *Ignatius developed the meaning of ἀγάπη also with the help of biblical *exegesis, the former in Ep. ad Cor. 49-55, the latter in Ep. ad Eph. 3; Ep ad Rom. 7. According to Polycarp, following Christ means "to love what he loved" (Ep. ad Phil. 2,2). Ignatius, remarkably, uses not only ἀγάπη but also ἔρως, in reference to his ardent love for Christ, which is leading him straight to martyrdom: in his Epistula ad Romanos 7 he writes, in reference to Jesus: "My Love [ἔρως] has been crucified."

*Origen of Alexandria seems to have been the first to fully develop the theme of mystical ἔρως and the mystical marriage between Christ and the soul, in his commentary on the Song of Songs—a work in which, acc. to *Jerome, Origen, who had already outclassed all other exegetes, outclassed himself—and in many other places, also taking up Plato's conception of love, as is reflected in his very choice of the ἔρως/ἐρᾶν terminology along with the ἀγάπη vocabulary. It is from Origen that *Gregory of Nyssa would derive his own use of ἔρως in reference to the intensity of the love between the soul and God. The theme of the mystical marriage between the soul and Christ is developed by Origen in many passages, among which are some that comment on the parable of the ten virgins, such as Comm. in Matth. 17,33 and Comm. in Matth. ser. 63 and 64: Origen speaks of the "Logos-bridegroom," a theme that will be taken up also by Methodius. The ἔρως theme in Origen is not simply a yielding to Plato, but it must be read, and completely transfigured, in a mystical light. The principal goal of a saint's love is "the knowledge of Christ's love" (In Eph. 15). The unity in love that will obtain again in the end was lost at the beginning: this is explained by Origen in various passages, one of the most representative of which is Princ. 2,8,2-3, where he reports the traditional etymology (attested in Aristotle, *Chrysippus and *Philo) of ψυχή from ψῦχος, ψῦξις, "cold; getting cold." For, the νόες, getting cold in their love for God, became souls and turned to sin. This "getting cold" is a lack of love for God. And lacking love, for Origen, is the most serious sin; it marks an estrangement from God. It is provoked by the pride of believing that we are worthy of the Good, which instead comes only from God, who thus deserves all our love. The estrangement from love brought about a different habit as well: that of doing good not for love, but out of fear, acc. to a distinction that has Pauline roots and is typical of Origen. Those who are motivated by fear instead of love in their actions are spiritually immature persons. With an antithesis inherited from Philo and Paul, in Hom. in Gen. 7,4 Origen draws a distinction between those who adhere to God willingly and out of love, as children of the free woman (Sarah), and those who do so out of fear and for threats, as children of the slave (Hagar). These are also those who believe that God punishes sinners out of anger.

Thus, acc. to Origen, the beginning was marked by an estrangement from love, and its partial replacement with fear; the end will be the voluntary recovery of perfect love. What is more, acc. to Origen, it will be love that, in the end, will prevent all rational creatures from a new fall (caritas omnes creaturas continebit a lapsu), although this does not at all mean that rational creatures will lose their free will. Indeed, in Comm. in Rom. 5,10,158-240 Origen begins with a refutation of those who thought that Christ's sacrifice would have to be repeated over and over again—an accusation that was curiously leveled against him during the "Origenistic controversy," whereas it is clear that Origen himself disavowed it. The point of Origen's opponents is based on the possibility of ever new falls on the part of rational creatures. Origen is adamant that this is not at all what he personally teaches and in fact cannot be the case (easdem etiam in futuris saeculis dispensationes a Christo repetenda esse arbitrantur. Sed ad haec nos breviter prout possumus respondebimus). Origen's reply is grounded in two main tenets: (1) it is impossible that Christ's sacrifice should be reiterated, because, even though it occurred once and for all, its effectiveness was such as to reach absolutely all rational creatures and all times (αἰῶνες); therefore, there will be no need to repeat it (5,10,235-236 and 187-195). Hence, it is also clear that for Origen the salvation of all rational creatures entirely depends, not on a metaphysical necessity, but on Christ's cross. (2) It is not the case that the fall of all rational creatures, humans and angels, will take place over and over again, indefinitely, because there will come an end to all αἰῶνες, which will be the apokatastasis, and in that condition no fall will occur any longer, since perfect love (ἀγάπη) will prevent this, although all rational creatures will retain their free will: Quod autem sit quod in futuris saeculis teneat arbitrii libertatem ne rursum corruat in peccatum brevi nos sermone apostolus docet dicens:

"Caritas numquam cadit." Idcirco enim et fide et spe maior caritas dicitur, quia sola erit per quam delinqui ultra non poterit. Si enim in id anima perfectionis ascenderit ut ex toto corde suo et ex tota mente sua et ex totis uiribus suis diligat Deum et proximum suum tamquam se ipsam, ubi erat peccati locum? . . . caritas omnem creaturam continebt a lapsu, tunc cum erit Deus omnia in omnibus. . . . Tanta caritatis vis est ut ad se omnia trahat . . . , maxime cum caritatis causas prior nobis dederit Deus qui unico filio suo non pepercit, sed pro nobis omnibus tradidit (5,10,195-226).

Origen quotes 1 Cor 13:8: ἡ ἀγάπη οὐδέποτε (ἐκ) πιπτει. Love will prevent new falls because perfect love excludes all possible sin. To the objection that ἀγάπη could not impede Satan's fall, or Adam's, Origen replies that this took place not in the apokatastasis, but before the manifestation of Christ's ἀγάπη: vel ille qui Lucifer fuit et in caelo oriebatur vel ille qui immaculatus erat a nativitate sua et cum cherubin positus labi potuit antequam erga beneficia Filii Dei caritatis vinculis stringeretur (5,10,227-230). At the beginning, love was not yet perfect: it will be really perfect only in the telos, and thanks to Christ's work. This is also one of the reasons why Origen thought that the end would be not only similar to, but even better than, the beginning. In this passage Origen also argues against one of the typical assumptions of the supporters of eternal damnation; namely, that one rational creature's free will may endure forever in the rejection of the Good. Origen in his reply has recourse to love, again. Indeed, he responds with Paul's revelation that absolutely nothing will be able to separate us from God's love, not even death, thus, a fortiori, not even our free will: Ad hunc namque perfectionis gradum ascenderat apostolus Paulus et in hoc stans confidens dicebat: "Quis enim nos separabit a caritate [=ἀγάπη] Dei quae est in Christo Iesu? . . . neque vita neque mors neque praesentia neque futura neque angeli neque virtutes neque altitudo neque profundum neque creatura alia poterit nos separare a caritate Dei quae est in Christo Iesu domino nostro.' Ex quibus omnibus evidenter ostenditur quod, si haec omnia quae enumeravit apostolus separare nos non possunt a caritate Dei . . . , multo magis libertas arbitrii nos ab eius caritate separare non poterit (5,10,212-222). If not even death, not even angels and demons will be able to separate us from God's love, neither will human free will be able to do so, because God's love overcomes all. For, "even if this faculty is part of the natural order, love's power is so great as to draw everything to itself [tanta caritatis vis est ut ad se omnia trahat], to lead all together to itself, and to overcome all powers. . . . Therefore, rightly, love that alone is greater than all the rest will prevent every creature from a new fall. Then God will be "all in all" [ideo merito caritas, quae sola omnium maior est, omnem creaturam continebit a lapsu. Tunc erit Deus omnia in omnibus]. The souls will then be enflamed by God's love, being in God, just as the soul of Christ is, of which Origen speaks in Princ. 2,6,6: "That soul which, like iron on fire, always dwells in the Logos, always in Wisdom, always in God, all that it does, feels and comprehends is God. Therefore, we cannot say that it is liable to alteration and change, because it is incessantly inflamed by the union with the divine Logos and has acquired the possession of immutability." All souls will achieve this condition in the apokatastasis, and will be inflamed by divine love.

Origen's model was followed by Gregory of Nyssa, not only in his commenting on the Song of Songs as an *allegory of the mystical love that unites Christ to the church and Christ to each soul, but also in his use of the ἔρως terminology in reference to divine love. He too finds that a particularly intense (ἐπιτεταμένη) ἀγάπη can be named ἔρως, as he actually does in his homily 13 on the Song of Songs, where he calls Christ the "fiery arrow of ἔρως" and "archer of ἔρως." *Gregory of Nazianzus, too, would follow Origen's vocabulary and conception of love: he described the deep affective relationship between him and *Basil in terms of φιλία, but also, repeatedly, ἔρως and πόθος, passionate love and intense desire. In chapters 19-20 of Or. 43 the deep intensity of their affection, oriented toward God, constitutes the norm of their love (ἔρωτος νόμος). This is why Gregory can say that he and Basil had as their guide "God and desire" (θεῷ καὶ πόθῳ). Even after Basil's death, Gregory confesses that while speaking he fears to be overwhelmed by his πόθος.

In his Homilies on the Song of Songs Gregory of Nyssa naturally focuses on the theme of spiritual love. In his fourth homily he mentions the definition in 1 Jn 4:8, that God is love (ἀγάπη), which he mentions again in his seventh homily, where God is said to be both "Mother" and ἀγάπη, and in the last sentence of Homily 12: "But God is ἀγάπη, as John says." At the beginning of Homily 13, Gregory declares love to be the main factor of both Christ's sacrifice and our salvation: "It is out of love for us sinners that Christ died. . . . For God is love, as it was said: the love that enters one's heart through the arrow of faith. . . . This dart is faith, which is active through love." God is love, and the soul that submits to God's love is saved, because, as Origen already maintained, voluntary submission to God coincides with salvation: the soul "wishes to enter the house . . . then, once it has done so, it leaps again to what is greater. For it wants to be subjected to Love [ἀγάπη]. But Love [ἀγάπη] is God, as John stated: if the soul submits to God, this is its salvation" (Homily 4). For, as Gregory explains soon after, the soul's continual ascent in love for God fulfills God's will, which, acc. to 1 Tim 2:4, consists in the salvation of all human beings.

Gregory thinks that this will shall certainly be realized, and its fulfillment will take place through love: "The discourse is an exhortation, in the form of an oath, to let love always grow and increase, until the will is filled with the One who wants all human beings to be saved and to reach the knowledge of truth. . . . Love must be always awake and alert, until the bridegroom's will is fulfilled: and this will of his is that all human beings be saved and reach the knowledge of truth." This passage, moreover, clearly indicates that the doctrine of apokatastasis is alive and well even in Gregory's last works. Notably, in Homily 7 the same universally salvific will is ascribed also to the church, who "imitates the Lord in wanting all human beings to be saved and to reach the knowledge of the truth." The same idea returns toward the end of Homily 10, where God's will is identified with the salvation of all humans, realized by Christ also thanks to the adherence of our free will. (This conception is the same as Origen's: the Good must be chosen freely, but all in the end, after the due purification, will choose it freely.) Christ says, "'My food is that I do my Father's will.' Now, what is God's will is evident: 'God wants all human beings to be saved and to reach the knowledge of truth.' Thus, food for Christ consists in our salvation. Our own fruit is our free will." Gregory, like Origen, strongly insists on the fact that our own adherence must be free, e.g., in Homily 12: "Resurrection would not have been effective if it had not been preceded by voluntary mortification. . . . The mortification of bodily passions, which had its origin in the innermost heart, for a free decision."

Outside his Homilies on the Song of Songs, Gregory of Nyssa mostly uses the term ἀγάπη in reference to divine love, both the love of God and Christ for humans and vice versa. Especially in his De anima et resurrectione, he must face a question: if all passions (πάθη) are to vanish in the end, and the ideal of impassibility (ἀπάθεια) will be attained by all, how is it possible that love remains in the end? The solution is simple: ἀγάπη will remain even in the telos because ἀγάπη is no passion, no πάθος. As Macrina explains, desire and anger, which correspond to Plato's major subdivisions of the human soul, are per se neutral movements of the soul: if they are governed by reason, they will not serve vice, and will produce, not passions (πάθη) but good emotions (εὐπάθειαι). Love cannot be eliminated as a πάθος; otherwise, we could not tend to God; even anger can be used positively, as an arm against evil (60A–68A), but while this and other movements of the soul will be extinguished in the end, because they will be useless, love will remain: our love for God, and God's love for us (96A). That ἀπάθεια does not exclude love, which will remain after our perfecting, is repeated by Gregory also in his Homily 1 on the Song of Songs: the soul "must gaze at the inaccessible beauty of divine nature, and love it as much as is proper to the sympathy of the body toward what is consanguineous to it, but transforming its passion into ἀπάθεια. Thus, once every corporeal attitude has been extinguished, our minds burn out of love only for the Spirit, fomented by that fire which the Lord came to bring upon earth."

In De anima, 92A–96A, Macrina affirms that, after the purification of the soul through the imitation of God, hope, memory and desire will vanish (ἐλπίς, μνήμη, ἐπιθυμία), which were necessary in this life but will be unnecessary in the next, just as they are unnecessary to God, who desires nothing, needs nothing and is beyond all goods: only love (ἀγάπη) will remain, or a "loving disposition" (ἀγαπητικὴ διάθεσις, 93C), which is the only force that relates the soul to God: a "loving movement and activity" (ἀγαπητικὴ κίνησις τε καὶ ἐνεργεια) from which any desire (ἐπιθυμία) is excluded (93C–96A). Similarly, Gregory in De mortuis (GNO 9,62) states that in the next world, after the destruction of our body oppressed by passions, our desire or ὁρμή will be directed to its true object: "For love, there, will be incessantly directed to the true Beauty" (ἐκεῖ γὰρ ὁ ἔρως τοῦ ἀληθινοῦ κάλλους ὁ ἄπαυστος). In the same work Gregory indeed explains that it is impossible that human free will remain in evil forever, because the desire for what is evil cannot endure forever, insofar as satiety [κόρος] and tedium appear. Only the desire for the Good can last forever, because it produces satisfaction without creating κόρος: "Our appetite [ὄρεξις], purified from all these things, will orient itself toward one single object of will, desire and love. It will not entirely abolish our natural impulses to these things, but it will reorient them toward participation in immaterial goods. For there will be an incessant love for true Beauty, a laudable desire for the treasures of Wisdom, the beautiful and noble love for glory that is achieved in the communion of God's kingdom, a sublime passion that will never find satiety and will never be deluded, in its good desire, by the satiety [κόρος] of these objects."

In Homily 13 on the Song of Songs, indeed, Gregory defines ἔρως as "an intense ἀγάπη" (GNO VI 383, 9: ἐπιτεταμένη ἀγάπη ὁ ἔρως λέγεται). And in Homily 1 on the Song of Songs he invokes Scripture in support of his own use of ἔρως for the soul's love for God: "Wisdom clearly speaks in the Proverbs, when it describes love [ἔρωτα] for divine Beauty: this love is irreproachable: it is a passion without passion for incorporeal realities [ἀπαθὲς ἐπὶ τῶν ἀσωμάτων τὸ πάθος]" (GNO 6,23,12). To stress that divine ἔρως is not to be confused with earthly and corporeal ἔρως, Gregory even speaks of an opposition between these two forms of ἔρως: "Love for God arises from realities that are opposed to those for which corporeal desire arises," ἐκ τῶν ἐναντίων τῇ σωματικῇ ἐπιθυμίᾳ τὸ θεῖον ἔρωτα γίνεσθαι (GNO 6,192,1).

Our strong love for God, however, will never equate to God's love for us. All of God's actions and decisions in respect to us are motivated exclusively by this love. This is why Gregory can say: "It is not the case that God's judgment, as its main purpose, brings suffering to sinners, but, for its part, . . . it brings about only what is good, by separating this from evil and by attracting the sinner to itself, in view of his or her participation in beatitude. It is rather the violent separation of what was mixed that turns out to be painful" (De anima 100C). The more the soul is immersed in sin, the more difficult and painful will be the process of liberation, but this process, far from being considered by Gregory as an eternal perdition, is an action performed by God out of love for the soul. Macrina explains: "It seems to me that the soul must suffer whenever God's power, out of love for human beings, extracts what belongs to it from the ruins of irrationality and materiality. For, to my mind, it is not out of hatred, or for punishment against a sinful life, that sinners experience pains at the hands of the One who claims and attracts to itself all the beings that came into existence thanks to it and for it. The Godhead, indeed, as its main and best purpose, attracts the soul to itself, who is the source of all beatitude; though, as a collateral phenomenon, the above-mentioned state of suffering arises for those who are pulled in such a way." God's primary will is not punishment, but the attraction of the soul to the Good, originating from God's love. Now, if all of God's actions are motivated by love, it is because God is ἀγάπη itself: John's definition is repeated by Gregory in his Homily 7 on the Song of Songs: "God is neither male nor female: for how could it be possible to conceive of anything of this kind concerning the nature of God, when not even for us, who are human beings, this characteristic does not endure forever, but, when all of us are one and the same thing in Christ, we shall take off the marks of this physical difference, together with the whole old ἄνθρωπος? . . . If we call God 'Mother' or 'Love,' we are not mistaken; for God is love [ἀγάπη], as John has stated."

Gregory manifestly takes up Origen's demonstration that in the apokatastasis love will prevent further falls because "Love never falls [ἡ ἀγάπη οὐδέποτε ἐκπίπτει]." In In illud: Tunc et Ipse Filius, 13-14 (Downing), Gregory declares that "nobody will fall out of the kingdom of God" (μηδενὸς ἀποπίπτοντος). Gregory also recovers Origen's opposition between love and fear—which Origen in turn drew from Paul—the final vanishing of fear and triumph of love, and the emphasis on unity in love. In Homily 15 on the Song of Songs, Gregory insists, like Origen and on the basis of Paul, that "God will receive each one in his or her order, attributing [rewards or purifications] to each one acc. to his or her deserts." Then Gregory quotes Paul's words in Rom 8:35 and 38-39, also cited by Origen: "Nothing will ever be able to separate us from the love of God in Jesus Christ: neither life nor death, neither present nor future, nothing else among all existing things." And, after underscoring the difference, already emphasized by Origen, between doing good for love and doing it for fear, he declares: "But if, as it is written [1 Jn 4:18], love [ἀγάπη] will completely chase out fear, and fear, by transforming itself, will become love, then it is found that what is saved constitutes a unity [μονὰς τὸ σῳζόμενον] thanks to its being connatural with what is the only Good [ἐν τῇ πρὸς τὸ μόνον ἀγαθὸν συμφυΐᾳ], and all are reciprocally unified [πάντων ἀλλήλοις ἑνωθέντων] in perfection" (GNO 6,466-467). Perfection is given by the Holy Spirit, who already in Origen has this function. For Jesus "said that all will be one and the same thing, naturally joined to the One who is the only true Good, so that, thanks to the unity in the Holy Spirit, as the apostle says, they will be joined all together in the bond of peace, and all will become one body and one spirit, thanks to the one hope to which they have been called. . . . For all souls of every class have in common the rush to reach this beatitude," because "the natural impulse toward what is blessed and praised is common to all . . . until, when all who look at the same telos of their desire have become one and the same thing, no evil [κακία] will remain in anyone. Then God will be all in all," because "all, thanks to reciprocal union, will be united in the communion with God in Jesus Christ."

That the final union of all rational creatures in the apokatastasis will be a work of love is made clear by Gregory in In Inscriptiones Psalmorum 1.9: "The passage in which it is said, 'Love the Lord with sweet-sounding cymbals' seems to me to illustrate the union of our nature with the angels. For, when human nature will be restored to its original condition, the union of angelic and human, with their reciprocal encounter, will produce that sweet sound of thanksgiving. . . . For this is the sense of the union of one cymbal with the other: one is the angels' ultramundane nature, and the other is the humans' rational nature. Sin separated them from one another, but when God's love has united them again, they will again make that hymn of praise resound." Already Origen indicated that the τέλος will be unity or ἑνότης, and that "the unity is achieved through love and truth [δι' ἀγάπης καὶ ἀληθείας]" (Fragm. in Jer. 28).

For it is love that led Christ to incarnation, as Gregory explains: "Out of love for us, who for our foolishness were corrupted in our being, Christ accepted to be created like us, in order to lead again toward the Being [εἰς τὸ ὄν] what had ended up with being outside the Being [τὸ ἔξω τοῦ ὄντος γενόμενος]" (De vita Moysis, 2,175). No one will remain "outside the Being" (ἔξω τοῦ ὄντος): this, because the Being coincides with the Good and with God, is tantamount to saying what Gregory asserts in his In Illud: Tunc et Ipse Filius: that no being will remain "outside the number of the saved" (μηδὲν ἔξω τῶν σωζωμένων).

An author who knew Origen's work well, and whose work was well known to Gregory of Nyssa, was Methodius (end of the 3rd—beginning of the 4th c.), whose Symposium, a dialogue, is closely inspired by Plato's dialogue of the same title. Like that of Plato, Methodius's work is also devoted to love, and in particular to spiritual love, whose chief expression is the ascetic life in which chastity and virginity are a core aspect. The final hymn to the Christ-Logos is dedicated to the celebration of chastity: here this theme is linked to the recovery of the original beatitude in the telos. Indeed, the ideal proposed is, "while staying in the world, not to be in the world, but to have reached, in one's mind and will, the congregation of those who are in heaven." Methodius delineates love as an ascending ladder of perfection, which leads to unity with the mystic bridegroom. This is clearly inspired by Plato's ladder of Eros in his Symposium, in a constant ascent to the Good itself (αὐτοαγαθόν), whose visible image is Beauty (καλόν).

This reading of Plato's Symposium was certainly suggested to Methodius by Origen. The latter understood this dialogue of Plato's as an exhortation to a spiritual ascent, which is the same that is offered by Methodius. In the prologue to his commentary on the Song of Songs, Origen indeed refers to Plato's Symposium when he speaks of learned Greeks in search of the truth on the nature of love, who wrote many things, also in the form of dialogues, showing that "the essence of love is nothing but the faculty for leading the soul from earth to the utmost heights of heaven, and that it is impossible to reach the utmost happiness unless one is motivated by the desire of love" (non aliud esse amoris vim nisi quae animam de terris ad fastigia caeli celsa perducat, nec ad summam posse beatitudinem perveniri nisi amoris desiderio provocante). That Origen is speaking of Plato is even clearer from what he adds: Quaestiones de hoc quasi in conviviis propositae referuntur, inter eos, puto, inter quos non ciborum, sed verborum convivia geruntur.

It is obvious that there is no opposition between Plato's treatment of love in his Symposium and Methodius's treatment of pureness, chastity and virginity, ἁγνεία, and παρθενία in his own Symposium, all the more in that the ideal of virginity in Methodius's view is much deeper and broader than the simple preservation of physical integrity, and that Plato's love finds its development in the mystical love for Christ. Chastity, which is even assimilated to martyrdom in Methodius (Symp. 7,3), has its example in Christ, who "preserved incorrupt in virginity the flesh that he took upon himself. . . . The Logos, with its incarnation, became the supreme virgin, just as it is the supreme Shepherd and Prophet of the church" (1,5). This virginity must be understood not only in a physical sense but also, and eminently, in a spiritual sense: it reflects the purity of the soul that tends to its union with Christ-Logos, the divine bridegroom. In 1,1 Methodius explains that "it is not enough to preserve one's body unsullied, because we should not show greater care for the temple than for God's image, but we should care for our souls." The consecrated virgin should be holy "both in her body and in her spirit."

Likewise, in 6,3 the necessity of keeping one's senses pure is attached to virginity, and in 6,2 virginity is considered in a spiritual sense as the best way to recover the image of God, which is present in all human beings, in all its pureness, acc. to a conception that will be particularly developed by Gregory of Nyssa, along the lines of Origen. For virginity is "to maintain this beauty intact and inviolate, as it was formed by God, who created it, imitating the eternal and intelligible nature of which the human being is image and likeness [εἰκὼν καὶ ὁμοίωσις] and will become a glorious and holy image, will pass on from here to heaven, to the city of the blessed, and will become a glorious and holy image, and will dwell there as in a sanctuary." The eminently spiritual nature of virginity, which preserves the image of God in us, is manifest in 2,6, where the human being is said to be the "rational and living image" of God the Creator, and in 6,1, where the soul, in that it is in the image of God, is said to have a rational beauty. In 4, chastity is said to be the best way to "restore [ἀποκαθίσημι] the human being to heaven, and lead it to incorruptibility and reconciliation with God." It is a "means of salvation that guides our lives," which was given us by God as a "most glorious help."

In the third speech among those presented by the virgins, St. Paul's admonitions are mentioned: Paul himself is presented as "the bride of Christ and mother of the believers," and his preference for virginity over marriage is praised. In the second speech, the reader is reminded that marriage too was instituted by God, although we should always keep our mind oriented toward the transformation of our bodies into the likeness of angels, when human beings "will no more marry, acc. to the infallible words of the Lord." It is esp. in 5,4,5 that Methodius explains in a detailed way what spiritual virginity is: it is the greatest decision of all, one's entire consecration to the Lord, "when not only do I endeavor to maintain my flesh pure from any venereal union, but also to refrain from other kinds of sins: if I close my ears to calumny and open them to God, I have offered my ears to God; I keep my heart pure by offering all my thoughts to God . . . abstaining from haughtiness and anger." In the final dialogue between two virgins, Gregorion and Eubulion, the former observes that it is necessary to preserve pure not only the body but also the heart, which the Holy Spirit inhabits.

The final Hymn to the Christ-Logos himself is a sort of mystical epithalamium, describing the mystical love that characterizes the choice of virginity. In all of it, and in all of the Symposium, esp. in Agatha's speech, the echo of the gospel parable of the wise virgins is at work. The epithalamium genre also explains the rich terminology concerning marriage and love that characterizes this hymn: notably, it comprises not only ἀγάπη, but also ἔρως and πόθος. This hymn celebrates Christ's mystical marriage, not only with the church, but also with each soul, acc. to both exegetical lines found in Origen's commentary on the Song of Songs. In Methodius's Symposium, the theme of individual love between the soul and Christ is present, not only in the final hymn, but already in the course of the dialogue (in 6,2 and 6,5), where the soul, thanks to this love and its mystical union with Christ, obtains the crown of incorruptibility and immortality, woven with the flowers of wisdom. Christ passionately loves (ἐράω) the beauty of chastity or ἁγνεία (1,39).

The soul's love for the Logos and its beauty is specifically described by Methodius as an "intense desire" (πόθος), in strophe E of the final Hymn: the Logos' beauty is designated as χάρις, which is not only beauty but also the main performer of salvation, for both Paul and Origen. It is not mere chance that in the same passage another fundamental soteriological conception of Origen's appears: the notion, founded on 1 Cor 15:28—one of Origen's favorite passages in support of his theory of universal salvation—that God will be all good things (πάντα) in the perfection of apokatastasis. In Comm. in Io. 1,9,52, moreover, Origen applied this idea specifically to Christ in the context of a reflection on his ἐπίνοιαι: "We shall understand how Jesus is many good things" (συνήσομεν πῶς πολλὰ ἀγαθά ἐστιν ὁ Ἰησοῦς). Methodius, in turn, presenting the life characterized by love for the Logos as a preparation and prefiguration of the apokatastasis, states that Christ is all good things (πάντα) for the soul absorbed by his love. Gregory of Nyssa, too, drew on Origen's equation between Christ and all good things, just as he took from Origen the use of 1 Cor 15:28 in support of the apokatastasis: "All hope for good things [πᾶσα ἀγαθῶν ἐλπὶς] lies in Christ, in whom we have learned that there are all the treasures of good things [ἐν ᾧ πάντας εἶναι τοὺς θεσαυροὺς τῶν ἀγαθῶν]" (De vita Mos. 2,248).

Gregory of Nyssa was inspired by Methodius's Symposium, and of course by Origen, for his De virginitate, which, as Gregory himself states, is an encomium (prol. 1, GNO 8/1,248). Like Origen and Methodius, Gregory describes virginity and ascetical life, for both men and women, as a mystical marriage with Christ. Like Methodius, moreover, Gregory also stresses that virginity is much more than mere physical purity and indeed encompasses all aspects of ascetical life (18,5, GNO 8/1,320-322).

It is no accident that such a positive evaluation of spiritual ἔρως, and the wish to find its justification in the Bible, is evident in authors who were mystics, such as Origen, Gregory of Nyssa and, as I shall show, ps.-*Dionysius. They all had a good knowledge of Plato, too, and transposed his discourse on ἔρως to the Christian spiritual plane.

*Evagrius of Pontus, who, at the end of the 4th c., was strongly influenced by both Origen and Gregory of Nyssa, and was one of the main supporters of the doctrine of apokatastasis, in his Letter to Anatolius 61 and 65 joined this doctrine to his theory of love, making love the revealer of the image of God in each human being, of the eviction of evil, and of the eventual apokatastasis: "Love makes God's image, conformed to the archetype, evident to us in each human being, even when the spirit of evil endeavors to degrade someone before you. . . . A time will come in which evil will be consumed." This is perfectly consistent with Evagrius's main tenet in his Kephalaia Gnostika: "There was a time when evil did not exist, and there will be a time when, likewise, it will no more exist, whereas there was no time when virtue did not exist, and there will be no time when it will not exist. For the germs of virtue are impossible to destroy" (1,40-41).

*Diadochus of Photice also connected love to the theology of the image, and—following Origen—he did so precisely through the final and voluntary attainment of each one's likeness to God. In ch. 4 of his 100 Chapters on Spiritual Perfection he states that "every human being is created in the image [εἰκών] of God. The attainment of likeness [ὁμοίωσις] to God is conceded to those who submit their freedom to God through a great love. We do not belong to ourselves anymore, when we are similar to the One who, through love, has reconciled us with God." Likewise in ch. 78: "God's grace, by means of baptism, with infinite love resumes to draw the lines of the divine image in order to bring the image [εἰκών] in the human being to the future perfect likeness [ὁμοίωσις]."

The soul's love for God seen as an infinite progression, along the lines of Gregory of Nyssa's conception, will be found again, e.g., in *John Climacus, who defines love as "an abyss of light, a spring of fire: the more it gushes, the thirstier it makes those who are already thirsty. . . . This is why love is an eternal progression" (Ladder of Paradise 30, 197-201).

Among the Latin Fathers, it is surely *Augustine who offers the most developed theology of love. In his writings, both caritas/diligere and amor/amare are used and play a substantial role, although sometimes they seem to be equivalent. In the Latin translations of the Bible, both in the Vulgate and in the Vetus Latina, which of course was used by Augustine, both terms are represented, but with an overwhelming prevalence of caritas and diligere, which regularly render ἀγάπη and ἀγαπᾶν. Caritas is also the term that Augustine often uses in his homilies, when he addresses his audience with caritas vestra, "your love." When he speaks of reciprocal love among Christians, he generally uses caritas: e.g., in De moribus ecclesiae catholicae et de moribus Manichaeorum Augustine never uses amor, but he uses caritas twice, in 14,32 in a quotation from Paul, where Paul had ἀγάπη (Si enim propter cibum frater tuus contristatur, non iam secundum caritatem ambulas. Noli cibo tuo illum perdere, pro quo Christus mortuus est), and in 14,35 in his own comment on this passage (Apparet igitur, ut opinor, quo fine a carnibus et a vino sit abstinendum. . . . Ad comprimendam delectationem. . . . Ad tuendam infirmitatem, propter illa quae sacrificantur atque libantur. Et quod maxime commendandum est, propter caritatem, ne imbecilliorum ab his continentium offendatur infirmitas).

If caritas is designated for interpersonal relationships, amor denotes a strong love for God or for oneself (here I see the same connotation of ἔρως as a strong ἀγάπη that I have pointed out in Origen's and Gregory of Nyssa's linguistic use): amor Dei usque ad contemptum sui is opposed by him to amor sui usque ad contemptum Dei; the first builds up the "city of God," whereas the second has built the earthly city (Civ. Dei 14,28). And in De doctr Chr. 3,10 he proposes the synthesis of "love and knowledge of God and of one's neighbor." Human perfection and the good for each human being is attained when, by the increase of the love thanks to which we live well, the other love, due to which we live badly, diminishes, until we are restored to perfection and the whole of our life is transformed into good" (Civ. Dei 11,28).

Drawing on 1 Jn 4:20 Augustine in his Homilies on the Gospel of John 17,8 explains that it is through love for neighbor that one can see God. In these homilies (123,4-5), Augustine, in agreement with his contrast between amor sui usque ad contemptum Dei and amor Dei usque ad contemptum sui, opposes loving Christ to loving oneself and the other things in the world. It is notable that, while in Jesus' question to Peter and Peter's answer Augustine uses diligere and amare respectively, acc. to the Latin translation of the gospel, in his own comment he uses amare in reference to loving oneself or Christ, as he also does in De civitate Dei: Qui hoc animo pascunt oves Christi ut suas velint esse non Christi, se convincuntur amare, non Christum, vel gloriandi . . . non obediendi et subveniendi et Deo placendi caritate . . . apostolus gemit sua quaerere non quae Iesu Christi. Nam quid est aliud, "Diligis me? Pasce oves meas," quam si diceretur: Si me diligis, non te pascere cogita, sed oves meas sicut meas pasce, non sicut tuas; gloriam meam in eis quaere, non tuam; dominium meum, non tuum; lucra mea, non tua, ne sis in eorum societate qui pertinent ad tempora periculosa, seipsos amantes, et caetera quae huic malorum initio connectuntur? Cum enim dixisset apostolus: Erunt enim homines seipsos amantes, secutus adiunxit: Amatores pecuniae, elati . . . Haec omnia mala ab eo velut fonte manant, quod primum posuit: seipsos amantes. Merito dicitur Petro: Diligis me? Et respondet: Amo te

. . . Non ergo nos, sed ipsum amemus (§ 5).

Indeed, soon afterward, Augustine stresses the difference between loving oneself and loving God, but at the same time he explains that loving God indeed coincides with loving oneself, since God's love includes all other forms of love: Quisquis seipsum, non Deum amat, non se amat; et quisquis Deum, non seipsum amat, ipse se amat. Whenever we love, we love God; by loving another person, we love God in that person. This is because God is the summum bonum. Augustine's homilies on John and 1 John are a reflection on God's being Love and on divine love. Loving our neighbor is a function of our love for God, ignited by the Holy Spirit. In De doctrina Christiana Augustine explains: "Whoever . . . justly loves his neighbor should so act toward him that he also loves God with his whole heart, with his whole soul and with his whole mind." Augustine strongly influenced the development of the theology of love in Western Christian tradition; his ama et fac quod vis will remain as an emblem of his thought. In Burrus's edited volume, Karmen MacKendrick highlights the intrinsic consistency of Augustine's thought on love, contra Nygren, who deemed it an inconsistent synthesis of incoherent motifs (eros and agape: see below).

Ps.-Dionysius (following Origen and Gregory, and also *Plotinus, who uses the term ἔρως when he wishes to stress the intensity of love (Enn. 1,6,7; 5,2,1; 6,4,5; 6,5,12) insists on his "erotic" transposition of 1 Jn 4:8 and 4:16 in Div. Nom. 4,12-14 (pp. 155-62). John's very definition of God as ἀγάπη is turned into God's ἔρως, as God is both object and subject of universal love. The mystic author begins with stating that "all tend toward, desire and love what is beautiful and good [τὸ καλὸν καὶ ἀγαθὸν ἐφετὸν καὶ ἐραστὸν καὶ ἀγαπητόν]. It is because of this Beauty and Goodness and for its sake that worse beings ardently love [ἐρῶσι ἐπιστρεπτικῶς] those which are better." It is God who created all beings with this desire for what is beautiful and good. Here, ps.-Dionysius adds that, since his discourse is true, it must also take the liberty of saying that "the divinity itself, the creator of all, in turn, out of exceeding goodness, strongly loves all creatures [δι᾿ἀγαθότητος ὑπερβολὴν πάντων ἐρᾷ], makes all, leads all to perfection, embraces all . . . and God's passionate love [ὁ θεῖος ἔρως] is good, directed to what is good and motivated by the good."

The author explains that God's creative initiative itself was due to God's goodness and love: "This beneficial strong love [ἔρως] for all beings, which preexisted them in exceeding goodness, did not permit itself to remain sterile in itself" (155). Now, this mystic author is well aware that the use of the word ἔρως in reference to God might easily arouse perplexities and criticisms: for this reason, he blames those who attach themselves to mere words or even just sounds of words, and do not understand that—as Gregory of Nyssa had already explained—ἔρως in reference to God has nothing to do with sense-perceptible realities, but it has a highest and mystical meaning (156). In 157 ps.-Dionysius adduces the same passage from Scripture that was already adduced by Gregory of Nyssa for the same purpose, i.e., Pr 4:6-8, in which ἔρως is prescribed, but ἔρως for Wisdom (of course he cites from the LXX, where v. 7 is absent); then he puts forward the Song of Songs, which he calls "theology of love" because the love it sings is divine; and finally Ignatius's aforementioned description of Christ as "his love," precisely ἔρως: "Let those who denigrate the term ἔρως listen, that I may not give the impression of subverting the divine Scripture with my argument: Scripture says, 'Love her passionately [ἐράσθητι αὐτῆς] and she will preserve you; fortify her, and she will exalt you; honor her, that she may embrace you,' and all the other things that are sung in the theology of love [κατὰ τὰς ἐρωτικὰς θελογίας]. In fact, some of our sacred sages even thought that the name ἔρως is more divine [θειότερον] than the name ἀγάπη. Divine Ignatius writes: 'My Love [ἔρως] has been crucified.' Thus, let us not fear this name, ἔρως."

Ps.-Dionysius then explains the reason why both Scripture and the early Fathers used ἔρως in reference to divine love, and not only ἀγάπη: "Those who spoke of God seem to me to have deemed the names ἔρως and ἀγάπη synonymous, but to have reserved true ἔρως for divine love, because of their extraordinary innate knowledge. Indeed, it is not only we, but Scripture itself, that celebrates true ἔρως as worthy of God. But most people cannot properly comprehend that the ἔρως ascribed to God is primary, simple and has a unique meaning [τὸ ἑνοειδὲς τῆς ἐρωτικῆς θεωνυμίας]; instead they have slipped down to the divisible, corporeal and separable ἔρως, which is not the true ἔρως, but only a phantom of true ἔρως, or better, the result of a degeneration from it. For most people cannot grasp the uniqueness and simplicity of the one divine ἔρως. . . . According to those who correctly listen to the divine words, the names of ἀγάπη and ἔρως have the same meaning, conferred to them by the sacred authors throughout the divine revelation" (157-58).

Next, our mystical author, along the lines of Origen, and of Plato as well, describes the nature of divine love (158-59): "It has a force that unifies all, ties all together and strongly keeps all together in beauty and goodness; it preexisted all thanks to is beauty and goodness . . . divine ἔρως is also ecstatic [ἐκστατικός], in that it does not allow lovers [ἐραστάς] to belong to themselves, but they belong to those whom they love. . . . This is why also the great Paul, when he fell prey to divine ἔρως and participated in its ecstatic force, said with an inspired mouth: 'It is no longer I who live, but it is Christ who lives in me.'" As ps.-Dionysius comments, Paul was a true "ecstatic lover [ἐραστής]." But not only human beings who love God "go out of themselves" into ecstatic love: God does the same in divine ἔρως: "It is necessary to dare say this, too, for the sake of truth: even the divinity who is the cause of all with its love [ἔρωτι], for the excess of its loving goodness [δι' ὑπερβολὴν τῆς ἐρωτικῆς ἀγαθότητος] goes out of itself with its providence directed to all beings [εἰς τὰ ὄντα πάντα], and is similarly enchanted by goodness and love and passion [ἀγαπήσει καὶ ἔρωτι]. . . . Therefore, those who are expert in theology call God 'jealous,' because of God's immensely good love [ἔρωτα] for the beings, who provoke his loving eagerness [ἐφέσεως ἐρωτικῆς] to jealousy. . . . What is lovable [ἐραστόν] entirely belongs to the beautiful and the good, and love [ἔρως] dwells in what is beautiful and good, and has its cause in the beautiful and the good."

In 160 finally ps.-Dionysius addresses the question of God's being both object and subject of love: "But why did the theologians call God sometimes ἔρως and ἀγάπη, sometimes desirable [ἐραστόν] and lovable [ἀγαπητόν]? It is because of love that God is the cause, the initiator and, so to say, the progenitor; and, as for being lovable, God is so personally; so, in one way, God is moved, and, in another way, God moves. They call God desirable [ἐραστόν] and lovable [ἀγαπητόν] as beautiful and good; on the other hand, they call God ἔρως and ἀγάπη as the moving force that uplifts everything, the only Beauty and Goodness itself, being a sort of manifestation of itself through itself, good emanating unity among the elect, simple loving movement [ἐρωτικὴν κίνησιν], moving itself, acting upon itself, preexisting in goodness, from goodness rising up to all beings, and returning again to the good."

Because God is infinite, for ps.-Dionysius, just as for Gregory of Nyssa, divine love also exists. Ps.-Dionysius, indeed, goes on to say: "Hence, divine love [ἔρως] shows its infinity and lack of a beginning [τὸ ἀτελεύτητον καὶ ἄναρχον], like an eternal circle revolving around goodness: from the good, in the good and toward the good." At this point, in 161, ps.-Dionysius reports what his teacher and "initiator to the divine mysteries" (ἱεροτελεστής) said about divine love, again called ἔρως: his view is that love is a unifying force, not only directed from the worse to the better in the form of desire (as in Plato), but also from equal to equal, and from the better to the worse in the form of Providence: "Let us conceive of love [ἔρως], either divine or angelic or intellectual or psychic or physical, as a unifying force that keeps those involved in it together, and moves the superior beings to providential care for those which are more in need, and the equal to a reciprocal relationship."

What this theologian taught is that all these forms of love have their source and beginning in God, who is love (again, ἔρως): "Now, let us reduce all these kinds of love to the one and single love [ἔρωτα], which comprises all these and is the father of all these. First, we must reduce all love from the many forms to two loving forces [ἐρωτικὰς δυνάμεις], which are governed by the absolute and incomprehensible cause of all love [ἔρωτος], which transcends all, and to which the whole love [ἔρως] of all beings tends, in conformity with the nature of each being. Now, reducing even these two forces, in turn, to unity, let us say that one simple force is that which moves itself to a sort of unifying mixture, beginning from the Good and down to the last of beings, and from the latter back again up to the Good through all beings. This simple force revolves from itself, through itself, and upon itself, and develops toward itself always in the same manner."

Maximus the Confessor (d. 662) also joined ἀγάπη and ἔρως in his description of divine love and human love for God. He devoted a whole work to love, the Centuries on Spiritual Love. Love for God is prayer (2,1: "The person who truly loves God also prays with no distraction"), and a classification of human forms of love shows that the best kind is that which is motivated by God: "Human beings love each other for the following reasons . . . : for the sake of God, as the virtuous loves all, and the person who is not yet virtuous loves the virtuous; or because of nature, as parents love their children and vice versa; or for vainglory, as a person who is glorified loves those who glorify him; or due to an attachment to the earthly goods, as a person who loves a rich person because he receives good things from him; or due to an attachment to satisfaction, as a person who cares for the belly and what is below the belly. The first motive is praiseworthy, the second is neutral, the others are passional" (2,9).

Perfect love, which returns good for evil (2,49), is without passion, ἀπαθής, in conformity with Gregory of Nyssa's view (2,10: "Perfect love entails loving each human being in the same way"; 2,30: "The person who is perfect in love and has reached the culmination of freedom from passions . . . contemplates the nature of all human beings, which is one and the same, considers all in the same way and treats all in the same manner. For this person, indeed, there is neither Greek nor Jew, neither male nor female, neither slave nor free, but Christ is all in all"; 2,25: "ἀπάθεια does not exclude love in the least, but rather generates it"). And yet, although true love is without passion, it is described by Maximus not only as ἀγάπη but also as ἔρως, an ἔρως without passion: just as in Gregory of Nyssa it is ἔρως not because it is a passion, but due to its intensity. "When someone's mind is continually turned toward God, its appetite enormously increases toward divine ἔρως, and its impulsive part is totally turned toward divine ἀγάπη. It becomes totally illuminated thanks to its enduring participation in divine splendor, and, after tying the impassioned part of the soul to itself, is oriented to a divine ἔρως that does not cease and to an ἀγάπη that has no end, because it has completely moved away from earthly things to the divine" (2,48).

The same connection is evident in 3,67: divine love can be depicted as a passion only metaphorically, as a blessed passion, in order to describe in human words the intensity of this love: "The blessed passion of saintly love is necessary, which binds the soul to the spiritual visions, and persuades it to prefer the immaterial things to the material ones, the intelligible [νοητά] and divine things to the sense-perceptible. Love for God is no passion proper, because all passions of the soul are sublimated in this love (3,98): "A perfect soul is that whose passional power turns completely toward God."

*Isaac of Nineveh, a Syriac mystic of the 7th c., made of divine love the gist of his theology and soteriology. Like Gregory of Nyssa, he maintained that what we consider as punishments, since they have God's love as their motive, not only cannot be eternal, but are not even punishments: they rather are a purification, and suffering is only—just as in Gregory of Nyssa's view—a side effect of God's primary purpose: "God corrects with love, never punishes, and only wants that his image [i.e., the human soul] recovers its health; he does not harbor resentment" (Spiritual Teachings, nr. 260 in the Slavic Philocalia). Universal salvation is made by Isaac to depend on God's immense merciful love, which always cares for all: "God's loving care always surrounds all human beings, but it can be seen only by those who have purified themselves from their sins and every moment have God on their minds" (Hom. 5,B64). Isaac even considers Christ's death on the cross to be nothing but an expression of God's infinite love, as a passage from the so-called second part of his work shows: "If zeal had been appropriate to amend humanity, why would God the Logos have had to take on a body in order to return the world to the Father, using kindness and humility? And why did he let people stretch him on the cross for the sake of the sinners, handing his sacred body to suffering for the world? For my part, I declare that God did all this for no other sake than in order to make his love known, so that, thanks to a greater love originating from this awareness, we could be conquered by his love, because of the demonstration of the power of the kingdom of heaven, which consists in love, through the Son's death." Likewise in Kephalaia 4,78: "The purpose of our Lord's death was not our redemption from sins, or any other purpose, but it was only in order that the world might acquire an awareness of God's love for the creation. Had it been aimed simply at the remission of sins, it would have been enough to redeem us in some other way."

Isaac regards not only Christ's death but also his incarnation as motivated by pure love: "The true vision of Jesus Christ our Lord consists in becoming aware of the meaning of his incarnation out of love for us and inebriated with love for Christ" (14,30; see also 14,48). Just as love is the true motive of Christ's cross, so it is also the true motive of hell, as is clear from chap. 39: "Even for the affliction and condemnation in Gehenna, there is some hidden mystery: the wise Creator has taken the evilness of our actions and our will as a point of departure for his future success, using this as a way of perfectly realizing his salvific will, which remains hidden both to angels and to humans and is also hidden to those who are being punished, whether they be demons or humans, for the whole period for which the punishment itself lasts"—which evidently means that there will be an end to this punishment—"if we were to say or think that all that which concerns Gehenna is not indeed full of love and impregnated with compassion, this would be an opinion full of blasphemy and an offense to God our Lord. If we even say that he will hand us to the fire in order to have us suffer, to torment us and for all sorts of evil, we attribute to the divine nature a hostility to rational creatures, whom he made by grace, and the same is the case if we affirm that he thinks or acts out of spite, as though he wished to avenge himself. Among all of his actions, there is none that is not entirely motivated by mercy, love and compassion: this is the principle and the end of God's dealing with us" (39,22).

*John of Dalyatha, an Eastern, Syrian mystic of the 8th c. who deeply loved symbols and was strongly influenced by the Origenian tradition, including ps.-Dionysius and Isaac himself, developed at length the themes of God's love and of mystical love for God. The latter is evident in Ep. 7,1-2: "Understand, my brother, this mystery which is the life of heavenly beings, and will be ours, too, just as it is theirs, in the unending aiōn. Let us be tormented by the love for the One who is Beauty: this is the end of all our labor. Blessed are those who are inebriated with your love, my God! . . . Taste and see, my brother, the sweetness of our good Father . . . who appears in those who love him and fills them with wonder for his Beauty." The angels, who take care of human souls, reflect God's love, which can be seen esp. in discourse 7, On the Love of Holy Angels, influenced by ps.-Dionysius and Origen. The guardian angel is called by John "the Angel of Providence," who fondly loves the soul entrusted to him (see also discourse 14, On Prayer).

Mystical love of Christ and mystical marriage of the soul with Christ, acc. to Origen's and Gregory of Nyssa's allegories of the Song of Songs, are themes that are dear to John. In Ep. 11,1 he highlights the soul's love for Christ and its reciprocation: "At the end of combat, the crown with which Christ crowns the person who loves him is the vision of the Holy Trinity: blessed are you, O fighter. . . . Your king will heal your wounds . . . will restore your worn-out limbs, afflicted due to love for him. . . . Those limbs were immersed in the blood of their wounds out of love for the most handsome Bridegroom, but already in this life they shine forth with the eternal glory which he gives them as a token." God's purifying fire is that which "destroys and consumes all tumult and sin" and is also identified with "the fire of Your Love, by which all heavenly powers are inflamed," acc. to a set of ideas that are also found, in a synthetic form, in the prayer at the end of his letters, which is a real synthesis of the core concept of his mystical theology: love, fire, beauty, light, wonder, the angels' role, mercy, God's appearing in one's heart to disperse the enemies—i.e., the powers of evil. It is no accident that John quotes Rom 8:35-39, acc. to which nothing will be able to separate us from God's love. This quotation repeatedly occurs in John of Dalyatha; e.g., in Ep. 31,4, or in the prayer following Ep. 42. Many times he insists on God's love, to which "nothing can be compared" (Ep. 47,8) and which is ineffable: "Whoever attempts to speak of God's love declares his own ignorance, unaware that it is utterly impossible to do so" (Ep. 34,1). John praises God's salvific love: "Glory to the abundance of your ineffable love," which always leaves "the door open," which "lets us exit the prison in which we have imprisoned ourselves, even when we would not want to: may your power prevail over us, O merciful Father" (Ep. 5,4). The solitary's suffering is the dimension of divine universal love (Ep. 30,3).

Anders Nygren in his Agape and Eros underscored the difference between eros, which is self-centered and human, and agape, which is selfless and divine (30-35): acc. to him, they "belong originally to two entirely separate spiritual worlds, between which no direct communication is possible." Even if Platonic Eros is a sublimation of "vulgar Eros," nevertheless "there is no way, not even that of sublimation, which leads over from Eros to Agape." Different from Eros, agape is God-centered, an overflow of love, and a sacrificial gift that descends on humans and renders them worthy of love and capable of loving selflessly. Nygren reconstructs the history of these two concepts from classical Greek philosophy, through its influence on Judaism, the early church and up to the Reformation. According to Nygren, the Fathers and medieval Christian authors before Luther elaborated syntheses of agape and eros in which eros absorbed agape and distorted it, esp. in the case of ascetic or mystical authors. The examples that Nygren produces are precisely Origen and Gregory of Nyssa, in whose works I have pointed out the use of ἔρως, understood as an intense ἀγάπη, also in the divine sphere. But he esp. attacks Augustine's theology of caritas and ps.-Dionysius's theology of ἔρως. Nygren distinguishes the active human subject of desire (eros) and the receptive human subject of faith (agape).

But in Gregory of Nyssa's perspective, e.g., agape is active while being receptive at the same time: it is a continual tension of the soul toward God. And in the end, too, when all will be bound by agape which will prevent further falls, all will have chosen voluntarily and happily to remain attached to the supreme Good. As for God's agape, although it is oblational, it is certainly not passive, but very active, so much that it even produced the whole creation. According to Nygren, only ἀγάπη is authentically Christian love (92). Ἔρως is completely different from ἀγάπη also because ἀγάπη is unmotivated, indifferent to value: it loves regardless of the value of the loved, in whom it creates value. Ἔρως, instead, loves its objects only because they are worthy of love; it has distorted authentic Christian faith when theologians have embraced it, which, in Nygren's view, happened "when Christianity tried to express itself in Platonic terms" (54). Nygren believed that Christianity was pure only in its New Testament origins—which he supposed to be alien to Hellenistic influence—whereas subsequently an "infiltration" of strong elements of the Hellenistic conception of Eros took place, until a "syncretistic confusion" occurred due to the "Helle-nization of Christianity" (with an evident adoption of Harnack's terminology and ideology).

Now, this is clearly the widespread but unjustified presupposition that philosophy in general, and Platonism in particular, is incompatible with Christianity and "polluted" it from outside: see my Origen, Patristic Philosophy, and Christian Platonism: Re-Thinking the Christianization of Hellenism, VigChr 63,2 (2009). Eros, thus, in Nygren's view, characterized the Greek philosophy of Aristotle, Plato and the gnostics, and denotes an acquisitive love which responds and aspires to the beauty or perfection of its object. Properly speaking, only God can love in a purely agapic sense, which is displayed in his work of redemption—i.e., God's gift of his only begotten Son to redeem sinners, who were his enemies. Classical philosophy cannot conceive of purely selfless love or a God who is characterized by such a love. For the gnostics and later Christians who were influenced by them, God provides redemption because he longs for fellowship or praise from his creation, or because he needs to restore his creation to the original order to please himself. This, I observe, is certainly not the case with either Origen or Gregory of Nyssa, who are very clear that God's creation was not motivated by any need.

According to Nygren, the synthesis between Christianity and Platonism produced aberrations calling for a reformation and a recovery of the pureness of agape, uncontaminated by eros; this reformation came with Luther, after the Fathers and the medieval authors. (In the Middle Ages, acc. to Nygren, monasticism, legalism and ritualism are examples of human attempts to reach up to God in the eros attitude, rather than glorying in God's descending to humans in the agape attitude.) It is Luther to whom Nygren devoted the last chapter of his book. Luther instituted a sort of "Copernican revolution," in Nygren's expression; he corrected Augustine's view that the supreme Good is attained through a complete synthesis of agape and eros: caritas. Augustine's emphasis upon God's unmerited descent to humanity represents the agape element of caritas. His emphasis upon the necessity of virtue in humanity's ascent to God represents the eros element of caritas. However, in Nygren's view, this makes caritas an inauthentic Christian love. Whereas Catholicism had built the doctrine of salvation through "faith formed by love" (739-740), Luther emphasized salvation "by faith alone" in the God who is agape and whose "love has made a new way for itself down to lost humanity. Once for all, and in a decisive manner, this has come to pass through Christ" (741). It is worth recalling that also for those Fathers whom Nygren criticized, Origen and Gregory of Nyssa, the whole soteriology and even the eschatological apokatastasis depend on Christ: if we eliminate Christ, no salvation is possible, let alone universal salvation. Nygren's position was favored by the Reformed theologian Karl Barth.

Benedict XVI, instead, in his encyclical Deus Caritas Est maintained that both eros and agape are aspects of divine love and related to the logos and the teachings of Jesus. Agape is descending, oblative love in which one gives of oneself to another; eros is ascending, possessive love which seeks to receive from another, but both belong in Christian love and are good, although eros is in danger of being downgraded to sex if it is not balanced by Christian spirituality. In section 7 this is made clear: "Eros and agape—ascending love and descending love—can never be completely separated. The more the two, in their different aspects, find a proper unity in the one reality of love, the more the true nature of love in general is realized. . . . On the other hand, man cannot live by oblative, descending love alone. He cannot always give, he must also receive. Anyone who wishes to give love must also receive love as a gift. . . . Yet to become such a source, one must constantly drink anew from the original source, which is Jesus Christ, from whose pierced heart flows the love of God. . . . Only in [the way of contemplation] will he be able to take upon himself the needs of others and make them his own." Ibid. 9-10: "God loves, and his love may certainly be called eros, yet it is also totally agape. . . . This is not only because it is bestowed in a completely gratuitous manner, without any previous merit, but also because it is love which forgives. . . . In Jesus Christ, it is God himself who goes in search of the 'stray sheep,' a suffering and lost humanity. . . . His death on the Cross is the culmination of that turning of God against himself in which he gives himself in order to raise man up and save him. This is love in its most radical form."

R. Lagerborg, Die platonische Liebe, Leipzig 1926; H. Arendt, Der Liebesbegriff bei Augustin. Versuch einer philosophischen Interpretation, Berlin 1929; A. Nygren, Agape and Eros: The Christian Idea of Love, tr. P.S. Watson, Chicago 1953 [Eros und Agape, Gütersloh 1930-1936]; P. Tillich, Love, Power, and Justice: Ontological Analyses and Ethical Applications, Oxford 1954; C. Spicq, Agapè dans le Nouveau Testament, I-III, Paris 1958–1959; J. Burnaby, Amor Dei: A Study of St. Augustine's Teaching on the Love of God, London 1960; J. Colson, Agapè chez St. Ignace d'Antioche, London 1961; H.U. von Balthasar, Glaubhaft ist nur Liebe, Einsiedeln 1963; L. Robin, La théorie platonicienne de l'amour, Paris [2]1964; J. Vanier, Amitié et amour chez Aristote, Paris 1964; G. Outka, Agape: An Ethical Analysis, New Haven 1972; G. Vlastos, The Individual as Object of Love in Plato's Dialogues, Princeton 1973; R. Kieffer, Le Primat de l'Amour. Commentaire épistémologique de 1 Corinthiens 13,

Paris 1975; J.-L. Marion, Prolégomènes à la charité, Paris 1986; W. Klassen, Love: NT and Early Jewish Literature, in The Anchor Bible Dictionary, IV, New York 1992, 381-396; V. Brümmer, The Model of Love: A Study in Philosophical Theology, Cambridge 1993; E.A. Johnson, She Who Is, New York 1993; B. Gerhardsson, The Shema in the New Testament, Lund 1996; C. Osborne, Eros Unveiled: Plato and the God of Love, Oxford 1996; D. Konstan, Friendship in the Classical World, Cambridge 1997; S. Pricoco (ed.), L'Eros difficile. Amore e sessualità nell'antico cristianesimo, Soveria Mannelli 1998, esp. E. Prinzivalli, Desiderio di generazione e generazione del desiderio: Metodio di Olimpo e le polemiche sull'eros fra III e IV secolo, 39-66; P. Esler, Jesus and the Reduction of Intergroup Conflict: The Parable of the Good Samaritan in the Light of Social Identity Theory, Biblical Interpretation 8 (2000) 325-357; Agostino di Ippona, Amore Assoluto e 'Terza Navigazione,' ed. G. Reale, Milan 2000[2]; A. Fabris, I paradossi dell'amore fra grecità, ebraismo e cristianismo, Brescia 2001; B.V. Brady, Christian Love, Washington, D.C. 2003; W.G. Jeanrond, Biblical Challenges to a Theology of Love, Biblical Interpretation 11 (2003) 640-653; V. Burrus-C. Keller (eds.), Toward a Theology of Eros: Transfiguring Passion at the Limits of Discipline, New York 2006; I. Ramelli, Gregorio di Nissa Sull'anima e la resurrezione, Milan 2007; Id., Note per un'indagine della mistica siro-orientale dell'VIII secolo: Giovanni di Dalyatha e la tradizione origeniana, "'Ilu" 12 (2007), 147-179; Id., L'Inno a Cristo-Logos nel Simposio di Metodio di Olimpo, in Motivi e forme della poesia cristiana, Rome 2008, SEA 108, 257-280; Id., Transformations of the Household and Marriage Theory Between Neo-Stoicism, Middle-Platonism, and Early Christianity, RFN 100 (2008) 369-396; Id., Simon Son of John, Do You Love Me? Some Reflections on John 21:15, NovT 50 (2008) 332-350; B. Zorzi, The Use of the Terms ἁγνεία, παρθενία, σωφροσύνη and ἐγκράτεια in the Symposium of Methodius of Oympus, in VigChr 63,2 (2009) 138-168; I. Ramelli, Origen, Patristic Philosophy, and Christian Platonism: Re-Thinking the Christianization of Hellenism, in VigChr 63,3 (2009).

I. Ramelli

LUCIA (Lucy) of Syracuse (d. 304). The tomb of Lucia still exists in the catacomb at *Syracuse which bears her name. The oldest evidence of her cult is the inscription of Euschia, who died on her feast day at the beginning of the 5th c. Some decades later the virgin Lucia was inserted in the Mart. hier. for 13 Dec and from here passed into all calendars, martyrologies and sacramentaries. Monasteries with her name existed in Syracuse and in *Rome at the time of *Gregory the Great (Ep. 7,36; 9,44; 11,15; Dial. 4,13). During this period her cult also grew in Rome, where the same pope is said to have inserted her name in the canon of the Roman Mass (a formulary for the Mass of the saint may in fact be found in the Sacramentarium Gregorianum); following this, Pope *Honorius I built the church of St. Lucia in Selci. Lucia enjoyed such prestige in 7th-c. Rome that one legend put her birthplace in the city (Sansterre 1, 152). Her name was also inserted in the canons of *Milan and *Ravenna. We find an image of her in the procession of martyrs in the mosaic in St. Apollinare Nuovo at Ravenna. The Passio of the 6th c. is pure hagiographical fiction without any historical value: it recounts that Lucia, already engaged to be married, accompanies her sick mother to the tomb of St. Agatha; she renounces marriage (that St. Lucia pulled out her eyes to send them to her fiancé is a later element in the story), is cruelly tortured (topos of the undying life) and is martyred during the persecution of *Diocletian. Medieval accounts of the translation of her relics, full of contradictions, suggest that her relics were brought to Venice and Corfinio and from there to Metz. A play on words on Lucia's name resulted in the appellation "the saint of light [lux]."

BHL 4992-5003; 995-996; Verzeichnis 74; BS 8, 241-257; LCI 7, 415-420; C. Huelsen, Le chiese di Roma nel medio evo, Florence 1926, repr., Rome 2000; F. Lanzoni, Le diocesi d'Italia, Faenza 1927, 105-107, 632-633; E. Donckel, Ausserrömische Heilige in Rom, Luxemburg 1938, 65-66; V.L. Kennedy, The Saints of the Canon of the Mass, Vatican City [2]1963, 175-179; S.L. Agnello, Recenti esplorazioni nelle catacombe siracusane di s. Lucia: RivAC 30 (1954) 7-60; 31 (1955) 7-50; J.-M. Sansterre, Les moines grecs et orientaux à Rome aux époques byzantine et carolingienne 1-2, Brussels 1980; V. Messana - S. Pricoco (eds.), Il Cristianesimo in Sicilia dalle origini a Gregorio Magno, Caltanissetta 1987; Euplo e Lucia 304-2004, eds. T. Sardella - G. Zito, Catania 2006.

V. Saxer - S. Heid

LUCIAN of Antioch (d. 312). *Eusebius (HE 4 6,3) describes him as a priest of *Antioch, learned in sacred science, martyr during the last persecution. We know in fact that he was responsible for a revision of the Greek text of the OT and suffered martyrdom at Nicomedia 7 Jan 312. *Jerome (Vir. Ill. 77) refers, without giving details, to his libelli* on the faith and his letters. We know that Lucian taught *Arius and also important supporters of his, called co-Lucianists, among whom was *Eusebius of Nicomedia. In this sense *Alexander of Alexandria (in Theod., HE I, 4), writing in an anti-Arian letter which traced the Arian heresy to Judaizing *adoptionism, says that Lucian was the successor to *Paul of Samosata and was excommunicated by the Antiochene community for the duration of three episcopates.

This sparse and inconsistent evidence has resulted in some divergent and indeed doubtful positions on the part of modern scholars. For a long time Lucian was thought to be the founder of the literalist exegetical school of *Antioch, rather than the allegorical approach followed by the Alexandrian school: but the information we have does not allow this conclusion, the school of Antioch proper starting only with *Diodore of Tarsus many decades after Lucian's death. Beyond this, Alexander's testimony has made Lucian seem a disciple of Paul of Samosata and a promoter of his heresy, as such caught up in the reaction against Paul, and excluded for many years from the community. On this account he would have been readmitted shortly before suffering martyrdom.

But this reconstruction cannot be reconciled with the fact, indicated by Alexander and otherwise shown to be right, that Arius and his co-Lucianists were disciples of Lucian. In fact, Arius's doctrine of radical *subordinationism is connected with a Logos theology and appears antithetical to *monarchianism, either *Sabellian or adoptionist. Recent attempts to link Arius and Paul of Samosata hardly seem convincing; and the decisiveness and consistency with which the co-Lucianists supported Arius is proof that his teaching was in broad terms anticipated by Lucian, who conversely can only with difficulty be considered a disciple of Paul. The connection between Arius and the adoptionists was made by Alexander for polemical reasons on the grounds that both undervalued—albeit in different ways—the divinity of Christ. Disconnecting Lucian then from Paul, and basing ourselves on the pre-Arian character of his teaching as on the persistence of monarchianism in Antioch after the condemnation of Paul—seen from the connection between Paul and Eustathius—we may suppose that Lucian taught a radical subordinationism in Antioch which anticipated Arius, therefore opposing Paul's monarchianism. He was condemned then in the wake of the response to the condemnation of Paul for having given new impetus to monarchianism in Antioch, lacking, however, the radical elements of Paul's thought.

Into this reconstruction we may insert the claim, found in sources of the *homoiousian party, acc. to which Lucian was the author of the formula approved by the Council of Antioch in 341, clearly of *Origenist inspiration and undoubtedly orthodox, even if in moderate subordinationist language. Many modern scholars do not accept this claim or argue that the original text of Lucian must have been so profoundly altered as to have made it unrecognizable. Yet the indications that this claim is correct are not few; and on account of the orthodoxy of the text it may be considered—in the context of the various libelli on the faith to which Jerome refers—that which Lucian composed in order to be readmitted into the community after a long period of exclusion.

Quasten I, 402-404; G. Bardy, Recherches sur S. Lucien d'Antioche et son école, Paris 1936; M. Simonetti, Le origini dell'arianesimo: RSLR 7 (1971) 319-330; H.Ch. Brennecke, Lucianus von Antiochien: TRE 21 (1991) 474-479; Lucian of Antioch, St: ODC (1997) 1001-1002; T. Böhm, Lucianus von Antiochien: LACL (1997) 405-406; D.S. Wallace-Hadrill, Christian Antioch, Cambridge 1982; R.D. Williams, The Quest of the Historical Thalia, in R.C. Gregg (ed.), Arianism: Historical and Theological Reassessments: Papers from the Ninth International Conference on Patristic Studies, Cambridge 1985, 1-35; J.R. Busto Saiz, The Biblical Text of Malachias Monachus to the Book of Wisdom, in N.F. Marcos (ed.), La septuaginta en la investigación contemporanea, Madrid 1985, 257-269; W. Löhr, Die Entstehung der homöischen und homöusianischen Kirchenparteien, Bonn 1986; R. Williams, Arius: Heresy and Tradition, London 1987; R.P.C. Hanson, The Search for the Christian Doctrine of God, Edinburgh 1988, 79-84; H.C. Brennecke, Lucianus von Antiochien in der Geschichte des Arianischen Streites, in Logos. Festschrift f. L. Abramowski, Berlin 1993, 170-192.

M. Simonetti

LUCIAN of Carthage (3rd c.). This confessor, who lived at the time of the Decian persecution (250), appears in the correspondence of *Cyprian (Ep. 21-23, 27). He was compromised by his granting declarations of indulgence to the *lapsed: he issued them either blank, with no name, or collectively, or even bearing the names of the dead. The Calendarium Carthaginense has Ss. Luciani et Vincenti martyrum listed for 1 Feb. It is difficult to ascertain if he should be identified with one of the Lucians listed in the Mart. hier.

V. Saxer, Vie liturgique et quotidienne à Carthage vers le milieu du III^e siècle, Vatican City ²1984, 316-317.

V. Saxer - S. Heid

LUCIAN of Kefar Gamala (d. after 415). Lucian, a priest of a village called Kefar Gamala (Beth-gamal) 20 miles from *Jerusalem and not far from Lydda-Diospolis, in 415 found the relics of the first martyr St. Stephen (Acts 6–7). *John II, bishop of Jerusalem, received a visit from the priest informing him of the revelation that had been made to him in respect to the relics. He was commissioned with finding them, which he duly did. John, participating at that time in the Council of *Diospolis which met to make a pronouncement on *Pelagius, left Diospolis immediately with two others, and, having identified the relics, on 26 Dec 415 transferred them solemnly to the Church of Zion in Jerusalem, the church where the saint had been ordained. John then had the basilica of St. Stephen built near the Neapolis Gate (today the Damascus Gate), where the relics were placed 15 May 438 or 439. Lucian had kept for himself some bones of lesser importance, which he distributed among friends and which subsequently arrived in the West. He also wrote a report of the events (BHG 1648x-1648y); this too arrived in the West. After this we know nothing further of Lucian. The Byzantine church at Beit-Jimal is certainly not to be identified with the martyrium of St. Stephen at Kefar Gamala.

E. Lucius, Die Anfänge des Heiligenkults in der christlichen Kirche, Tübingen 1904, 156-160; J. Martin, Die revelatio S. Stephani und Verwandtes: Historisches Jahrbuch 77 (1958) 419-433; V. Saxer, Morts, martyrs, reliques en Afrique chrétienne aux premiers siècles, Paris 1980, 245-246; P. Maraval, Lieux saints et pèlerinages d'Orient, Paris 1985, 266-267; P.H.F. Jakobs, Reste einer byzantinischen Siedlung bei Beit-Jimal: Akten des XII. Internationalen Kongresses für Christliche Archäologie, Vatican City-Münster 1995, 873-880.

V. Saxer - S. Heid

LUCIAN of Samosata (d. 190). Writer and Greek philosopher, lived in the 2nd c. AD. Born in about 120 at Samosata, a city in N Syria, on the right bank of the Euphrates, he had tried other professions before embarking on a brilliant career as rhetorician, speaker, versatile writer and novelist, a follower of the itinerant teachers of the Second Sophistic. He was in *Rome, *Asia Minor, *Antioch, Samosata, *Athens (where in all probability he lived for some years) and then in Egypt, where he died ca. 190. Very quickly he gained a vast readership who greatly admired his pungent style, as well as his appealingly uninhibited spirit, always ready to provoke public opinion with paradoxes, bizarre tales and original literary forms. Lucian derided and scorned everything which sprang from mere convention and from an uncritical forma mentis: thus his attacks on historiography, literature and even on philosophy, to the extent that they were products of such a mentality. The lucid and cutting force of his intelligence was unleashed in his observation of human beings, their weaknesses, their limitations, their vain agitations, without however believing in the possibility that the world could improve; and in this absence of moral indignation his satire differs from analogous forms in classical literature. 82 works and a collection of epigrams are attributed to him, among which we find essays of considerable literary merit, oratorical preambles, encomiums, laudationes, controversiae and judicial defenses, jokes and grammatical polemics, writings on philosophy including practical philosophy, as well as parodies and satires, invectives and polemical tracts, mimes, and other compositions.

In respect to Lucian's views on Christianity, of special note is his De morte Peregrini, which presents itself in a form of a letter, and which contains a ruthless attack against a certain complex and undoubtedly interesting figure who in 165 mounted a stake in order to voluntarily burn himself alive. The libellus* is directed most of all against the Cynics, who held Peregrinus Proteus to be a new Hercules; but there are many allusions to the person of Jesus, and to his followers, including their way of thinking and of living. (Lucian presents them as victims of Proteus's deception.) Peregrinus's history is a strange one: born in Hellespontus, he converted to Christianity in Palestine, where he became a prophet and a leader of the community; imprisoned, he refused to apostatize, and was released by a Roman magistrate. Accused of parricide by his compatriots of Parium, he sought to silence them by giving his property to the pagan community. His relations with the Christians broke down, for some reason which is unknown to us. Following this we find him in *Egypt, where he followed Cynic asceticism in its strictest forms, in *Italy (from where he was expelled for having insulted the emperor) and finally in Greece, where he attempted to foment a revolt against the Roman authorities. It was there, during the Olympic games, before an applauding crowd, that he committed suicide in a spectacular manner, and became the object of a cult.

The account of Peregrinus's Christian period is of real interest, for in this phase he gained credit and indeed renown in the Palestinian community. We learn from Lucian (see De morte Peregrini 12-13) that the Christians were always ready to lend material and other help to fellow believers in prison or otherwise in difficulty, that they feared nothing in the face of torture and death, on the contrary approaching death with complete faith in their espoused beliefs, beliefs which to the mind of the pagan seemed unprovable: a reaction shared by *Galen, *Celsus and *Marcus Aurelius. Lucian makes no more than a few references to the Christians—it may be said that he shows a psychological curiosity about them (see E.R. Dodds, Pagan and Christian, 105)—and yet, in the context of the few pagan testimonies that we have about Christianity, they are not to be undervalued.

Lucien de Samosate. Œuvres complètes, ed. E. Chernberg, Paris 1934; Luciani Opera, ed. M.D. MacLeod, Oxford 1972–1987; C. Gallavotti, Luciano nella sua evoluzione artistica e spirituale, Lanciano 1932; M. Caster, Lucien et la pensée religieuse, Paris 1937. On Peregrinus (as well as on Lucian), see E.R. Dodds, Pagan and Christian in an Age of Anxiety, Cambridge 1965, 59-63, 120-121 and passim; H.D. Betz, Lukian von Samosata und das Neue Testament, diss., Mainz 1957; M.D. MacLeod, in ANRW II, 34, 1362-1421; G. Anderson, in ANRW II, 34/2, 1422-1447; M. Weissenberger, Literaturtheorie bei Lukian, Stuttgart-Leipzig 1996; I. Ramelli, I romanzi antichi e il cristianesimo: contrasti e contatti, Madrid 2001, 143-161.

P. Siniscalco

LUCIDUS, presbyter (d. after 474). We learn of Lucidus from Bishop *Faustus of Riez (Ep. 1 and 2, and Grat. prol.). Lucidus was a priest from the S of *Gaul who in the 2nd half of the 5th c. aroused the suspicions of Faustus for certain ideas he held regarding *grace and *predestination, carrying *Augustine's thought to extreme consequences. Faustus attempted, first, to induce him to retract by putting before him certain anathemas to sign, then the question was discussed at a number of councils (Councils of *Arles and *Lyons, of uncertain dates, between 470 and 474), where the theses of Lucidus were condemned, and to which Lucidus submitted. The whole episode, which is difficult to reconstruct, was part of the long, protracted controversy between Augustinians and anti-Augustinians in the S of Gaul.

CPL 963; PL 53, 681-685; CSEL 21, 3-4 and 161-168; MGH, Auct. ant. 8, 288-291; DTC 5, 1020-1024, and Tables 3036; É. Griffe, La Gaule chrétienne à l'époque romaine, 2, Paris [2]1966, 83f. n.44, 145, 289; 3, Paris 1965, 371-372.

A. Pollastri

LUCIFER–LUCIFERIANS. Lucifer (d. 370) was bishop of Cagliari, and represented Pope *Liberius at the Council of *Milan in 355, which was due to consider the question of *Athanasius of Alexandria. On that occasion he wrote to *Eusebius of Vercelli asking him to participate in the council. Lucifer was among the few who did not bow to the will of the emperor *Constantius in that he did not sign the condemnation of Athanasius. Deposed and exiled, he was sent first to Germanicia (*Syria) and Eleutheropolis (*Palestine) and finally to *Thebaid. During his exile he had occasion to criticize the De synodis of *Hilary, which seemed to him too moderate in its attitude toward the opponents of the Nicene faith. When in 362 the emperor *Julian permitted those exiled by Constantius to reenter their sees, Lucifer, instead of taking part in the council announced by Athanasius in *Alexandria, went to *Antioch, where the anti-*Arian community was divided between *Meletius and the priest *Paulinus. The partisans of Paulinus were intransigent Nicene adherents. Lucifer endorsed their position, consecrating Paulinus as bishop in opposition to the legitimate bishop Meletius, thus aggravating the local *schism. Eusebius of Vercelli, coming from Alexandria, did not approve of Lucifer's action. Annoyed by this, as by the light measures taken by the Council of Alexandria toward those who had compromised with Arianism, Lucifer returned to *Sardinia via *Naples and *Rome. *Jerome (Vir. ill. 95) says that he died under *Valentinian I (364–375).

Lucifer addressed Constantius in five violently worded polemical libelli* published during the years of his exile: De non conveniendo cum haereticis, De regibus apostaticis, Pro sancto Athanasio in 2 books, De non parcendo in Deum delinquentibus and Moriendum esse pro Dei filio (355–361). From a brief correspondence between Lucifer and the magister officiorum Florentius, we learn that Lucifer had seen that the first three of these were sent to Constantius, who, astonished at the offensive tone used in respect to him, asked Lucian whether he was truly their author. Lucifer confirmed this, but the emperor did not take any particular action as a result. In his writings Lucifer defends Athanasius, argues against contact with heretics (whom he puts on a level with pagans), declares himself ready to die for his faith and above all attacks Constantius, whom he compares with the worst tyrants of the OT. The scriptural support which Lucifer adduces for his various positions is of such a quantity that his libelli may be properly called scriptural *florilegia. They are interesting examples of Latin translations of the Scriptures prior to Jerome, and notable linguistically as they are rich in popular language; less so for their doctrine, as the defense of the Nicene faith is reduced to a few stereotypical formulas.

The name "Luciferian" was given to the most intransigent supporters of Paulinus against Meletius at Antioch. In Rome in around 380, it was also given to certain strict orthodox partisans of Nicene orthodoxy who had not approved of the moderate steps taken by the Council of Alexandria and subsequent councils against those who, despite having signed the pro-Arian formula of *Rimini, intended to return to orthodoxy; for this reason they would not enter into communion with Pope *Damasus, who tormented them in various ways. They established contacts with analogous schismatic communities of rigorous anti-Arians present in various Eastern and Western cities. Their leaders were *Gregory of Elvira in the West and Heraclides of Oxyrhynchus in the East. We do not have proof that it was actually Lucifer who began this schism, and their being called Luciferians may be derived rather from the fact that they followed a model of anti-Arian intransigence typical of Lucifer.

As a result of the hostile attitude of *Catholics toward them, in 384 the Luciferians sent to *Theodosius, in the name of the Roman priests *Faustinus and *Marcellinus, a Libellus precum in which they set out in detail their miserable situation in Rome, *Trier, Eleutheropolis, *Oxyrhynchus, etc. and asked that they be left in peace. Theodosius gave them what they asked in a rescript. Subsequent to this date we have no precise information about them. There are some literary fake documents, springing from a Luciferian context and probably Spanish in origin, intended to win support for their sect: a letter of Eusebius of Vercelli to Gregory of Elvira and two letters of Athanasius to Lucifer. Perhaps it was at least partly in this milieu that the compilation known as the ps.-Athanasian De trinitate was composed.

CPL 112-118; PL 13, 767-1049; CSEL 14; CCL 8 (bibl.); Patrologia 3, 61-65 (bibl.); M. Simonetti, Appunti per una storia dello scisma luciferiano: Atti del convegno di studi religiosi sardi, Padua 1963, 67-81.

M. Simonetti

LUCILLA (d. after 312). A noble and rich women, of Spanish origin, resident at *Carthage, supporter of groups and individuals from whom sprang the *Donatist schism. Before the persecutions of *Diocletian she had been reproached by *Caecilian, deacon of the bishop *Mensurius, because she was accustomed to kiss the relics of a martyr at the moment of receiving Communion (Opt. Milevis, De schismate I,16). After the death of Mensurius (311/312), Lucilla sponsored through donations the party of Numidian bishops who were gathered at Carthage to declare the episcopal consecration of Caecilian invalid and to elect a new bishop, who was to be *Maiorinus, servant of Lucilla and already lector in the deaconry of Caecilian (Gesta apud Zenoph.: CSEL 26, 196-197).

Monceaux 4, Paris 1912, 16-19; W.H.C. Frend, The Donatist Church: A Movement of Protest in Roman North Africa, Oxford 1952 (²1971), 18-21; A.C. de Veer, Le rôle de Lucilla dans l'origine du schisme africain, BA 4e Série, Traités antidonatistes, 4, 799-802; V. Saxer, Morts, martyrs, reliques en Afrique chrétienne aux premiers siècles, Paris 1980, 233-235; PCBE 1, 649.

F. Scorza Barcellona

LUCINIUS (Baeticus) (d. ca. 390). Friend of *Jerome, a layman, interested in having good biblical codices at his disposal; possessing financial means, Lucinius sent scribes from Baetica in Palestine, in order to transcribe Jerome's originals. On this occasion he put various questions to Jerome in a letter which was subsequently lost and thus known only through Jerome's reply (Ep. 72). He died in about 390, as shown by the letter of condolence which Jerome sent to his wife, Theodora (Ep. 75).

J.M. Bover, La Vulgata en España: Estudios bíblicos I (1941) 18-22; T. Ayuso Marazuela, La Vetus Latina Hispana, I, Madrid 1953, 513; U. Domínguez del Val, Historia de la antigua literatura latina hispano-lusitana, II, Madrid 1998, 91-92.

M. Díaz y Díaz

LUCIUS I, pope (d. 254). His pontificate lasted a very short time, about eight months, between the spring of 253 and the beginning of 254 (Eus., HE 7, 2). Immediately after he was elected emperor, Gallus had him arrested and condemned to exile. After the death of Gallus and under the new emperor *Valerian, Lucius was able to return to Rome. He had a correspondence with *Cyprian (Ep. 61 and 68). The LP puts his place of origin in Rome, and also presents him as a martyr, beheaded on the order of Valerian (see I, 153). This fact is doubtful, because Valerian began his anti-Christian persecution only in 257; i.e., three years after the death of Lucius. Besides, the Roman church venerated him from the 4th c. only as a confessor, entering his name in the Depositio episcoporum and not in the Depositio martyrum. Lucius intervened on the question of the lapsi*, with the moderation of the Roman see proper to that subject. He wrote several letters on the matter which have been lost (on his apocryphal letters see Jaffé, 122). Lucius was buried in the cemetery of St. *Callistus. The Roman Martyrology commemorates him 4 Mar.

Cyprian, Ep. 61,1,1; 61,3,1-2; 68,5,1; Eus., HE VII, 2; 10,3; LP I, XCVI-XCVIII, CXLVIII, 66-69 and 153; G.B. De Rossi, Roma sotterranea cristiana, II, Rome 1867, 62-70; G. Mongelli, La Chiesa di Cartagine contro Roma durante l'episcopato di S. Cipriano, Miscellanea Francescana 1959, 104-121; BS 8, 286-287 (A. Amore - Cl. Mocchegiani Carpano); O. Limone, L'opera agiografica di Guaiferio di Montecassino, in Monastica. Scritti raccolti in memoria del XV centenario della nascita di S. Benedetto (480-1980), III, Montecassino 1983, 77-130 (Passio sancti Lucii papae); LTK³ 6, 1085 (G. Schwaiger); EPapi I, 278-281 (F. Scorza Barcellona).

M. Spinelli

LUCIUS of Adrianople (d. after 343). Bishop of Adrianople about 330, deposed by the *Eusebians at an uncertain date in the context of the reaction against Nicaea. Returning to his see on the death of *Constantine I (337), he was expelled again, taking refuge in Rome, as did *Athanasius, *Marcellus and others. *Sozomen (HE III, 12) affirms that he was exonerated of the accusations made by the Eusebians through the agency of the Western bishops gathered at *Serdica (343). Lucius returned to Adrianople, but following the commotion there he was sent away again in chains, and died shortly afterward.

DCB 3, 753.

M. Simonetti

LUCIUS of Alexandria (d. after 380). Third *Arian bishop of *Alexandria. Elected shortly after the murder of *George (Dec 361), but unable to go to Alexandria and receive consecration, he remained in *Antioch. Subsequently, with the support of the emperor *Valens, in 367 he reentered Alexandria by night, going to the house of his mother. The pagan, Christian and Jewish population—still remembering George—wanted to kill him, and only with difficulty did he manage to survive through the intervention of the civil authorities. After this the Arians took him to Samosata, where he left bad memories beause of his systematic persecution of the clergy. At the death of Athanasius (373) he again took possession of his see with the support of the emperor Valens, while the orthodox *Peter II fled to *Rome. Lucius persecuted the orthodox, esp. monks. At the death of Valens in 378 he was expelled, taking refuge with *Demophilus of Constantinople, whom he followed into exile in 380. We possess a fragment of an Easter discourse of his, which presents a Logos-sarx Christology (F. Diekamp, Doctrina Patrum de incarnatione Verbi, Münster i.W. 1907, 65, XV).

Simonetti, passim; A. Martin, Athanase d'Alexandrie et l'Église d'Égypte au IVe siècle (328-373), Rome 1996, 593ff., 790ff.; A. Lukaszewicz, Un moine en exil: JJP 28 (1998) 85-94.

E. Prinzivalli

LUCULENTIUS (6th c.?). An author of unknown place or date, perhaps from Vandal *Africa or *Italy, of whom we have a collection of 18 sermons commenting on passages of the NT, esp. Pauline texts; to the series of the PL should be added two sermons discovered subsequently, published respectively by Müller (PLS 4, 1416-1420) and by Lemarié, who adds the text of a sermon on the gospel of Luke 24:36-47. Lemarié advances the hypothesis that the author is from the Carolingian period owing to his dependence on late authors, but it could also be the contrary (see Bouhot: REAug 28 [1980] 351). His commentary is of a literal and historical character, in a simple yet precise style, written without any oratorical artifice.

CPL 953; PL 72, 803-860; A. Müller, Ein neues Fragment aus dem Schriftkommentar des Luculentius: ThQ 93 (1911) 206-222; Stegmüller 5408-5418; Moricca III, 2, 1555-1556; V. Bulhart, Textkritische Studien zu Luculentius: WS 59 (1941) 148-149; W. Affeld: Traditio 13 (1957) 388 (MSS); J. Lemarié, Deux fragments d'homéliaires conservés aux archives capitulaires de Vich, témoins de sermons pseudo-augustiniens et du commentaire de Luculentius sur les Évangiles: REAug 25 (1979) 85-105; H. Müller, Das "Luculentius"-Homiliar. quellenkritische Untersuchungen mit Teiledition, Vienna 1999.

A. Di Berardino

LUGDUNUM. See *LYONS

LUKE, Evangelist. The Luke-Acts narrative is the realization of an organically conceived plan by a single author—namely, Luke—for the benefit of the catechumen Theophilus, or whoever may lie hidden beneath that name, a person at the margins of the church but nevertheless a sympathetic and keen observer of its life. The author did not have it in mind to explain what he narrated, but rather to provoke sympathy and understanding in a reader who had come into contact with Christian teaching. The gospel and Acts also set out to demonstrate to the Roman authorities that the new religion had as much right to exist as had the Jewish religion, to which it was intimately connected. The underlying conviction is that the same economy of salvation orients both Christianity and Judaism, and that the ineluctable will of God, which has entered history in the person of Jesus, son of Mary, connects the present to the past and opens up a new future. This temporal connection is present from the very beginning of the narrative, where in the case of Zechariah (Lk 1:18-20) we see clearly that the plan of God, following its own sovereign course but not in opposition to the social situation of the protagonists, continues in its course—with varying emphases—throughout the gospel, in contexts both favorable (Lk 4:42-44; 5:15; 7:7-19) and hostile (Lk 4:28-30; 7:31-35; 8:34-37). The book of Acts itself actualizes the parable of the mustard seed which becomes a tree (Lk 13:18-19; Mt 13:31-32) and the promise of the *Holy Spirit which makes of Peter an orator (Acts 2:14-36), a thaumaturge (Acts 3:1-10) and a worker of miracles (Acts 5:19). The death of Stephen is the seed from which germinates the conversion of Paul (Acts 7:55-8:3).

In the context of the passing on and first interpretations of the teaching of Christ undertaken by the NT authors, Luke's own emphases mark a break with the established constitution of contemporary political-religious society. In the Greco-Roman and Semitic worlds, both of which had close links to the pagan culture which gave priority to a materialist ethic, women were regarded as possessing a limited dignity and social standing. Among prophets, however, and wherever there was attention to revelation, women could not be held to possess inferior status. That being said, no other writing of the NT gives such value and preference to women: Elizabeth (Lk 1:13-60), Anna (Lk 2:36-38) and the holy women (Lk 8:1-3), Martha and Mary of Bethany (Lk 10:38-42), the widow of Nain (Lk 7:11-17), the sinner who anointed Christ (Lk 7:36-50), the woman who was bent over (Lk 13:10-17), the women who accompanied Jesus to Calvary (Lk 23:27-31), the housewife (Lk 15,8-10), and the widow who troubles the unjust judge (Lk 18:1-8) form a great mosaic, every piece of which grants to the woman a specific mission. With profound affection and sincere devotion Luke paints his picture of Mary, most-favored of God and loved by men, in the double optic of virgin and mother. As the mother of Jesus she is honored by Elizabeth (Lk 1:42-45) and by an anonymous hearer of the Lord (Lk 11:27-28). In the Acts she is mentioned in the context of the Christian community praying in expectation of the Holy Spirit (Acts 1:14). Motifs similar to these in other NT writings are both few and of less significance.

Patristic use of the Lukan writings was not always attentive to Luke's values and distinctives; cultural background and religious sensibility resulted in the emphasis now of one aspect and now of another. According to *Jerome, "among the evangelists, Luke is distinguished for a notable knowledge of the Greek language" (Ep. 20,4: PL 22, 378). Jerome's flattering judgment must be mitigated and interpreted within the context of *Koine and not in comparison with high Greek literature. Nonetheless the Fathers were from the beginning aware of the Lukan corpus, mentioning it along with the other evangelists as well as commenting on it. The oldest testimony, on which a certain tradition was founded, is that of *Irenaeus of Lyons: "Luke, a companion of Paul, wrote down the gospel which the latter preached" (Adv. haer. III, 1,1: SC 211, 24). The Irenaean formulation of this information includes more data and has been accepted by critics with a certain reserve. Irenaeus returns to Luke insistently, speaking of his journeys with Paul (Acts 16:10-28,16; the "we" passages), the declarations of Paul (Col 4:14; 2 Tim 4:10-11) and defending the unity and integrity of the work against the mutilations of the *Marcionites and the other *gnostics (Adv. haer. III, 14: SC 211, 258-274). Irenaeus's attestations are important on account of the period from which they come (end of the 2nd c.) and because they take up previous traditions present in *Asia Minor which had been brought to *Gaul. We cannot, however, overlook the fact that Irenaeus—ignoring Lk 1:1-4 and on the model of Col 4:12-14 and Phil 23-24, where Luke is in the group of collaborators of Paul (2 Tim 4:10-11)—says that he is a secretary of the apostle, attentive to his interpretation of the gospel message. At the same time we should note that the biblical texts to which Irenaeus refers contain interesting information: Luke is not of Jewish stock, he is a doctor, he collaborates with Paul, and with Paul he meets Mark on several occasions.

Notwithstanding the many problems that it poses, the Muratorian *Canon does give us authoritative information on the origins of the NT. In lines 2-8 it says: "In the third place the gospel of Luke. Luke was a doctor, who after the ascension of Christ Paul took with him on account of his knowledge of law; he wrote with Paul's approval what was true. Not having seen the Lord in the flesh, and according to what he was able to learn of events, he begins his account from the birth of John." In lines 34-39 he mentions the origin of the Acts: "The Acts of all the apostles were written in one book. Luke intimates to the excellent Theophilus that all these things had happened at that time, and this he shows clearly omitting the passion of Peter and the departure of Paul from Rome for Spain." The Muratorian Canon, clearly dependent on the biblical passages relating to Paul and Luke, identifies Luke as the companion of Paul with the author of the gospel and the Acts. From 200 onward we find Luke referred to more frequently.

*Tertullian, without any polemical note, defends the integrity of the Third Gospel and sets out the characteristics of the author, among them that he was not part of the college of apostles but moved in their circles (apostolicus), that he was a disciple and follower of Paul, mentioning that while Marcion fabricated a gospel of his own under the pseudonym of Paul, Paul conformed his gospel to that of the apostles who had preceded him, concluding: "If he who was the light of Luke asked confirmation of his faith and preaching from the authority of his predecessors, so much more I would ask that the gospel of the disciple be founded on the authority of his master. . . . The gospel of Luke is commended to us on account of its deriving from Paul" (Contra Marcionem IV, 2,4-5).

Tertullian does not contribute anything additional to Irenaeus or the Muratorian Canon, on which he seems to depend, but he speaks out of a tradition which had by then established itself. The decision of Marcion to prepare a gospel under the name of Paul without doubt hints at the early link made between Luke and Paul, whose supposed origination of the Third Gospel aroused a particular affection for it in Marcion and his followers.

With *Origen the problem of the attribution of the Third Gospel has been overcome. *Eusebius, referring to his biblical canon, observes: "The third is the gospel of Luke which was praised by Paul and composed for believers coming from the Gentile peoples" (Eus., HE VI, 25,6). Origen is not the only writer who states that Luke composed his gospel for the Gentiles, but he also preached a series of 39 homilies on the text (SC 87) that, as the first known commentary, has had a considerable influence on the history of spiritual theology as well as providing some important insights that proved crucial at a later time. Among the most important to mention are devotion to the person of Jesus, spiritual combat and the battle between Satan and Christ for dominion over the world (Hom. 30; 31), the discernment of spirits (Hom. 1), the human vocation to become a perfect image of the Creator (Hom. 8; 34) and angelology (Hom. 12; 13). Medieval writers, and above all those from the monastic tradition, frequently appealed to Origen, esp. in the translations of *Jerome and *Rufinus and the Sententiae of *Evagrius. The homilies of Origen are of great significance on account of the historical period in which they were composed, the group for whom they were composed (the catechumens) and for the exegetical method which stands out both for its moderation and its concrete style (see Origène, Homélies sur Luc: SC 87, 91).

Eusebius, tracing a profile of Luke, gives some information which adds to our knowledge: "Luke, Antiochene by birth, had regular contacts with the apostles as well as with Paul, whose friendship he enjoyed. Having learned from them the art of healing souls with the gospel, he wrote on the instruction of those who, from the beginning, were eyewitnesses and ministers of the Word, having investigated everything from the very origins [see Lk 1:1-4]; in the Acts he recounts what he himself had seen" (Eus., HE III, 4,6).

Most frequently alluded to is Luke's Antiochene origin; the stated frequent contacts with the apostles reflect more the hagiographer than the historian. A picture of the evangelist established, he attempts some exegesis of Luke from a historical perspective, which thanks to OT references opens up avenues for broader study (see Lk 1:33 linked to Ps 88:36-37: PG 24, 532). There are sufficient fragments from the commentary to indicate the type of applied exegesis (PG 24, 529-606).

To the 4th c. belong the anti-Marcionite prologues to the gospels; that for Luke contains information compatible with that recorded in previous centuries. Luke: "a doctor, author of the gospel, disciple of the apostles, follower of Paul up to his martyrdom; served the Lord with an unblemished life; celibate and without children, he lived until eighty-four years old in Boeotia, full of the Holy Spirit. The gospels already having been composed, that of Matthew in Judea and that of Mark in Italy, under the inspiration of the Holy Spirit he wrote his gospel in the region of Achaia. He explains at the beginning that the other gospels were written before his, but that it was necessary to relate in more detail to the Greek faithful the whole economy of salvation"; then he wrote the Acts of the Apostles (see M.J. Lagrange, Évangile selon Luc, XV-XVII). The anti-Marcionite prologues identify Luke with the author of the Third Gospel and also of the Acts, and offer some biographical data not previously supplied. As the apostolic age became more remote, the biography of Luke was enriched until it reached the point of legend.

Given the details that we find in the Bible and the Christian tradition we can sum up the historically plausible evidence as follows. Luke did not know Jesus during his earthly ministry; he is with Paul at Rome during the first (61–63) and the second (65–66) periods of captivity. A doctor (Col 4:14), he sends greetings to Philemon (v. 24); a converted pagan, he is with Paul when all others have left him between 65 and 66 (2 Tim 4:11). From the Acts we learn that he is with Paul during the second journey, from Troas to Philippi, and in the third, from Philippi to Jerusalem, during the detention of Paul at Caesarea and during his removal to *Rome (Acts 16:10–28:16). In the Acts the city of *Antioch is mentioned with particular interest: he describes events there (Acts 11:19-26), refers to the teachers and prophets to be found there (Acts 13:1-3), to its role as a center from which emanated the church's mission to the world beyond Palestine (Acts 14:26-28; 15:1-35); here for the first time the faithful were given the name Christians (Acts 11:26). As a writer of the golden age, Luke explains his intentions in his prologue which he then puts into effect in his work. He has made contact with everyone who had a part, from the beginning, in that series of events in which Jesus of Nazareth was the principal actor. The order in which what follows is arranged is not strictly chronological. He works on the basis of Mark when the earlier gospel is connected to the schema of primitive preaching; i.e., from the Galilean ministry to the programmatic discourse (Lk 3:1–4:30; 4:31–6:19), from the discourse in parables to the journey to Jerusalem (Lk 8:4–9:50), and finally in the ministry in Jerusalem (Lk 18:15–21:38); he knows a series of sayings available also to Matthew, but which he uses in different ways (Lk 9:51–18:14); he introduces passages of his own which have come to him as a result of his research. The most esp. Lukan parts of the text are to be found in the journey to Jerusalem or "great insertion" (Lk 9:51–18:14), where Luke gathers together the most beautiful parables of Jesus. The infancy narratives (Lk 1–2) have nothing in common with those of Matthew (1–2): they are Christian prehistory, and the characters are presented as Jews who are looking ahead to the new religion.

Luke knows the canons of narrative of his time: he knows that an event, whether it is important from the outset or whether it becomes so subsequently, must be set in its historical context. The birth of John the Baptist is dated to the time of Herod the Great (Lk 1:5), that of Jesus from the reign of the emperor Augustus (Lk 2:1): the appearance of the precursor and the beginning of the ministry of Jesus are synchronized with dates from both Roman and Greek history (Lk 3:1-2). The overall plan is determined by the great insertion (Lk 9:51–18:14), where Luke adopts but somewhat modifies Mark's geographical schema, which orients Jesus' activity toward Jerusalem. This harmonious and well-integrated whole is, after the infancy narrative (Lk 1–2), divided into three great sections marked by specific geographical and theological characteristics: (1) Lk 3:1–9:17—messianic manifestation in Galilee—(2) Lk 9:18–19:27—messianic journey toward Jerusalem (great insertion)—(3) Lk 19:28–24:53—the Messiah in Jerusalem, taking possession of his city and of his temple, founding his kingdom, followed by the passion and resurrection. Within this structure there are several themes synchronically designed to show that Jesus is King and Messiah, or even more fittingly, Lord-Messiah (Lk 2:11). Luke, the only evangelist who extends the narrative of the mission of Jesus to that of the church, reveals his distinctive and indeed original principle of continuity. This originality may be seen in the plan of salvation history divided into three periods: that of the OT, summed up in Lk 1–2, characterized by the presence of the prophets and of the Baptist (see Lk 16:16); the central period, concerned with the person of Jesus, to whom the gospel is devoted; the period of the church, of which the Acts of the Apostles describes the beginnings insofar as they could be recorded, serving also as a pointer to what was to come. The unfolding of events after the resurrection of Jesus led Luke to distinguish these three periods linked by his central conviction: the presence of God in history.

To this universal vision Luke connects certain underlying themes. Jesus the Son of God, who reveals himself progressively throughout the narrative in words and deeds, from the initial proclamation which describes him as filled with the Holy Spirit (Lk 1:35; 2:40, 52; 4:1, 14, 18) to the confession of Peter, who calls him "the Christ of God" (Lk 9:20), to that of the Father, who presents him to the whole of humanity as "the firstborn Son" (Lk 9:35), to his capacity to give freely of himself (Lk 9:31, 51; 13:32), up to the death that opens to him the way of glory (Lk 22:69; 24:49; 21:25-27). The gathering of the people: Jesus preaches to Israel, which in response to him divides both before and after the resurrection (Lk 2:34-35; Acts 2–4; 5:33-40), and also to the socially marginalized (Lk 2:8-10; 4:18; 6:20-26; 5:20-32; 8:1-3). The way of the disciple, which consists in conversion (Lk 5:32; 12:54-13:9 etc), which is an act of faith in confessing the Lord Jesus (Lk 1:20,45; 7:50; 8:12-13) combined with prayer and charity (Lk 11:1-13; 6:27-42; 10:25-37). This way, notwithstanding the commitment it requires, is full of light and joy. The eschatological prophecy: Jesus announces his return at the end of time as Son of Man, when the time of the church will come to its completion (Lk 9:26; 12:35-48; 17:23-37; 18:8). This conviction checks the impatience in awaiting the parousia, which had affected certain proto-Christian groups, and gives way to the realization of the plan of salvation, a work falling preeminently to the church (Lk 2:11; 3:22; 4:21; cf. Acts, passim).

From ancient tradition, the prologues and Irenaeus we can put the date of composition of the Lukan writings to after the death of Paul, in about 67, and indicate the probable place as Achaia. The prophetic description of the fall of Jerusalem in 70 (Lk 19:27, 43-44; 20:20-24; 23:28-31) is much more explicit and precise than that of Mark (13:14-19), and the accounts of Flavius Josephus (Jewish War, V, 4.6; VI 1-5) and *Tacitus (Hist. V, 11-13) lead us to suppose that Luke knew those events and that they made a deep impression on him. The gospel therefore was probably composed after the destruction of Jerusalem sometime around 80. It is probable that to the prophecy of the fall of the Holy City included by Mark (13:14-19) Luke added those clarifications which transformed a prediction into a prophecy ex eventu. The conclusion of Acts, which ends after the first Roman imprisonment of Paul (62–63), cannot be regarded as a decisive argument for dating the composition of the gospel before 62. A careful examination of Acts 28:30-31 suggests that Luke concludes in the way he does not owing to any lack of material but simply because he has completed his own plan. In this way additional credence is given to Irenaeus and the anti-Marcionite prologue in which Luke's writings are dated to after the death of Paul.

The patristic authors were not able to engage with the problems which historical criticism has raised in connection with Luke in more recent times, but rather, in their commentaries and homilies, they threw into relief the message that the evangelist imparted in his own particular style. Apart from Origen and Eusebius, Luke aroused the interest of ecclesiastical writers both Greek and Latin. Among them we should note particularly *Titus of Bostra (d. 378), who delivered homilies on the whole gospel; his exegesis is sober, moderate, avoiding the use of imagery. He adopts the same interpretative technique as the Against the Manicheans, where there is special attention to the sacred text in its treatment of the truths of the *incarnation and of the virgin birth (TU 21/1). In a series of homilies *Cyril of Alexandria (d. 444) drew from the gospel some lessons for Christian conduct. Notwithstanding that only some of these have been preserved in the original language—only three complete homilies—the Syriac version (6th–7th c.) gives us 156, while the fragments from the catenae, apart from not being completely authentic, emphasize their anti-*Nestorian character and so obscure the text by using it in an extraneous controversial context (PG 72, 475-950; CSCO 70; 140; TU 34, 1b). Among the Greek writers there are no other continuous commentaries. Relatively frequently we find homilies delivered on feasts of the Lord or the Virgin Mary, as well as fragments of homilies gathered in the catenae (see R. Devreesse: DBS I, 1181-1194); it is not rare that Luke is cited in letters which treat the incarnation or the virgin birth in theological depth. The Greek patristic tradition, even that which comes to us from important writers (*John Chrysostom, *Athanasius of Alexandria, *Basil, *Gregory of Nazianzus), had given pride of place to *Matthew and *John. Origen's early interest in Luke did not subsequently yield the attention which might have been expected. Broader consideration of Luke would have to wait until the Byzantine era.

In the Latin patristic tradition, the first continuous commentary is that of *Ambrose, originating in a series of homilies given in different contexts, then collected together by the author and substantially reworked to provide a veneer of continuity. Ambrose, while mindful of the systematic development of the biblical text, takes up exegetical insights from Origen's homilies on Luke and Hilary's commentary on Matthew. The christological hermeneutic combines the approaches of the Antiochene and Alexandrian schools, to which Ambrose adds a pastoral concern to highlight, esp. where the text allows it, the errors of the *Arians, the *Sabellians and the *patripassians. Presupposing historical and literal interpretations, he emphasizes symbolic and *allegorical *exegesis, through which he more easily achieves moral and pastoral application of the text. The commentary, also of great importance in literary terms, has its reference point in the person of Christ, the God-man, and establishes the roots of a devotion to the humanity of Christ which was to capture the attention of medieval mysticism.

*Augustine, who tends to favor the gospel of John, as we see from many discourses which make up the collection of 124 tractates (CCL 36, 1954), took up only a few Lukan themes, comparing them either with Matthew (Sermon 51 on the genealogy of Christ) or acc. to the subject under consideration (Sermon 98 on the resurrection of the son of the widow of Nain [Lk 7:11-17]; Sermon 99 on the woman who was a sinner [Lk 7:36-50]; Sermon 100 on following Christ [Lk 9:57-62]; Sermon 101 on the plentiful harvest [Lk 10:2-61, PL 38, 594-661]). The Christmas discourses cannot really be considered exegetical homilies on Lk 1–2, because Augustine's aim is to identify in these chapters certain themes of particular value for the edification of the faithful (see Sermons 194-196: PL 38, 1115-1125). Augustine also devoted the second book of the Quaestiones Evangeliorum to Luke, of which in 51 short chapters some salient points are discussed. The sermons are pastoral and exhortative, with Augustine striving to apply the biblical texts to the Christian life, more than they are exegetical.

Sharing Augustine's interest in Luke but differing in interpretation, *Peter Chrysologus and *Gregory the Great draw truths of pastoral significance from the texts. Notwithstanding doubts over the authenticity of certain discourses, those considered genuine by critics allow us to say that between 425 and 450 in *Ravenna Peter Chrysologus tried to overcome the tensions in the city which followed the end of the Council of *Ephesus of 431. Sermons 22-27 put forward rather emphatically some points connected with Lk 12; the mission of John the Baptist occupies sermons 86-94; the annunciation and birth of Christ, with reference to Matthew 1–2, are the subject of sermons 140-144 and 147-150, where pastoral concerns give way to dogmatic ones (PL 52, 259-278, 441-469, 575-599). Of the forty homilies of Gregory the Great on the gospels, seven are devoted to Luke. They have the merit of providing at the beginning the complete gospel text, the subject matter of the homily, and the basilica in which it was preached, as well as the circumstances and details of its delivery. Together with his homilies on Ezekiel they reflect the events of 590 and 591 (PL 76, passim). In many respects Gregory makes his own the pastoral interpretation of those who commented on the gospel before him.

In the medieval period we find a continuous commentary on Luke by *Bede the Venerable, which may be dated between 709 and 715. As with other writers of the period, he takes up Jerome, Augustine and in particular Ambrose, with whose exegesis he intermingles his own penetrating observations. Having set out in the first place the theory of the four senses of Scripture (historical, moral, allegorical, mystical) he moves for the most part with ease from one to the other, esp. when he leaves the line of the great Fathers to do exegesis of his own (see the explanation of the word Iesus, CCL 120, 58). The commentary on Luke, together with that on the Apocalypse considered a model in particular for their richness of content and allegorical and moral interpretations, has enjoyed great success both at the time and subsequently, esp. in monastic settings. In his homilies on Lukan pericopes the style is the same, with greater *parenetical and moral application of the gospel (CCL 120, 1960). The commentary of Bede, written between 780 and 785 at the height of the Carolingian era, was followed by a smaller commentary by an anonymous Irish monk who had emigrated to S Germany, at the time of the pious and learned Irish bishop Virgilius of Salzburg (d. 784). The interpretative technique is typical of the period: having cited a verse from the gospel, sometimes consisting of only a few words, he gives one or two interpretations, and then gives the most commonly accepted one, with attention to the multiple senses. The authorities to whom he appeals are *Pelagius, Ambrose, Jerome, Bede, Gregory the Great and *Isidore of Seville. In style and exegetical method the work reflects the Expositio Quattuor Evangeliorum, widely read and appreciated in educated Irish circles. The Latin text used is basically the Vulgate, but also frequently incorporating material from the Vetus Latina (CCL 108C, 1973, IX-XI).

Patristic and medieval commentaries: Origen: Homiliae in Lucam, PG 13, 1799-1902; PL 26, 219-306 (trs. Rufinus); SC 87, Paris 1962; Cyril Alex.: Explanatio in Lucam (CPG 5207): PG 72, 475-950; Ambrose (CPL 143): Expositio Evangelii secundum Lucam, PL 15, 1525-1850; CSEL 32/4, 1892; CCL 14, 1957, 1-400; SC 45 and 52, 1956 and 1958; Bede (CPL 1356): In Lucae Evangelium Expositio, PL 92, 301-634; CCL 120, 1960, 5-425; Anonymous, Irish: Commentarium in Lucam, CCL 108C, 1974, 3-101; Theophylact: Expositio in Lucam, PG 123, 683-1126; M.J. Lagrange, Évangile selon Luc, Paris [7]1948; L. Cerfaux - J. Cambier, Luc (Évangile selon saint): DBS V, 545-597; G. Lomiento, L'esegesi origeniana del vangelo di Luca, Bari 1966; B. Rigaux, Testimonianze del Vangelo secondo Luca, Padua 1973; var. aus., L'Évangile de Luc. Problèmes littéraires et théologiques, Gembloux 1973; J.A. Fitzmyer, The Gospel According to Luke, 2 vols., New York 1979; W. Schmithals, Das Evangelium nach Lukas, Zürich 1980; E. La Verdière, Luke, Wellington 1980; R.E. Brown, La nascita del Messia secondo Matteo e Luca, Assisi 1981; F. Bovon, Luke the Theologian: Thirty-Three Years of Research (1950–1983), tr. K. McKinney, Allison Park, PA 1987; M.D. Goulder, Luke: A New Paradigm, 2 vols., Sheffield 1990. For the exegesis of the Fathers, see H.J. Sieben, Exegesis Patrum: saggio bibliografico sull'esegesi biblica dei Padri della Chiesa, Rome 1983; Id., Kirchenväterhomilien zum Neuen Testament: ein Repertorium der Textausgaben und Übersetzungen, mit einem Anhang der Kirchenväterkommentare, Steenbrugis 1991; also see the journal "Annali di storia dell'esegesi" 11 (1994)–14 (1997); A. Gregory, The Reception of Luke and Acts in the Period Before Irenaeus, Tübingen 2003. In particular, see Luke, ed. A. Just, ACCS NT 3, Downers Grove, IL 2003.

E. PERETTO

LUKE, Evangelist (apocryphal). For a long time the tradition seemed content with the role of Luke as a "secretary" and companion of Paul (Irenaeus, Adv. Haer. 3,1,1; cf. Acta Pauli 14), identifying him with the physician of the same name of Col 4:14 and affirming his Antiochene and pagan origin (Eus. Caes., HE 3,4,6; Suppl. ad quaest. ad Stephanum 4), as well as his being celibate (Prologo antimarcionita; Jerome, In Matth., praef.) or numbering him among the 70 or 72 disciples sent by Jesus (Lk 10:1; see Epiphanius, Adv. Haer. 51,11, followed by some MSS of the Greek-Syriac list of the apostles). The traditions about his preaching are contradictory: *Dalmatia, *Gaul, *Italy, *Macedonia (Epiphanius, ibid.; cf. the list of ps.-Epiphanius: Greece, Rome and Italy). According to the anti-Marcionite Prologue (4th c.) Luke died in Bithynia; it seems to be owing to a confusion between Bithynia and Boeotia that the later traditions record that he died (of natural causes) when bishop of Thebes in Greece, also locating his tomb there (list of the apostles of ps.-Epiphanius; see also the Acts of Titus 6). In the apocryphal texts Luke rarely appears: together with the apostles in the Dormitio Pseudo Ioannis 13 and in the lists of the apostles and disciples. A Martyrdom of Luke which circulated in anti-Chalcedonian circles remains, in four different languages: *Syriac, Bohairic *Coptic, Arabic and Ethiopian (perhaps behind the Syriac and Coptic lies an original Greek text, now lost); this document, which locates Luke's apostolate first in *Dalmatia and then in Proconnesus, is an amalgam of familiar incidents: healings; destruction of images of idols at the invocation of the name of Jesus; trial before Nero (perhaps at Constantinople); miracle of a reattached limb; conversion of the first executioner, who suffers martyrdom together with Luke; the recovery of the corpse which had been thrown into the sea. Further, a Coptic text attributed to *Basil of Caesarea transcribes the full text of a letter of Luke on the construction by the apostles of the first church in honor of the Madonna. The Byzantine traditions relating to Luke multiply after the translation of his relics, now in Padua, from *Achaia to *Constantinople (336) and their placement in the basilica of the Holy Apostles (357). If one disregards the fanciful reference that Nicephorus Callistus (14th c.) attributes to *Theodore the Lector (5th c.), the first traditions about Luke as a painter date to the 8th c. (*Andrew of Crete; *John of Damascus etc.).

CANT 290-294; BHG 990y-993t; BHL 4970-4977; BHO 567-571; BS 8 (1967) 188-222; LCIK 7, 447-464; Écrits apocryphes chrétiens, ed. de F. Bovon - P. Geoltrain, Paris I, 1997; II, 2005: I, 176; 1172-1177; II, 470, 476, 612, 959-978 (martyrdom, with bibl.); F. Kellner, Sterbeort und Translation des Evangelisten Lukas und des Apostel Bartholomaeus: ThQ 87 (1905) 596-608; D. Woods, The Date of the Translation of the Relics of Ss. Luke and Andrew to Constantinople: VChr 45 (1991) 286-292; M. Chaîne, Catéchèse attribuée à S. Basile de Césarée. Une lettre apocryphe de S. Luc: ROC 23 (1922-23) 150-159, 271-303; M. van Esbroeck, La première église de la Vierge bâtie par les Apôtres, in Aegyptus Christiana. Mélanges d'hagiographie égyptienne et orientale dédiés à la mémoire du P. Paul Devos, bollandiste. Curauerunt U. Zanetti - E. Lucchesi (Cahiers d'Orientalisme 25), Geneva 2004, 1-18; M. Bacci, Appunti sulla nascita, moltiplicazione e decadenza delle immagini di culto attribuite a San Luca: Bollettino d'Arte 79/88 (1994) 73-92; Id., Il pennello dell'Evangelista. Storia delle immagini sacre attribuite a San Luca (Piccola Biblioteca Gisem 14), Pisa 1998; Luca Evangelista. Parola e immagine tra Oriente e Occidente, Catalogo della mostra, ed. G. Mariani Canova, Padua 2000; M.P. Billanovich, Un'antica tradizione sul luogo della morte di S. Luca: Beozia o Bitinia?: Italia medioevale e umanistica 41 (2000) 127-137; R.W. Burgess, The Passio S. Artemii, Philostorgius, and the Dates of the Invention and Translations of the Relics of Sts Andrew and Luke: AB 121 (2003) 5-36; G. Zampieri, La tomba di San Luca evangelista. La cassa di piombo e l'area funeraria della Basilica di San Giustina in Padova, Rome 2003.

S.J. Voicu

LUPUS of Troyes (d. 479). Born in Toul in about 395 to an aristocratic family, he received a good education. In ca. 418 he married Pimeniola, sister of *Hilary of Arles. After six years of marriage, with mutual agreement they renounced the conjugal life in order to devote themselves entirely to God: Lupus went to the *cenobium of *Lérins, placing himself under the direction of the founder, *Honoratus. After a year, traveling to Mâcon so as to give away his possessions to the poor, he passed through Troyes and was made bishop there in 426/427. Continuing to live a monastic life, he showed himself a zealous pastor, generous to the poor and tireless in defense of his people during the barbarian invasions. In 429 he accompanied *Germanus of Auxerre to *Britain to combat *Pelagianism and obtained many conversions by preaching and through miracles. He then returned to Troyes and took up again the pastoral care of his diocese. When in 451 *Attila with his Huns invaded *Gaul, Lupus persuaded them to spare the city from destruction.

*Sidonius Apollinaris wrote him four letters (Ep. VI, 1.4.9; IX, 11 = PL 58, 551; 554; 558; 626). Lupus himself, along with Bishop Euphronius, wrote a letter to *Thalassius of Angers on questions of ecclesiastical legislation. After 52 years in the episcopate, this great bishop commended his soul to God on 29 July 479, the day of his feast.

Editions: CPL 988 (Ep. ad Thalassium) PL 58, 66-68 (Ep. 1 is a Vignier forgery); Munier, in CCL 148, 140-141. See also CPL 989: Vita s. Lupi (cf. BHL 5087), in MGH Script. Mer. 7 (1920) 284-302. Studies: E. Griffe, La Gaule chrétienne, II, Paris 1966, 301-304; BS 8 (1966) 390-391; Patrologia III, 498; A.H. Hubert, Studien zur sozialen und kirchlichen Führungschicht Galliens: Germanus von Auxerre, Lupus von Troyes und Trierer Bischöfe des 5. Jahrhunderts: Jahrbuch für westdeutsche Landesgeschichte 19 (1993) 17-41; I. Crété-Protin, Église et vie chrétienne dans le diocèse de Troyes du IV^e au IX^e siècle, Villeneuve d'Ascq 2002.

M. Maritano

LUSITANIA

I. History - II. Spread of Christianity - III. Archaeology.

I. History. Province of Hispania created by Augustus (27 BC) in Hispania Ulterior. It enjoyed imperial rank and included three legal conventus: Emerita (Mérida, Badajoz), Pax Iulia (Beja, Baixo Alentejo) and Scallabis (Santarem, Ribatejo). With the reform of *Diocletian (284–297), Mérida became the capital of the diocesis Hispaniarum, the prestige of the province increasing as a result of this promotion and the power of aristocratic landowners intermarried with the *Theodosian dynasty, responsible for the vain attempt to defend the peninsula from German invaders (406–409). Once the barbarians had crossed the Pyrenees, the Lusitanian territories suffered widespread devastation. In the period of King Rechila (441–448), the Suevi controlled important Lusitanian centers, such as Mérida and Mértola (Myrtilis, Baixo Alemtejo), finally occupying even *Seville. The campaign of Theodoric II (456) and the occupation of Santarem by Sunieric (460) halted their advance. Euric then sent a powerful army to curb the Suevian occupation of Mérida, Santarem, Olisipo (Lisbon), Cauria (Coria) and Salmantica (Salamanca). Thus, far from imperial control, Lusitania remained separated into two parts, the Suevic (to the N of the Duero) and the Visigothic (to the S). Following the defeat at Vouillé (507), the *Visigoths entered Hispania in huge numbers, many settling in Lusitania. The region enjoyed a certain autonomy until two events in the reign of *Leovigild resulted in *Toledo gaining increased control: the rebellion of *Hermenegild (579–584), supported by the Lusitanian aristocracy, and the annexation of the Suevian kingdom (585). Nevertheless, Lusitania played the leading role in a number of rebellions, such as that of Witteric, a noble Lusitanian *Goth who participated in (and betrayed) the Meridan revolt against *Recared (587), and who took the throne (603–610) after having risen against Recared's son, Liuva II; in exchange, the action against Sisenand (ca. 633) failed. After the Battle of the River Guadalete and the capture of Toledo by Gebel El Tariq (711), resistance against the Arabs in the Lusitanian cities was brief and ineffective, esp. in Mérida, which was incorporated into the Islamic dominions in 713.

II. Spread of Christianity. From the conciliar acts we know of the episcopal sees of Mérida, Elbora (Talavera de la Reina), Ossonoba (Faro), Lisbon, Abela (Ávila), Beja, Conimbriga (Coimbra), Viseum (Viseu), Egitania (Idanhaa-Velha), Lamecum (Lamego), Coria, Salamanca and Caliabria (to the E of Salamanca). We know little for certain of the process of Christianization of the province. The new religion was spread by pilgrims, soldiers and merchants, with the garrison of the Legion VII Gemina (at Mérida and along the Vía de La Plata) and the colonies of Jewish and Eastern traders (at Mérida and Lisbon) playing a certain role. The first document relating to Christian *Spain (Cypr., Ep. 67) attests to the existence of a bishopric at Mérida (254) and another at León-Astorga, and also speaks of the problems of the libellatici who *apostatized during the persecution of *Valerian (254–258). In the 4th c. the persecution of *Diocletian (303–311) brought a noteworthy martyr, *Eulalia, to Mérida, around whom grew up one of the most important martyr cults on the peninsula. At the end of the century (384), there is evidence of the presence of an Arian bishop, *Potamius of Lisbon (Marcellinus and Faustinus, Libellus precum). The *Priscillian heresy left its mark in Lusitania, since Priscillian pretended, fruitlessly, to the see of Mérida and subsequently obtained that of Ávila, which he himself had created. During the 5th c. the Lusitanian church faced jurisdictional problems deriving from the division of the ecclesiastical province between the Suevi and the Visigoths, and the presence of Arian bishoprics at Mérida and Viseu (which disappeared during the reign of *Recared). One of the principal figures of the epoch was *John of Bíclaro, a Catholic Goth born at Santarem and exiled by Leovigild, founder of the monastery of Bíclaro, bishop of Girona (ca. 591), and author of a Chronicle which inspired *Isidore of Seville.

III. Archaeology. The paleo-Christian remains of the province are complicated to understand because there is little scope for architectural contextualization, and also because it is difficult to relate them to nearby towns. Further, the chronology is very problematic, as we have to rely on architectural criteria. However, most of the churches date from between the 6th and 7th c. Most common are rectangular plans with one aisle (Milreu, Ibahernando, Vera Cruz de Marmelar, Santa Olalla and Portera) or three (Torre da Palma, Alconétar, Idanha-a-Velha, San Gião de Nazaré, San Pedro de Balsemão, El Gatillo de Arriba), whereas a Greek cross plan (Valdecebadar de Olivenza) or composite types (Santa Lucía del Trampal) are rarer. Many of these churches have a baptistery (Milreu, Alconétar, Torre da Palma, Valdecebadar, El Gatillo), in some cases contemporary with the building of the church, in others added subsequently. Opposing apses containing choir seating (Alconétar, Torre da Palma) and triple apses (Vera Cruz, Santa Lucía) are peculiar to Lusitanian religious architecture. In the 5th c., Eastern and African influences are more important (as in the cases of opposing apses), documented in the villae of Milreu, La Cocosa and Torre de Palma, which are churches and martyria converted into rural Christian centers and possible "patronage parishes." The sources mention the existence of monasteries such as Aquis (Conc. Tolet. XII [680]), which has caused some to hold that a number of these churches may have been monastic (San Gião, Santa Lucía), shown perhaps by their private areas and gates of wall height.

P. de Palol Salellas, Arqueología cristiana de la España romana (siglos IV al VIII), Madrid-Valladolid 1967; J. Vives Gatell, Inscripciones Cristianas de la España Romana y Visigoda, Barcelona 1969; L. Caballero Zoreda - F. Arribas, Alconétar en la vía romana de La Plata. Garrovillas (Cáceres), Excavaciones Arqueológicas en España 70, Madrid 1970; H. Schlunk, La iglesia de S. Gião cerca de Nazaré. Contribución al estudio de la influencia de la liturgia en la arquitectura de las iglesias prerromanas de la Península Ibérica, Actas do II Congresso nacional de arqueología, Coimbra 1971, 509-582; Th. Ulbert, Die westgotenzeitliche Kirche von Valdecebadar bei Olivenza (prov. Badajoz): MM 14 (1973) 202-216; H. Schlunk - Th. Hauschild, "Hispania antiqua." Die Denkmäler der frühchristlichen und westgotischen Zeit, Mainz a.R. 1978; Th. Ulbert, Früchristliche Basiliken mit Doppelapsiden auf der Iberischen Halbinsel. Studien zur Architektur- und Liturgiegeschichte, Archäologische Forschungen 5, Berlin 1978; M. Sotomayor Muro - T. González García, La Iglesia en la España romana y visigoda, Historia de la Iglesia en España I, ed. R. García Villoslada, Madrid 1979; E. Cerrillo Martín de Cáceres, La basílica de época visigoda de Ibahernando, Cáceres 1983; S.J. Maloney, Excavations at the Early Christian Church of Torre de Palma. Final Report, Louisville, KY 1989; L. Caballero Zoreda et al., La iglesia de época paleocristiana y visigoda de El Gatillo de Arriba (Cáceres): Extremadura arqueológica 2 (1991) 471-492; Id., La iglesia de época visigoda de Santa Lucía del Trampal, Alcuéscar (Cáceres): Extremadura arqueológica 2 (1991) 497-523; J. Vilella Masana, Roma, Cartago i la cristiandat hispana segons l'epístola 67 de Cebrià: Homenatge a M. Tarradell, Barcelona 1993, 883-887; A. Fuentes Domínguez, Extremadura en la tardía Antigüedad: Extremadura arqueológica 4 (1995) 217-237; L.A. García Moreno, Historia de la España visigoda, Madrid 1989; C. Godoy Fernández, Arqueología y liturgia. Iglesias hispánicas (siglos IV al VIII), Barcelona 1995; P. Mateos Cruz, La cristianización de la Lusitania (ss. IV-VII): Extremadura en época visigoda: Extremadura arqueológica 4 (1995) 239-263; A.M.C.M. Jorge, L'épiscopat de Lusitanie pendant l'Antiquité tardive (III-VII siècle), Lisboa 2002; R. Teja Casuso (ed.), La Hispania del siglo IV. Administración, economía, sociedad, cristianización, Bari 2002.

P. Maymó i Capdevila

LUXORIUS (5th–6th c.). Latin poet and grammaticus (or rhetor) who lived at the end of the 5th and at the beginning of the 6th c. in *Vandal Africa in the time of King Hilderic (523–530; see Anthol. lat. 194, Riese) and Gelimer (496–534). His texts present difficulties of reconstruction. He seems to be a Christian (Anthol. lat. 340,13), even if in one poem he accuses a certain deacon of drinking too much. It appears that he held an official post of importance, because in one MS he carries the title spectabilis, although this may be only an honorary title. His one hundred or so epigrams included in the Salmasian Anthology follow different meters and are inspired by the poet Martial and also Statius. There is also a Virgilian cento (Anthol. lat. 18, Riese), acc. to the fashion of Late Antiquity. Eleven of these refer to the games of the circus, with their traditional divisions, and to other types of spectacle, but gladiatorial sports had by then died out. Luxurius reveals personal interest and participation in these sports; he is a witness to the continuation of these entertainments during the Vandal period. The epigrams are important in the study of aesthetics, literary linguistics and the social life of Vandal Africa at the beginning of the 6th c. Moreover, Luxurius testifies to the existence of *schools. He also writes on grammatical topics.

CPL 1517; ed. F. Bücheler - A. Riese, Anthologia latina I, 1, Leipzig 1894, 33-221; M. Rosenblum, Luxorius: A Latin Poet Among the Vandals (with tr.), New York 1961; I.K. Horváth - F. Kurucz, Luxorius költeményei latinul és magyarul, Szeged 1963 (text with intro. and notes); ed. R. Shackleton Bailey, Anthologia Latina, I: Carmina in codicibus scripta, Fasc. I: Libri Salmasiani aliorumque carmina, Stuttgart 1982; The Epigrams of Luxorius, tr. R. O'Connell, Philadelphia 1984; Luxurius, 2 vols., Stuttgart 1986; V. Tandoi, Luxoriana: RFIC 98 (1970) 37-63 (observations on the editions of M. Rosenblum and F. Kurucz - I.K. Horváth); G. Laville, La vita del circo ed altri spunti di realtà quotidiana negli epigrammi di Lussorio: AAP 23 (1974) 271-286; J. Veremans, L'asclépiade mineur chez Horace, Sénèque, Terentianus Maurus, Prudence, Martianus Capella et Luxorius: Latomus 35 (1976) 12-42; B. Löfstedt, Bemerkungen zu Luxorius: AClass 23 (1980) 97-105; R.W. Garson, Observations on the Epigrams of Luxorius: MusAfr 6 (1977/78) 9-14; S.T. Stevens, The Circus Poems in the Latin Anthology, in The Circus and a Byzantine Cemetery at Carthage, ed. J.H. Humphrey, Ann Arbor, MI 1988, I, 153-178; H. Laaksonen, L'educazione e la trasformazione della cultura nel regno dei Vandali: L'Africa Romana 7/1 (1990) 357-361; L. Zurli, Esegesi e critica del testo: qualche esempio da Luxorius: GIF 45 (1993) 29-46; M. Giovini, La "vedova allegra" Paula e i giocatori di dadi Ultor e Vatanans nei carmi 304, 318 e 328 (Sh. B.) di Lussorio: SIFC 19, 3rd ser. (2001) 190-226.

A. Di Berardino

LYCIA and PAMPHYLIA. Lycia—a mountainous region of SW *Asia Minor—bounded to the N by Caria, to the E by Pamphylia, and to the W and S by the Mediterranean. It had as its principal cities Xanthos, Telmesso, Myra, Patara and Phaselis. The country, inhabited first by the Solymi and then by the Termilae—who came from Crete—was subsequently conquered by Lycus, son of the Athenian king Pandion. It belonged to the Persians, then to Alexander, then to the Diadochi and finally to the Rhodians (190–168 BC). It was annexed to the empire as a province under *Claudius, but kept its own customs and maintained the traditional form of confederation of cities which each year kept the koinon (a feast of a religious character) under the presidency of the Lyciarch. Pamphylia, in S Asia Minor, located between Lycia, *Cilicia, and Pisidia and traversed by the Taurus Mountains, had as its principal cities Attalia, Olbia, Side, Perga, Aspendos and Ptolemais. It was originally called Mopsopia, but its name is perhaps connected with the diversity of races to which it owes its colonization (from pan and phylē). Subject to the Persians, then to Alexander and to the king of *Syria, it was given by the Romans to Eumenes of Pergamon after the defeat of Antiochus the Great, and returned finally to the Romans in AD 133, to whom it had been bequeathed, along with the rest of the kingdom of Pergamon. Anthony gave up part of it, along with Lycaonia and *Galatia, to the Galatian king Amyntas: at his death, in AD 24, under Tiberius, it became a Roman province, to which Claudius later added Lycia; the union of the two territories under one governor lasted at least until the era of *Constantine (313); after that the two provinces were divided. In the *Diocletian reorganization it was included in the diocese of *Asia and the prefecture of the East, its capital Aspendos. The cities of Lycia and Pamphylia saw significant growth in Late Antiquity, with Christian constructions including churches.

The origins of Christianity in the region are very ancient; the list of bishops present at *Nicaea in 325 lists twenty-five bishops for Lycia, Pamphylia and Isauria: in proportion to the number of names given for Bithynia (11) this indicates a greater degree of Christianization of the W over the E parts of Asia Minor. The most ancient bishop of whom we know in Lycia was in the city of Myra: one Nicander, chosen by St. Titus; for Pamphylia, it was Nestor, bishop of Side in the mid-3rd c. (Gams, Ser. episc., 449-450).

D. Magie, Roman Rule in Asia Minor to the End of the Third Century After Christ, Princeton, NJ 1950, 529-530, 576-579, 663, 1386, 1533; H. Deeter, Lykia: PWK 13, 2270-2291; W. Ruge, Pamphylia: ibid., 18, 3, 354-407; A.D. Macro, The Cities of Asia Minor Under the Roman Empire: ANRW II, 7, 2, Berlin-New York 1980, 672; Dizionario Epigrafico IV (1983) 2273-2304; Studies in the History and Topography of Lycia and Pisidia: In Memoriam A.S. Hall, ed. D. French, London 1994; G. Fowden, Religious Developments in Late Roman Lycia: Topographical Preliminaries, in Landscape and Settlements: Use and Influence of Routes, Paris 1990, 343-372; S. Mitchell, Anatolia, II, Oxford 1993, 58-59; C. Foss, The Lycian Coast in the Byzantine Age: DOP 48 (1994) 1-52.

M. Forlin Patrucco

LYONS

I. The city - II. Origins of Christianity - III. The church of Lyons from the 4th to 6th c. - IV. Council.

The name of Lugdunum, very frequent in *Gaul, designates in the first place the city at the meeting point of the Rhone with the Saône, today called Lyons.

I. The City. Founded in 43 BC by Lucius Munatius Plancus (CIL 10, 6087; Cassius Dio, Hist. rom. 46,50), it had three principal nuclei: (1) Lugdunum, on the hill of Fourvière. Established by the Romans, with its forum vetus and forum novum, basilicas, temples, theaters, aqueducts, walls and to the S of all these, the circus. (2) Condate (Gallic name which means confluence), on the S bank of the Saône, at the point where the river, to the S of the Croix-Rousse and after the section where it runs from E to W, having connected with the Rhone, heads SSW. It is in this Gallic town that in 12 BC the federal sanctuary of the Three Gauls was set up, making the city their capital; nearby, in AD 19, C. Julius Rufus, priest and head of the federation, constructed an amphitheater. The sanctuary features two winged victories set on columns on either side of the altar. An image of the sanctuary appeared on the reverse side of the Gallic coins minted at Lyons. (3) Canabae, an island situated downstream from the confluence, formed by the two arms of the Rhone. Today it is the area called Bellecour-Perrache, and the meeting point of the rivers is further downstream. At the S meeting point were the residences of the international shipping merchants, otherwise occupied with storehouses and potteries.

Beyond these three agglomerates, the residential districts of the sailors of the Saône and the Rhone stretched along the two rivers, and above Condate, an industrial zone.

Apart from the rivers, the city was also at the intersection of a number of land routes: from the E, via Bourgoin, the road from *Italy entered; from the S, via *Vienne, that from Narbonensis; from the W, via Feurs, the road from the Atlantic, which began at Saintes; from the N, via Bourg-en-Bresse, that of the Rhine; and along the Saône, that of the Seine.

The territory subject to the city corresponded to the population of the Segusiavi. Yet, as the table of Peutinger tells us, Lyons is also caput Galliarum; and as capital of the Three Gauls (Belgian, Celtic, Aquitanian) each year on 1 Aug received the delegates of the cities who declared their loyalty to *Rome and participated in the cult of Rome and of Augustus. Finally Lyons gave its name to a province, which was more or less equivalent to Celtic Gaul; i.e., the territory between the Loire, the Saône, the Marne, the Somme and the sea. In the 4th c. the Lyonnaise province was subdivided into Lugdunensis I with Lyons as capital, II with Rouen, III with Tours and IV with Sens. The Christian history of Lyons was to unfold in close connection with the development of its political and civic importance.

II. Origins of Christianity. The first evidence of Christianity in Lyons appears with the martyrs of 177. A letter about them is written in the name of "the servants of Christ, pilgrims in Vienne and Lyons of the Gauls, to their brothers who are in Asia and Phrygia" (Eus., HE, 5,1,3): these Christians made up "two churches" (ibid., 13). The letter tells us of a dozen of the martyrs along with their names; two of them deserve particular mention: Sanctus "the deacon from Vienne" (ibid. 17) and *Pothinus, "charged with the ministry [διακονία] of the episcopate" in Lyons (ibid., 29); they belong to a group of persons who have "established what is here" (ibid., 13). In brief, from the particular links that unite the two churches of Gaul with those of Asia Minor it is legitimate to deduce a relationship of historical dependence: Lyonnaise Christianity is of Asiatic origin; this is confirmed by the origin of certain members of the church, their particular religious tendencies and by the biography of *Irenaeus. This Christianity is recent, because its foundations are all still alive at the time of persecution; its organization is of an archaic type, as the expression "deaconship of the episcopate" used for Pothinus shows. It is also very probable that the communities of Lyons and of Vienne were alone in Gaul in having an embryonic hierarchical structure: this seems to be behind the mention of the παροικίαι κατὰ Γαλλίαν in Irenaeus's intervention before *Victor I, at the time of the controversy over the celebration of Easter (Eus., HE 5,23,3).

The two churches present us with some specific questions. The first regards the geographical origin of the letter, if we can still take seriously the thesis acc. to which the Gauls in question are those of Asia Minor. The second deserves more serious attention: the geographical origin of the Christians of Lyon themselves. In this respect the thesis of their Asiatic origin deserves more nuance, taking account of the influences from Rome. Finally there is the problem of their *Montanism, which is connected in turn with the hierarchical organization of the primitive churches. Instead of Montanism properly so called, it is usual today, for essentially chronological reasons, to speak of pre-Montanism in a period in which prophecy was not yet considered heretical, and in which the *charisms and their hierarchical parallel had not yet been eliminated from the institutional hierarchy. The writings of Irenaeus show that a decade later in Lyons this development had taken place. One may wonder whether the shift from prophecy to heresy accomplished by Montanus was not unconnected with the general triumph of the monarchian episcopate.

The details of the outcome of the persecution are unclear: if perhaps the church of Lyons was decimated, survived and adopted a new leader in the person of Irenaeus, who found himself in Rome in 177, on a mission to *Eleutherus, and also made an appeal to Victor (see above), showing himself worthy of his name "since he prayed for the peace of the churches" (Eus., HE 5,24,18). He speaks little of his own church: a "barbarian language" is spoken there—i.e., different from Greek. We can be sure that he died at the beginning of the 3rd c., but we do not know in what circumstances: certain later traditions make him a martyr. We have to await the year 254 before hearing again of the church of Lyons in the person of its bishop Faustinus (Cypr., Ep. 68,1).

III. The Church of Lyons from the 4th to 6th c. We know in part the history of Christianity in Lyons after the peace of the church, thanks to *episcopal lists and archaeological remains.

1. Episcopal lists. The list of bishops is preserved in a number of medieval MSS deriving from a catalog of the 9th c.: Duchesne reckoned them trustworthy. Of some bishops, however, there are only the names: Verus, Julius, Ptolemy, Maximus, Tetradius, Martin, Senator. Others are known thanks to other sources: Zachary, in the Mart. Adon. figures as the bishop of Vienne, which is a duplication of Zachary of Lyons, unless it is the other way around; Elias, mentioned by *Gregory of Tours (Gl. Conf. 61), who places him "in the time of the pagans," a truly meager piece of evidence; Vocius, on the occasion of the Council of *Arles (314); Verissimus, on that of *Serdica (343); Elpidius, in the Mart. Adon. (2 Sep). The information on others is more extensive; we will look at several, excluding *Justus (end of the 4th c.) and *Eucherius (d. 16 Nov 449/450), who have separate entries in the Encyclopedia. Nicetus (d. 2 April 573) was the great-uncle of Gregory of Tours, to whom he taught the rudiments of grammar, when he was a priest, and the rules of the ecclesiastical life, when he had become a bishop. He also ordained him as a priest. These familial and personal links induced his great-nephew to write a biography of Nicetus (inserted in the Vitae Patrum 8) and two accounts in other places (Hist. fr. 4,36; Gl. conf. 60). These last were intended to complete the anonymous Life, written in ca. 590, by order of Aetherius (BHL 6088). We also learn some details from his epitaph (E. Le Blant, Inscr. chrét. de la Gaule, I, Paris 1856, 57-60). Yet despite all these sources, however well we know the character of the saint, we are poorly informed about his episcopal activity. It is from other documents that we know him to have been present at the Councils of *Paris (558) and Lyons (570, 572).

The last bishop of the 6th c. was Aetherius. Excluded, to the advantage of Priscus, from the immediate succession to Nicetus, he was elected at the death of the former, between 586 and 589. At this latter date he was the first signatory on a collective episcopal letter intended to end a conflict which had broken out in the monastery of the Holy Cross of *Poitiers, founded by *Radegund (Greg. Tours, Hist. Fr. 9,41). His name appears twice more in Gregory of Tours (ibid. 10,28; Vitae PP. 8,8), and once in a Life of St. Outrille of Bourges (BHL 839). He is the addressee of several letters of *Gregory the Great (Jaffé 1436, 1747, 1830, 1872). It is him, not an Aetherius bishop of Arles (who in fact never existed), who ordained *Augustine of Canterbury bishop (Bede, HE I,27). The anonymous Life of St. Nicetus was written at his request (BHL 6088); he died in 602 (Fredeg., Chron. 22: PL 71, 618).

2. Archaeological remains. No trace has been left of the buildings used for Christian worship prior to the peace of the church, and those that remain posterior to it have not been easy to interpret.

A. Necropolises. The fact that the inscription of Euteknios, found at St. Just in 1974, is not clearly Christian but neither with any certainty pagan (which is a shame, because it is apparently of an early date, 3rd c.), correlates with other pre-Constantinian inscriptions of Lyons, none of which contain unequivocally Christian elements. For the same reason the Christianization of the necropolises may be fixed in the 4th c. In the 5th c. the first dated Christian inscriptions appear.

B. The episcopal complex. The texts report the Ecclesia Lugdunensis, the work of *Patiens. Sidonius Apollinaris describes its building and dedication; for its inauguration *Faustus of Riez delivered a sermon, which is difficult to identify (CSEL 21, 232-238?). In the 8th c. the episcopal complex included a number of different buildings: (1) The Church of St. Stephen (BHL 1418), the roof of which was repaired by Leidrad (MGH, Ep. car. aev. 2,542-543): it was to here, between 806 and 837, that the relics of Speratus, *Cyprian and *Pantaleon were transferred (Mart. Flor. 17.7); (2) The Church of the Holy Cross, the foundation of which MS 925 at the University of Bologna attributes to Arigius (M.-C. Guigue, Obit. Egl. prim. Lyon, Lyon 1902, 111); (3) The domus ecclesiae, enlarged and elevated in height by Nicetus at the beginning of his episcopate for himself and his clergy (Greg. Tours, Hist. Fr. 4,36), and restored by Leidrad (op. cit.)

C. Other churches. In addition to the episcopal complex, it will suffice to list the twenty or so churches which are found in the texts. (1) St. Eulalia, afterward St. George, with a female monastery; (2) St. Paul, founded by Sacerdos, perhaps in the 6th c. (3) Church of the Holy Maccabees, afterward St. Just: Sid. Apoll., Ep. 5,17; Mart. hier. 14.7, 4.8; 14.8, 2.9; 14.10, 21.10. The tombs of Just, Albinus, Patiens, Antiochus and Elpidius were excavated in 1971. (4) St. John, afterward St. Irenaeus, attributed to Patiens. (5) Ainay, Basilica of the Holy Apostles, place of the burning of the martyrs of 177. (6) St. Laurence of Choulans, excavated. (7) St. Nicetus (see the details on the bishop above). (8) St. Michael, founded by Queen Caretena (d. 506). (9) St. Maria (Greg. Tours, Gl. conf. 64). (10) S. Elias (ibid., 61). (11) Island of Barbe, upstream from Lyons (Vit. PP. Jur., etc.). (12) St. Peter (BHL 837). (13) Hospital (Council of Orléans, 549). (14) Monastery (Greg. Tours, Hist. Fr. 10,8). (15) Tomb of a matron (Greg. Tours, Gl. conf. 63). (16) Church of the Apostles (Mart. Adon.). (17) Monasterium novum. (18) Hospital of St. Romanus. (19) Hospital of St. Genesius. (20) St. Vincent.

PWK 13, 1718-1723; DACL 10, 1-402; LTK^2 6, 1250; Cath 8, 50-56; Les Martyrs de Lyon (177), ed. J. Rougé - R. Turcan, Paris 1978; La topographie chrétienne de la Gaule, Paris 1980, 33-57; Le diocèse de Lyon, ed. J. Gadille, Paris 1983; A. Audin, Gens de Lugdunum, Brussels 1986; Province ecclésiastique de Lyon (Lugdunensis Prima), ed. P.-A. Février et al., Paris 1986; Lyon dans les textes grecs et latins: la géographie et l'histoire de Lugdunum de la fondation de la colonie (43 avant J.-C.) à l'occupation burgonde (460 après J.-C.), ed. J.-C. Decourt - G. Lucas, Paris 1993; J.F. Reynaud, Lugdunum christianum: Lyon du IV^e au VIII^e s.: topographie, necropolis et édifices religieux, Paris 1998.

V. Saxer

IV. Council. A new council was held in Lyons 470–475, under the presidency of the bishop, *Patiens, to combat new errors which had arisen since the Council of Arles of 470.

CCL 148, 161; Griffe II, 231; Palazzini 2, 282-283.

Ch. Munier

M

MACARIUS (4th–5th c.). Friend of Rufinus. *Rufinus of Aquileia, returning to *Rome in 397, translated, on the request of one Macarius, whom he called vir desideriorum, *Pamphilus's Apology for Origen, *Origen's De principiis, and wrote his own work, On the Falsification of the Books of Origen. Macarius was an aristocrat and a cultured Roman Christian. According to *Gennadius, Macarius had himself written a book Adversus mathematicos (De viris ill. 26), now lost. Rufinus, moreover, states that Macarius was interested in astrology. He perhaps may be identified with Macarius, friend of *Paulinus of Nola (Ep. 49; cf. Aug., Ep. 259,1), whom *Palladius mentions in connection with *Pinianus (Historia Lausiaca 62).

PCBE 2, 1346-1347; P. Lardet, Saint Jérôme contre Rufin, SC 303, Paris 1983, 41*ff.; M. Simonetti, L'attività letteraria di Rufino negli anni della controversia origeniana, in Storia ed esegesi in Rufino di Concordia, Udine 1992, 89-107; R. Armacker - E. Junod, Pamphile, Eusèbe de Césarée, Apologie pour Origène, SC 465, Paris 2002, 14-18.

A. Di Berardino

MACARIUS (Simeon) (active 385–430, in the region of *Antioch). For a long time a certain voluminous and poorly edited spiritual work was attributed to *Macarius of Egypt, circulating in part under the name of Macarius (the Blessed), but in fact practically anonymous. On account of the fact that in some cases it bears the name of *Simeon (sometimes "the Stylite"), Dörries has proposed to identify him with Simeon of Mesopotamia, one of the exponents of *Messalianism condemned at Antioch in about 400. This work, in any case, contains the greater part of the propositions of Messalianism condemned in 426 and 431, as well as explaining and justifying them. Perhaps the name of Macarius of Egypt was introduced to avoid the accusation of the Messalian heresy; perhaps the author's true name was Simeon. The work, of great evocative power, but not artistically edited, has come down to us only with difficulty through recensions undertaken in about the 11th c. by *hesychast monks (CPG 2410-2427; PG 34); establishing the authentic text is not easy. The editions in circulation do not go beyond the medieval redactions, and we await from the synthesis of these a reconstruction of the original. There are three collections: H. Berthold, Makarios/Symeon. Reden und Briefe. Die Sammlung I, Berlin 1973 (2 vols.); H. Dörries - E. Klostermann - W. Kroeger, Die 50 geistlichen Homilien des Makarius, Berlin 1962 (this is the second type, the most widespread and best known, an anthology); E. Klostermann - H. Berthold, Neue Homilien des Makarios/Symeon. I. Aus Typus III, Berlin 1961. Some texts appear beneath the name of Ephrem. Some minor compositions also exist, which in part still await publication. Since some of these texts are unpublished, and, moreover, the most important MSS were discovered only recently, critical analysis and interpretation of the whole may bring happy surprises. Simeon takes his inspiration from the experiences and terminology of *Eustathius of Sebaste and from the response of *Basil of Caesarea, which he accepts, but not without reservation. His relations with *Gregory of Nyssa are also friendly and fruitful, but Simeon is less intellectual, his spirituality more experiential. Toward *John Chrysostom and the Antiochenes one notes a greater coldness. We are far from Egyptian monasticism, both in vocabulary and approach. *Alexander the *Acoemete is more representative of the Macarian movement, while showing himself more active on the plane of social demands.

Various works of Macarius (Simeon) have been mixed up with the MS tradition of a number of saints, in particular Basil, Isaiah and Mark. The spiritual homilies have had a strong influence on *hesychasm, on Arabic and Slavic spirituality, and, in the West, on Protestant pietism and Methodism. They lead not only to a living experience of prayer but also to an evangelical poverty, to the renunciation of worldly cares, to gentleness, to humility. The interior battle is observed with a penetration that psychology cannot but admire. At a literary level, too, these documents, in style both popular and spontaneous, reveal an aspect of Eastern Christianity and of its interior experience that the formal traditionalism of Byzantine culture frequently hides from us. The late publication of these documents invites us to attentive study committed to learn their relation to their cultural and religious counterparts.

CPG 2410-2427; DSp 10, 27-43; TRE 21, 730-735; E.A. Davids, Das Bild vom neuen Menschen, Salzburg 1968; H. Dörries, Die Theologie des Makarios/Symeon, Göttingen 1978; V. Desprez, Ps. Macaire. Œuvres Spirituelles I, SC 275, Paris 1980; W. Strothmann, Schriften des Makarios/Symeon unter dem Namen Ephraem, Wiesbaden 1981; Id., Die syrische-Überlieferung der Schriften des Makarios, 2 vols., Wiesbaden 1981; Id., Textkritische Anmerkungen zu den Geistlichen Homilien des Makarios-Symeon, Wiesbaden 1981; H. Berthold, Die Ursprünglichkeit literarischer Einheiten im Corpus Macarianum, in Überlieferungsgeschichtliche Untersuchungen, ed. F. Paschke, Berlin 1981, 61-76; G.A. Nuna, P'sevdomakaris t'hzulebat'a k'art'uli versia, Tblisi 1982; Makarios-Symposion über das Böse. Vorträge der Finnisch-deutschen Theologentagung in Goslar 1980, ed. W. Strothmann, Wiesbaden 1983; R. Staats, Makarios-Symeon, Epistola Magna. Eine essalianische Mönchsregel und ihre Umschrift in Gregors von Nyssa De instituto christiano, Göttingen 1984; C. Stewart, "Working the Earth of the Heart": The Messalian Controversy in History, Texts, and Language to AD 431, Oxford 1991; F. Fitschen, Messalianismus und Antimessalianismus, Göttingen 1998; S. Burns, Divine Ecstasy in Gregory of Nyssa and Pseudo-Macarius: Flight and Intoxication: Greek Orthodox Theological Review 44 (1999) 309-327; LACL 467-468.

J. Gribomont

MACARIUS I of Jerusalem (bishop 314–333). One of the most tenacious adversaries of *Arius at the Council of *Nicaea. In 326 the emperor *Constantine I wrote him a letter in connection with the construction of a basilica of the Holy Sepuchre, indicating that the church should be greater than all others, asking him to indicate the number of workers, the type of material and the sum of money necessary (Eus., Vita Const. 3.31-32). According to the legend, dating from the 2nd half of the 4th c., Macarius helped *Helena to identify the true cross (Rufinus, HE 10).

DCB 3, 765; EC 7, 1740; LTK³ 6, 1220; BS 8, 421-425; S. Borgehammar, How the Holy Cross Was Found: From Event to Medieval Legend, Stockholm 1991; J.W. Drijvers, Helena Augusta: The Mother of Constantine the Great and the Legend of Her Finding of the True Cross, Leiden 1992, passim.

S.J. Voicu

MACARIUS II of Gerapolis. Bishop of Gerapolis from 563 to 575, and the author of a letter addressed to an Armenian Catholic (Ep. ad Vertanem catholicum Armeniae).

CPG 7020; V. Hakobian, Kanonagirk' Hayoc' II, Erevan 1971, 216-229.

P. Marone

MACARIUS of Alexandria (d. 394/400). To reconstruct the life of Macarius of *Alexandria, we need to recall that the tradition about him and *Macarius of Egypt has been confused because of the great fame they both enjoyed—based on the numerous miracles recounted by the sources—the fact that they bear the same name, lived at the same time and in nearby places, and moreover that they knew each other. This may be seen in the Latin version of the Historia Monachorum in Aegypto (ch. 29) and in the Greek version (ch. 23). At least five sayings refer to Macarius of Alexandria (PG 45, 71-442), and in one of these both of them are referred to. *Sozomen (HE III, 14) calls Macarius the "Citizen," recounting that, like Macarius of Egypt, he lived in his hermitage up to his ninetieth year, having spent seventy years of his life there.

G. Bunge, Évagre le Pontique et les deux Macaire: Irénikon 56 (1983) 215-227; 323-360; Coptic Encyclopedia 5, 1489-1490; LTK³ 6, 1219; LACL 468.

F. Aleo

MACARIUS of Antioch (bishop after 649 until 681). He never succeeded in taking possession of the Antiochene see owing to the presence of Arab invaders. He died in *Rome in 685. Head of the *monothelite party at the Third Council of *Constantinople (680), the Acts of which pass down to us his extensive Profession of Faith and the texts of some of his speeches. His sources are *Gregory Thaumaturgus (from the life by *Gregory of Nyssa) and the symbol of 381.

CPG 7625; ACO II, 2, 1, 218-230 and 506-507; Mansi 11, 349-360; J. Rissberger, Das Glaubensbekenntnis des Patriarchen Makarius von Antiochien des Hauptes der Monotheleten auf den sechsten allgemeinen Konzil, Offenbach 1940; Patrologia V, 228-229; LACL 468.

S.J. Voicu

MACARIUS of Egypt (d. 386/390). The name of Macarius, "the Blessed," was common among the monks of the 4th c. In one collection of sayings (PG 45, 71-442), at least thirty-nine refer to Macarius of Egypt, also called the Great. According to *Socrates Scholasticus (HE IV, 23), Macarius of Egypt was born shortly before 300 in Upper Egypt and was austere (ἀυστηρός). According to * Palladius of Helenopolis (Hist. Laus. 17), he left home at the age of thirty and, taking refuge in the hermitage of Scete, remained there until his ninetieth year, prematurely (παιδαριογέροντα) surpassing the other monks in virtue and wisdom.

A document in the Coptic language, containing The Virtues of Macarius and a Life of Macarius, the Father of the Monks of Scete, attributed to *Serapion of Thmuis, underlines the intimate relationship that united Macarius of Egypt to *Anthony, an assertion that, even if it is of doubtful accuracy, should be kept in mind when assessing the monasticism of Scete. We learn from this source interesting information about Macarius's youth, the village where he passed his childhood, Tchitchber, in the Nile Valley, not far from Wadi-Natrun, i.e., Scete. It is related how the young Macarius was a camel-driver who smuggled salt, gaining him the epithet "Macarius the Camel-Driver." The Life also recounts another anecdote which became famous, and which entered into the Synaxarion: that of the girl who attributes her pregnancy to Macarius, who is therefore expelled by the inhabitants of the village, near which he then lives as a hermit.

According to *Sozomen (HE III, 14), he was ordained priest for the monks of Scete, at the age of forty. From *Rufinus of Aquileia, we learn about a persecution of the desert monks, instigated by the Arian bishop of Alexandria *Lucius, after the death of *Athanasius, in the forty-sixth year of his priesthood, therefore 373. In these circumstances, acc. to Socrates (HE IV, 24) and Sozomen (HE VI, 24), Macarius took refuge in the region called Bucoli or Elearchia, in the N of the delta. Rufinus, passing through the monasteries of *Nitria and Scete in 374, on his journey toward Palestine, assures us that he met personally both Macarius of Egypt and *Macarius of Alexandria (HE II, 4). In the Latin version of Historia Monachorum in Aegypto attributed to Rufinus (ch. 28)—an account of a journey undertaken in Egypt in the winter of 394–395—the Egyptian, called "Macarius, the disciple of Anthony," is presented as inaugurating monastic life at Scete, in Upper Egypt. *Evagrius of Pontus (Cap. Prac. ad Anat. 93-94) also tells us that, before 399, the year of his death, he met Macarius of Egypt in the hermitage of Scete. Evagrius has preserved about ten sayings, some of which Macarius appears in. Palladius, however, never met Macarius, because the monk had died one year before Palladius arrived in the desert. Landing at Alexandria in 387, after spending a year in the desert and three in Alexandria, he arrived at the hermitage of Kellia in 391. The death of Macarius would fit therefore in 390 or 386.

Modern philology at the start of the nineteenth century has cast doubt on the attribution to the monk of Scete some writings placed under his name, such as the Homiliae Spirituales and the Epistula Magna. The most important objection to his authorship derives from the particular ascetic doctrine of those works. The central doctrine of these writings placed under his name is a mystical union of the devout with the Holy Spirit, a theme not found in the sayings. Moreover, the very precise references in these writings to *Stoic and peripatetic thought are also absent from the sayings.

Palladius and Rufinus do not record any writings of Macarius, nor do they make mention of any philosophical works by him. The same may be said of *John Cassian, Socrates, Sozomen and for the authors who would seem best qualified to do so, such as *Jerome and Evagrius, and the Cappadocian fathers, who seem to be unaware of the existence of the homiliae and epistulae attributed to Macarius. Only *Gennadius of Marseille (De Scr. Eccl. X) mentions an Epistula ad Filios Dei; its attribution to Macarius, however, is not certain. It seems, however, that it can be traced to the monastic context of Scete.

In the sources Macarius of Egypt is confused with *Macarius of Alexandria, because they bear the same name and lived at the same period and in nearby places. Socrates (HE IV, 23) informs us that Macarius of Alexandria, unlike Macarius of Egypt, was of a friendly disposition, and talked amiably with young aspirants to the ascetic life. They both suffered under the persecution of Bishop Lucius and took refuge in the N of the delta. Palladius (Hist. Laus. 18) says that he met Macarius of Alexandria in his hermitage at Kellia, where, in Upper Egypt, in the desert of Nitria, 40 km from Scete, he lived for nine years, showing that he knew him well, and letting it be understood that he lived with Macarius until the latter's death, which took place three years after Palladius arrived, therefore 394 or 400. Evagrius of Pontus also knew him personally from Kellia, and at least one saying from his collection (Cap. Prac. Ad Anat. 98) seems to refer to Macarius of Alexandria.

J. Stiglmayr, Makarius der Ägypter auf der Pfaden der Stoa: ThQ 92 (1910) 88-262; C. Flemming, De Macariis Scriptis Aegyptii Quaestiones, Göttingen 1911; D.A. Wilmart, La Lettre spirituelle de l'abbé Macaire: RAM 22 (1920) 361-377; L. Villecourt, La date et l'origine des "Homelies Spirituelles" attribuées à Macaire: CRAI (1920) 250-258; Id., La Grande Lettre Grecque de Macaire, ses Formes textuelles et son Milieu littéraire: ROC 22 (1921) 29-56; E. Amélineau, Histoire des Monastères de la Basse Égypte, Annales du Musée Guimet 25, Paris 1925, Introduction, XXXIII; 47-118; 119-208; E. Amann, Macaire d'Égypte: DTC 9, 2, Paris 1927, 1454-1455; H. Dörries, Symeon von Mesopotamien. Die Überlieferung der Messalianischen "Makarios" Schriften, (TU 55/1,1), Leipzig 1941; E. Peterson, Macario il Grande: EC 7 (1951) 1740-1741; A. Guillaumont, Le problème des deux Macaires dans les Apophthegmata Patrum: Irénikon 48 (1975) 40-59; V. Desprez, Le Ps.-Macaire: SA 70 (1977); A. Guillaumont, Macaire d'Alexandrie ou le Citadin: DS 10 (1979) 4-5; Id., Macaire d'Égypte ou le Grand, DS 10 (1979) 11-13; Coptic Encyclopedia 5, 1491-1492; U. Zanetti, Le Testament spirituel de saint Macaire: Irénikon 74 (2001) 179-201; T. Vivian, Saint Macarius the Spiritbearer: Coptic Texts Relating to Saint Macarius the Great, Crestwood, NY 2004.

F. Aleo

MACARIUS of Jerusalem (bishop 552 and 563/564–574/575). His first election was not confirmed by *Justinian, who, suspecting him of *Origenism, gave preference to Eustochius. At the deposition of Eustochius, he reoccupied the see of *Jerusalem after having anathematized *Origen, *Evagrius of Pontus and *Didymus.

DCB 3, 765; DTC 11, 1759; L. Perrone, La Chiesa di Palestina e le controversie cristologiche, Brescia 1980.

S.J. Voicu

MACARIUS of Magnesia (around 400). Probably the homonymous accuser of Heraclius of Ephesus at the Synod of the *Oak (Constantinople, 403; see Photius, Bibl., cod. 59). Author of the Apocriticus, an imaginary diatribe lasting five days between a pagan and a Christian, which text, full of lacunae, is a response to a source which has thematic echoes of the Contra Christianos of *Porphyry of Tyre; in the responses of the Christian one glimpses, apart from an anti-Jewish polemic, criticism of the literalism of the *Antiochene school and a defense of *allegorical interpretation, articulated around the concept of oikonomia; the *Christology points to a date toward the end of the 4th c. Of his commentary on Genesis (consisting of at least 17 homilies?) there remains only a fragment.

CPG 6115-6118; DSp 10, 13-17 (cf. PG 10, 1343-1406); R. Goulet, Macarios de Magnésie, Le monogénès. Introduction générale, édition critique, traduction française et commentaire. I-II (Textes et traditions 7), Paris 2003; F. Corsaro, Le Quaestiones nell'Apocritico di Macario di Magnesia, Catania 1968; C.J. Larrain, Macarius Magne Ἀποκριτικὸς πρὸς Ἕλληνας. Ein bislang unbeachtetes Exzerpt: Traditio 57 (2002) 85-127; M. Featherstone, Opening Scenes of the Second Iconoclasm: Nicephorus's Critique of the Citations from Macarius Magnes: REB 60 (2002) 65-111; G. Schalkhausser, Zu den Schriften des Makarios von Magnesia, TU 31,4, Leipzig 1907; R. Waelkens, L'économie, thème apologétique et principe herméneutique dans l'Apocriticos de Macarios Magnès, Louvain 1974; V. Ugenti, Noterella sul significato di μαθητεία in Macario di Magnesia: Rudiae 12 (2000) 203-208; V. Ugenti, Spigolature patristiche (Girolamo e Tertulliano, Macario di Magnesia): Orpheus n.s. 22 (2001) 259-266; E.D. Digeser, Porphyry, Julian, or Hierokles? The Anonymous Hellene in Makarios Magnēs' Apokritikos: JTS 53 (2002) 466-502 [who believes the pagan is Heraclius]; LACL 468-469.

S.J. Voicu

MACARIUS of Tkow (d. 452). Monk and bishop of Tkow (town of Upper Egypt), who acc. to the Coptic tradition was a follower of *Dioscorus at Chalcedon, lending him support in the fight against his adversaries. Having returned to Egypt after the end of the council, and taking refuge in Canopus, he did not wish to submit to Leo's Tomus ad Flavianum and was killed by order of an imperial functionary. A homily In Honour of Michael the Archangel in Coptic is attributed to him (ed. Lafontaine) which, apart from the customary praise of the angel, contains a long invective against women.

Coptic Encyclopedia 5, 1492-1494; D.W. Johnson, A Panegyric on Macarius Bishop of Tkow, CSCO 415-416, Louvain 1980; G. Lafontaine: Muséon 92 (1979) 301-320.

T. Orlandi

MACEDONIA. At the time of the administrative reform of *Diocletian and *Constantine I, the province of Macedonia extended between *Epirus and *Thrace: from the first it was separated, to the W, by the Pindus mountain range, and Mount Grammos, and then by a line that passed to the E of the Lake of Lychnis (Achris), not far from the city of the same name; the boundary with Thrace to the E was the Nestos River, which runs from the Rhodope Mountains into the Aegean. To the N it was bounded by Dardania, Praevaliana and Dacia Mediterranea; the boundary follows an ideal line which, running NE until S of Skopje and then SE, connects the Vestiskos, Skardos, Orbelos, Rhodope and Emos Mountains. To the S it bordered the sea and the mouth of the river Pineios (near Tempe), following a curved line that, extending to the W of Olympus and to the S of the Haliacmon River, arrived at the Pindus (Papazoglou, Quelques aspects, 328-338; Theocharidis 44). The Macedonian territory was crossed, from Epirus to Thrace, by the Via Egnatia, which passed through the cities of *Nicaea, Cellae, *Edessa, *Pella, *Thessalonica, *Apollonia, Amphipolis, *Philippi, Neapolis and Akoutisma. When, however, *Constantinople became the capital of the empire, this great Roman artery lost some of its importance (Lemerle, Philippes, 71-72; Invasions, 274-276).

Macedonia proper, as defined above, constituted a province of the diocese of the same name that at the beginning of the 4th c. included the provinces of Macedonia, *Thessaly, *Achaia, the two Epiri, Praevalitana and *Crete (Rufo Festo, Breviar. VIII; cf. Lemerle, Philippes, 77; Theocharidis 46). In the last quarter of the 4th c. the diocese of Macedonia included the following provinces: Achaia, Macedonia Prima, Crete, Thessaly, Old Epirus, New Epirus and part of Macedonia Salutaris, and was subject to a vicar (Notit. Dignit. I, 34 and III, 7; Seeck 2 and 9; cf. Lemerle, loc. cit. and Invasions 265-271; Theocharidis 91-95; Pallas, L'illyricum, 62-63). Macedonia Salutaris was suppressed before 412 (Papazoglou, La Macédoine Salutaire; Theocharidis 91-95). In the Synekdemos of Hierocles (527-528) mention is made of Macedonia Secunda. To Macedonia Prima belonged the city of Thessalonica (the capital), Pella, Europo (today Bozatzi, on the right bank of the Axios in the province of Imathia), Dion, Berea, Larissa (not that of Thessaly), Heraclea Lyngou (which Honigmann identifies with Florina), Nicaea (near modern Velusino, Macedonia), Heraclea Strymonos (today Zervochori), Serrai, Philippi, Amphipolis, Apollonia (Arnea, near Chalkidiki), Neapolis (Kavalla), and the islands Thasos and Samothrace (Hierocles, Synekd. 638, 1a-641,9; Honigmann 14-15). Remaining outside were the ancient Macedonian cities of Caesarea (ancient Aiane) and Diocletianopolis (ancient Argos Orestikòn, today Chroupista), belonging now to Thessaly (Theocharidis 94). To Macedonia Secunda belonged the cities of *Stobi (the capital), Argos (present-day Stari Grad?), Pelagonia (Heraclea Lyncestis) (Hierocles, Synekd. 641,1-641,9; Honigmann 15-16), all in modern Macedonian territory; also remaining outside was the territory of old Astivos (present-day Bragalnitsa), to the NE of Stobi, included in Dacia Mediterranea (Theocharidis 95). Macedonia Secunda, created between 479 and 482, was suppressed between 535 and 545 and her cities passed again to Macedonia Prima.

The diocese of Macedonia constituted part of the administrative district of Illyricum, which, with its center at *Sirmium, in *Pannonia II, belonged to the Praefectura praetorio Italiae. With the bipartition of Illyricum (395 or 396), Macedonia was added to Eastern Illyricum (Praefectura praetorio per Illyricum), which, separated from the West, was annexed to the empire of the East. The use of Greek prevailed, contrastingly with Western Illyricum, where the ordinary language was Latin. In the Macedonian region a marked Latin presence was to be found at Stobi and Philippi (Theocharidis 32). The administrative center of Eastern Illyricum was Thessalonica. When Pannonia II was annexed to Eastern Illyricum (427 or 437), the administrative center was transferred from Thessalonica to Sirmium until its destruction by the Huns (441 or 442), when Thessalonica reacquired the role of capital. In about 535, the center of Eastern Illyricum was transferred to Justiniana Prima, but it is not certain if this transfer was ever implemented (Lemerle, Philippes, 76-83; Theocharidis 43-59, 72 and 95-103). The diocese of Macedonia as an administrative district lasted until the end of the 8th c. or the beginning of the 9th (Lemerle, Invasions, 265-271; Theocharidis 220-231). For a long time Macedonia was devastated by barbarian invasions, from the end of the 4th c. with the invasion of the *Goths (379, 380, 388); there were other invasions a century later, when Stobi was destroyed (479), and subsequently until 482. In the years 454, 493, 499 and particularly in 517 Macedonia was invaded by Hun tribes, to be followed, in the following century (540 and 558-559), by the Slavs (Lemerle, Invasions, 277-287; Theocharidis 86-88 and 125-158). From the end of the 6th c. there succeeded a series of Avaro-Slav invasions (578, 597, 600-603, 616, 618 and around 630) which concluded with the settling of the Slavs in the territory of Macedonia (Popoviç, Les témoins e La descente; Lemerle, Philippes, 113-118; Invasions, 287-308, Les plus anciens recueils, 174-189; Theocharidis 140-158 and 179-189).

Christianity was introduced into Macedonia by the apostle Paul who, coming from Asia Minor, landed at Neapolis (Act 16:9-11); from there he passed to Philippi (Act 16:20-40), Amphipolis, Apollonia (Act 17:1), Thessalonica (Act 17:1-10) and Berea (Act 17:10-14). Soon the Christian faith began to spread among the other cities of Macedonia (1 Th 4:10; cf. Harnack 624). *Ignatius of Antioch is said to have passed through Neapolis, Philippi and other Macedonian cities, being led as a prisoner to *Rome (Martyr. S. Ign.: PG 5, 984). In the 2nd decade of the 4th c., Christianity grew surprisingly in Macedonia (Arnobius, Adv. gent. II, 12; PL 5, 828; cf. Harnack 539 and 951-952), acquiring political weight, which Constantine the Great seems to have taken account of in his rise to power (Theocharidis 82-86). The Christian community in *Edessa is ancient, where it seems that the Pauline preaching on the resurrection was developed with particular fervor (Pallas, Investigations, 5). Especially at Thessalonica, the martyr St. *Demetrius (for the hagiographical questions relating to him: Theocharidis 59-82; see also *Thessalonica) was held in fervent veneration. Apart from the saints martyred at Thessalonica, one learns of Mucius, priest of Amphipolis, who was brought to Constantinople, where he suffered martyrdom (Delehaye 163-175 and 225-232; Harnack 791). Under *Licinius 40 virgins suffered martyrdom with the deacon Ammon, at Beroia, near Berea (Delehaye 194-207; Harnack 788; Theocharidis 39); very probably, however, the place in question is the homonymous city of Thrace (Delehaye 207-209), otherwise called the "city of Trajan" or Augusta Traiana or Irenopolis (today Stara Zagora in Bulgaria). The Macedonian church was organized with its center at Thessalonica because of the importance the city had assumed during the imperial administration, its bishop being head of all the bishops of Eastern Illyricum. It was placed under the ecclesiastical jurisdiction of Rome, and the metropolitan of Thessalonica functioned as the pope's vicar, esp. from *Innocent I (412) onward (Max Herz. z. Sachsen 60-61 and 90-92; Grumel; Theocharidis 103-125 with recent bibl.). Eastern Illyricum, and with that Macedonia, was removed from the jurisdiction of Rome and annexed to the patriarchate of Constantinople in the year 732 or 733 (Theocharidis 232-235; Pallas, L'Illyricum, 70-73; on the Macedonian church and on its organization: Konidaris, Ἐκκλησ. ἱστορ. I, 506-509; on its bishops, on the basis of the acts of the councils and of Par. Gr. Cod. 1555A: Ἐκκλησ. ἱστορ. I, 509-510; Id., Αἱ μητροπόλεις, 41-42 and 94 and Die neue, 258).

Surviving paleo-Christian remains or those recently discovered in the cities of Macedonia Prima mentioned by Hierocles can be found at *Thessalonica; at Dion, a basilica from the 1st half of the 5th c. reconstructed in the 2nd half of the 6th c. (Pallas, Monuments, 77-80); at Berea (Pallas 80-81) and nearby (Pallas 81); at Edessa, three basilicas to the S of the city (Pallas 82-88); at Serrai and its hinterland (Pallas 90); at *Philippi; at Amphipolis four basilicas (Pallas 90-106) and another church, following a centralized plan, circular on the outside, hexagonal on the inside (on the city: Papazoglou, Eion); on the island of Thasos, a basilica following a Greek cross plan (Lemerle, À propos; Hoddinott, Early, 106-108) and other simple basilicas (Pallas 121-125; Hoddinott 181-183), and on the island of Samothrace. Monuments in places where the identification with cities mentioned by Hierocles is uncertain: Eleutheropolis, near Philippi; Podochorion; Prosotsani; Alora (or Aralo, Pallas 87); Boskochorion near Kozani: a basilica with three aisles (Hoddinott, Early, 183-184); Akrini near Kozani: a martyrion with three apses (Pallas 88-89; Grabar); Nikiti in Chalkidiki: three basilicas (the third is noteworthy). Among the cities of Macedonia Secunda: at *Stobi, at Palikura near Stobi (Hoddinott, Early, 185-186); at Bargala (Aleksova-Mango, Aleksova); at Pelagonia, the old Heraclea Lyncestis, various basilicas at Sudovol (Hoddinott, Early, 202-204) and Ramenska Tumba (Cambi), all in modern Macedonia. In Bulgarian Macedonia: a basilica at Sandanski (Hoddinott, Bulgaria, 183-185 and 287-290). The paleo-Christian buildings of Macedonia, esp. those far from the great cities, are for the most part ornate, with mosaic floors (G. Cvetković-Tomašević; Kolarik, passim).

H. Delehaye, Saints de Thrace et de Mésie: AB 31 (1912) 161-300; M. Herz. z. Sachsen, Das christliche Hellas, Leipzig 1918; A. Harnack, Mission und Ausbreitung des Christentums in den ersten drei Jahrhunderten, Leipzig [4]1924; G.I. Konidaris, Αἱ μητρόπολεις καὶ αἱ ἀκχιεπισκοπαὶ τοῦ Οἰκουμενικου Πατριαρχείου καὶ ἡ τάξις αὐτῶν, I, Athens 1934; P. Lemerle, Philippes et la Macédoine orientale, Paris 1945; E. Kitzinger, A Survey of the Early Christian Town of Stobi: DOP 3 (1946) 81-162; P. Lemerle, À propos d'une basilique de Thassos et de Saint-Jean d'Éphèse: Byzantion 23 (1953) 531-543; F. Papazoglou, Eion-Amphipolis-Chrysopolis: Zborn. Rad. Viz. Inst. 2 (1953) 7-22; G.I. Konidaris, Ἐκκλισιαστική Ἱστορία τῆς Ἑλλάδος, I, Athens 1954; P. Lemerle, Invasions et migrations dans les Balkans depuis la fin de l'époque romaine jusqu'au VIII[e] siècle: Rev. Hist. 211 (1954) 265-308; F. Papazoglou, La Macédoine Salutaire et la Macédoine Seconde: BAB 52 (1956) 115-124; R.E. Hoddinott, Early Byzantine Churches in Macedonia and Southern Serbia, London 1963; V. Grumel, Les origines du Vicariat apostolique de Thessalonique d'après les premiers documents pontificaux, Actes XII Congr. Int. Ét. Byz. (1961) II, Beograd 1964, 451-461; B. Aleksova - C. Mango, Bargala: A Preliminary Report: DOP 25 (1971) 265-281; R.F. Hoddinott, Bulgaria in Antiquity, London-Tonbridge 1975; D.I. Pallas, Investigations sur les monuments chrétiens de Grèce avant Constantin: CArch 24 (1975) 1-19; Vl. Popoviç, Les témoins archéologiques des invasions avaro-slaves dans l'Illyricum byzantin; MEFR Ant. 87 (1975) 445-504; B. Aleksova, Ranohristijanskata bazilika vo Bargala: Zborn. Arch. Muz. 6-7 (1967-74) Skopje 1975, 21-35; J. Wiseman - Dj. Mano-Zissi, Stobi: A City of Ancient Macedonia: Journ. Field Archaeol. 3 (1976) 269-302; D.I. Pallas, Les monuments paléochrétiens de Grèce découverts de 1959 à 1973, Vatican City 1977; N. Cambi, Unpublished Excavations and Finds of Early Christian Period in Yugoslavia, Atti IX Congr. Int. Arch. Crist. (1975), II, Vatican City 1978, 141-156; A. Grabar, Une forme essentielle du culte des reliques et ses reflets dans l'iconographie paléochrétienne, JS 1978, 165-174; Vlad. Popoviç, La descente des Koutrigoures, des Slaves et des Avares vers la mer Égée: Le témoignage de l'archéologie, CRAI 1978, 596-648; Fan. Papazoglou, Quelques aspects de l'histoire de la province de Macédoine, in ANRW II, 7, 1 Berlin-New York 1979, 302-369; G. Cvetković-Tomašević, Mosaïques paléobyzantines de pavements dans l'Illyricum oriental: Iconographie, symbolique, origines: Rapports présentés au X[e] Congr. Int. d'Archéol. Chrét., Thessaloniki 1980, 283-347; R.E. Kolarik, The Floor Mosaics of Eastern Illyricum, in Rapports présentés au X[e] Congr. Int. d'Archéol. Chrét., 173-203; D.I. Pallas, L'Illyricum oriental: Aperçu historique: Θεολογία 51 (1980) 62-76; G.I. Theocharidis, Ἱστορία τῆς Μακεδονίας κατὰ τοὺς μέσους χρόνους (285-1354), Thessaloniki 1980; P. Lemerle, Les plus anciens recueils de miracles de Saint Démétrios, II, Commentaire, Paris 1981; D. Feissel, Recueil des inscriptions chrétiennes de Macédonie du III[e] au VI[e] siècle, Paris 1983; I. Mikulčič, Frühchristlicher Kirchenbau in der S.R. Makedonien: CCAB 33 (1986) 221-251; C.S. Smively, Apsidal Crypts in Macedonia: Pos- sible Places of Pilgrimage, in Actes du XI[e] Congrès Int. d'archéologie chrétienne, III, Rome 1989, 1179-1184; G. Gounaris, L'archéologie chrétienne en Grèce de 1974 à 1985, ibid., 2687-2711; K. Hattersley-Smith, The Early Christian Churches of Macedonia and Their Patrons: ByzF 21 (1995) 229-234; EAM 8 (1997) 65-71; RBK 5 (1995) 982-1220; C.J. Downing, Wall Paintings from the Baptistery at Stobi, Macedonia and Early Depictions of Christ and the Evangelists: DOP 52 (1998) 259-280; Dizionario epigrafico di antichità romane, V, 32-96.

D.I. Pallas

MACEDONIUS (4th–5th c.). Vicarius Africae in the years 413–414. There are two extant letters of his addressed to *Augustine (in the letters of Aug., 152 and 154), and two of Augustine to Macedonius (153 and 155): others (only one?) have been lost (cf. Ep. 152,1 and 154,3). Augustine had written to him asking a favor for Bishop Boniface, and Macedonius took the opportunity to ask him if it was lawful for bishops to practice intercessio before judges, in favor of the guilty party. Macedonius willingly accepted to do this if the request came from worthy persons. Augustine responded with a long letter (153) which sets out to justify the positive value of episcopal intercessio, which he considers a duty for a bishop in the light of gospel forgiveness, and implies hatred for sin and love for the sinner, respecting of course the validity and necessity of human justice, yet tempered by mercy. Macedonius was also a reader of the works of Augustine (Ep. 152,3; 154,2). Augustine appreciated Macedonius's meekness and wisdom, and also his interest for the social and religious good of the people. In this spirit Macedonius promulgated a decree in favor of the return of the *Donatists into the unity of the church (Ep. 155,4,17).

PLRE II, 697; PCBE I, 659-661; K.K. Raikas, The State Juridical Dimension of the Office of a Bishop and the Letter 153 of St. Augustine to Vicarius Africae Macedonius, in Vescovi e pastori in epoca teodosiana, SEA 58, Rome 1997, 683-694; M. Moreau, La magistrat et l'évêque. Pour une lecture de la correspondence Macedonius-Augustin, in Hommage à Serge Lancel, ed. B. Colombat - P. Mattei, Grenoble 1998, 105-117.

A. Di Berardino

MACEDONIUS, bishop. Bishop of Mopsuestia, Cilicia. He belonged to the party of *Eusebius of Nicomedia; he followed, from *Nicaea onward, all the phases of the *Arian controversy, up to the middle of 4th c. He was one of the six commissioners charged by the Council of *Tyre (335) with the inquiry on the alleged illicit conduct of Athanasius of Alexandria. In 345 he was part of the Eastern delegation which presented the Ekthesis makrostichos to *Constans and in 351 subscribed to the first formula of *Sirmium.

Simonetti, passim; A. Martin, Athanase d'Alexandrie et l'Église d'Égypte au IV[e] siècle (328-373), Rome 1996, passim.

E. Prinzivalli

MACEDONIUS I – MACEDONIANS (d. after 360). Macedonius was a priest at *Constantinople around 335, and was at odds with the bishop, *Paul, whose own tumultuous and complicated history intersected with his own. He replaced Paul on the episcopal seat when the latter was for the fourth time banished from Constantinople in 344; but when Paul reentered the city in 346, Macedonius was all but deprived of authority until ca. 350, when his rival was definitively expelled from the city and Macedonius acted cruelly toward Paul's supporters. In these years Macedonius promoted the spread of ascetical ideals and the rehabilitation of heretics. Of *homoiousian bent, he participated in the Council of *Seleucia (359) and was deposed by his adversaries at the Council of Constantinople (360). We find him still active in 362 against the *Arians. He was considered to be among the initiators, around 360, of the dispute about the *Holy Spirit, because along with other homoiousians he was said to have refused to recognize the Spirit's divine character.

The first group of homoiousians of Constantinople and the neighboring areas, gathered around Macedonius, were called Macedonians; but from ca. 380 the name came to indicate those who, while not being Arians, refused to recognize the divinity of the Holy Spirit (see *Pneumatomachi). These were rather numerous in the area of the straits; they came, having been invited, to the Council of Constantinople in 381, headed by *Eleusius of Cyzicus and Marcianus of Lampsacus; but they refused to subscribe to the Nicene Creed and thus abandoned immediately the work of the council. They were active in the course of the 5th c. Since those homoiousians who did not wish to adhere to the Nicene homoousion merged with the ranks of the Macedonians, they were characterized not only by a refusal to recognize that the Spirit is God but also by the affirmation that the Son is homoiousios with respect to the Father: a perfect resemblance, but without implying identity of substance. As for the Holy Spirit, it seems that some of them defined him as a creature, but others preferred to remain vague: they recognized him as theion, not as truly and properly God.

DCB 3, 775-777; F. Loots, Zwei macedonianische Dialoge: Sitz. d. Preuss. Akad. (1914) 526-551; P. Meinhold, Pneumatomachoi:

PWK 41, 1066-1101; F. Loofs, Die Christologie der Macedonianer: Geschichtliche Studien für A. Hauck, Leipzig 1916, 64-76; Simonetti 592; R.P.C. Hanson, The Search for the Christian Doctrine of God, Edinburgh 1988, 915; BBKL 5, 597-599.

M. Simonetti

MACEDONIUS II of Constantinople, saint (d. 25 April 516). Nephew of Patriarch *Gennadius, and scevophylax of Hagia Sophia, Macedonius was designated by Emperor *Anastasius (495) to replace the deposed patriarch of Constantinople, *Euphemius, who had been banished to Eucaita. Notwithstanding imperial pressure, he refused to condemn the decisions of Chalcedon, although he had signed the Henoticon. Then, in 511, having been tricked, he signed a profession of faith that made no reference to *Ephesus or Chalcedon. Following this he made a solemn declaration accepting the latter council and condemning its opponents. He was subsequently arrested by Anastasius and exiled to Eucaita (11 August 511), from where he was transferred to *Gangra in 515, where he died on 25 April 516, the date on which he is commemorated in the Byzantine Synaxarion.

V. Grumel, Regestes[2], 181-192; BS 8, 442-444; C. Capizzi, L'imperatore Anastasio I (491-518), Rome 1969; W.H.C. Frend, The Rise of the Monophysite Movement, Cambridge 1972, 186-237; Grillmeier 2/2, 31, 79, 249, 257, 319.

D. Stiernon

MACRINA. A common name (145 Macrinos and 50 Macrina are known), borne by at least two illustrious ladies of the family of *Basil the Great.

1. Macrina the Elder, d. ca. 340. Disciple of *Gregory Thaumaturgus at *Neocaesarea in Pontus, she was forced, during the persecutions, despite the nobility of her family, to live in hiding with her husband. Mother of Basil the Elder, grandmother of Basil the Great and of a family of saints. It was to her that Basil (Ep. 204,6; 223,3) attributes the vigor and orthodoxy of his own faith.

2. Macrina the Younger (ca. 327–379), virgin, sister of Basil. Her brother *Gregory of Nyssa gives an account of her life, attributing to her a dialogue on the resurrection, strongly inspired by *Plato, and showing a high esteem for her spiritual influence and her learning. Like her grandmother, a celebrated example of Christian womanhood. It is strange that Basil never mentions this sister.

CPG 3166, 3149; PG 46, 960-1000; P. Maraval, Grégoire de Nysse. Vie de S. Macrine, SC 178, Paris 1971; Id., Encore les frères et les sœurs de Grégoire de Nysse: RHL 60 (1980) 161-165; A. Momigliano, Macrina, una santa aristocratica vista dal fratello, in Le donne in Grecia, ed. G. Arrigoni, Bari 1985, 331-344; La Vita di S. Macrina, intro., tr. and notes, E. Giannarelli, Turin 1988; Gregory of Nyssa, Vita di Santa Macrina, intro., tr. and notes, E. Marotta, Rome 1989.

J. Gribomont

MACROBIUS (d. after 365). *Donatist bishop of *Rome, successor of Encolpius. According to *Gennadius (Vir. ill. 5), before passing to the Donatist church he had been a Catholic, and had written a book Ad confessores et virgines which was mistakenly identified with the De singularitate clericorum of ps.-*Cyprian. Of Macrobius we do have the Passione Isaac et Maximiani in which, under the form of a letter addressed to the faithful of Carthage, he narrates the martyrdom of two Donatist laymen during the Macarian persecution of 347 (acc. to the traditional dating, or in 346, as the most recent editor demonstrates), instigated, acc. to the usual Donatist explanation, by the Catholic traditores. Macrobius died shortly after 365 and was succeeded as Donatist bishop of Rome first by Lucian and then Claudian. We do not have evidence to verify the title of martyr given to Macrobius in the explicit of his Epistula.

CPL 721 (BHL 4473): PL 8, 767-774; DSp 10, 56-57; Monceaux 5, 82-98; W.H.C. Frend, The Donatist Church: A Movement of Protest in Roman North Africa, Oxford [2]1971, 185-187; PCBE 1, 662; P. Mastandrea, Papiri di martiri donatisti (BHL 4473 e 5271): AB 113 (1995) 39-88; V. Saxer, Afrique latine, in G. Philippart (ed.), Hagiographies: histoire internationale de la littérature hagiographique latine et vernaculaire en Occident des origines à 1550, I, Turnhout 1994, 64-66; F. Scorza Barcellona, L'agiografia donatista, in M. Marin - C. Moreschini, Africa cristiana. Storia, religione, letteratura, Brescia 2002, 131-133.

F. Scorza Barcellona

MACROBIUS (4th–5th c.). The only certain date we have in the life of Macrobius Ambrosius Theodosius is that he lived between the end of the 4th c. and the start of the 5th c. On the basis of the sparse biographical details contained in his works an attempt has been made to reconstruct, as far as is possible, the principal stages of his political and literary career. However, in this reconstruction scholars have not yet reached agreement. Since the publication of the important monograph of Flamant the tendency is to identify Macrobius the writer with the proconsul of Africa Theodosius Macrobius, who held his position from November of 408 until August of 410. Supposing this identification, it has also been thought that Macrobius was originally from Africa (Numidia), but this conclusion is purely hypothetical.

Three works of Macrobius have come down to us: the De differentiis et societatibus Graeci Latinique verbi, the Saturnaliorum libri VII and the Commentariorum in Somnium Scipionis libri duo. The first is a work purely grammatical and philological in character, showing more than anything else the author's erudition. The second takes the form of an extended dialogue in which the Platonic model converges with the later dialogues of Aulus Gellius and Athenaeus. On the first day of the dialogue, which acc. to scholars may be dated to 383–384, the characters discuss various subjects, while on the two following days all the discourses focus on the works of Virgil, who becomes the point of departure for reflections on philosophy, law, rhetoric and philology. The author shows remarkable erudition, but above all of interest is his rereading of *Neoplatonic philosophy, which becomes an interpretative key for understanding both the material and the spiritual worlds. These same elements of profound erudition and understanding reality in the light of Neoplatonic philosophy are also to be found in the last work of Macrobius, the commentary on the Somnium Scipionis, which is of great importance in part because it preserves a part of the lost De republica of Cicero.

Editions and translations: L. Jan, Macrobii Opera, Quedlinburg-Leipzig 1848-1852; J. Willis, Macrobius, 2 vols., Leipzig 1970; N. Marinone, I "Saturnali" di Macrobio, Turin 1977; L. Scarpa, Macrobii Ambrosii Theodosii "Commentariorum in Somnium Scipionis libri duo," Padua 1981; M. Armisen-Marchetti, Macrobe: Commentaire au Songe de Scipion, Livre I, Paris 2001.

Studies: T. Whittaker, Macrobius or Philosophy, Science and Letters in the Year 400, Cambridge 1923; A. Cameron, The Date and Identity of Macrobius: JRS 56 (1966) 25-38; H. De Ley, Macrobius and Numenius: A Study of Macrobius, "In Somn." I.c.12, Brussels 1972; J. Flamant, Macrobe et le néo-platonisme latin, à la fin du IVᵉ siècle, Leiden 1977; B.C. Barker-Benfield - P.K. Marshall, Macrobius, in Texts and Transmissions: A Survey of the Latin Classics, ed. L.D. Reynolds, Oxford 1983; A. Saggioro, Il sacrificio pagano nella reazione al Cristianesimo: Giuliano e Macrobio: AnSE 19 (2002) 237-254.

M. Conti

MACROBIUS (early 5th c.). *Donatist bishop of *Hippo who succeeded Proculeianus in about 406, and was present at the Council of Carthage in 411. Macrobius had had the Catholic subdeacon Rusticianus (or Rusticanus) rebaptized after he had been excommunicated by his bishop and joined the Donatist church. *Augustine addressed Macrobius on this occasion to express his disapproval (Ep. 106). Macrobius defended himself, claiming to have followed the practice of his predecessor (Ep. 107 of the correspondence of Augustine). Augustine responded with a second letter taking up the Donatist question more broadly (Ep. 108): from this letter we learn that at the moment of his installation Macrobius had reacted against the excesses of the *circumcellions. Later, however, Macrobius had recourse to the circumcellions to occupy the Donatist churches closed by *Honorius, and had had a certain Donatus rebaptized, who was accused of the murder of a priest (Aug., Ep. 139, 2).

DCB 3, 780-781; W.H.C. Frend, The Donatist Church: A Movement of Protest in Roman North Africa, Oxford ²1971, 73, 272, 291-292; PCBE 1, 662-663.

F. Scorza Barcellona

MACROCOSM and MICROCOSM. As G. Calogero has shown (EI 21, 802), the expression μικρὸς κόσμος (Latin: microcosmus) used of humanity seems to go back to Democritus (fr. B 34 Diels, II ⁶1952, p. 153). The parallelism between the individual living being called the "small universe" and the "great universe," the cosmos, is found clearly formulated in *Aristotle (Phys. 8,252a 24-27). It is to *Stoicism, however, that we may primarily attribute the emphasis on the correspondence between the universe, composed of the divine and rational principle which governs and permeates it, the logos, and matter, and then humanity, equally governed by reason (logos), a fragment of the universal logos, and equipped with a material body: in SVF II 634 the *cosmos is presented as an animated and rational living being, governed by the intelligence-ether which runs through it, just as the human being is permeated by the soul, which, when it has the function of guide, takes the name of intelligence. These Stoic ideas are taken up by Philo who establishes a precise parallelism between the function of the logos of the universe and that of the mind of humanity (De opif. m. 69), and who, referring to the Stoics, expresses himself thus: "Some have felt confidence to grant equality between the smallest of living beings, man, and the whole world, having observed that each of them consists of a body and a rational soul; consequently, by virtue of this correspondence, they have called man a 'microcosm,' and the 'great man' the universe" (Quis rer. div. her. 155). *Plotinus sees a strict correspondence between his three metaphysical hypostases (the one, the intelligence and the soul) and the immaterial structure of human beings, characterized also by these three elements (Enn. V, 1,10 [284,5-6,10-13], V, 1,12 [286,4-5]). The Stoic-Philonic conception is accepted in full by *Gregory of Nyssa (De an. et res., PG 46, 28 B).

R. Allers, Microcosmus from Anaximandre to Paracelsus: Traditio 2 (1944) 318-347; G. Calogero, Macrocosmo e microcosmo: EI 21, 802-803 where a more extended bibl. may be found (cf. p. 803; Calogero, however, mentions neither Philo nor Gregory of Nyssa, and for Aristotle and the Stoics his account is lacking in precision); M. Harl, Quis rerum divinarum heres sit [Les Œuvres de Philon d'Alexandrie 15], Paris 1966, 69-71; Historisches Wörterbuch der Philosophie, 5, 540-542; J. Jouanna, L'interprétation des rêves et la théorie micro-macrocosmique dans le traité hippocratique "Du Régime": sémiotique et mimésis, in Text and Tradition: Studies in Ancient Medicine and Its Transmission Presented to Jutta Kollesch, ed. K.-D. Fischer et al., Leiden 1998, 161-174; Ressembler au monde: nouveaux documents sur la théorie du macro-microcosme dans l'antiquité orientale, ed. Ph. Gignoux, Turnhout 1999; S. Lilla, Neuplatonisches Gedankengut in den Homilien über die Seligpreisungen Gregors von Nyssa, Leiden 2004, 28, 36 n. 111.

S. Lilla

MEDABA. Town on the hills of Moab and repeatedly mentioned in biblical texts as "Medeba" (Num 21:30; Josh 13:9,16; 1 Chr 19:7; 1 Macc 9:35-36), its name also occurs in the Mesha stele. Recently, excavations undertaken on the "tell" of the city have demonstrated that human occupation of the site had begun as early as the fourth millennium BC, and the numerous ceramic items recovered datable to the Iron Age (9th–7th c. BC) attest that Madaba was heavily populated in this period as well, to which both the biblical texts and the Mesha stele refer.

Reoccupied in modern times in the last decades of the 19th c. by Bedouin Christian families, the city owes its reputation to the numerous mosaics in the churches and the buildings that have been discovered, the workmanship and beauty of which suggest a true and proper "school of Madaba" at work in the region.

The highest expression of this school is certainly the so-called Map of Madaba: a mosaic floor in the church datable to the 6th or 7th c. AD, which must originally have represented a large geographical region, extending from *Tyre and Sidon in the N down to the Nile Delta in the S, taking in the *Sinai Peninsula, and bounded on the W by the Mediterranean and on the E by the desert. The large extant piece of this mosaic, discovered in 1896 during construction work for the church of St. George and now visible within that church, with its vignettes of cities and more than 150 toponyms, is a unique artifact, artistically, epigraphically, historically and geographically, as well as biblically.

Other churches and buildings with mosaic floors have been discovered and studied more recently. We must mention those near to the paved road from the Roman period which runs through the center of the city, some of which are now within the delimited "archaeological area," which may be visited: the church of the Virgin and the hall of Hippolytus, the church of the Prophet Elijah and the crypt of St. Elianus; the church of the Sunna'; the church of the Holy Martyrs; the "Burnt Palace." At a greater distance there is the church of the Apostles and that which must have been the "cathedral" of Madaba.

Of great importance in the area is Mount Nebo with the churches of the ancient city and also the Moses Memorial, a sanctuary which recalls the vision of the Promised Land granted by God to the prophet before he died (Dt 34:1-5). Ma'in, Massuh, Umm al-Rasas (the biblical Mephaath) and Zizia are other places in the diocese of Madaba in which churches with mosaics and inscriptions have been found, permitting reconstruction of the ecclesiastical and artistic history of this important center of the *Arabian Province in the *Byzantine and Umayyad eras.

M. Piccirillo, Chiese e Mosaici di Madaba, Jerusalem-Milan 1989; Id., The Mosaics of Jordan, Amman 1993; M. Piccirillo - E. Alliata (eds.), Umm al-Rasas–Mayfa'ah. I. Gli scavi del complesso di Santo Stefano, Jerusalem 1994; P.M. Bikai - T.A. Dailey (eds.), Madaba: Cultural Heritage, Amman 1996; M. Piccirillo - E. Alliata (eds.), Mount Nebo. New Archaeological Excavations 1967–1997, Jerusalem 1998; M. Piccirillo - E. Alliata (eds.), The Madaba Map Centenary 1897–1997, Jerusalem 1999; A. Michel, Les églises d'époque byzantine et umayyade de Jordanie (Provinces d'Arabie et de Palestine) V-VIII siècle. Typologie architecturale et aménagements liturgiques (avec catalogue des monuments), Turnhout 2001; M. Piccirillo, L'Arabia cristiana, Milan 2002; B. Hamarneh, Topografia cristiana ed insediamenti rurali nel territorio dell'odierna Giordania nelle epoche bizantina ed islamica: 5.-9. sec., Vatican City 2003.

C. Pappalardo

MADAUROS. A city of *Numidia (also Madaura; today near the present village of M'Daourouch), as the crow flies 25 km (15.5 mi) to the S of *Thagaste, city of Apuleius (ca. 125–171/180). *Augustine of Hippo studied at Madauros from ca. 365 until 369, at which time it was a small center of studies and a thriving town, partly owing to the now-defunct cultivation of olives. It was a Roman colony for veterans at the end of the 1st c.; in the 4th c. we know of two statues of the god Mars. It was occupied by the *Vandals and went into decline; reusing previous materials, a fortress was constructed in the Byzantine period, between 534 and 536, over the theater and a part of the baths, a sign of its decadence. In a now-barren landscape, there are substantial remains from the Roman period (forum, theater, baths, Roman basilica, shrines, arches and also the remains of two Christian churches). At the beginning of the 5th c. the population was largely pagan, for Maxi-mus of Madauros, professor of grammar (and, perhaps, also of Augustine), writes that "the market-place of our city is protected by a great number of beneficent deities; we see this and we can establish it" (Ep. 16,1 among the letters of *Augustine of Hippo). Again in about 408 the curia is largely composed of pagans (see Aug., Ep. 232,1-2). The first certainly Catholic bishop we hear of in 407 is Placentinus (PCBE 1, 876-877); at the conference of *Carthage of 477 there is also a *Donatist bishop, Donatus (PCBE 1, 314, n. 39); while it seems we should rule out the presence of a Catholic bishop at the Council of Carthage in 345–348 (DACL 10, 898), because Madaurensis in the MS is a correction of Maginensis (Antigonus: PCBE 1, 72). The last bishop we know of is Pudentius in 484 (PCBE 1, 934). Maximus of Madauros speaks of the strange Punic names of the martyrs venerated by the Christians (Ep. 16, in the letters of St. Augustine), but this does not mean that they were from Madauros, as some authors have maintained (Allard, Duchesne, Monceaux, Harnack). Augustine responds that "the Catholic Christians, who have a church in your city, do not worship any dead person" (Ep. 17,5). The epigraphic material on the pagan religious life of the city is abundant, the Christian much less so.

DACL 10, 886-914; M. Leglay, Saturn africain, I, Paris 1961, 361-364; O. Perler, Les voyages de saint Augustin, Paris 1969, 125-128; C. Lepelley, Les cités de l'Afrique romaine au Bas-Empire, II, Paris 1981, 127-139; P. Mastandrea, Massimo di Madauros (Agostino, Epistulae 16 e 17), Padua 1985.

A. Di Berardino

MAGI (the kings). The number, identity, provenance and disposition of soul of those simply described as Magi who came from the East to *Bethlehem to adore Jesus (Mt 2:1-12) were the object of numerous interpretations on the part of the Christians of the first centuries, which were then passed on to successive eras and established in the tradition as a literary and iconographic heritage. As early as *Origen (Hom. Gen. 14,3) we find the Magi connected with the three persons who in Gen 26:27-29 confer with Isaac: it is logical to think that the threefold number of the Magi, accepted with few exceptions by the subsequent tradition, is derived from the three gifts they offer to Jesus. That the Magi are royal figures is supposed by *Tertullian (Marc. III, 13,8), based on the application of Ps 71:10, 15 to the gospel text. The most common opinion on the provenance of the Magi is that they were *Persian: *Justin Martyr (Dial. 77,4; 78,1; 88,1) and Tertullian (Marc. III, 13,8; Adv. Jud. 9) have them as coming from *Arabia, with reference (explicit in Tertullian) to Psalm 71. A Chaldean origin, proposed by some authors, is associated with the prophecy of the birth of Jesus identified by the Magi in the apparition of the star, assuming the Chaldean use of divination by observation of the stars. From Origen onward (Contra Cels. 1,59; Hom. Num. 13,7; 15,4), it was quite common to affirm the descent of the Magi from Balaam, the diviner who in Num 24:17 announces the rising of the star of Jacob, sometimes identified with the star of gospel account.

In this context the adoration of the Magi represents the recognition of the divinity of Jesus, and that from the moment of the appearance of the star, or at least of the meeting with Jesus in Bethlehem. The gifts take on, in this light, a symbolic value which is principally christological, indicating the nature and status of him whom the Magi had come to adore: gold, incense and myrrh indicate respectively kingship, divinity and the mortal condition (humanity, but also death and burial, and therefore implicitly the passion). The first testimony of this symbolic interpretation of the gifts is that which we read in *Irenaeus of Lyons (Adv. Haer. III, 9,2), destined to achieve widespread acceptance. Other authors, however, as alternatives or additions to this christological interpretation, proposed a symbology of what the faithful, on the example of the Magi, can and must offer to Christ: various virtues (faith, chastity, purity of heart etc.) and devout acts (prayer, mortification, almsgiving). In later ages there was no lack of global interpretations intended to find in the three gifts a symbol of threefold entities or concepts: the three theological virtues, the three worlds, the three senses of Scripture, the three parts of philosophy. From the 6th c. the gospel account was magnified into legends, rich in detail and widely diffused: thus in two Syriac texts, the *Book of the Cavern of Treasures (6th. c.) and the Chronicle of Pseudo-Dionysius of Tel Mahre, called the Chronicle of Zuqnin (8th c.), in which the Magi offer to Christ the gifts hidden by Adam in a cave and reserved to the person who would be heralded by a mysterious star. In these legends the names of the Magi are already referred to, which would later become fixed as Balthasar, Gaspar and Melchior. The Chronicle of Zuqnin was drawn upon as a source by the ps.-Chrysostomic author of the Opus imperfectum in Matthaeum (5th c.).

H. Kehrer, Die heiligen Drei Könige in Literatur und Kunst, I-II, Leipzig 1908-1909; DB 4, 543-552; BS 8, 494-528; Cath 3, 1816-1823; DACL 10, 980-1067; L. Olschki, The Wise Men of the East in Oriental Tradition: Semitic and Oriental St. 11 (1951) 375-395; U. Monneret de Villard, Le leggende orientali sui Magi evangel- ici, ST 163, Vatican City 1952; J.C. Marsh-Edwards, The Magi in Tradition and Art: Irish Ecclesiastical Record 85 (1956) 1-9; J. Duchesne-Guillemin, Die drei Weisen aus dem Morgenlande und die Anbetung der Zeit: Antaios 7 (1965) 234-252; W.A. Schulze, Zur Geschichte der Auslegung von Matth. 2,1-12: TZ 31 (1975) 150-160; Enc. delle Religioni 3, 1816-1823; Die Heiligen Drei Könige. Darstellung und Verehrung, Cologne 1982; R. Deichting, Sedulius Scottus. Ein "Heiliger König mehr" aus dem Abendland, in H. Löwe, Die Iren und Europa in früheren Mittelalter, Stuttgart 1982, 866-875; F. Scorza Barcellona, "Oro e incense e mirra" (Mt 2,11). L'interpretazione cristologica dei tre doni e la fede dei magi: ASE 2 (1985) 137-147; Id., "Oro e incenso e mirra" (Mt 2,11). II. Le interpretazioni morali: ASE 3 (1986) 227-245; Id., La notizia di Marco Polo sui Re Magi: Studi e Ricerche sull'Oriente Cristiano 15 (1992) 87-104; R.C. Trexler, The Journey of the Magi. Meanings in the History of a Christian Story, Princeton, NJ 1997; F. Cardini, I Re Magi. Storia e leggende, Venezia 2000; C. Jullien - F. Jullien, Apôtres des confins. Processus missionnaires chrétiens dans l'Empire iranien, Bures-sur-Yvette 2002, 111-117; R. Favaro, Sull'iconografia bizantina della stella dei Magi a Betlemme, in La Persia e Bisanzio, Atti dei Convegni Lincei 201, Rome 2004, 827-863; S.J. Voicu, Prima del presepe. Magi e pastori nei racconti antichi, Rome 2004; Th. Schmidt-Kaler, Der Stern und die Magier aus dem Morgenland. Der Stern von Bethlehem im Lichte der historischen Astronomie, in Il contributo delle scienze storiche allo studio del Nuovo Testamento, ed. E. dal Covolo - R. Fusco, Vatican City 2005, 254-313.

F. Scorza Barcellona

MAGIC. If magic is the "art of producing extraordinary effects out of proportion to the methods which it employs," then it is without doubt connected to religion. From Eastern religions astrologers and magi overran the Roman Empire, offering remedies, given remuneration, for certain illnesses or for predicting the future. Astrology allowed one to know the future, magic to intervene in events using a variety of means; but also the Romans, drawing on Etruscan tradition, practiced certain divinatory arts, in particular haruspicy. Some of these practices had recourse to the occult sciences, while others were connected strictly to the cults and sacrifices. In the Roman tradition, from the time of Sulla onward, it was not easy to distinguish between black, harmful magic from that which was harmless. In the course of the 4th c. the emperors had prohibited recourse to private divination. *Constantine I also tried to distinguish between that magic which was subject to grave punishment—namely, those magical arts that were damaging to health or which offered bribes with love spells—and that which was innocent, which sought to offer remedies for suffering bodies or to help in agricultural cultivation (CTh 9,16,3).

Christian Antiquity presents us with two issues: the accusation of magic directed at Christians and the response given to this, and then, further, the existence and survival of magical practices within Christianity. Suetonius defines the Christian religion as malefica. A serious accusation, considering how the Romans notoriously feared curses, the evil eye, the unleashing of occult forces through incantations, drawing lots or magic potions. The trial of Apuleius allows us to glimpse the dread which magic inspired. Judaism had already been subject to the charge of magic. We know that at the time of Christ Jewish magicians were spread across the Greco-Roman world (Juvenal, Sat. III, 13; VI, 542-547; Lucian, Trag. 174); the Jews indeed were specialists in magic and exorcism. In Ephesus they used even the name of Jesus (Acts 19:13). The rabbinic tradition in its turn attempted to discredit Christ by presenting him as a sorcerer. *Justin Martyr refutes this calumny (Dial. 69,7; 108,2; 1 Apol. 30). There is an identical accusation in the Ps. ep. Pilati ad Claudium and in the gospel of Nicodemus. From the Jews this charge passed to the pagans, who accused Christ of being guilty of charlatanism and Christianity of magic, as the Apologists relate (Latt., Div. Inst. V, 3,19; Just., 1 Apol. 30; Recogn. I, 58,1; Orig., Contra Celsum 7,69). It is true—and confirmed by Justin Martyr—that *Simon Magus traveled to Rome and with the help of the demons worked magical miracles (Just., 1 Apol. 26,1-3; 56,2; Dial. 120,6). The same accusation is made of *Peter and *Paul (Philostratus to Eusebius). *Tertullian was obliged to defend Christianity against the same accusation (Ad ux. II, 4,5). It reemerged at the time of *Julian the Apostate (Socr., HE III, 13,11,12). To this charge, the Christians responded that magic is demonic and that Christianity represents precisely a break with the demons and so with magic (Justin, Tertullian, *Cyprian of Carthage, *John Chrysostom; Aug., De doc. christ. II, 35-36). Exorcisms before and after baptism had as their purpose the expulsion of demons.

The boundary between magic, astrology and superstition is not easy to trace. New converts did not easily abandon practices, objects, formulas, imprecations and incantations to which they were profoundly attached. The Trad. Ap. in fact excludes from baptism magi, astrologers and fortune tellers (ch. 16). There should be no surprise that in certain Christians tombs we find defixionum tabellae, dirae, imprecationes, devotiones, esp. in Africa (see *Amulets).

For their part the Christians created "magical crosses," formulas for warding off evil powers or imprecations against them. They Christianized amulets like the scarab, engraving an image of Christ upon them (Dölger, AC 2, 230-240). Even the sacred texts, above all the beginning of the four gospels, were seen to possess a "magical" efficacy. The Verbum caro factum est preserved from lightning. The women of *Constantinople wore the gospel as a pen-dant around the neck (John Chrys., In Mt. hom. 8,3). Amulets, formulas such as *ABRASAX, magical symbols on Christian tombs, magical nails, phylacteries against occult powers—none of these had waned in popularity by the time of John Chrysostom, Augustine and *Caesarius of Arles, who fought without respite against these survivors of paganism. The Canons of Athanasius (cans. 72 and 73) and the Councils of Orléans in 511 (can. 30), Auxerre in 573 (can. 41), and Clichy in 626 (can. 16) did the same. From time to time the accusation of magic was resorted to in order to attack someone, as in the case of the proceedings against *Athanasius and against *Priscillian of Avila.

See the following entries in DACL: Adjuration, Amulettes, Imprécations, Phylactères; F. Dölger: AC 2 (1930) 153-176; 3 (1932) 81-100; 4 (1933-1934) 188-228; A.A. Barb, La sopravvivenza delle arti magiche, in Il conflitto tra paganesimo e cristianesimo nel IV secolo, Turin 1968, 111-137; A.G. Hamman, La vie quotidienne en Afrique du Nord au temps de saint Augustin, Paris 1979, 170-193; D.E. Aune, Magic in Early Christianity: ANRW II, 23, 2 (1980) 1507-1557; L. Desanti, Sileat omnibus perpetuo divinandi curiositas. Indovini e sanzioni nel diritto romano, Milan 1990; G. Luck, Arcana mundi. Magia e occulto nel mondo greco romano, Rome 1997; Ancient Christian Magic: Coptic Texts of Ritual Power, ed. M. Meier - R. Smith, Princeton, NJ 1999; N. Janositz, Magic in the Roman World. Pagans, Jews and Christians, London 2001; F. Dolbeau, Le combat pastoral d'Augustin contre les astrologues, les divins et le guérisseurs, in Augustinus Afer, ed. P.-Y. Fux et al., Fribourg 2003, 167-182; M.W. Dickie, Magic and Magicians in the Graeco-Roman World, London-New York 2003.

A. Hamman

MAGNUS, martyr. Magnus was a common name, borne by many martyrs: Magnus and his companions Aquilinus, Geminus, etc.; Magnus of Avignon; Magnus of Caesarea in Cappadocia; Magnus of Milan; Magnus deacon and Roman martyr at the time of Pope Sixtus; Magnus of Terni, etc. The cult of a Magnus, martyr, was widely spread. The best known is Magnus venerated at Trani and in the southern-central part of the Via Appia on 19 August, attested as early as the Mart. hier. (codex Epternacensis) at Fabrateria (Vetus, modern Ceccano in Lazio, or the Nova in the area of S. Giovanni Incarico) and also found in the Gelasian Sacramentary. Magnus, born at Trani, of which he became bishop, was martyred on returning from a pilgrimage to *Rome, at Fabrateria, where he had dedicated himself to the evangelization of the territory. In the Middle Ages his relics were brought to Anagni. Simonetti regards the saint of Trani and the martyr of Fondi as two different people. Luongo prefers not to duplicate the saint, holding that the cult began at Fabrateria and then spread to the surrounding area (Fondi, Aquino) and then also elsewhere.

M. Simonetti, Sulla tradizione agiografica di S. Magno di Trani, in Il paleocristiano in Ciociaria, Rome 1978, 97-131; Id., Un testo inedito su san Magno di Trani, in Paradoxos Paideia, Milan 1979, 42-54; G. Luongo, Agiografia fondana, in Fondi tra antichità e Medioevo, ed. T. Piscitelli Carpino, Fondi 2002, 193-250; Magno di Trani. Memoria e culto di un martire paleocristiano nelle Valli del Liri e del Sacco, ed. F. Carcione, Venafro 2004.

A. Di Berardino

MAGNUS MAXIMUS, emperor (d. 388). Following the revolt which broke out in Britain in 383, the Spaniard Magnus Maximus was proclaimed emperor; to him passed the army of *Gratian, who in the same year was defeated and killed. Keen to win the favor of the Catholic clergy, Magnus referred the *Priscillianist question to the Council of Bordeaux (384), where Priscillian and his followers were condemned. Priscillian having subsequently appealed to the tribunal of the emperor, Magnus Maximus decreed his death, along with certain of his companions. For this Magnus Maximus was sharply reproached by some bishops, among whom *Ambrose, who, for the second time, presented himself at *Trier as ambassador of *Valentinian II. In 387 Magnus Maximus invaded Italian territory, forcing Valentinian to flee; *Theodosius came to his defense; having established his official residence at Milan, Magnus Maximus moved to the East and advanced into Illyria. The following year he was beaten by Theodosius at Petovium on the Drava and killed at *Aquileia. We have two letters of Magnus Maximus, one to Valentinian II against the *Arians and the *Manicheans, and another to Pope *Siricius.

CPL 1593-1594; PL 13, 591-594; CSEL 35, 88-91; PLRE 1, 588; M.V. Escribano, Iglesia y Estado en el Certamen priscilianista, Zaragoza 1988.

S. Zincone

MAIORINUS (early 4th c.). First lector of the church of Carthage at the time of Bishop *Mensurius (there is much discussion regarding the date of his death); he was succeeded in 311 (though many propose an earlier date) by *Caecilian, persona non grata to the matron *Lucilla and many others, esp. the bishops of *Numidia. The opponents then elected Maiorinus (312), constituting thus the pars Maiorini (Aug., Ep. 88,1). Under his name was redacted the libellus ecclesiae catholicae, criminum Caeciliani traditus a parte Maiorini (Aug., Ep. 88,2). Maiorinus ordained other bishops, extending the strength of his pars, and died before the Council of *Arles of 314 after a brief episcopate. He was succeeded by *Donatus, who gave his name to the secessionist movement.

PCBE 1, 666-667; K. Clancy, When Did the Donatist Schism Begin?: JTS 28 (1977) 104-109; B. Kriegbaum, Kirche der Traditoren oder Kirche der Märtyrer? Die Vorgeschichte des Donatismus, Innsbruck 1986; Y. Duval, Chrétiens d'Afrique à l'aube de la paix constantinienne. Les premiers échos de la grande persécution, Paris 2000, passim.

A. Di Berardino

MALABAR. From the Augustan era onward there are frequent and reliable references to commercial links with the SW coast of India, where archaeologists have discovered numerous landing berths, such as the much-frequented one at Muziris, known to Pliny the Elder and identifiable with Cranganore; but a commercial land route also existed, where the Tabula Peutingeriana indicates a temple of Augustus and where *numismatic discoveries document Roman coinage from the first empire; there is also evidence of legations from India to *Rome and vice versa, from *Augustus to *Aurelian. The first evangelization of India is attributable by tradition to St. *Thomas—who is said to have preached also in Parthia and in Mesopotamia—and to St. Bartholomew. (The Malabar tradition recorded by the Portuguese in 1533 mentions the arrival of Thomas, Bartholomew and *Judas Thaddeus in Malabar.) The first has a particular link with *Edessa, traditionally evangelized by Thomas or by his disciple Thaddeus-Addai, a center for the propagation of Syro-Aramaic Christianity, and to which in the Severan period the relics of Thomas were solemnly translated. The bricks of the tomb of St. Thomas at Mylapore have the same dimensions as those of a nearby Roman station of the 1st c. AD (A. Schurhammer, The Malabar Church: OCA 196 [1970] 99-101). In the De vitis Apostolorum his preaching moves toward the East: the Parthians, the Medes, the Persians, the Bactrians, the Magi and the Indians, among whom he died.

Toward the of the 2nd c., we find the apparently historical mission of *Pantaenus, *Stoic philosopher and *Alexandrian Christian learned in the Scriptures and in secular literature, teacher of Clement and founder of the catechetical school of the Didaskaleion of Alexandria, who, sent by the bishop of the city, Demetrius, traveled by sea to India, by invitation of certain Indian Christians. There he is said to have found groups possessing the "Hebrew" gospel of Matthew brought there by Bartholomew, which Pantaenus took back to Alexandria (Eus., HE V, 10; Hier., Vir. Ill. 36; Ep. 70,4). The mission of Pantaenus seems to be indirectly corroborated by *Clement of Alexandria (Strom. I, 71,3; III, 60,2) and by Hippolytus (Philos. 24) who, shortly afterward, give information originating directly from India, the first speaking of the Buddhists, of the women of the monastic order founded by the Buddha and of the Semnoí, an honorific title of the ascetical Indians, the second presenting the doctrine of the Vedic brahman certainly transmitted by Christian sources, given the emphasis on God as logos and as light. *Bardesanes and *Plotinus too reveal a detailed knowledge of India, derived in the first place from a meeting with the chief of an Indian delegation, which had arrived in Syria AD 218, to Elagabalus, the object of which was probably a flourishing commerce with the coasts of Malabar (Stobeo I, 3,56): Bardesanes did not only name the Indians in the Liber legum regionum, but also dedicated to India a work which was read by *Porphyry (FHG III, 719 frags. 1-3; Porphyry, Sullo Stige, ed. C. Castelletti, Milan 2006, 126ff., 245ff.), disciple of Plotinus, who for 38 years had wanted to travel to India, perhaps to imitate *Apollonius of Tyana, and who himself presents convergences of thought with the Upanishad, traceable perhaps to a *gnostic source.

The Jewish-Christian matrix of the evangelization of Malabar is clear also in the name of the local Christians, Nazrani mahapilla ("great Nazerene sons," the name of the Jewish-Christian guardians of the "Hebrew" Matthew), and in that which was for centuries their ecclesiastical language, *Syriac, as well as in particular liturgical uses (e.g., the celebration of the paschal meal with unleavened bread, the baptism of children after 40 days, the absence of sacred images) and in the jurisdictional dependence of the Indian church, after *Constantine, on that of Persia, suffragan of *Selecuia-Ctesiphon, dependent itself on Edessa until 424. Among the eucharistic *anaphoras of the church of Malabar one of the most important is that of *Addai and Mari, evangelizers of Edessa, and in the Acta Thomae Jesus is termed "nazirite," Thomas sings in "Hebrew" and is understood by an Indian flautist who is evidently Jewish, and goes to India with the merchant Habban. There is reliable evidence from the Constantinian era, with new missionaries in India Ulterior and Interior; Bartholomew, on the other hand, acc. to Rufinus (HE X, 9), is supposed to have traveled to India Citerior, where in preaching he brought the gospel that Pantaenus was to find; on his return, he went to Greater *Armenia (also acc. to the De Vitis Apostolorum). In 325 John, bishop of Persia and of Great India, was charged with notifying the Indians of the decisions of *Nicaea. *Frumentius went there to preach, invited by *Athanasius of Alexandria after 328. The celebrations of Constantine reached as far as India, and Indian delegations were sent to Julian. In about 340, *Theophilus was sent to India by *Constantius II and there effected reforms among the Christians. In 345, 72 families of the church of Persia, including ecclesiastics, led by the merchant Thomas Kinayi, were sent to Malabar by the catholicos of Seleucia-Ctesiphon and established themselves at Muziris, since the church of Malabar, which had remained isolated even through the *Sassanid persecution, had a structure which did not correspond to the Nicene canons as reported by John. Later, David of Charax (Basra) from the Sassanid Empire went to preach in India.

The term Malabar is a Portuguese deformation of a poorly understood appellation. The language is Malayalam, of the Dravidian linguistic group. *Cosmas Indicopleustes, in 520–525, bears witness to a Christian presence on the island of Socotra, in Male (= Malabar) and at Kalliana (= Ceylon), whose bishop was ordained in Persia. Sabrisho I (596–604) took India and China into his jurisdiction. It seems that the diocese of Rev-Ardashir independently influenced the Christian groups of Malabar. Numerous crosses have been discovered with Pahlavi inscriptions from 7th to the 8th c. Already in the 16th c. travelers from the West—above all the Portuguese—found on the SW coast of India the church of Malabar and that of Malankara. Certainly historical are Mar Thomas (ca. 795–824), the cited Mar Sabrisho and Mar Peroz (ca. 880). The first was ordained in Baghdad by Timothy I: similar movements correspond to the parallel exodus of the Persians repulsed by Islam. The tomb of St. Thomas is mentioned in 833, on the occasion of the delegation sent by Alfred the Great of England. Bar Hebraeus seems to be the first to have used the expressions "Christians of St. Thomas" in contrast with those of Mari, dependant on Baghdad. With the Synod of Diamper (20 June 1599) we find the Latin tampering with the ancient Syriac usages and the almost total destruction of the apocryphal Syriac books. Beyond the Catholic hierarchy, in the two rites, today there exists, from 1964, the Eastern catholicos, and the metropolitans of Mar Thomas.

M. Medlycott, India and the Apostle St. Thomas, London 1905; J. Dahlmann, Die Thomas-Legende, Freiburg i.B. 1920; J.R. Farquhar, The Apostle Thomas in North India: BJRL 10 (1926) 80-111; The Apostle Thomas in South India: BJRL 10 (1926) 20-50; A. Mingana, The Early Spread of Christianity in India: BJRL 10 (1926) 435-514; K.T. Joseph, The Malabar Christians, Trivandrum 1929; U. Monneret de Villard, La fiera di Batne e la traslazione di s. Tommaso a Edessa: RAL 6 (1951) 77-104; J.W. Brown, The Indian Christians of St. Thomas, Cambridge 1956; R.P. Placid Podipara, Les Syriens du Malabar: OrSyr 4 (1956) 375-423; E. Tisserant, Eastern Christianity in India, Bombay-Calcutta-Madras 1957; A.F.J. Kljin, The Acts of Thomas, intro., tr. and comm., Leiden 1962; A. Fischer, Pantainos: LTK 8, 24; A. Hammann, Le Sitz im Leben des Actes de Thomas, TU 88, Berlin 1964; A.M. Di Nola, ed. G. di Hildesheim, La storia dei Re Magi, Florence 1966; H.J.W. Drijvers, Edessa und das jüdische Christentum: VChr 24 (1970) 3-33; B. Ehlers, Kann das Thomasevangelium aus Edessa stammen?: NT 12 (1970) 284-317; A.M. Mundadan, Sixteenth Century Traditions of St. Thomas Christians, Bangalore 1970; A.D. Smelik, Aliquanta ipsius Thomae: VChr 28 (1974) 290-294; Erbetta II, 307-374; M. Bussagli, I re Magi, Milan 1985, 63-70 and passim; A. Dihle, L'ambassade de Théophile l'Indien ré-examinée, in L'Arabie pré-islamique, ed. Th. Fahd, Leiden 1987, 461-468; A. Magris - M. Piantelli, Plotino e l'India; l'India e Plotino: Annuario filosofico 6 (1990) esp. 120-135; J.R.K. Fenwick, The Malabar Independent Syrian Church, Bramcote (Nottingham) 1992; J. Madey, La chrétienté de Saint Thomas en Inde: Irénikon 65 (1992) 24-41; S.C. Mimouni, Pour une définition nouvelle du judéo-christianisme: NTS 38 (1992) 161-186; V.C. Samuel, The Growing Church. An Introduction to Indian Church History, Kottayam 1992; J. Teixidor, Bardésane d'Édesse, Paris 1992, 39; H. Wybrew, L'Église Mar Thoma en Inde: Irénikon 65 (1992) 451-461; J. Kolangaden, The Historicity of Apostle Thomas, Neelanchavil, Kolazhy, Trichur 1993; J. Perumattam, Fr. Placid and the Missionary Expansion of the Syro-Malabar Church: ChrOr 14 (1993) 64-75; J. Kollaparambil, The Persian Crosses in India Are Christian, Not Manichaean: ChrOr 15 (1994) 24ff.; Id., The Identity of Mar John of Persia and Great India, in VI Symposium Syriacum, ed. R. Lavenant, OCA 247, Rome 1994, 281-297; S.C. Mimouni, Le judéo-christianisme syriaque, in VI Symposium Syriacum, 269-280; L. Moraldi, Gli apocrifi del NT, II, Casale Monf. 1994, 303-428; P. Pallath (ed.), Catholic Eastern Churches: Heritage and Identity, Rome 1994; P. Gignoux, The Pahlavi Inscription of the Mt. Thomas Cross (South India), in var. aus., Solving Riddles, Winona Lake, IN 1995, 411-422; K. Hermes, Countdown to 1999. Die Synode von Diamper (1599) im Spiegel der verschiedenen Kirchen der südindischen Thomaschristenheit, in Syrisches Christentum weltweit, eds. M. Tamke et al., Münster 1995, 325-340; K. Valuparampil, Margasastra of the Acts of the Apostles and the Mar Thomas Nasranis of India: ChrOr 16 (1995) 15-28; I.H. Dalmais, Les chrétiens de St Thomas et le Prêtre Jean: Harp 8/9 (1995/1996) 393-395; J. Kolangaden, The Historicity of Apostle Thomas' Evangelization in Kerala: Harp 8/9 (1995/1996) 305-327; B. Schmitz, Das Indienbild in der syrischen Thomasliteratur: Harp 8/9 (1995/1996) 105-116; A. Dihle, Indien: RAC 18, 1-56; C. Velamparampil, The Celebration of the Liturgy of the Word in the Syro-Malabar Qurbana: A Biblico-Theological Analysis, Kottayam 1997; G. Menachery, The Nazranies, Trissur 1998; X. Koodapuzha, Christianity in India, Kottayam 1998; P. Vazheeparampil, The Making and Unmaking of Tradition: Towards a Theology of the Liturgical Renewal in the Syro-Malabar Church, Rome 1998; G. Appassery, Raza. Qurbana of Nazrani, Delhi 2000; I. Ramelli, Linee generali per una presentazione e per un commento del Liber Legum Regionum: RIL 133 (1999) 311-355; Id., La missione di Panteno in India, in La diffusione dell'eredità classica, Alessandria 2000, 95-106; Id., Bardesane e la sua scuola tra la cultura occidentale e quella orientale, in Pensiero e istituzioni del mondo classico nelle culture del Vicino Oriente, Alessandria 2001, 237-255; C. Dognini - Id., Gli Apostoli in India nella Patristica e nella letteratura sanscrita, Milan 2001; P. Schneider, L'Éthiopie et l'Inde: interférences et confusions aux extrémitès du monde antique (XVIII^e siècle avant J.C.), Rome 2004.

I. Ramelli

MALCHION of Antioch. Saint (feast 28 Oct). The only sources for his life are *Eusebius (HE 7,29,1-2 and 7,30,1-71) and, depending on him, *Jerome (De vir. ill. 71). Malchion was a priest and head of a school of rhetoric at *Antioch; he was esteemed for his purity of faith. At the Second Council of Antioch (268), he unmasked the errors of *Paul of Samosata and was one of the authors of the Letters, written in the name of the council, to the bishops *Dionysius of Rome and Maximus of Alexandria.

Bardenhewer II, 276-278; DTC 9, 1765-1766; EC 7, 900-901; Quasten I, 401; LTK² 6, 1325-1326; BS 8, 584-585; Altaner 215; P. de Navascués, Paolo de Samosata y sus adversarios, Rome 2004, passim.

A. De Nicola

MALCHUS of Philadelphia (5th c.). *Photius speaks of having read a Storia bizantina (Byzantiaca) of the Christian *Sophist chronicler Malchus of Philadelphia (from Syria, as the name is Semitic) in seven books, which narrate the events of the years 473/474 up to 480. For these years it is an important and reliable source, perhaps because he draws on the evidence of trustworthy observers. In reality, acc. to the *Suidas, the account stretches from *Constantine up to *Anastasius (491). Photius himself testifies that the books he had read must have been preceded by others, which he had not seen. The preserved portion (in the Suidas and esp. in the Excerpta de legationibus of Constantine Porphyrogenitus) narrates the events surrounding the emperors *Zeno (474–491) and *Basiliscus (475–476). The author shows interests in the *Ostrogoths and in Italian affairs until the death of the emperor Nepos (480). Photius appreciates the style of the historian.

Repertorium 7, 415-416; PLRE 2, 703-704; B. Baldwin, Malchus of Philadelphia: DOP 31 (1977) 91-107; L.R. Cresci, Problemi storici e filologici del testo di Malco: Atti dell'Ist. Veneto di Scienze, Lettere e Arti 138 (1979–1980) 509-520; Id., Malco di Filadelfia, Frammenti: Byzantina et Neo-Hellenica 9 (1982) 69-121 (text, comment. and tr.); R.C. Blockley, The Fragmentary Classicising Historians of the Later Roman Empire: Eunapius, Olympiodorus, Priscus and Malchus, III, Liverpool 1983, 404-455; Id., On the Ordering of the Fragments of Malchus' History: Liverpool Classical Monthly 9 (1984) 152-153.

A. Di Berardino

MALTA. An island rich in Neolithic temples in a unique style. Colonized by the Phoenicians and then by the Carthaginians, passing under Roman dominion in AD 218, it was incorporated into the province of Sicily. St. Paul was shipwrecked at Malta (Acts 27:39–28:10) in about the year 60. The fact that Luke calls the inhabitants barbaroi indicates that the language then spoken was still Punic, despite the long Roman colonization. The place of the shipwreck is traditionally located at the Bay of St. Paul. In the vicinity is found the church of S. Pawl Milqgħi (St. Paul Welcomed) of 1666, but documented as early as 1488. The excavations of the Italian Archaeological Mission from 1963 onward have revealed one of the numerous Roman rustic villas with a residence and tools for cultivation of oil and wine, and a graffito with the name Paulus.

Malta has many tombs and catacombs cut in the limestone, with burial niches, arcosolia, canopied tombs with or without seats, and burials in the ground. Characteristic of Malta are the triclinia cut out of the rock. One finds both Christian and Jewish monograms, although of the Christian inscriptions only one is in Latin. The oldest of these tombs date from the Punic era, but the catacombs are today placed at the beginning of the 4th c. onward. There are many lamps with the chi-rho imported from *Africa. Archaeological research identifies a connection between the stone mensae and the tables used as altars. It seems that up to the 4th or 5th c. the Eucharist was celebrated either immediately before or after the agape, despite the universal prohibition promulgated barely a century earlier. Since after *Constantine the island came under the Eastern empire there are also probable traces of the Byzantine rite. The same Italian mission has found a chapel with a baptistery and, presumably, a monastery, which flourished 4th–5th c. The excavation is near to a chapel dedicated to the Madonna of the Snows, but the interesting fact is that this complex occupies the site and incorporates what remained of an ancient temple constructed in the 6th c. AD dedicated to Astarte then to Hera and Juno (with the inscription in Punic and in Greek). It would seem to be the temple plundered by Varro acc. to Cicero's accusation. This temple also was constructed on a preceding Neolithic one of the Tarxien period for the cult of the dea mater.

The first clear mention of a bishop of Malta is to be found in the letters of *Gregory the Great, who in 592 wrote to Lucillus; he then wrote in 598 to the bishop of Syracuse ordering him to depose Lucillus for some misdeed. A year later he sent another letter to the Roman defensor Siciliae telling him to order Lucillus and his son to return the property which they had taken from the church to Trajan his successor. Byzantine Malta was invaded by the Arabs in 870.

D.H. Trump, Malta: An Archaeological Guide, London 1972; V. Borg, Malta and Its Paleochristian Heritage: A New Approach, in Malta: Studies in Its Heritage and History, Valletta 1986, 46-86, with ample bibl.; J. Samut Tagliaferro, Malta: Its Archaeology and Its History, Narni 2000.

P. Grech

MAMAS (Mammas, Mammes, Mammet) of Caesarea. The hagiographical dossier on Mamas is very rich and includes, as well as two *panegyrics respectively by *Basil of Caesarea (BHG 1020) and by *Gregory of Nazianzus (BHG 1021), various Passiones and Vitae in Greek and in Latin, with recensions in *Syriac and in *Armenian (BHO 589-592). In 2002, Berger edited the pre-Metaphrastic Greek life (BHG 1019), which derives from a Greek Passio now lost, certainly from before 5th–6th c., of which numerous recensions exist in Greek (BHG 1017z; 1019a-1019q) and Latin (BHL 5192-5196). In 1940 Delehaye published the Latin text of a Passio (BHL 5191d), which uses the lost Greek text with the addition of a brief introduction (see B. Mombritius, Sanctuarium II, 126-129). It is called "encyclical" as it appears to be a circular letter that the three bishops Euprepius, Cratone and Perigenes sent to all the Eastern and Western churches. From the Middle Ages we should remember the 733 hexameters of the De vita et fine sancti Mammae monachi (BHL 5197) which Walafrid Strabo wrote, on the request of three canons of Lagres, most likely between 837 (Brooke) and before 841 (Solinski). This is a true and proper Heiligenepos (Berschin) in which the Vita is preceded by a praefatio of 24 minor asclepiads and by an oratio of 20 hendecasyllabic Phalaeceans; it is further followed by a hymn in the Ambrosian style in Natalem sancti Mammetis, in iambic dimeters. It has been hypothesized that the Vita of Walafrid Strabo bears dependence on the peom Waltharius (P. Dronke, followed by Önnerfors; contra Schieffer). A Passio was also redacted by St. Godfrey, bishop of Landres, in 1164 (BHL 5198). There are numerous documents of a liturgical nature, such as the office contained in an original MS of St. Martial of Limoges, from the end of the 11th c., edited by Pörnbacher.

According to the account of the "encyclical" Vita, Mamas was a young man of twelve years who had lived with Thaumasius, the pious and charismatic bishop of *Caesarea in Cappadocia, at the time of the emperor *Aurelian (270–275). The bishop having died, he abandoned the city, in which an uprising against the Christians was raging, following a supernatural voice which had ordered him to go to the forest and preach the gospel to the ferae silvarum. The same voice enjoined him to strike the earth with a staff, from where a book miraculously appeared containing the four gospels. It became a means of his preaching among the animals, which on their part provided milk with which he prepared cheese to send to the Christians hidden on account of the persecution. (The motif of the cheese is taken up in the iconography.) His remarkable preaching to the beasts having become widely known, the governor of the region sent soldiers to arrest him on the accusation of *magic. Mamas converted them to Christianity, but wished in any case to go into the city, so that they could be baptized and so as not to escape martyrdom. He was subjected to numerous torments (among others he was immersed in a burning furnace) and was several times exposed to lions and leopards, by which he was, however, always spared. He died serenely, on his knees, after having preached the eternal damnation of the governor of the region, Alexander, who died on the same day, cum cruciato nimio. In subsequent developments of the legend, his belly is torn up by a trident, while in other recensions he is a hermit who dies as a martyr at an old age (Cignitti).

Mamas, whose historical existence there is no reason to doubt (Scorza Barcellona), was venerated in Cappadocia, in the sanctuary which rose up over his tomb, where he was solemnly commemorated on 1 Sept and the Sunday after Easter. The place and date of his primitive cult are reflected in the oldest sources we have: i.e., homily 23 in Mamantem martyrem of Basil of Caesarea, delivered on 1 Sept in a year between 370 and 373 (Troiano), and homily 44, in novam Dominicam, of Gregory of Nazianzus, given on first Sunday after Easter (probably 16 Apr) of 383. The two Cappadocians present the martyr as a simple shepherd, from a poor family, exalting his thaumaturgic powers. More particularly, Basil celebrates in Mamas the penia met' eusebeias and gathers numerous biblical exempla directed at showing the excellence of the condition of shepherds (Girardi); for Gregory, Mamas is "shepherd and also martyr," adding the information that he used to milk "the deer, which used to compete with each other to nourish that just man with an uncommon milk" (Hom. 44,12). In neither homily do any of the themes found in the Passions and the subsequent Lives appear; these themes were legendary amplifications probably intended to make of Mamas a sort of Christian Orpheus, capable of taming animals and living in pacific symbiosis with the wild beasts (Delehaye; Pörnbacher); he also absorbs some elements of the great mother of the gods, Cybele, and of her companion Attis (Hadjinicolaou-Marava). Parallels are also drawn with Genesis (the power of Adam over the animals) and Exodus (the staff and more generally the model of Moses) and above all with the book of Daniel (the lions and the furnace) (Solinski).

The most common liturgical date of the feast of the saint is 2 Sept (Constantinopolitan Synaxarium; marble calendar of Naples; Annus ecclesiasticus Graeco-Slavicus, Armenian and Coptic calendars and liturgical books). The date of 17 August is recorded, though, on the basis of the Passio mentioned above, in the Mart. hier., the historical martyrologies and the Mart. Rom. (Saxer).

From Caesarea the cult of Mamas spread to *Constantinople, where the body of the saint was translated in 11th c. and where three churches and a monastery were dedicated to him. There were subsequent partial translations of the relics to the West: if *Radegund succeeded in obtaining a finger for the Monastery of the Holy Cross of Poitiers (BHL 7049), the cathedral of Langres, in Champagne, which already possessed an arm of the saint, obtained the head (BHL 5199), which from 1205 has been preserved in what is the most important shrine to Mamas in the West. Other presumed relics are in Cyprus, Milan and Lucca. In Italy the cult of the saint established itself in Tuscany, Emilia-Romagna, Lazio and in the Veneto. Sanctuaries dedicated to him coincide often with the presence of water, and the martyr is invoked, among other reasons, for protection of maternity and nursing. Elsewhere he is considered protector from hail and able to tame the most ferocious animals. There is a copious iconography in both East and West, in which various episodes of his passion recur. Mamas is usually represented as a young man, surrounded by animals.

BHG 1017z-1022; BHG Novum Auctarium 1019-1022; BHL 5192-5199; BHL Novum Supplementum 5191d-5198d; BHO 589-592. AASS Augusti, III, Antverpiae 1737, 423-446; Basil. Hom. 23 (CPG 2868): PG 31, 589-600; Basil of Caesarea, I martiri. Panegirici per Giulitta, Gordio, 40 soldati di Sebaste, Mamante, It. tr. by M. Girardi, Rome 1999 (Collana di Testi Patristici 147), 115-128; Greg. Naz. Hom. 44 (CPG 3010, 44): PG 36, 608-621; Gregorio di Nazianzo, Tutte le orazioni, ed. C. Moreschini, Milan 2000, 1122-1133; H. Delehaye, Passio sancti Mammetis: AB 58 (1940) 126-141; A. Berger, Die alten Viten des heiligen Mamas von Kaisareia. Mit einer Edition der Vita BHG 1019: AB 120 (2002) 241-310; Walafrid Strabo, De vita et fine sancti Mammae monachi: MGH, Poetae Latini Aevi Carolini, II, 259-296, ed. E. Dümmler; Walahfrid Strabo: Zwei Legenden: Blathmac, der Martyrer von Iona (Hy); Mammes, der christliche Orpheus, ed. M. Pörnbacher, Sigmaringen 1997; B. Solinski, Le De uita et fine sancti Mammae monachi de Walahfrid Strabon: texte, traduction et notes: Journal of Medieval Latin 12 (2002) 1-77; M. Pörnbacher, Eine Offiziendichtung zu Ehren des hl. Mammes, Patron von Langres, in einer Handschrift aus Saint-Martial in Limoges (Paris, Bibliothèque nationale, lat. 5351), in Scripturus Vitam. Lateinische Biographie von der Antike bis in die Gegenwart. Festgabe für Walter Berschin zum 65. Geburtstag, ed. D. Walz, Heidelberg 2002, 903-913. A. Hadjinicolaou-Marava, Hò hàgios Màmas, Athens 1953; BS 8, 592-612 (B. Cignitti); G. Bernt, Die Quellen zu Walahfrids Mammes-Leben, in Festschrift Bernhard Bischoff zu seinem 65. Geburtstag dargebracht von Freunden, Kollegen und Schulern, ed. J. Autenrieth - F. Brunhölzl, Stuttgart 1971, 142-152; U. Dronke - P. Dronke, "Barbara et antiquissima carmina," I, Le caractère de la poésie germanique héroïque, II, Waltharius-Gaiferos, Barcelona 1977, 66-79; R.M. Bret, Les saints et les biches: Présence Orthodoxe 43 (1979) 38-43; A. Önnerfors, Die Verfasserschaft des Waltharius-Epos aus sprachlicher Sicht, Opladen 1979, 37-51; R. Schieffer, Zu neuen Thesen über den Waltharius: Deutsches Archiv 36 (1980) 193-201; M.S. Troiano, L'Omelia XXIII in Mamantem Martyrem di Basilio di Cesarea: VetChr 24 (1987) 147-157; M. Brooke, The Prose and Verse Hagiography of Walahfrid Strabo, in Charlemagne's Heir. New Perspectives of the Reign of Louis the Pious (814–840), ed. P. Godman - R. Collins, Oxford 1990, 551-564; M. Girardi, Basilio di Cesarea e il culto dei martiri nel IV secolo. Scrittura e tradizione, Bari 1990, 137-144; W. Berschin, Biographie und Epochenstil im lateinischen Mittelalter. III, Karolingische Biographie 750-920 n. Chr., Stuttgart 1991, 275-279; I. Moreira, Provisatrix Optima: St. Radegunde of Poitiers' Relic Petition to the East: Journal of Medieval History 19 (1993) 285-305; Il grande libro dei santi. Dizionario enciclopedico, II, 1283-1284 (F. Scorza Barcellona).

B. Clausi

MAMBRE VERCANOL, lector. According to tradition, the brother of *Moses of Khorene and one of the first group of *Armenian translators (5th c.) and author of a (now lost) history. It is not certain that the three sermons published under his name (two on the resurrection of Lazarus and one on the entry of Jesus into Jerusalem) belong to the same author. Inglisian (p. 174) puts him in the 7th c.

Bardenhewer V, 208-209; Koriwn Vardapeti, Mambrēi Vercanołi ew Dawt'i Anyałit'i; matenagrowt'iwnk', Venice 1833, 35-93; Mambrīi Vercanołii čark', Venice 1894; S. Weber, Ausgewählte Schriften der armenischen Kirchenväter, II, Munich 1927, 1-27.

S.J. Voicu

MANDEANS and MANDEISM. Mandaje ("gnostics") denominates the members of a religious community formed of small groups currently present in S Iraq and in Iranian Khuzistan, which shows itself to be the bearer of a very ancient tradition, similar to the systems of *gnosticism of the first centuries AD. This tradition is contained in numerous sacred books, written in a Semitic dialect (Aramaic-Eastern group), the origin and antiquity of which is much discussed. Among the most important is the Ginza ("Treasure"), the Book of John or the Book of the Kings, and a collection of hymns and prayers (Quolasta), as well as numerous liturgical texts relating to the principal cultic acts of the community. Among these baptism (masbuta) is primary, celebrated each Sunday in running water. Other important rites are those for the consecration of the priestly group, who guide the faithful as representatives of the heavenly beings, and also the so-called masiqta, a funeral rite which guarantees to the soul the return to the divine world from which it comes.

Mandeism is a religion with a dualistic basis which proposes an opposition between the world of Life, populated by numerous divine beings (Uthra) above which is the supreme Father, variously denominated ("Life," "Great Life," "Father of Greatness"), and the inferior world of the Darkness with its chief the "King of the Darkness" produced by Ruha, the (feminine) Spirit of iniquity.

The creation of the world is the result of a collaboration between certain envoys of the kingdom of Light and the demoniacal entities, a collaboration which culminated in the molding of man, into whom a luminous and divine substance was introduced (the "Interior Adam").

Imprisoned in the material body as in a prison, this substance aspires to be liberated and to return to its original homeland. This is possible by means of the knowledge, transmitted by a heavenly messenger (Manda d-Haijê, the "Knowledge of Life") and the complex of ritual acts prescribed by the community. In relation to the fundamental role of baptism, an important place is given in Mandeism to John the Baptist, called "prophet of the Truth." In fact, the Mandean tradition reveals numerous elements of Jewish and Christian origin, although it also contains strong polemic both against Judaism (Adonai being described as the bad god, and Moses as the prophet of Ruha) and Christianity (Jesus is presented in a very negative light). Ample space is made in the life of the Mandean community for astrological ideas and magical practices, with the use of Amulets, talismans, formulas of exorcism and incantations.

One theory worthy of credence connects the origin of the Mandeans to a Jewish heterodox sect of Baptist character, progressively open to gnostic and Iranian influences, which traveled from Palestine to Mesopotamia around the 2nd c. AD.

L. Tondelli, Il mandeismo e le origini cristiane, Rome 1928; K. Rudolph, Die Mandäer, I-II, Göttingen 1960-61; Id., I Mandei, in Storia delle religioni, ed. G. Castellani, Turin 1971, IV, 749-771; E. Lupieri, I Mandei. Gli ultimi gnostici, Brescia 1993; E.M. Yamauchi, Gnostic Ethics and Mandaean Origins, Piscataway, NJ 2004.

G. Sfameni Gasparro

MANI – MANICHEANS – MANICHEISM.
I. Mani and Manicheism - II. Manichean literature

I. Mani and Manicheism. Mani (or Manes) was born 14 April 216 near *Seleucia-Ctesiphon in Parthia, which had recently fallen under Persian control. At the age of four his parents, Patik (or Pattīg) and Maryam (Miryam) took him to live with the *Elkesaites, a branch of Jewish Christianity, through which Mani could have become acquainted with (in addition to Christianity) some of the *gnostic ideas that are to be found in his system. At the age of 12 he received a revelation from his divine twin or companion (syzygos), who told him of the battle between light and darkness, and bid him leave the Elkesaites. A second revelation at the age of 24 gave him the order to become a messenger of light and salvation. Following this, around 241, Mani undertook a journey which carried him to India and into contact with Buddhism. When *Shapur I (242–273) became king of Persia, Mani returned and presented himself at court to publicly announce his divine mission. The attitude of the king was encouraging (to such an extent that Mani dedicated to him his first writing, the Šābuhragān), and the new revelation was to extend itself over the following 30 years. Other journeys undertaken in this period could have driven Mani W, as far as *Egypt (*Alexander of Lycopolis, Against the Teaching of Mani IV, 20), and he charged his most intimate disciples, Addas (Addai or Adimanto), Thomas and Hermas, to carry out missions.

Shapur died in 273, followed by his successor Hormizd I in 274. The new king, Bahram I (274–276/277), probably under pressure from Zoroastrian believers, had Mani arrested. He died in prison, or was put to death, on 2 March 274 or 26 Feb 277. His death unleashed a wave of persecution against his followers, pushing them into exile both in East and West. In the East the successors of Mani at the head of the religion established their headquarters at Seleucia-Ctesiphon. Manicheism became the religion of state of the Uyghur people in Chinese Turkestan from 762 until ca. 840. From there it spread even further E, to Siberia, Manchuria and China. Moving to the W, Manicheism passed through *Syria and *Cappadocia, reaching *Carthage, *Rome and Egypt toward the end of the 3rd. c. In Roman territory Manicheism soon found opposition from successive governments, starting with *Diocletian (284–305). One reason for hostility toward the movement from the point of view of the civil authorities seemed to have been its origin in Persia, historical enemy of Rome; another was due to the fact that this religion undermined the very foundations of organized societies. There is no evidence of the existence of Manicheism in the West after the 6th c., but some of its ideas survived in "neo-Manichean" groups, such as the *Paulicians, the Bogomils and the Albigensians.

Since Manicheism lasted from the 3rd c. until at least the 17th c. and spread gradually in an area which stretched from Africa to China, it is not easy to separate the central nucleus of its doctrine from regional and chronological variations. Further, its very system of beliefs was extremely complex, and mediated by the use of allegories and symbol. To this may be added the fact that the precise relationship of Manicheism with other religions, and in particular Buddhism, Zoroastrianism and Christianity, has been long discussed. During the 19th c. and until the middle of the 20th c. the opinion was widespread that Manicheism was principally inspired by the Eastern religions. However, through the study of original documents, we now consider Manicheism and Mani himself as inspired more by some form of Christian ideas than from other sources. That said, the Christian elements were underlined to a greater or lesser extent by the teachers of this religion, acc. to the religious traditions of the geographical religion which it sought to convert. However, a nucleus of fundamental beliefs seems to have been shared by Manicheans in every place.

This system of beliefs takes its origin from a crucial question for all organized religions: why does evil exist? The response of Manicheism is a radical dualism. It proposes a cosmogony, or explanation of the world in which we live, on the basis of its origin and destiny, and in three moments or phases: the primordial separation of spirit and matter, of light and darkness, of good and evil; their mixture; and the final return of the two antagonists to their original spheres. In the first phase the two principles coexisted in total separation one from the other. One, completely good, manifested only positive qualities (peace, intelligence and so on) and dwelled in the kingdom of light, which is constituted by the substance of this principle. This principle is the God "with four faces," the Father of Greatness and Light. The other principle, the Prince of Darkness, is intrinsically evil and negative. Frequently called simply "matter" (in the Iranian sources Āz, lust or greed), this principle lives in the kingdom of his dark substance. Each kingdom is constituted by five trees or elements. In the kingdom of good these are the gentle breeze, the wind which refreshes, the bright light, the living fire and the clear water. The elements of the kingdom of darkness are the stifling smoke, the devastating fire, the destructive fire, the turbulent water and the obscurity of the abyss. On three sides the two kingdoms extend to infinity, but on their fourth side they touch each other.

The second (or middle) phase refers to the present condition of all things. It begins when, during the turbulence which is eternally present in the kingdom of darkness, the principle of evil rises to the boundary of darkness with light. Seeing the light, the principle of darkness desires it and invades it. In its defense the principle of good brings to birth a certain number of *Aeons, composed of the substance of light of the principle of good: the Mother of Life, the Great Spirit, and Primordial Man, with his five sons. After a long battle the principle of evil defeats the Primordial Man and seizes his light, although some of the powers of the principle of evil (demons, both masculine and feminine) are in their turn seized by the powers of the kingdom of light. This is the moment in which light and darkness, good and evil, come to be mixed together for the first time. At this point the principle of good sends other beings—the Friend of the Lights, the Great Architect, and the Living Spirit—to liberate the Primordial Man and to construct the material world with parts of the captured demons. They are successful in this operation, but some particles of light remain mixed with the darkness. Our present visible world, therefore, is constituted by this mixture of elements of light and darkness, so that everything we find pleasant in it is attributable to the presence of the imprisoned light, while all that is unpleasant is owing to the darkness, which is the prison of the light.

To the end of providing a way of liberating this imprisoned light, the principle of good takes two steps. In the first place the Father of Greatness creates a mechanism for freeing the light. This comprises the sun and the moon, considered as composed of the substance of uncontaminated light and having the function of being collectors of light which has been liberated. The two stars then send this light back via the zodiac, represented by a great windmill with twelve blades, to the kingdom of light. Material creation is therefore an act dictated by necessity, a means used by the substance of light to regain that which it has lost.

The second step consists in sending the "Third Messenger" to the captured demons in the cosmic battle and to tempt them to release the particles of light which they had seized. The "Third Messenger" achieves this by presenting himself to each of them under the aspect of a desirable individual of the opposite sex. The light thus freed is sent to the sun and the moon, and then to the kingdom of light through the Column of Glory, "the Milky Way." The particles of the substance of darkness which escape from the demons are left to fall into the visible world.

Seeing these developments and their purpose, the principle of evil counterattacks, creating a rival to the Primordial Man. This outcome is achieved by making a male demon and a female demon devour the light fallen to the earth, and then making them copulate. Their union produces Adam, the first terrestrial man. Adam is a world in miniature, a *microcosm, because he contains in himself both light (the soul) and matter (the body). Then the demons unite again and produce Eve, the first woman. She is similar in composition to Adam, although she seems to contain less light than him. The first human couple, therefore, far from being a creation of God, is the result of a malicious initiative, and has the purpose of keeping as much light as is possible trapped in the material world, esp. through the generation of children.

To counter this new tactic of the kingdom of darkness, a "Jesus" is sent by the kingdom of light to reveal to Adam and Eve the knowledge (gnosis) of how to attain salvation. But the definitive revelation of how humanity can be saved has to come from Mani, who was convinced that the revelations of the founders of previous religions, esp. Buddha, Zoroaster and Jesus, although authentic, were incomplete; and that therefore it was his mission to bring to the world the fullness of revelation, by means of what he called the "Religion of Light." This is the reason for which the followers of Mani made reference to him as the one in whom resided the Paraclete.

Mani habitually called himself "the apostle of Jesus Christ." But in Manicheism the figure of Jesus does not at all have the centrality which he does in orthodox Christianity, because Manicheism includes numerous entities called "Jesus" or "Christ." *Augustine of Hippo makes reference to at least three (Contra Faustum XX, 11): Jesus the Splendor, identified with the liberated light and deposited on the moon and on the sun (which were therefore objects of devotion); the suffering Jesus, who in effect consists in the light imprisoned in our material world on the "cross of Light"; Jesus the "Son of God," who has come on the earth in human appearance and who appears to have suffered and died by the hand of Pilate. None of these Christs is in reality a savior, as they are all simply bearers of salvific knowledge. On the contrary, the Jesus of orthodox Christianity was considered false, and seen as a devil in disguise. This was the Jesus who was truly nailed to the cross, since he had a material body—something unthinkable for a being sent from the kingdom of light to accomplish a mission of salvation. Since human flesh has a malign origin, and is formed through procreation (an act which emulates the demonic conception of Adam and Eve), the "true Jesus" of Manicheism cannot be born of Mary, nor can he, in fact, be born at all.

In the Manichean vision, every living being on the earth is a microcosm of the primordial battle, as each contains both matter and the substance of light. This is true above all for human beings, who are all called to avoid as far as possible the consequences of this mixed condition. Yet it is not simply a question of avoiding the mixture: the liberation of the light from matter had to continue in this world by the action of those who had responded to the divine call. Manicheans were those who had heard this call clearly and knew how to respond to it. The full members of Manicheism were the elect (perfect, or saints), with a hierarchy of 12 apostles or teachers (such as Adimanto), 72 bishops (such as Faustus) and 260 priests (such as Fortunatus). Some E Manichean documents mention other titles such as cantors and scribes, but these may have designated functions limited to the cult, or concerning the organization of the life of the community. The other principal group in Manicheism was that constituted by the hearers (catechumens). This group included both women and men; however, it seems that only men could accede to the higher grades of the hierarchy. Above all the others was the archēgos, the successor of Mani.

The elect were the primary instrument by which the liberation of light from its material prison was effected. This was their most sacred duty, which was realized by digestion: in fact, one of the ironies of the system was in the fact that, although human bodies were considered to be of diabolic origin and were designed to facilitate the imprisonment of light in matter, some of them were in fact the direct instrument of salvation, i.e., the liberation of the light. Since the Manicheans thought that this light was present in all living beings to different degrees, the diet prescribed for the elect consisted esp. in certain cereals, vegetables and fruits, as also certain spices and juices, all identified by their bright color as containing most light. (Augustine mentions some of these foods in the De Moribus Manichaeorum, 13,29-16,53 and Contra Faustum V, 10.) Therefore, in Manicheism the elect were, in intent and in the end pursued, the true saviors. This is the reason why a rigorous asceticism was asked of them, since they, more than all the other members of the human race, had to be involved in matter to the least extent possible, while they performed their task of freeing as much light as they could. The ascetic codex which the elect had to follow consisted in three "seals" and five "commandments." The "seal of the mouth" obliged them to vigilance over their own senses. The "seal of the hands" imposed vigilance over their actions and prohibited the killing of any living being, including vegetables killed by scything to obtain food. The "seal of the heart" meant not thinking of anything out of harmony with the kingdom of light and with the process of the liberation of light. The commandments prohibited ownership, lying, killing, illicit foods (such as meat), and they imposed purity (above all from sexual relations). The elect had to dedicate themselves to frequent prayer (seven times a day) and to the keeping of a more severe fast for about a quarter of the days of the year.

Since they could not have family links or possess anything, it was implicit that the elect (at least in the Western forms of Manicheism) moved constantly from one place to another. Moreover, as they were not able to kill any living being (including vegetables), nor gather their own food, others had to do this for them. This task fell to the hearers and constituted their principal religious duty. The hearers were subjected to a less exacting code of behavior. They had to avoid lying, homicide, stealing, adultery and neglect of their primary religious duties; however, they were able to do manual work, own property and "kill," i.e., harvest and prepare food, which they offered to the elect. Their diet was less severe. They had to observe fewer days of fast (fifty in total, probably Sundays) and dedicate themselves less frequently to prayer (four times a day). They could also marry (although also in their case procreation was not encouraged).

We possess many Manichean liturgical texts (psalms, prayers and readings) but little information on how the liturgies were carried out. We know that the Manicheans did not accept baptism in water, but practiced frequent penitential rites, probably every Monday, the holy day of the week. During the Monday service the hearers and the elect gathered in different groups. The principal liturgical feast of the Manicheans was the Bema, observed on the day of the death of Mani. It seems that this celebration had as its center a throne or high platform (bēma in Greek), which bore the portrait of Mani, and had five steps which led up to this (reflecting here the importance which this number in general had in the Manichean religion). On this occasion the Living Gospel was read. According to a Manichean source in Coptic (the ninth Kephalaion), the feast of the Bema was also the occasion to nominate new members of the elect and hearers in the community. The ceremony of initiation of the elect consisted of five steps: a sign of peace was given to the candidate, who clasped the right hand of each member of the elect present. Then he who presided over the ceremony led the candidate to the center of the ceremonial space (ekklēsia), which represented the universal Manichean church. There the candidate exchanged a kiss with each of the elect and offered them a sign of veneration. At the end there was the imposition of the right hand of the one who presided on the head of the candidate, the act which officially numbered the candidate among the elect. Essentially, the same rite was used to admit one of the elect to a higher grade of the hierarchy. We do not have any information about the rite of admission to the hearers.

According to the same source in the Coptic language, the importance given to the right hand had the purpose of recalling elements of the cosmological myth: before the Primordial Man went to battle, the Mother of the Living placed her right hand on him, then grasped his hand with hers. The Living Spirit does the same after the rescue and return of the Primordial Man. The scope of the rite was therefore eschatological: it signified both the sending of the member of the elect to discharge the duty of freeing the light, and his welcome in the kingdom of light after death. Although this description of the rite and its interpretation derive from a single source, there is no reason to think that this form of rite did not conform to the practice of Manicheans in other places and periods.

At death the elect were destined to have their substance of light begin its journey back to the kingdom of light; the destiny of the hearers was to be reincarnate as elect, and thus become eligible for salvation. After a conflagration lasting 1,468 years, as much light as possible would be liberated. All material bodies, along with the light imprisoned in non-Manicheans, was, however, destined to remain buried forever.

The third and last cosmological phase regarded the return to the order of the first phase. This was to happen when as much light as possible had been liberated from matter through the action of the elect. At that future time a great fire would erupt to complete the work of purification. Then the universe would disappear, the principle of evil and all the dark substance would be constrained to return to the reign of darkness, and would be newly and totally separated from the kingdom of light. But the reconstituted order would not be exactly that which it was at the beginning, since part of the light would be permanently imprisoned in the reign of darkness.

II. Manichean literature. One of the reasons Mani invoked to demonstrate his right to be a revealer was that he was the first founder of a religion to have left writings from his own hand. Various sources attribute to him seven works: the Shabuhragan; The Great (or Living) Gospel; the Book of Giants; The Treasure of Life (or of the Living); Pragmateia (or Treatise), perhaps the same writing known as the Great Letter to Pattīg); The Book of the Mysteries (or Secrets); and the Letters. These works formed the Manichean protocanon, although probably not all regions had access to all seven writings (e.g., it seems that Roman Africa knew only five). Attributed to Mani is also a book of pictures (Ertank or Pictures) to explain his doctrine to the illiterate. None of these works has survived in integral form, although we do have extracts from some of them. The works of the immediate successors of Mani could have constituted a deuterocanon: some of these were collections of Psalms and the Kephalaia.

Until the beginning of the 20th c. the knowledge of Manicheism was derived exclusively from evidence given by its opponents. The first to launch an attack against Manichean doctrines in a literary work was a pagan philosopher from Egypt, *Alexander of Lycopolis. Not long after this, orthodox Christians too voiced opposition to the writings, doctrines and beliefs of the Manicheans. Among these opponents we should number *Ephrem (the deacon) of *Nisibis in Syria, the author (perhaps called *Hegemonius) of the Acts of Archelaus, *Serapion of Thmuis (in Egypt), *Titus of Bostra (in Syria), *Epiphanius of Salamis (in Cyprus) and *Augustine of Hippo (in Africa). All these lived in the 4th c. and at the start of the 5th c. Other writers would engage in controversy with the Manicheans in subsequent centuries, in particular the Syrians *Severus of Antioch (6th c.) and *Theodore bar Koni (8th c.); the Arabs Wadih al-Ya'qubi (9th c.), an-Nadim (10th c.), al-Beruni (11th c.) and al-Sharastani (12th c.); the Shkand-vimānīk Vishār of the Persian Martan Farrux I Ohrmazddatan (9th c.); and the histories of the Chinese Buddhists Tsung-chien and Chih-p'an (12th c.). But we do not any longer have to base ourselves only on testimony of the polemicists. Today we have the good fortune to possess original documents of the Manicheans thanks to a number of discoveries made from 1904 onward in Turfan, in NW China. There have been other discoveries in Algeria in 1918, and in Egypt from the 1930s up to the present day.

Since it considered matter as synonymous with evil, and saw material creation as dictated more by necessity than by love, Manicheism repudiated the presentation of creation in Genesis, together with its creator (identified with the principle of evil). Manicheism in fact came to reject the OT itself, as it did everything which it considered "Jewish interpolations" in the NT. The proof of the malign origin of the rejected Scriptures was their content, because they presented a God who was subject to anger, jealousy, to the emotion of revenge, and they encouraged acts of immorality, such as the killing of enemies, polygamy and procreation. Nonetheless, the Manicheans attributed a revelatory character (albeit imperfect) to that which remained of the NT after its "decontamination." They felt a special affinity for the ideas of Paul, and were surely partly responsible for the rebirth in interest in the Pauline literature in the 4th c. Manicheism also made use of certain of the apocryphal works of the NT, such as the Gospel of Thomas and the Acts of John; and they reworked some of them for their own purposes.

G.B. Mikkelsen, Bibliographia Manichaica: A Comprehensive Bibliography of Manichaeism Through 1996, Corpus Fontium Manichaeorum, Subsidia, 1, Turnhout 1997, contains quite a complete list of the studies on Manicheism, for which reason we cite only those published after the work of Mikkelsen: P. Mirecki - J. BeDuhn (eds.), Emerging from Darkness: Studies in the Recovery of Manichaean Sources, Nag Hammadi and Manichaean Studies 43, Leiden 1997; S.N.C. Lieu, Manichaeism in Central Asia and China, Nag Hammadi and Manichaean Studies 45, Leiden 1998; S.G. Richter, Die Herakleides-Psalmen, Corpus Fontium Manichaeorum, Series Coptica I: Liber Psalmorum, Pars II, fasc. 2, Turnhout 1998; S. Clackson - E. Hunter - S.N.C, Lieu, eds., Dictionary of Manichaean Texts, 1, Turnhout 1998; W.-P. Funk, Kephalaia I, Zweite Hälfte, Stuttgart 1999–; J. BeDuhn, The Manichaean Body in Discipline and Ritual, Baltimore 2000; A. Magris, Il manicheismo, Antologia di testi, Brescia 2000; Z. Gulacsi, Manichaean Art in Berlin Collections, Corpus Fontium Manichaeorum, Series Archaeologica et Iconographica 1, Turnhout 2001; J. van Oort - O. Wermelinger - G. Wurst (eds.), Augustine and Manichaeism in the Latin West, Nag Hammadi and Manichaean Studies 49, Leiden 2001; Il manicheismo, I, Mani e il manicheismo, ed. G. Gnoli, Milan 2003; D. Durkin-Meisterernst, Dictionary of Manichaean Texts, III, Turnhout 2004; Alexander of Lycopolis, Contro i manichei, Genoa 2005.

J.K. Coyle

MANNA. The episode of the manna (Ex 16:14-35), sent by God to satisfy the Hebrews in the desert, and therefore a symbol of the saving action of the Lord, received little attention in paleo-Christian art. We know of two examples of cemeterial art. One is in the Roman catacomb of Cyriacus, from the end of the 4th c. (Wp 242,2), where two men and two women are pictured gathering the manna which descends from heaven in the hollow of their paenula. The other scene is to be found on the ceiling of a niche in the catacomb of the Jordani. In this case, however, the manna is not gathered in the hollow of clothing, but in a container thought to be a gomor, a measure of slightly less than 4 liters, which was a person's daily portion. The descent of the manna in the fresco, which dates from the 2nd half of the 4th c., is visible behind the man who gathers it. On the left side of a Gallican sarcophagus (Ws 97,2-3-7), decorated on all four sides with mosaic scenes, along with a column of fire and a star is distinguishable manna, and also quails which take on the same soteriological significance as the manna. The scene is also depicted in the wooden doors of St. Sabina in Rome (ca. 430).

DACL 10, 1416-1423; EC 7, 1973; LCI 2, 150-153; Volbach-Hirmer, 78, pl. 103; U.M. Fasola, Le recenti scoperte nelle catacombe sotto Villa Savoia. Il "coemeterium Iordanorum" ad S. Alexandrum, Actas VIII CongrIntArquCrist, Vatican City-Barcelona 1972, 273, pl. III, 10; G. Jeremias, Die Holztür der Basilika S. Sabina in Rom, Tübingen 1980, 34-35, pl. 30-32a.

A.M. Di Nino

MANSUETUS of Milan (7th c.). Fortieth bishop of *Milan, in 679 he held a provincial council on the *monothelite question and, in the name of the bishops present, sent a synodal letter to Constantine IV Pogonatos against monothelitism (the exposition fidei of the Milanese council is in PL 87, 1265-1267). The date of his death is uncertain. His cult dates from after the 13th c.

CPL 1170-1171; PL 87, 1261-1265; BS 8, 632; F. Savio, Gli antichi vescovi d'Italia dalle origini al 1300 descritti per regioni: La Lombardia, I, Milano, Florence 1913, 284-286.

S. Zincone

MANUMISSION into the CHURCH. A means of leaving slavery. The slave was liberated by the power (manus) of the master (dominus), with the concession of liberty (datio libertatis: Di. 1,1,4), and joined the category of freedmen. During the empire the libertus became sui iuris and civis (up to the 2nd c. it was not so). The freedman contracted obligations with his master, among which was assuming his name and respect, but also economic obligations acc. to the contractual conditions. Manumission took various forms (manumissio inter amicos, in convivio, fideicommisaria etc.). *Constantine introduced a new one: manumissio in ecclesia. *Sozomen, writing at the time of *Theodosius II, affirms that Constantine issued three laws on manumission in the church (HE 1,9,6). Of the three laws the CTh reports only one (CTh 4,7,1), of 321; a second is preserved in CI (1,13,1), both addressed to bishops (*Protegenes of Serdica and *Ossius of Cordoba); we do not have the first law, however; the two which have been preserved are only imperial rescripts in response to specific requests for clarification of a previous constitution. Bishop Protegenes, on the one hand, directly or indirectly, had addressed himself to the emperor (even if he was not at Serdica, because in the subscriptio the place of promulgation of the law is not indicated) to ask for clarifications. Ossius, on the other hand, having close relations with the emperor as his counselor in Christian affairs, could have himself advanced the suggestio, which then became an imperial response.

With this law (CI 1,13,1) Constantine established that it was possible to grant liberty to slaves in the church under the eyes of the community and in the presence of the bishop. The conditions for the validity were as follows: the presence of the people and of the bishop, and the signature of the dominus, a document signed by the bishop. This legislation had a social character, and we see its effects when persons of immense wealth dedicated themselves to an ascetic life toward the end of the century, e.g., *Melania. Manumission occurred during a liturgical function, i.e., on festal days. The law CTh 4,7,1 of 321 directed to Bishop Ossius of Cordoba, the ecclesiastical counselor to Constantine, added other concessions (amplius concedimus) to those above: all clerics were able to grant manumission to their slaves, not only in the way established in the preceding laws but also etiam cum postremo iudicio, before death, without requiring a precise formula and without witnesses. Liberty was obtained at the moment that the wish of who granted the manumission was publicly known. In any case this is properly a manumissio extra ecclesiam. This last law is the only reported by CTh in that it includes also CI 1,13,1. *Augustine (sermo 21,-7) describes how manumission occurs: "You bring your slave to the church for manumission. All are silent. Your attestation is read or your wish is declared. You declare your manumission of your slave as he has in all things been faithful to you. If your slave, to whom you have granted manumission, does not remain faithful to you and does not show himself worthy of your manumission by remaining faithful, you catch him with some fraud in your house, how did you cry out?" Augustine invites clerics to grant manumission to their own slaves. The rite of manumission was refined over time. The practice of manumission in the church was not introduced in all the Roman provinces simultaneously, but at different times. In *Africa manumission was introduced only after 401, since the bishops gathered together at *Carthage in June and September of 401, among which was Augustine, were preoccupied to know the practice of the Italian churches, if the bishops applied manumission, and to ask the emperor for a law for it (can. 62, Munier, CCL 149, 168; cf. can. 82).

S. Calderone, Costantino e il cattolicesimo, Florence 1962; F. Fabbrini, La Manumissio in Ecclesia, Milan 1965; S. Calderone, Intorno alla manumissio in ecclesia, in Studi in onore di G. Grosso, IV, Turin 1970, 377-397; M.A. Levi, La cittadinanza dei liberti: Atti dell'Acc. Romanistica Costant. 4 (1981) 501-507; W. Waldstein, Schiavitù e cristianesimo da Costantino a Teodosio II: Atti dell'Acc. Romanistica Costant. 8 (1990) 123-145; J.A. Harrill, The Manumission of Slaves in Early Christianity, Tübingen 1995; H. Grieser, Sklaven im spätantiken und frühmittelalterlichen Gallien (5.-7. Jh.), Stuttgart 1997.

A. Di Berardino

MANUSCRIPT TRADITION. No work of the patristic period has comes down to us in the form of the original, i.e., a document copied or revised by the author. Between the original and us, the text has been transmitted through successive copies, citations of other authors, adaptations or translations. Reconstructing the various phases of this process of transmission, inserting them in the most general historical context, is to write the history of the text. The principal channel of transmission is constituted by the body of MS copies of the text itself, or direct MS tradition. The study of the MS tradition is intended to reconstruct, on the basis of the copies which have been preserved, a text which is as close as possible to the original; this involves a series of techniques elaborated and perfected in the course of nearly two centuries of theoretical discussion and practical applications. The recensio, gathering together all the sources, reconstructs the reciprocal relationship of dependence; to do this, the material evidence of dependence or nondependence is used (age of the copies, mutilations, misplaced pages), and also errors (modifications of the original text) which have been progressively introduced into the text as it becomes more distant from the original. There is also an attempt to establish a genealogical tree of copies (stemma codicum); logical rules allow the elimination of sources which are without value, arriving gradually to a text which is the closest possible to the original. In the terms of the recensio one does not usually arrive at a perfect construction of the text of the author; critical evaluation is then introduced (emandatio in the broad sense): on the basis of the context, of language and of the style of the author, a choice is made from the variants which the recension has not indicated should be eliminated, and one tries, by conjecture, to improve the text where one supposes that it is still defective. Classical stemmatic rules are difficult to apply where the copies are great in number, when many of these have been prepared or corrected, often repeatedly, on the basis of more than one original (contaminatio), i.e., when the author has published several editions of his work or when the copyists have liberally reworked the text to the point of creating several recensions of it. In fact, all these cases are encountered frequently for texts in the patristic era. Huge numbers of biblical MSS require appropriate analysis, all the more because contamination seriously complicates matters; in such cases, real progress is to be expected using computerized processing and related methods. We know, or have good reason to believe, that authors such as *Augustine of Hippo, *Athanasius of Alexandria and *Gregory of Nyssa put into circulation improved versions of a text which had already been published. Hagiographical texts, esp. when not supported by the authority of a great name, were adapted to the taste of the moment. Dogmatic tracts were often subjected, by different parties, to tendentious modifications: works not in perfect conformity with official doctrine were deliberately suppressed or, if they had been sufficiently copied, were lost (this is the case of numerous ante-Nicene authors); others, finally, were preserved in forms more or less modified (e.g., Irenaeus and a large part of the work of Origen). In brief, acc. to the case, editors find themselves faced with questions of various types: they try to resolve these by reconstructing, in the most detailed manner possible, the different phases of the history of the text which they study. The MSS are grouped acc. to their origin and inserted into the cultural context in which they were produced: this allows one to take account of certain textual particularities, to explain their genesis and to appreciate their value. The history of doctrines, language and literary styles brings to light recasting and the existence of recensions, and permits these to be contextualized in concrete circumstances. In the case of the Greek authors, the study of ancient versions, esp. Syriac, permits one to arrive at an earlier tradition than direct witnesses allow. A history of the text thus understood, at the same time both detailed and concrete, can make an important contribution to the history of a culture, of varying milieus and of different mentalities.

On the questions of method, two classics: P. Maas, Textkritik, Leipzig [4]1960 (It. tr. Florence [3]1972); G. Pasquali, Storia della tradizione e critica del testo, Florence [2]1952 (repr. Milan 1988); more recent contributions are cited by S. Timpanaro, The Genesis of Lachmann's Method, Eng. tr., Chicago 2005; description of methods which use computerized processing: J. Duplacy, Classification des états d'un texte. Mathématique et informatique: repères historiques et recherches méthodologiques: RHT 5 (1975) 249-309. Panoramic view and reflections on the characteristics of the transmission of the patristic texts: H.G. Beck, Zur Überlieferung der griechischen Patristik: Geschichte der Textüberlieferung der antiken und mittelalterlichen Literatur, I, Zürich 1961, 494-510; T.C. Skeat, La produzione libraria Cristiana dalle origini: papiri e manoscritti, Florence 1976; Centenaire J.P. Migne (1875-1975). Table ronde international sur l'édition patristique. Rétrospective et prospectives: SE 22 (1974-75) 12-111; D. Harlfinger (ed.), Griechische Kodikologie und Textüberlieferung, Darmstadt 1980; G. Cavallo (ed.), Libri e lettori nel mondo bizantino. Guida storica e critica, Rome-Bari 1982; A.G. Hamman, L'épopée du livre: la transmission des textes anciens, du scribe à l'imprimerie, Paris 1985; N.G. Wilson, Le biblioteche del mondo bizantino, in Le biblioteche nel mondo antico e medievale, ed. G. Cavallo, Rome-Bari [2]1989, 79-112; H.Y. Gamble, Books and Readers in the Early Church: A History of Early Christian Texts, New Haven-London 1995; J.-C. Fredouille et al. (eds.), Titres et articulations du texte dans les œuvres antiques, Paris 1997, 581-589; F. Troncarelli, Vivarium: i libri, il destino, Steenbrugis-Turnhout 1998.

P. Canart

MAPINIUS of Reims (6th c.). Bishop of *Reims from 535 to 549, he was represented at the Fifth Council of Orléans of 549 by the archdeacon Protadius (Mansi IX, 138). Only two letters of his have come down to us (Ep. Austrasicae 11 and 15), one addressed to *Nicetius of Trier, in which he apologizes for being unable to participate in the Council of Toul of 550, giving us also information about that council, and the other to Vilicus of Metz, in which Mapinius commemorates the seventieth birthday of his correspondent.

CPL 1062; PL 68, 43-46; 71, 1165-1166; W. Gundlach ed., MGH, Epp. III, Berlin 1892, 126-127, 129; repr. in CCL 117, Turnhout 1957, 429-430, 433-434; N. Gauthier, L'évangélisation des pays de la Moselle, Paris 1980, 179, 210-211, 218, 250; Patrologia IV, 303.

P. Marone

MAR MARI, Acts of. *Syriac apocryphal work in 34 chapters; it recounts the missionary activity of the apostle Mar Mari, companion of the apostles and one of the great evangelizers. The Acts begin with a description of the monument of Christ at Banias; it follows a reworking of the story of *Abgar and of the apostolate of *Addai, who nominates Mar Mari as his successor. The following chapters recount the story of the apostolate of Mar Mari and the miracles he worked during the voyage from *Edessa to *Mesopotamia and *Persia. Before his death Mar Mari named Papa as his successor; this section provides a revision of the beginning of the Christianization of these countries acc. to the perspectives of the 6th–7th c., during which the text was written. The historical value of the work remains an open question.

Editions: J.B. Abbeloos: AB 4 (1885) 42-138 (with Lat. tr.); P. Bedjan, Acta martyrum et sanctorum syriace, 1, Paris-Leipzig 1890, 45-94; Fr. tr., Ch. e F. Jullien, Les Actes de Mar Mari, Turnhout 2001 (intro., tr. and comm.); Ch. and F. Jullien, Les 'Actes de Mar Mari': une figure apocryphe au service communautaire: Apocrypha 10 (1999) 177-194; Id., Apôtres des confins, Bures-sur-Yvette 2002, 77-78.

M. Starowieyski

MARA BAR SERAPION, Letter of. Mara, son of Serapion, a *Syriac learned man who had received a Greek education, esp. in philosophy, wrote a letter to his son, a student, after the conquest of Samosata by the Romans (AD 73). Here, Mara takes up the topic of the wise man persecuted by evildoers who are subsequently punished by God, and offers three examples: two Greek philosophers, Socrates and Pythagoras, and "the wise king of the Jews," who was killed by them, but who "is not dead, thanks to the new laws promulgated by him." As for his killers (with the same generalization applied to the Athenians who killed Socrates), they were deprived of their reign and dispersed everywhere. This certainly is a reference to Jesus and to the destruction of Jerusalem in AD 70. Although a late dating has been proposed (McVey), and it has also been suggested that this letter is a mere rhetorical exercise that has nothing to do with Mara (Chin), on the basis of both historical and philosophical points I have argued that it was in fact composed by Mara toward the end of the first century AD and that it is replete with *Stoic motifs, especially typical of Roman Stoicism. Both Tieleman and Rensberger now agree on its Stoicism, its authenticity and its early date. Thus, this is very likely to be one of the very first pagan references to Jesus, probably even earlier than Tacitus. It is roughly contemporary with Josephus, whose Testimonium describes Jesus in the very same way, as a "wise man" (σοφὸς ἀνήρ) who was put to death by the leaders of his people, but who still lives in those who love him and saw him after his resurrection.

I. Ramelli, Gesù tra i sapienti greci perseguitati ingiustamente in un antico documento filosofico pagano di lingua siriaca, RFN 97 (2005) 545-70 (with review by S. Zurlo, E da una lettera del 73 d.C. spunta il Salvatore, Giornale 27.III.2005, 16-17); K.E. McVey, A Fresh Look at the Letter of Mara bar Serapion to His Son, in V Symposium Syriacum Leuven 1988, ed. R. Lavenant, Rome 1990, OCA 236, 257-72; C. Chin, Rhetorical Practice in the Chreia Elaboration of Mara bar Serapion, Hugoye 9.2 (2006) 145-171; A. Merz – T. Tieleman, The Letter of Mara bar Serapion: Some Comments on Its Philosophical and Historical Context, in Empsychoi Logoi. Religious Innovations in Antiquity. Studies in Honour of Pieter Willem van der Horst, ed. A. Houtman – A. de Jong – M.W. Misset-van de Weg, Leiden 2008, 107-133; I. Ramelli, Stoicismo romano minore, Milan 2008, with critical essay, tr., comm. and biblio.; D. Rensberger, Awakening Sleeping Texts: Reconsidering the Letter of Mara bar Serapion, in Aramaic in Postbiblical Judaism and Early Christianity, ed. P.V.M. Flesher – E.M. Meyers, Duke Judaic Studies Monograph Series 3, Winona Lake, IN 2010.

I. Ramelli

MARANATHA. An Aramaic term found in 1 Cor 16:22, and then again in the liturgical prayer that concludes the thanksgiving in the Didache (10:6), in two inscriptions (one Greek of the 4th–5th c. and one Latin of 7th–8th c.) and in can. 75 of the 4th Council of Toledo of 633. Modern critics interpret it either in the declarative sense "Our Lord has come / comes" (with past reference, to the incarnation; in the present, esp. to the liturgical context) or in the imperative sense "Our Lord, come" (the invocation of Rev. 22:20 seems be the Greek version). The difference lies in different ways of dividing the word: Maran atha or Marana tha. The Greek Fathers always translated it in the past tense, "Our Lord has come," from *John Chrysostom (In Ep. I ad Cor. hom. XLIV), who finds in it a confirmation of the kerygma of the resurrection, to other commentators on the Pauline epistle: *Theodoret of Cyrrhus, who states that it is not a Hebraic but a Syriac word (PG 82, 373), *John of Damascus (PG 95, 705), Theophylact (PG 124, 793). Among the Latins it is *Ambrosiaster who gives it to mean the same as venit understood in the past tense (In 1 Cor. 16,22). *Jerome calls it a "Syrian word" (De om. hebr.). The eschatological significance of the imperative meaning may be based on the analogous expression ("until he comes") of 1 Cor 11:26: an invocation of the parousia of Christ in the context of the Lord's Supper.

K.G. Kun, see entry Maranatha: GLNT 6, 1249-1266 TDNT 4, 466-472); C.F.D. Moule, A Reconsideration of The Context of Maranatha: NTS 6 (1960) 307-310; U.B. Muller, Prophetie und Predigt im Neuen Testament, Gütersloh 1975, 201-211.

F. Cocchini

MARATHONIUS of Nicomedia (4th c). A deacon of *Constantinople, active in promoting the monastic life, he was ordained bishop of *Nicomedia by Macedonius in ca. 342. He was, as was Macedonius, a promoter of thehomoiousion, and it is thought that, as such, he was deposed from his episcopal seat after the Council of Constantinople of 360. He continued to collaborate actively with Macedonius in the promotion of the doctrine opposed to the divinity of the *Holy Spirit, so that its supporters were sometime called Marathonians, as well as *Macedonians.

DCB 3, 803; R.P.C. Hanson, The Search for the Christian Doctrine of God: The Arian Controversy, 318-381, Edinburgh 1988, 761-762; H.C. Brennecke, Studien zur Geschichte der Homöer: der Osten bis zum Ende der homöischen Reichskirche, Tübingen 1988, 64 n. 37; 192, n. 85.

M. Simonetti

MARCELLA (mid 4th c.–early 5th c.). Roman matron, of the Marcelli family, Marcella lived from the middle of the 4th c. to the beginning of the 5th, and was linked to the milieu and form of Christian life which derived from St. *Jerome. From Jerome, who deals with her in numerous letters (23-29, 32, 34, 37-44, 46, 97, 127), and who honors her with a moving eulogy in Ep. 127, written two years after Marcella's death owing to a tristitia incredibilis which had taken hold of him, we know details of her life. Orphaned by her father at a young age and widowed after six months of marriage, Marcella with courteous firmness declined the offer of a new marriage with the consul Cerealis (358), notwithstanding the exhortations of her mother, *Albina. An acquaintance, in her youth, with *Athanasius, who was in exile in *Rome (340), through him she learned about *Anthony, the father of Egyptian monasticism, the monasteries of the *Thebaid, and *Pachomius and the way of life of virgins and widows who undertook to "be pleasing to Christ." Later (373) the presence in Rome of *Peter of Alexandria influenced Marcella to such an extent that, first among the Roman noblewomen, she made her propositum monachorum, living thus in her palace on the Aventine with her mother, Albina, and with other Roman noblewomen, including Asella, Principia, Marcellina, Lea and Sophronia. When Jerome came to Rome, Marcella had him as master and spiritual guide of her monastic group (382). She not only showed herself Jerome's diligent disciple (so much so that when absent from Rome Jerome addressed himself to her to resolve scriptural "disputes"), but was also acknowledged by him to be the cause of the resolution, in Jerome's favor, of the *Origenist question. The personality of Marcella—strong, free and balanced, amid her asceticism—as well as her marked competence in scriptural studies made of her monastery on the Aventine a center of intense monastic life which Marcella would not abandon, not even when she was invited by *Paula, *Eustochium and Jerome himself to move to Bethlehem

(Ep. 46 of 392/393). Only toward the end of the 4th c. did she move to the environs of Rome with Principia (the addressee of Jerome's Ep. 127). The sack of Rome by the *Visigoths of *Alaric saw Marcella again on the Aventine subjected to harsh tortures by the barbarians, while she succeeded in securing the safety of Principia. Led by the *Goths to the tomb of Paul, she died there some days later.

DCB 3, 803; DACL 10, 1760-1762; BS 8, 644-645; PCBE 2, 1357-1362; L. Pauthe, Histoire de Ste Marcelle, Paris 21884; Ch. Favez, Trois disciples: Marcella, Fabiola. Paula: Études des lettres 12 (1938) 218-232; A. Penna, S. Girolamo, Turin 1949, 74-85; L. Gutierrez, St. Jerome and Roman Monasticism: A Historical Study on His Spiritual Influence: Philippiniana sacra 10 (1975) 256-307; LTK 6, 1299; P. Nautin, La lettre de Paule et Eustochium à Marcelle (Jérôme, Ep. 46): Augustinianum 24 (1984) 441-449; St. Rebenich, Hieronymus und sein Kreis: prosopographische und sozialgeschichtliche Untersuchungen, Stuttgart 1992; Ch. Krumeich, Hieronymus und die Christlichen feminae clarissimae, Bonn 1993; G. Clark, Women in Late Antiquity: Pagan and Christian Lifestyles, Oxford 1994; S. Wittern, Frauen, Heiligkeit und Macht: lateinische Frauenviten aus dem 4. bis 7. Jh., Stuttgart 1994; G. Jenal, Italia ascetica atque monastica. Das Asketen- und Mönchtum in Italien von den Anfängen bis zur Zeit der Langobarden (ca. 150/250–604), Stuttgart 1995; B. Feichtinger, Apostolae Apostolorum. Frauenaskese als Befreiung und Zwang bei Hieronymus, Frankfurt a.M. 1995; A. Caruso, Marcella dell'Aventino e il suo tempo, Rome 1995; P. Laurence, Marcella, Jérôme et Origène: REAug 42,2 (1996) 267-293; M. Testard, Les dames de l'Aventin, disciples de saint Jérôme: BSAF (1996) 39-63; S. Letsch-Brunner, Marcella: discipula et magistra. Auf den Spuren einer römischen Christin des 4. Jh., Berlin-New York 1998; N. Adkin, The Letter of Paula and Eustochium to Marcella: Some Notes: Maia 51 (1999) 97-110; N. Adkin, Jerome on Marcella: BStudLat 29/2 (1999) 564-570; A. Bernet, Saint Jérôme, Clovis 2002.

M.G. Bianco

MARCELLINA (2nd c.). Carpocratian. Follower of the gnostic *Carpocrates. She came to Rome under Pope *Anicetus (155–166) acquiring a large group of disciples (Iren., Adv. haer. I, 26,6).

DCB 3, 803-804; W.A. Löhr, Karpokratianisches: VChr 49 (1995) 23-48, esp. 35-36; P. Lampe, Christians at Rome in the First Two Centuries, Minneapolis 2003, 319.

E. Prinzivalli

MARCELLINA (4th c.; d. 17 July 397/401). Older sister of St. *Ambrose of Milan, born probably at *Trier in about 330. To Marcellina, who on the Epiphany of 353 had received the velatio in the presence of Pope Liberius in the Vatican basilica, the bishop of Milan dedicated his De virginibus, considered the first organic treatise of spirituality and theology on the theme of Christian virginity. Also addressed to her are the Letters 20, 22, 41 of Ambrose. He told his sister of the events of Holy Week in 386, informing her of the tension that had arisen with *Justina (Ep. 20); he communicated to her the discovery of the bodies of the martyrs *Gervasius and Protasius, sending her a transcription of the homilies with which he had marked the feast (Ep. 22); he kept her informed of the reaction of *Theodosius after the fire at the synagogue and at the temple of the *Valentinians at Callinicus, and again after the homily in which he had illustrated to the emperor the difference that existed between the church and the synagogue (Ep. 41). In the De excessu fratris Satyri I, 33, written for the death of his brother, Ambrose records the grief of Marcellina. She died at Milan on 17 July during the episcopate of *Simplicianus, between 397 and 401, acc. to an ancient Life of St. Marcellina (BHL 5223). She was buried in the basilica of St. Ambrose, near to the tomb of her brother.

BS 8, 646-648; PCBE 2, 1365-1367; var. aus., S. Ambrogio nel XVI centenario della velatio di Santa Marcellina, Milan 1953; E. Bernasconi, Nella villa di campagna di Santa Marcellina, Milan 1959; C. Pasini, S. Marcellina vergine, in var. aus., Dizionario dei santi della chiesa di Milano, Milan 1995, 59; S. Spagnol - M. Dalpé, Sainte Marcelline, Sillery (Québec) 1996; M.C. Viggiani, Santa Marcellina. Una nobile romana a Milano. Vita, opere e devozione della sorella di S. Ambrogio, Genoa 2000.

M.G. Mara

MARCELLINUS, Luciferian. A priest of the *Luciferian community. Together with the Roman presbyter Faustinus he addressed the Libellus precum to the emperor *Theodosius I in 384.

CPL 1571; PCBE II/2, 1368-1370.

M. Simonetti

MARCELLINUS, pope (d. 304). According to the Depositio episcoporum* composed around 336 and included in the Chronography* of 354, Marcellinus succeeded Pope Caius on 30 June 296 (from 1 July, in the Liber pontificalis) and died in 354 during the Great *Persecution under the emperor *Diocletian, yet we cannot say with certainty that he suffered martyrdom. He was buried in the catacomb of *Priscilla next to the martyr Crescentius (LP 1, 162) and his tomb was well known. Since the Depositio episcoporum associates his depositio with 15 January, it is clear that Marcellinus was venerated in the Roman Church going back at least to around 336 (MGH, Chron. min. I, 70); nonetheless, his name is sometimes confused in the sources with his successor *Marcellus I (see BS 8,673; LP I, LXXI). Indeed, the Liber pontificalis adds that he relented during the persecution, but then repented and suffered martyrdom on 31 March; the text dwells on describing his *apostasy. This information can be derived from a Passio of the late 5th c. that was written to exonerate Marcellinus and three of his priests and later his successors *Miltiades, Marcellus I and Sylvester I from the accusation of traditores. At the end of the 4th and beginning of the 5th c., the *Donatists spread the accusation against their reputation, yet it was refuted by *Augustine of Hippo and by the Conference of *Carthage in 411 (Aug., C. litt. Petil. II, 92,202; De unico bapt. XVI, 27; Brev. Coll. III, 9ff.). At the same point in time as the Passio, yet another falsehood was fabricated concerning the lapsus* of Marcellinus, namely the proceedings of the Council of Sinuessa (Mansi I, 1249-1257; PL 6, 11-20), acc. to which he acknowledged his fault and condemned himself. The intent of this text was to establish the principle of prima sedes non iudicabitur a quoquam, during the struggles between Pope *Symmachus (498–514), the antipope *Laurentius and the *Ostrogoth king *Theodoric the Great.

AASS April. III, 412-414; LP I, LXXIIIff., XCIX, 162-163; III, 76; BHL 5223b, 5223d, 5223f; Hfl-Lecl I, 207-208; BA 31, 845-849; DTC 9, 1999-2001; BS 8, 651-653; DACL 10, 1762-1773; E.H. Röttges, Marcellinus-Marcellus. Zur Papstgeschichte der diokletianischen Verfolgungszeit: ZKTh 78 (1956) 385-420; A. Amore, Il preteso "Lapsus" di Papa Marcellino: Antonianum 32 (1957) 411-426; Id., È esistito Papa Marcello?: Antonianum 32 (1957) 57-75; Ch. Pietri, Roma Christiana, I, Rome 1976, 392-393; T.D. Barnes, Constantine and Eusebius, Cambridge, MA 1981, 38-39, 303-304; G. Squittieri, Cristianesimo e impero romano, Salerno 1981, 278-281; F. Tolotti, Le cimetière de Priscille. Synthèse d'une recherche: RHE 73 (1988) 281-314; EPapi 1, 303-307.

A. Di Berardino

MARCELLINUS Comes (d. after 534). Marcellinus was of Illyrian origin, an *orthodox *Catholic, born perhaps near Skopje, a native speaker of *Latin and well versed in *Greek; he lived at *Constantinople, where he was a secretary of the future emperor *Justinian until 525–527. This little that we know of his life comes from some of his sayings and from passing references in *Cassiodorus (Inst. 1,17,1-2). He received the titles of comes and vir clarissimus, perhaps for his services and for his activity as a writer. He wrote the Annales, a Latin chronicle that begins in 379 with the accession of *Theodosius I to the throne, and in the first edition proceeds to 518, later revised and continued through 534, the date of the retaking of *Africa with the defeat of the *Vandal king Gelimer. Another author extends the chronicle to 548; this section is called the Auctarium or Additamentum (Mommsen, 104-108). Marcellinus is a well-informed author, esp. about the events beginning in 498. Constantinople was a place of privileged perspective, and he was able to gain access to primary sources. His attention is turned to both West and East, but beginning with 454–455 he concentrates increasingly on the pars Orientis. He relays numerous events connected to *heresies and the leading heretics; a significant portion concerns the bishops of *Rome. Marcellinus is the first author who refers to 476 as the "decline" of the Roman Empire in the West. He depends on *Orosius for the most ancient history; his work was employed by *Jordanes, the Venerable *Bede and Paulus Diaconus, and was used in the Irish annals. Cassiodorus mentions two of his other works: the first is preserved only in a fragment (De temporum qualitatibus et positionibus locorum); concerning the second, he affirms that it was a detailed description in four books of the cities of Constantinople and *Jerusalem (Inst. 1,25,1).

CPL 2270-2271; PL 51, 917-948; CPPM III/A 295; MGH, Auct. ant., 11, 60-104; B. Croke, The Chronicle of Marcellinus: A Translation and Commentary (with a reproduction of Mommsen's crit. ed.), Sydney 1995; D. Bartonková, Marcellinus Comes and Jordanes's Romana: SPFB 12 (1967) 85-194; L. Várady, Jordanes-Studien. Jordanes und das Chronicon des Marcellinus Comes. Die Selbständigkeit des Jordanes: Chiron 6 (1976) 441-487; B. Croke, A.D. 476: The Manufacture of a Turning Point: Chiron 13 (1983) 81-119; S. Teillet, Des Goths à la nation gothique. Les origines de l'idée de nation en Occident du V[e] au VII[e] siècle, Paris 1984; G.M. Pintus, Eucherio di Lione nella cronologia di Gennadio e Marcellino: Studi Medievali 25 (1984) 795-812; M. Gusso, A proposito dell'uso di "interrex" nel "Chronicon" di Marcellinus Comes: Critica Storica 28/1 (1991) 133-152; Id., Contributi allo studio della composizione e delle fonti del Chronicon di Marcellinus Comes: SDHI 61 (1995) 557-622; Id., Index Marcellinianus: An Index to the Chronicon of Marcellinus Comes, Hildesheim 1996; Id., Il Chronicon di Marcellino Comes: a proposito di un libro recente: Cassiodorus 3 (1997) 273-289; B. Croke, Marcellinus on Dara: A Fragment of His Lost De temporum qualitatibus et positionibus locorum: Phoenix 38 (1994) 77-88; A. Cameron, The "Epitome de Caesaribus" and the "Chronicle" of Marcellinus: CQ, New Series 51 (2001) 324-327; B. Croke, Count Marcellinus and His Chronicle, Oxford 2001.

A. Di Berardino

MARCELLINUS, Flavius (d. 413). Tribunus and notarius*. Flavius Marcellinus was born probably at *Toledo; he had a brother named Apringius, a proconsul of *Africa (411–413). He was a man of culture, generous and aristocratic, with theological interests. Marcellinus exchanged letters with *Jerome (Ep. 126). He was a friend of *Augustine of Hippo, who wrote six letters to him (Ep. 128, 129, 133, 138, 139, 143) and dedicated three works to him: De peccatorum meritis et remissione in 412; De spiritu et littera in 412; and the first 2 books of De civitate Dei in 413. In the *Pelagian controversy he had an important role; he was in fact the first to call the attention of Augustine to the Pelagian cause (Aug., De gestis Pel. 11,25). The emperor *Honorius commissioned him to moderate the debate between the *Catholics and the *Donatists at *Carthage in 411 (CTh 16,11,3), a duty that he fulfilled with great care and dedication. In moments of difficulty he enjoyed the support of Augustine. The Pelagians accused him of corruption, and this accusation led to his downfall. After the revolt of the usurper Heraclianus, the comes Marinus arrested him on the double accusation of corruption and of having played a part in the revolt. At the same time, on the basis of the same accusations, the authorities arrested Apringius. The interventions of the African bishops did not have a significant impact: both brothers were executed on 15–16 September 413. The imperial court later conceded the injustice of such a condemnation (CTh 16,5,55). On 6 April the Roman church venerates Marcellinus as one of its martyrs.

S. Lancel, Actes de la conference de Carthage en 411 (SC 194, 195, 224, 373 and see the Index personarum, 1620-1621), Paris 1972-1991; PLRE II, 711-712; M. Moreau, Le dossier Marcellinus dans la correspondance de saint Augustin: RecAug 9 (1973) 3-181; PCBE 1, 671-688.

G. Ladocsi - S. Samulowitz

MARCELLUS I, pope (d. 309). With the *persecution that raged in 303, the *Roman Church found itself in enormous difficulty over internal divisions. Pope *Marcellinus died on 25 October 304. The Liber pontificalis claims that the papal see was vacant for seven years, three months and twenty-five days (ed. L. Duchesne 1, 162). Such a claim does not agree with what the same Liber otherwise writes in connection with his successor Pope Marcellus (ed. Duchesne 1, 164), who acc. to the Catalogus Liberianus was elected four years later (T. Mommsen, Chronica Minora 76; see R. Bagnall, Consuls of the Later Roman Empire 150). The year of the election of Marcellus is still greatly debated, and it is variously given as 306, 307 or even 308.

The Liber pontificalis states that Marcellus is of Roman origin; the first edition portrays him as a son of Marcellus, his very own *name (ed. Duchesne, 72-73); however, the second edition portrays him as a son of Benedictus and de regione Via Lata. According to Mommsen, he would have been a simple presbyter who led the Roman community during the vacancy of the papal see after the death of Marcellinus and before the election of *Eusebius in 310 or 311. Albeit to varying degrees, Röttges and Monachino are moving toward accepting such a thesis. Moreover, the presbyter Marcellus, and not a Pope Marcellus, would have been the founder of the cemetery of Novella and would have been the source of the titulus Marcelli. In his translation and continuation of the Chronicon by *Eusebius, *Jerome omits the name of Marcellus, and treats Eusebius as the 29th bishop of Rome (GCS 47, 228). Since they depend on Jerome, many later lists continue to omit the name of Marcellus. *Augustine names the two pontiffs: *Gaius, Marcellinus, Marcellus, Eusebius, Miltiades, *Sylvester (Ep. 53,1,2; C. Litt. Pet. 2,02).

Another significant problem arises from the Depositio episcoporum*, which links the commemoration of Marcellinus to 15 January (MGH, Chronica minora I, 70) but does not include Marcellus in the list. The Depositio martyrum* makes no mention of the two popes. Meanwhile, the Mart. hier., throughout its entire MS tradition, links 16 January with the deposition of the body of Pope Marcellus I in the catacomb of *Priscilla. The ancient sources locate the sepulchers in distinct and rather precise places: Marcellinus underground near the Roman martyr Crescentius, in the cubiculum clarum acc. to some MSS, and Marcellus in the upper basilica of St. Sylvester, acc. to the Notitia ecclesiarum from the middle of the 7th c. (R. Valentini and G. Zucchetti, Codice topografico della città di Roma, II, 77). We maintain that the sepulchral tradition, esp. the Catalogus Liberianus assembled only about a decade after the death of Marcellus, as well as the example of Pope *Damasus (366–384), who dedicated an epitaph to Marcellus and placed it near his *tomb in the basilica of St. Sylvester in the catacomb of Priscilla, is not capable of making up a bishop of Rome at a point in time so close to the narrated events. Thus Damasus explicitly claimed to have documentation for this (A. Ferrua, ICUR 6, n. 40; E. Diehl, n. 962). The Great Persecution under the emperor Diocletian had resulted in many lapsi ("apostates"), who after the storm of persecution subsided wanted to be reintegrated into the community, on account of which "there arise furor, hate, discord, protest, rebellion, killing; the *peace is destroyed," acc. to the epitaph. At Rome in 306 the attitude of the emperor *Maxentius was favorable to Christians; therefore, the delay in replacing the deceased bishop seems to have depended entirely on internal dissensions. Then appeared the tyrannus Maxentius, who for the sake of public order (or rather simply for the internal peace of the church?) sent the bishop Marcellus into exile; if his intervention was motivated by ecclesial factors, this could be seen as an interference of secular power into the disciplinary affairs of the church.

The Liber pontificalis credits Pope Marcellus with the construction of the cemetery of Novella, named after a Roman matron, on the Via Salaria. The new cemetery was positioned at the front of the catacomb of Priscilla; it is mentioned as well in the Gesta Liberii (PL 8, 1389). The same Liber further credits Marcellus with a reorganization of the Roman Church for the sake of an improved response to the needs of penitents and to *converts from *paganism. According to the testimony of the epitaph of Damasus, Marcellus died in exile, but he was not martyred; his body was returned to Rome and buried in the catacomb of Priscilla, on the Via Salaria, as the Mart. hier. states: Romae, via Salaria, in cimiterio Prescillae depos. sci Marcelli papae et conf. (ed. G.B. De Rossi and L. Duchesne, [9]). In fact, Sylvester ordered the construction of a basilica above the catacomb of Priscilla, and in the basilica were gathered the bones of Pope Marcellus and much later also the epitaph of Damasus; if they had been brought back earlier, they would have been placed underground. Perhaps in the course of the 9th c. his body was transferred to the church of S. Marcello on the Via Lata (the present-day Via del Corso) (for the fate of his body, see AASS Ian., ed. 1734, II, 4f.). Meanwhile, the titulus Marcelli* reappeared in the 4th c.; indeed, in ecclesia Marcelli the presbyter *Boniface I was ordained bishop of Rome on Sunday 29 December 418, acc. to the account that *Symmachus the prefect of Rome sent to the emperor *Honorius (Coll. Avellana, Ep. 14,6: CSEL 35, 60; see LP. I, 228, n. 1). Subsequently, in the course of the 6th c. the titulus* was confused with the pope of the same name, on account of which three presbyters present at the Roman *synod of 595 are of the titulus sancti Marcelli (MGH, Epist. I, 367). The apocryphal tradition also attributes three letters to Marcellus (Jaffe-Wattenbach, nn. 160-162; PL 6, 1091-1100).

Liber pontificalis, ed. L. Duchesne, Paris 1886, I, XCIXC, 164-166; III, ed. C. Vogel, Paris 1957, 6-7; 76; L. Duchesne, La nouvelle édition du Liber pontificalis: Mélanges d'archéologie et d'histoire 18 (1898) 389-392 (on Marcellus); Id., Histoire ancienne de l'Église, II, Paris 1907, 92-97; T. Mommsen, Ordo et spatia episcoporum romanorum: Neues Archiv 21 (1896) 335-357; Id., Gesta Pontificum Romanorum (an edition of the Liber pontificalis), MGH, Berolini 1898, LIII-LV; O. Marucchi, Il sepolcro del papa Marcellino: Nuovo Bulletino di Archeologia Cristiana 12 (1907) 107ff.; A. Profumo, La memoria di S. Pietro nella regione Salario-Nomentana, Rome 1916, 16-75; E. Caspar, Geschichte des Papstums, I, Tübingen 1930, 43-54, 97-101; H. Delehaye, Commentarius perpetuus in Martyrologium Hieronymianum, Acta Sanctorum Novembris, Brussels 1931, II, 2.42-43; E.B. Schaefer, Die Bedeutung der Epigramme des Papstes Damasus I für die Geschichte der Heiligenverherung, Rome 1932, 164-170; H.V. Schoenebeck, Beiträge zur Religionspolitik des Maxentius und Constantin, Klio, Supplement 43, Leipzig 1939; Martyrologium Romanum ad formam editionis typicae scholiis historicis instructum, Propylaeum ad Acta Sanctorum Decembris, Brussels 1940, 23-24; V. Monachino: EC 8, 16-17; DACL 10, 1754-1760; R. Valentini and G. Zucchetti, Codice topografico della città di Roma, II, Rome 1942, 128-129; E.H. Röttges: Marcellinus-Marcellus: ZKTh 78 (1956) 385-420 (the author upholds the common identity of Marcellinus and Marcellus, on the basis of which the papacy would have been vacant from 304 to 310); A. Amore, È esistito Papa Marcello?: Antonianum 32 (1957) 57-75; R. Krautheimer, Corpus basilicarum christianarum Romae, Vatican City 1962, II, 207-217; C. Pietri, Roma Christiana, Rome 1976, 492 and 561; L. Gigli, S. Marcello al Corso (Le chiese di Roma, new series 29), Rome 1977, [2]1996 (updated edition); V. Saxer: Cath 8, 399-400; T.D. Barnes, Constantine and Eusebius, Cambridge, MA 1981; F. Tolotti, Le cimetière de Priscille. Synthèse d'une recherche: RHE 73 (1988) 281-314 (esp. 296-298); B. Kriegbaum, Die Religionspolitik des Kaisers Maxentius: Archivum Historiae Pontificae 30 (1992) 7-52; R.B. Eno, The Significance of the Lists of Roman Bishops in the Anti-Donatist Polemic: VChr 47 (1993) 158-169; EPapi 1, 307-313.

A. Di Berardino

MARCELLUS of Ancyra (ca. 284–374). We know with certainty that Marcellus presided over the Synod of Ancyra in 314, bound up with the problem of the lapsi. He also participated in the first *Council of *Nicaea in 325, even if his ideas did not garner the attention of the *synodists. Around 335, his rigid anti-*Arianism prompted him to write a refutation of *Asterius the Sophist who was by now already "elderly," and he exposed him to the attacks of *Eusebius of *Nicomedia. He supported *Athanasius of *Alexandria at the Council of *Tyre in 335, and he opposed the reinstatement of *Arius. Deposed in 336 by order of the emperor *Constantine I, he was accused of *Sabellianism by the followers of *Eusebius of *Caesarea, an accusation repeated by Eusebius himself (Against Marcellus and On Ecclesiastical Theology). Thanks to this controversy, we have received many highly important fragments of his works; Erich Klostermann has edited them. After the *death of Constantine I in 338, Marcellus attempted to regain his episcopal see. Yet he was not able to secure it, due to the favor that his adversaries were receiving from *Constantius II, an heir to the throne of Constantine I. He took refuge with Pope *Julius I at *Rome, where he found himself together with Athanasius, who had preceded him by about one month. In a letter to Julius I, transmitted to us by *Epiphanius of Salamis (Haer. 72,2,3), he defended himself against the charge of Sabellianism that had been leveled against him. As a result, the Roman synod in 340 declared him to be *orthodox, in the same way as Athanasius. The Eastern orthodox leaders, struck for the most part by his original ideas, openly *excommunicated him in the third formula of *faith of the Council of *Antioch, promulgated in 341/342 in conjunction with the rites of consecration for the "Golden Church" of Constantine I.

A general synod, the Council of *Serdica in 341 or 342, did not succeed, primarily because the Eastern synodists refused to sit near Athanasius and Marcellus, whose presence was demanded and imposed by the Western synodists. The condemnation of Marcellus on the part of the Eastern bishops, issued at the Council of Serdica and reiterated at the Council of Philippopolis (ca. 343–347), is attested for us by a letter preserved in the Historical Fragments of *Hilary of Poitiers. After taking a closer look at the dossier of Marcellus, the Westerners pledged to him their trust. Yet a new formula of faith on the part of the Easterners, the Fifth Arian Confession of 345, labeled the Ekthesis Makrostichos on account of its unusual length, condemned Marcellus, *Paul of Samosata and *Photinus (originally from *Galatia and bishop of *Sirmium) in even stronger terms. Paul and Photinus had effectively pushed the modalist doctrines of their teacher Marcellus to the extreme. Photinus was first censured by the Makrostich (no. 6): "The disciples of Marcellus and of Photinus, both from Ancyra in Galatia, reject the eternal subsistence of Christ, his divinity and his eternal reign, under the pretext of safeguarding the divine *unity, similar in this matter to the Jews." He was likewise condemned in 345 and in 347 by the synods of *Milan, convened by the Westerners. The same synodists, however, did not lash out at Marcellus: instead, it was Athanasius who refused to pledge his trust to Marcellus (Hilary, Fragmenta 2,21; Sulpicius Severus, Hist. sacra 2,37).

We do not know where Marcellus endured his exile. He lived until ca. 375, and his theological reputation did not improve. Writing to Athanasius in 371, *Basil of *Caesarea asks him to issue a condemnation of the "teaching pernicious and foreign to the true faith" of Marcellus (Ep. 69,2), while Epiphanius was not hesitant to judge him a notorious *heretic (Haer. 72,2,3). Recently, with more legitimate motivations, an opuscule titled On the Holy Church has been attributed to him. Dated to 360 or earlier, this brief work demonstrates that the doctrinal essence of Marcellus remained unchanged even after his refutation of Asterius the Sophist.

Attributions of ps.-Athanasian writings to Marcellus have not received wide acceptance. In particular, the attribution of the tractatus* titled De Incarnatione et contra Arianos (PG 26, 984-1028), the most significant of these writings from a doctrinal point of view, lacks any basis.

Sources: CPG 2800-2806. The Fragments, followed by the letter of Marcellus to Pope Julius I, have been edited by E. Klostermann, GCS, Eusebius Werke IV, edited anew by G.C. Hansen in 1972, with the addition (pp. 255-263) of textual corrections, in particular those of F. Scheidweiler, Marcel von Ancyra: ZNTW 46 (1955) 202-214. The German translation of W. Gericke, Marcell von Ancyra. Der Logos-Christologe und Biblizist. Sein Verhältnis zur antiochenischen Theologie und zum Neuen Testament, Halle 1940, is barely reliable. On the tractatus of ps.-Anthimus of Nicomedia, G. Mercati, Anthimi Nicomediensis episcopi et martyris de sancta Ecclesia (ST 5), Vatican City 1905, 87-98 and M. Richard, Un opuscule méconnu de Marcel d'Ancyre: MSR 6 (1949) 5-28 (Opera minora II, n. 33). Other attributions: E. Schwartz, Der sogenannte Sermo maior de fide des Athanasius, Munich 1925; F. Scheidweiler, Wer ist der Verfasser des sogenannte Sermo maior de fide: ByzZ 47 (1954) 333-357; H. Nordberg, Athanasiana, Helsinki 1912, 58-62; Expositio fidei: see Scheidweiler, op. cit.; De incarnatione et contra Arianos: see M. Tetz, ZKG 83 (1972) 145-194.

Studies: T. Zahn, Marcellus von Ancyra, Gotha 1867; F. Loofs, Die Trinitätslehre Marcells von Ancyra und ihr Verhältnis zur älteren Tradition: Sitzungsberichte der königlich preussischen Akademie der Wissenschaften (1902) 724-781; RE 12, 259-265; M. Tetz, Zur Theologie des Markel von Ankyra: ZKG 75 (1964) 217-270; 79 (1968) 3-42; 83 (1972) 145-194; T.E. Pollard, Marcellus of Ancyra, A Neglected Father: Epektasis, Mélanges patristiques offerts au cardinal Jean Daniélou, Paris 1972, 187-196; M. Simonetti, Su alcune opere attribuite di recente a Marcello d'Ancira: RSLR 9(1973) 313-329; M.G. Rapisarda, La questione dell'autenticità del De incarnatione Dei Verbi et contra Arianos di S. Atanasio. Rassegna degli studi: Nuovo Didaskaleion 23 (1973) 23-54; C. Pietri, Roma Christiana, Rome 1976; H.C. Brennecke, Hilarius von Poitiers und die Bischofsopposition gegen Konstantius II. Untersuchungen zur dritten Phase des "arianischen Streites" (337–361), Berlin 1983; J.T. Lienhard, Marcellus of Ancyra in Modern Research: ThS 43 (1982) 486-503; Id., Acacius of Caesarea, Contra Marcellum: Historical and Theological Considerations: Cristianesimo nella Storia 10 (1989) 1-22; M.J. Dowling, Marcellus of Ancyra: Problems of Christology and the Doctrine of the Trinity, Belfast 1987; G. Feige, Die Lehre Markells von Ankyra in der Darstellung seiner Gegner, Leipzig 1991; A.H.B. Logan, Marcellus of Ancyra and the Councils of AD 325: Antioch, Ancyra, and Nicaea: JTS 43 (1992) 428-446; K. Seibt, Markell von Ankyra als Reichstheologe, Tübingen 1990; Id., Die Theologie des Markell von Ankyra. Berlin 1994 (see M. Simonetti: RSLR 31 [1995] 259-269); Die Fragmente; Der Brief an Julius von Rom / Markell von Ankyra, ed., intro. and tr. M. Vinzent, Leiden 1997; W. Kinzig et al., Tauffragen und Bekenntnis, Berlin 1999; J.T. Lienhard, Contra Marcellum: Marcellus of Ancyra and Fourth-Century Theology, Washington 1999; A.H.B. Logan, Marcellus of Ancyra (Pseudo-Anthimus), "On the Holy Church": Text, Translation and Commentary: JTS 51 (2000) 81-112; K. Seibt, Markell von Ankyra (ca. 280–374 n.Chr.) und Asterius Sophista (ca. 270–ca. 350 n.Chr.): Anmerkungen zu einer neuen Edition der Markell-Fragmente und der Epistula ad Iulium: ZKG 111 (2000) 356-377; L.H. Westra, The Apostles' Creed, Turnhout 2002, 28-36; 42-46; S. Parvis, Marcellus of Ancyra and the Lost Years of the Arian Controversy 325–345, Oxford 2006.

C. Kannengiesser

MARCIA (2nd c.). Mistress of the emperor *Commodus, the husband of Bruttia *Crispina, acc. to Cassius Dio she was favorable to the Christians (Hist. Rom. 72,4; see Herodian 1,16,4). This information seems to find confirmation in *Hippolytus of Rome (Philosoph. 9.12), acc. to whom Marcia obtained from the emperor the liberation of the Christians condemned to the mines of *Sardinia. Among them was the future Pope *Callistus I. *Eusebius of Caesarea writes that under Commodus, the Christians enjoyed peace and that there were numerous *conversions (Hist. Eccl. 5,21,1).

DCB 3, 813 f.; PWK 2, 2464-2481; DACL 10, 1825-1831; EC 8, 33-34; P. Keresztes, Imperial Rome and the Christians, I, Lanham 1989, 163-164.

V. Saxer

MARCIAN (Marcianus) (396–457). Marcian was the emperor of the East from 450 to 457. Born in 396 in *Thrace as the son of an ordinary soldier, he was also a soldier, and he participated in the Roman-*Sassanid War of 421–422. He then become a domesticus at *Constantinople in the service of Ardaburius (the magister militum of Emperor *Theodosius II) and his son Aspar, and he succeeded in reaching the level of tribunus. After the death of Theodosius, *Pulcheria chose him as her husband, in a mystical marriage rite, transporting him to the imperial throne. Marcian communicated his coronation both to *Valentinian II, emperor of the West, and to Pope *Leo I. He occupied himself above all with promoting the unity of the empire. In ecclesiastical politics he came under the predominant influence of Pulcheria, who died in 453. In the late autumn of 451 he presided over the Fourth Ecumenical *Council, the Council of *Chalcedon; in the session of 25 October, the only one in which the emperor participated, the Symbolum chalcedonense was approved. Leo protested against the 28th canon of the council. Although attributing the primacy of honor to the papacy, the canon recognized an equivalent status for the bishop of *Rome and the bishop of Constantinople. By will of the emperor, the jurisdiction of the bishop of Constantinople over *Thrace, *Pontus, *Asia and the missionary territories was established by law. Despite the sources of resistance against which it collided, the Council of Chalcedon established for the emperor the title of "protector of the true faith." The collapse of the *Hunnic Empire presented to Marcian the opportunity for colonization and for establishing a foedera with the barbarian populations. At the E borders of his empire, Marcian fought with success; in the West, in clashes with the *Vandals, he employed stall tactics. In this way he succeeded in improving the living conditions of the empire's peoples while gaining a good reputation for posterity; the Eastern church canonized him, together with Pulcheria. Marcian is remembered for his struggle against *Eutyches of Constantinople and the Eutychians, and for his vigorous defense of the formula of Chalcedon, which he upheld in every part of the empire by means of various imperial decrees issued after the convening of the council.

PWK 14, 1514-1529; I.E. Karagiannopoulos, Ἱστορία βυζαντινοῦ κράτους, I, Thessalonica 1978, 275-283; R.L. Hohlfelder, Marcian's Gamble: A Reassessment of Eastern Imperial Policy Toward Attila A.D. 450–453: American Journal of Ancient History 9 (1984) 54-69; M. van Esbroeck, Une Lettre de Dorothée comte de Palestine à Marcel et Mari en 452: AB 104 (1986) 145-159; Grillmeier 2/1, Freiburg i.B. 1986, 107-130; E. Dovere, Constitutiones divae memoriae Marciani in synodo Calchedonensi: AHC 24 (1992) 1-34; R. Lambertini, Sull'esordio delle istituzioni di Marciano: Studia et Documenta Historiae et Iuris 61 (1995) 271-284; R. Snee, Gregory Nazianzen's Anastasia Church: Arianism, the Goths, and Hagiography: Dumbarton Oaks Papers 52 (1998) 157-186.

J. Irmscher

MARCIAN, ascetic (ca. 310–ca. 390). In 1959 Jean Kirchmeyer presented a study to the Third International Conference on Patristic Studies at Oxford. He proposed a thorough examination of the writings transmitted in Greek under the name of Marcian, while instilling the expectation that the writings transmitted in *Syriac would be examined. On the matter of the Greek fragments, Kirchmeyer was inclined to think of a character of the 5th c. whom he identified with a Marcian of Bethlehem, born around 410, a *monophysite *ascetic who was active in the post-Chalcedonian controversies up to around 480, an era in which he would have evolved into a *Chalcedonian mindset, perhaps through the influence of the ascetic *Theodore of Mopsuestia, and he would have lived until about 492. Of this Marcian, the historians of the era bear witness, namely, *Cyril of Scythopolis (Vita Euthymii, ed. Schwartz [TU 49,2] 1939) and *Zacharias of Mytilene (Hist. Eccl. III, 3 [CSCO 87,107-108]). The year 1968 saw the posthumous publication of the wide-ranging work that Joseph Lebon had dedicated to the Syriac fragments attributed to a monk Marcian. Over many years, Lebon maintained an active interest in the notes and fragments attributed to Marcian. He did so presumably between 1909 and 1949, as becomes evident from a preface by Lebon himself, reproduced by the curator of the posthumous work, Albert van Roey, in the opening pages of the volume. Kirchmeyer took note of some of Lebon's articles on the matter in question; but since a completed version of Lebon's investigations did not come to pass, the two projects remain unfortunately independent of each other. Out of 17 MSS in Syriac and Greek, Lebon selects 11 opuscules, of which 7 are in Syriac, 2 in both Syriac and Greek, and 2 in Greek only. A thorough examination of these fragments, on which Lebon gives the critical edition of the Syriac tradition, suggests a date between 362 and 382 together with a provenance in the region of *Antioch. In his Religious History (PG 82, 1283-1496), *Theodoret of Cyrrhus outlines the life of an ascetic Marcian, to whom he further makes reference in ch. 25 of the Church History (PG 82, 1189 A-B). The Church History suggests a date for him in the range between 361 and 378; his death could not be any later 390. Lebon concludes that it is all but impossible not to identify this ascetic as the author of the fragments, or at the very least as the author of most of them. In particular, the following fragments (with the numbering of Lebon) are attributed to the Marcian of the 4th c.: I (on penitence), II (ascetical), III (on baptism), IV, V, VII, VIII (ascetics) and IX (parenthetic). Concerning VI ("gives another tractatus") and to X-XI (Greek fragments, on faith), Lebon determines that is impossible to make an attribution.

CPG 3885-3900 Suppl. 226-227; J. Lebon, Le moine s. Marcien (Spicilegium sacrum Lovaniense 36) Louvain 1968 (pp. IX-XII contain a full bibliographic review that surveys the numerous and complex related problems); J. Kirchmeyer, Le moine Marcien (de Bethléem?): SP 5 (TU 80), Berlin 1962, 341-359; A. van Roey, Remarques sur le moine Marcien: SP 12, Berlin 1975.

E. Cavalcanti

MARCIAN, presbyter (d. 471?). The presbyter Marcian was a saint of *Constantinople. Of Roman origin and an adherent of the *Novatianist faith, he was attracted to *orthodoxy through the monk Auxentius of *Bithynia. Ordained priest by *Patriarch *Anatolius of Constantinople (449–458) and chosen as oeconomus of the Great Church of Hagia Sophia by *Patriarch *Gennadius (458–471), he dedicated his own family fortune to the construction of churches, including the church of St. Anastasia (459) and the church of St. Isidore, among others. He died during the construction of the church of St. Irene of Perama, probably in 471. The *liturgical commemoration, initially fixed at 9 September, was transferred to 10 January, the date retained as well by the Mart. rom.

BS 8, 689.

D. Stiernon

MARCIAN of Arles. *Cyprian of Carthage gives the name of this bishop of Arles—the first that we know, thanks to a trustworthy contemporary document—as one that favored severity toward the lapsi (Ep. 68). His name does not appear in the list of the bishops of Arles.

L. Duchesne, Fastes épiscopaux de l'ancienne Gaule, I, Paris 1907, 252-254; L. Duquenne, Chronologie des lettres de saint Cyprien, Brussels 1972, 28-30.

V. Saxer

MARCION – MARCIONISM

I. Doctrine - II. Works.

Marcion of Sinope (d. ca. 160) was an important *heretical theologian. In the estimation of Adolf Harnack, he was "the most significant figure between Paul and *Augustine" (Marcion, 314 [Fr. tr.]). Since his writings have been lost over time, the information that we have on the life and works of Marcion has reached us through indirect sources, from the numerous writings of his opponents. Seven short Latin prologues to seven Pauline letters have been preserved. The document is not from Marcion's hand, but probably of Marcionite origin. The most important sources are *Justin Martyr, *Irenaeus of Lyons and *Tertullian. Justin was Marcion's contemporary at *Rome, and the later authors greatly depend on him. He wrote the now-lost Syntagma Against All Heresies, in which he spoke profusely of Marcion, but at a later date he also mentioned him in the first Apology.* Irenaeus, even when he does not actually name Marcion, frequently refers to him. Our principal source remains Tertullian's Against Marcion (207/212), which cites numerous passages in the Antithesis* of Marcion. Other sources include *Clement of Alexandria, the Elenchos that is sometimes attributed to *Hippolytus of Rome and *Epiphanius of Salamis. Marcion grew up in Sinope (now Sinop) in the *Pontus region on the Black Sea. Supposedly excommunicated by his father (who must have been a bishop) for having seduced a *virgin, he came to symbolize the heretic who corrupts the virgin church. He made a fortune in trading arms. He was for some time a member of the Christian community at Rome, which he endowed with a sizeable patrimony. In 144 (the only precise date) he was excluded from that community, which restored to him the donation in its entirety; he then established a separate church that grew rapidly. He died around 160.

I. Doctrine. Marcion did not want to be the founder of a new church, an innovator, and certainly not a prophet, but to preach the genuine and original message of Jesus in its purity, a message that he claimed was distorted by the church of his time. He finds the essence of this message in the *redemption of humanity, enacted through sheer compassion by God in Jesus Christ. With this perspective, he read the Holy Scriptures of the Christianity of his day, the OT, claiming that the God of whom it testifies is a Judge who is powerful and righteous, but also choleric, cruel, volatile and petty, able to claim, "I am he who causes the disaster (Is 45:7, see Tertull., Adv. Marc. I, 2 etc.). Therefore, this God cannot be the same as the Father of Jesus Christ. This latter God is in fact "exclusively" benign, as he himself has demonstrated by sending Jesus Christ to us. Hence two corollaries arise, the fundamentals of Marcionite doctrine: (1) the benign God, Father of Jesus Christ, becomes distinct from the God of the OT, creator and lord of this world, and (2) the OT is to be rejected as the foundation of Christian faith. The character of the two deities is precisely indicated in the Antithesis (see below). One is expressed in gospel, the other in law; the first is benign, the other just, although not essentially bad; the first is a Savior, the second a Judge; one reveals his essence by sending his very own Son, the other by creating this fallen world. The difference between the two deities is revealed above all in their behavior toward human beings. Humanity is a creature of God the creator, his "image and resemblance," a being from his "substance." Nonetheless, this God permits that his creatures disobey the law and plunge into *death (see Tertull., Adv. Marc. II, 5). On the contrary, the "other" God, while not having contracted any obligation with human beings, who are beings of another God, has compassion that leads him to announce through Christ the remission of sins, without any punishment (see Tertull., Adv. Marc. I, 23; I, 7). Whoever so believes is liberated from the chains of narrow legalism. To such persons is rendered possible a new life, without fear, in which, through grateful wonder in the face of the *love and *goodness of God, a new morality spontaneously emerges (see Tertull., Adv. Marc. I, 27 and the prologue of the Antithesis, Harnack 256).

Also characteristic of the Marcionite ethic is a rigorous *ascesis, defined as a renunciation of desire for matter as the structure of this world and for the *temptations of matter, together with an abstinence from both marriage and procreation that seeks not to perpetuate the fallen world of God the creator. The work of Christ consists in the announcement of this *forgiveness and this love of God. To such an end it is sufficient that he assumes a *docetic body. The thugs of God the creator do not recognize him, and by crucifying him they give him the opportunity to go down into the underworld and to announce even there his message. The believers will come back to *life one day "with the *soul"; as a consequence, this doctrine does not allow a *resurrection of the *flesh (Tertull., Adv. Marc. I, 24).

II. Works. Marcion establishes his gospel on an exclusively biblical basis. He finds it only in the apostle Paul and in the gospel of Luke, treated as Pauline. Yet in his theory, these writings would not be preserved in their original form, but immediately after their redaction would have been falsified by the "Judaizers" or followers of the God of this world, acc. to criteria at their convenience including legalism and a juridical ideology. Marcion thus emends the Pauline letters he recognizes as authentic (Galatians, 1-2 Corinthians, Romans, 1-2 Thessalonians, Laodiceans = Ephesians, Colossians, Philippians, Philemon), and also Luke, and he adapts them to his creed, making consistent expunctions and adding nothing! Thus he creates the first canon of NT writings. How these Scriptures were presented in the critical text established by Marcion is completely unknown. Certainly the underlying text was not the "Western" one, as Harnack assumes. The research on this problem is being radically redirected on the basis of new discoveries and concepts of NT textual criticism. Marcion justifies his *canon in the so-called Antithesis, a sort of "Introduction to the NT" for Harnack. The work is now lost. In this work, responding to the insinuations of his opponents, the author successively contrasts opposing statements at a *dogmatic and *exegetical level, concerning the redeemer God and the creator God and concerning their respective acts (see above and the refutations of the Antithesis in Tertull., Adv. Marc. II, 28).

Varying responses have recently been given to the question of whether Marcion had connections with the *gnostics. The predominant opinion seems to be that he knew gnostic Christians and that he was influenced by them, but not to the degree that one can group him with the gnostics. There are striking differences, esp. the negation of an immanent presence in the human person of an essence of divine being, as well as the exclusion of myth as a basis for constructing doctrine. Marcion exercised a profound influence on the development of the doctrine of the church, putting it on guard against the real and present danger of his times, of the corruption of the kerygma in a legalistic sense. Yet such an influence has often been exaggerated. One can hardly name a single element, either in dogma or in the development of the canon, that without him would not have been introduced or that would have been different. As a result the broader church expelled him, not only because of his distinction between two deities and for overbearing interventions into the text of the Holy Scriptures, but above all because of his entirely unsustainable *Christology—something that does not seem to have been emphasized strongly enough, esp. by Harnack. From such an insufficient Christology emerge other points of criticism. As Justin had already attested ca. 150, the Marcionite church expanded rapidly "even to the ends of the earth." Up until ca. 190, it constituted a true danger for the broader church. After this date the importance of the church diminishes, as it becomes partially absorbed by *Manicheism. In spite of this, and even though their very own doctrine prohibiting procreation constituted an obstacle to their growth, the Marcionite community persisted until the end of the 3rd c. in the West. In the East, it persisted even until ca. 450, particularly in the peripheral extent of the *Syriac language, and with greater vitality, as the refutations of and writings against heresies attest (*Ephrem the Syrian, *Rabbula of Edessa, *Theodoret of Cyrrhus). Marcionism exercises a notable influence even today, whether through the simultaneously positive and negative evaluation offered by Harnack, or in a broader sense through a belief system that is based primarily on individualistic faith and on the experience of salvation.

B. Aland: TRE 22, 89-101 (bibl.); LACL 463-485; A. Harnack, Marcion, das Evangelium vom fremden Gott, Leipzig [2]1924 (reprinted Darmstadt 1960; Eng. tr. Durham 1990; Fr. tr. Paris 2003); E.C. Blackman, Marcion and His Influence, London 1949; U. Bianchi, Marcion: Théologien biblique ou docteur gnostique?: VChr 21 (1967) 141-149; H. von Campenhausen, Die Entstehung der christlichen Bibel, Tübingen 1968, 173-194; J. Regul, Die antimarcionitischen Evangelienprologe, Freiburg 1969; J.G. Gager, Marcion and Philosophy: VChr 26 (1972) 53-59; B. Aland, Marcion. Versuch einer neuen Interpretation: ZTK 70 (1973) 420-447; A. Lindemann, Paulus im ältesten Christentum, Tübingen 1979, 378-395; A. Orbe, En torno al modalismo de Marción: Gregorianum 71 (1990) 43-65; Id., Marcionitica: Augustinianum 31 (1991) 195-244; C. Gianotto, Gli gnostici e Marcione. La risposta di Ireneo, in La Bibbia nell'Antichità cristiana, ed. E. Norelli, Bologna 1993, 235-274; G. May, Marcione nel suo tempo: Cristianesimo nella Storia 14 (1993) 205-544; E. Norelli, Note sulla cristologia di Marcione: Augustinianum 35 (1995) 281-305; Id., Marcione lettore dell'epistola ai Romani: Cristianesimo nella Storia 14 (1995) 635-675; Marcion und seine kirchengeschichtliche Wirkung: Marcion and His Impact on Church History, ed. G. May et al., Berlin 2002; the Fr. tr. of the Harnack volume (Paris 2003) has a lengthy supplement on the works of Harnack and on scholarly developments, and a thorough bibliography.

B. Aland

MARCION (Vita Polycarpi). The Martyrium Polycarpi (21,1), the letter of the community of *Smyrna to that of Philomelion and to all the churches, states that "we have made available, through the efforts of our brother Marcion, a brief memoir" (20,1) of the turn of events that led to the death of *Polycarp. Yet Evaristus has actually redacted the text: "Evaristus, who has handwritten this letter" (Mart. Poly. 20,2). It is not clear whether the role of Marcion was that of having composed and dictated the text to Evaristus, or that of an eyewitness of the events. The letter, written in the name of the Christian community of Smyrna, inaugurates a literary genre in the testimony of the martyrs before the authorities and the people, drawing inspiration from the Jewish tradition (2 and 4 Maccabees). The preface exalts the courage of the martyrs, and represents the first usage of this terminology in a technical sense. The letter itself speaks of the courage of Germanicus, of the impudence of Quintus, who denounced himself and renounced the *faith, and above all it speaks of the wise conduct of Polycarp. The text stresses the fact that it is not necessary to seek martyrdom willingly by turning oneself over to the authorities.

CPG 1045; V. Saxer, L'authenticité du Martyre de Polycarpe. Bilan de 25 ans de critique: MEFRA 94 (1982) 979-1001; S. Ronchey, Indagine sul martirio di san Policarpo, Rome 1990; B. Dehandschutter, The Martyrium Polycarpi: A Century of Research: ANRW II, 27 (1993) 485-522; Das Martyrium des Polykarp, edited and annotated by G. Buschmann, Göttingen 1998.

A. Di Berardino

MARCIONITE PROLOGUES. In numerous MSS of the Vulgate, each of the Pauline Letters is preceded by a brief prologue that presents its recipients, place of composition and thematic scope. In 1907 D. de Bruyne (RBen 24 [1907] 1-16) identified a *Marcionite origin for the prologues to seven letters: Galatians, 1 Corinthians, Romans, 1 Thessalonians, Colossians, Philippians and Philemon. P. Corssen (ZNTW 10 [1909] 36-45 and 97-102) and subsequently A. Harnack (ZNTW 24 [1925] 204-218) went even further, attributing such an origin to the prologues that were positioned in front of the other Pauline letters. W. Mundle (ZNTW 24 [1925] 56-77) and M.-J. Lagrange (RBi 35 [1926] 161-173) argued against this hypothesis, treating them instead as paraphrases of the prologues that *Ambrosiaster placed in front of his commentary on the Pauline Letters, and thus dating them to the 4th c. Bardy (DBS 5, 877-879) revived the problematic status of the question, proposing to consider these texts apart from Marcionism. He pushed them back to the 2nd

c., even conferring with the scholarship of Harnack (ZNTW 25 [1926] 160-162), who identified a dependency on these texts in the Muratorian fragment (see *Canon, Muratorian). As a result, the question drew opponents and supporters of a Marcionite origin. Also discussed was the possibility that the prologues, at least those of the original core, had been composed in *Greek, and that they had been translated into *Latin once they reached the West, around the middle of the 3rd c. Today it is generally maintained that the prologues were already present in some MSS of the Pauline Letters in the Vetus Latina edition, and were later inserted into the Vulgate. This is the thesis of H. J. Frede (Altlateinische Paulus-Handschriften, Freiburg 1964, 171-178; Ein neuer Paulustext, I, Freiburg 1973, 156-158), who has denied that the prologues have any connection to Marcionism. In 1970, K. Th. Schäfer (RBen 80 [1970] 7-16 and Kyriakon. Festschrift J. Quasten, Münster 1970, 135-150) resumed speaking of Marcionite prologues. He bolstered his hypothesis by studying the prologue to the letter to the Ephesians and a later prologue to the letter to the Laodiceans that de Bruyne reconstructed, and he wrestled with the interpretation of Ephesians in the writings of *Marius Victorinus. Subsequently, N. Dahl articulated a position against a Marcionite origin. Nevertheless, E. Norelli reasserted such an origin. Yet as Schäfer had already done, he credited the writing of the prologues not directly to Marcion but to one of his disciples. The hypothesis was advanced that these materials did not first appear as distinct introductions to individual letters, but rather as a unified text. The purpose of the text would have been to show the function that Paul assumed in the original Christian communities, and to correlate Christian origins to the adversarial relationship between Paul and the false prophets.

J. Wordsworth and H.J. White, Novum Testamentum Domini nostri Iesu Christi latine, II, Oxford 1913 (text of the prologues, each of which precedes one of the letters). In addition to the previous bibliographic citations, see N. Dahl, The Origins of the Earliest Prologues to the Pauline Letters: Semeia 12 (1978) 233-277; E. Norelli, La tradizione ecclesiastica negli antichi prologhi alle epistole paoline, in La tradizione. Forme e modi, Rome 1990, 301-324; V. Verheyden, The Canon Muratori: A Matter of Dispute, in The Biblical Canons, ed. J.-M. Auwers and H.J. De Jonge, Leuven 2003, 522-523.

A. Pollastri

MARCULFUS. It is disputed whether he is to be identified with the bishop of *Paris (644–657) or with the bishop of Meaux, or even whether he was a monk living in the 7th to 8th c. Marculfus, at the request of a bishop named Landry, wrote the Formularum libri II, a series of formulas intended to function as the compilation of various sorts of petitions, concessions of benefits and privileges, and other ecclesiastical and civil acts.

CPL 1833; PL 87, 695-756; Repertorium 7, 450f.; L. Levellain, Le formulaire de Marculf et la critique moderne: Bibliothéque École des chartes 84 (1923) 21-91; A. Uddholm, Formulae Marculfi. Études sur la langue et le style, Uppsala 1953; Id., Le texte des Formulae Marculfi: Eranos 55 (1957) 38-59.

M. Simonetti

MARCULUS (d. 346). Marculus was a *Donatist bishop of S *Numidia, and acc. to the Donatists a victim of the so-called Macarian persecution (in 347, acc. to the traditional dating, or in 346, as the most recent editor demonstrates). The account of his death is preserved for us in the Passio Marculi sacerdotis donatistae. Marculus was taking part in the delegation of ten Donatist bishops sent to the imperial representatives Paul and Macarius, in protest against the repressive measures that had been instituted against the *schismatic *African church. The meeting took place at Vegesela, a locality of *Numidia between Teveste and *Lambaesis; yet here the members of the delegation, on account of their insolent, judgmental attitude, were subjected to flogging. Marculus was then confined in the nearby fort of Castellum Novae Petrae, situated on a steep mountain, from which four days later he plunged, meeting his death in the rocks that stood below. At Vegesela, a basilica was erected in honor of Marculus. *Augustine of Hippo made the proposition that the supposed means of torture attributed to Marculus—like that which a bit earlier supposedly had victimized another Donatist bishop, Donatus of Bagai, found dead in a well—was not in conformity with Roman practice, bolstering the *Catholic opinion that this would have been a case of *suicide (see C. litt. Pet. II, 20,46; 86,195; C. Cresc. III, 49,54). Nonetheless, *Optatus of Milevis (III, 6) did not doubt that Marculus as well as Donatus had been killed.

CPL 720; BHL 5271; PL 8, 760-766 (Passio Marculi sacerdotis Donatistae); Monceaux V, 69-81; P. Cayrel, Une basilique donatiste de Numidie: MEFRA 51 (1934) 132-133; P. Courcelle, Une nouvelle campagne de fouilles à Ksar el Kelb': MEFRA 53 (1936) 166-197; H. Delehaye, Domnus Marculus: AB 63 (1935) 81-89; PCBE 1, 696-697; W.H.C. Frend, The Donatist Church: A Movement of Protest in Roman North Africa, Oxford ²1971, 179 and passim; E.L. Grasmück, Coërcitio. Staat und Kirche im Donatistenstreit, Bonn 1964, 123-126; B. Quinot, Marculus et Donatus, martyrs donatistes: BA 30, 771-772; Y. Duval, Loca sanctorum Africae. Le culte des martyrs en Afrique du IVᵉ au VIIᵉ siècle, Rome 1982, 158-160, 705; P. Mastandrea, Le interpolazioni nei codici della "Passio Marculi": AB 108 (1990) 279-291; P. Mastandrea, Papiri di martiri donatisti (BHL 4473 and 5271): AB 113 (1995) 39-88; V. Saxer, Afrique latine, in G. Philippart (ed.), Hagiographies: histoire internationale de la littérature hagiographique latine et vernaculaire en Occident des origines à 1550, I, Turnhout 1994, 64-66; F. Scorza Barcellona, L'agiografia donatista, in M. Marin and C. Moreschini, Africa cristiana. Storia, religione, letteratura, Brescia 2002, 128-131.

F. Scorza Barcellona

MARCUS AURELIUS, emperor (121–180). Marcus Aurelius Antoninus, the Roman emperor from 161 to 180, having received a superior education in *Rome with a particular emphasis on philosophical studies, ascended the throne by nomination of the Senate. He was joined in governance by his adopted brother, the coemperor Lucius Verus; he fought the Parthians and the *Germans. Pestilence, epidemics and superstitions cast a shadow over his reign. A violent popular reaction against the Christians, considered to be prophets of doom, arose in *Italy. Marcus Aurelius himself considered the Christians to be visionaries (Medit. XI, 3). *Athenagoras, *Melito, *Apollinaris and *Miltiades addressed *apologetic treatises to him. The *persecution happened not by an imperial edict but through the application of an imperial rescript of 176 against those that were disturbing the *peace with the introduction of new cults. The many victims included the apologist *Justin Martyr, the Martyrs of *Lyons in 177 and the bishop *Publius of Athens (*Eusebius of Caesarea, HE V, 1-2; IV, 23,2; 26,3). Marcus Aurelius died in 180 during renewed hostilities in the Wars on the Danube (166–175 and 177–180). Evidence of the philosophical and religious thinking of the emperor is reflected in his "meditations," originally titled To Myself. The column of Marcus Aurelius (cochleate like *Trajan's column) and the equestrian statue on the Campidoglio in Rome have passed down his imperial feats and solemn figure.

H.D. Sedgwick, Marcus Aurelius: A Biography, Oxford 1921; F. Carrata Thomes, Il regno di Marco Aurelio, Turin 1953; G. Lanata, Gli atti dei martiri come documenti processuali, Milan 1973, 64 and 131ff.; M. Sordi, I cristiani e l'impero romano, Milan [2]1990; F. Fontaine, Marc Aurèle, Paris 1991; P. Grimal, Marc Aurèle, Paris 1991; S. Jäkel, Marcus Aurelius's Concept of Life, Turku 1991; M. Ceva, Marco Aurelio: Pensieri, Milan 1994; P. Hadot, La citadelle intérièure: introduction aux "Pensées" de Marc Aurèle, Paris [2]1997; G. Jossa, I cristiani e l'impero romano. Da Tiberio a Marco Aurelio, Bari 2000.

L. Navarra

MARCUS DIADOCHUS. Author of a Sermo contra Arianos that primarily defends the consubstantiality of the Son with the *Father, against the objections of the *Arians. The name of the author of the *sermon is otherwise unknown. Various attempts have been made to identify him with one of the many *Egyptian bishops with the name Marcus who flourished in the 4th c., excluding in any case the 5th-c. *Diadochus of Photice in the mountains of *Epirus.

CPG 6105: PG 65, 1149-1165; Bardenhewer IV, 1923, p. 186; Baumstark, p. 339, no. 5; Patrologia V, 344.

F. Scorza Barcellona

MARIANUS and JACOBUS (d. 6 May 258). The two are the heroes of an *African Passio of noteworthy literary value (BHL 131), written by a cleric who was their companion and friend. The model is the Passio Perpetuae; note, e.g., the visions during imprisonment. Arrested at *Cirta in *Numidia and after a judicial proceeding before the municipal authorities, they were transferred to *Lambaesis and brought before the governor, condemned to death and executed. According to both the *Calendarium Carthaginense and the Mart. hier., they died on 6 May. The cult of the martyrs of Lambaesis must have been very familiar, given that *Augustine wrote a *sermon in their honor (Sermo 380). The *Vandal invasions and the other political vicissitudes of N Africa ensured that their *relics were translated to *Italy, where their cult spread. The relics were claimed by the cathedral of Gubbio; the relics of the other protagonists of the Passio were claimed by the nearby church of St. Secundus.

P. Franchi de' Cavalieri, La Passio SS. Mariani et Iacobi, ST 3, Rome 1900; Delehaye, PM 78-82; OC 382; G. Lazzati, Gli sviluppi della letteratura sui martiri nei primi quattro secoli, Turin 1956, 48, 190-200; F. Dolbeau, Le légendier de S. Francesco de Gualdo: Bolletino della Deputazione di storia patria per l'Umbria 73 (1976) 168; V. Saxer, Saints anciens d'Afrique du Nord, Vatican City 1979, 88-103; Id., Afrique latine, in Hagiographies I, ed. G. Philippart, Turnhout 1994, 43-47 (with bibl.).

V. Saxer and S. Heid

MARINA. The history and the cult of Marina have enjoyed a broad dissemination; a *Syriac MS that narrates her life dates back to 778. Every MS tradition (Greek, Latin, *Coptic etc.) locates Marina in different places, and sometimes even with the name "Maria." The essential elements of the legend tell us that a certain Eugenius, a widower, desired to enter a *monastery, and in order not to leave his little daughter in the world, he takes her with him, changing her name to "Marinus" and dressing her as a boy. After her father's *death, she remains in the monastery, always cross-dressing as a man. One day, she was sent on a mission with the other monks and stopped at an inn; the daughter of the innkeeper becomes pregnant and accuses Marinus, who considers himself culpable and asks for *forgiveness. Then he is expelled from the monastery, and he undergoes an extreme form of *penance. When her *body is washed after her death, it is discovered that Marinus was a *woman and therefore innocent.

BHL 5528-5530c; BHG 1163-1163e; Greek 614-615e; BS 1165-1170; M. Minghelli, Santa Marina la travestita, Palermo 2000.

A. Di Berardino

MARINUS. Numerous martyrs have been known by this name, among them (1) the monk Marinus, rediscovered in the 17th c. in the Benedictine abbey of Saint-Savin-sur-Gartemps (region of Poitou-Charentes); (2) the young Marinus of *Rome, celebrated on 26 December in the Mart. hier. and in the Mart. rom. and on 16 December in the Synax. Eccl. CP (BHG 2256); (3) the elderly Marinus of *Anazarbus in *Cilicia, martyred under the emperor *Diocletian, inscribed in the Synax. Eccl. CP on 8 August and 18 October (BHG 1171); (4) Marinus and Anianus, itinerant monks of *Ireland of the 7th–8th c., acc. to legend bishop and deacon, martyred in Bavaria on 15 November (BHL 5531-5535); (5) the soldier Marinus and the senator Asterius, martyred ca. 262 at *Caesarea Maritima on 3 March (Mart. hier.) or on 7 August (Synax. Eccl. CP); (6) Marinus, Secondinus and Fronto, martyrs at *Antioch on 16 November (Mart. hier.).

BHG 1171, 2256; BHL 5531-5541; BS 8, 1171-1183; LCI 7, 546-547.

V. Saxer and S. Heid

MARINUS of Constantinople (4th c.). Marinus was elected as bishop of *Constantinople by the *Arians at the death of *Demophilus (ca. 385). Like Demophilus, he was from *Thrace. Yet before long the same Arians replaced him with *Dorotheus of *Antioch in *Syria (*Socrates Scholasticus, HE V, 12), a man already quite elderly. He was the protagonist of a *schism among the Arians and each group with its own places of worship, arguing that the *Father had always been Father, even before the Son came into being, while Dorotheus and others were arguing that the Father had become as such only from the moment in which he had brought the Son into being. The Arian group that chose Marinus as its leader was called a member of the psathyrianoi, in the sense that one of its principal exponents, named Theoctistus, of Syrian origin, was a psathyropōlēs (a seller of cakes). This position was also accepted by the *Gothic bishop Selenas. The division also extended to other areas.

Socrates, HE V, 23; R.P.C. Hanson, The Search for the Christian Doctrine of God: The Arian Controversy, 318-381, Edinburgh 1988, 568.

M. Simonetti

MARIS of Chalcedon (d. after 362). A disciple of *Lucian of Antioch, Maris was from the very beginning (ca. 320) among the supporters of *Arius. He even supported him at the First Council of *Nicaea (325), although he subscribed to the anti-Arian formula of faith due to pressure from the emperor *Constantine I. He collaborated with *Eusebius of Nicomedia for the success of the opposition to the council, and at the First Synod of *Tyre (335) he was among the most active members in the condemnation of *Athanasius of Alexandria. In 342 he took part in a *Eusebian delegation sent to *Milan before the emperor *Constantius II, in an attempt to ease the tensions that flared between the Western supporters and the Eastern opponents of the council. Maris was one of the leading spokesmen of the Easterners at the Council of *Serdica, where the Westerners *excommunicated him for his support of Arianism. At a much later time, we find him at the Council of *Constantinople (360) that signaled the short-lived triumph of the politics of Constantius II in favor of moderate Arianism.

DCB 3, 833; Simonetti 592; R.P.C. Hanson, The Search for the Christian Doctrine of God: The Arian Controversy, 318–381, Edinburgh 1988, see indexes; H.C. Brennecke, Studien zur Geschichte der Homöer: der Osten bis zum Ende der homöischen Reichskirche, Tübingen 1988, 142-143; A. Martin, Athanase d'Alexandrie et l'Église d'Égypte au IVᵉ siècle (328–373), Rome 1996, see indexes.

M. Simonetti

MARIUS MERCATOR (1st half of 5th c.). The information on his life is connected to *Pelagian polemic. In 418 he was at *Rome and knew *Celestius, who defended his positions before Pope *Zosimus. In 429 he was in *Thrace in a Latin *monastery, where he wrote his Commonitoria (= memorandum) on Celestius, Pelagius and *Julian of Eclanum, in which he defends the positions of the *Catholic Church against Pelagians and *Nestorians. After the condemnation of the First Council of *Ephesus against these groups, there is no longer any mention of him. Given his anti-Pelagian convictions, Marius Mercator is generally thought to be of *African origin, but given the close relations that he reports around the family of Julian, he probably intends to uphold his fellow countryman. His writings, transmitted to us through the compilation made before 550 that is labeled the Collectio Palatina (ms. Pal. lat. 234 of the Vatican Library), are the Commonitorium super nomine Coelestii and the Commonitorium adversum haeresim Pelagii et Coelestii vel etiam scripta Iuliani. The first work is more than a biographical compilation of events related to Celestius, and it relates a memorandum of what was circulating as Pelagian teaching. The second is a refutation of Julian's affirmations, crafted after the model of the refutation in *Augustine of Hippo. Two of his writings against *Theodore of Mopsuestia, related to us by Augustine (Ep. 193,1), have been lost. Considering the entire literary activity of Marius Mercator, we find that he wrote with the ecclesial and imperial contexts of *Constantinople in mind, thus preoccupied with the Pelagian problem in connection with the Nestorian problem. He left to us an invaluable testimony in Latin, not only of the Pelagian movement in the East but above all of the thinking of Nestorius.

PL 48, 63-172, ACO I 5, I, 3-70; S. Prete, Marius Mercator, Commonitoria, Bologna 1959; Id., Mario Mercatore, I memoriali antipelagiani, Siena 1960; Id., Mario Mercatore polemista antipelagiano, Turin 1958; O. Wermelinger, Marius Mercator: DSp 10 (1978) 610-615; V. Grossi: Patrologia III, 471-473.

V. Grossi

MARIUS of Avenches (d. 593/594). A bishop of Avenches (Aventicum) and of Lausanne, active in the 2nd half of the 6th c., Marius wrote a Chronicon in continuation of the one by *Prosper of Aquitaine. The work covers the span of time from 455 to 585. It is concerned with the deeds of the *Franks, *Burgundians, *Goths and *Longobards (Lombards), and in particular with the affairs of Burgundy, the author's own region. Marius is proud of his Roman ancestry, and in his work he finds satisfaction in emphasizing the *Byzantine reconquest of *Africa and of *Italy.

CPL 2268; PL 72, 793-802; MGH, Auct. ant. 11, 232-239; DCB 3, 835; BBKL V, 835-837; J. Favrod, La Chronique de Marius d'Avenches, Lausanne [2]1993.

M. Simonetti

MARIUS CLAUDIUS VICTORIUS. See *CLAUDIUS MARIUS VICTORIUS

MARIUS VICTORINUS (ca. 280–285; d. after 363). Gaius Marius Victorinus was of *African origin and a master of *rhetoric; establishing himself at *Rome, his great success merited a statue in the Forum. Around 355, at an advanced age, he converted to Christianity; we do not know for what reason. He vacated his academic post in 362, as a result of the edict of the emperor *Julian the Apostate that barred Christian professors from teaching. We do not have information on him after this date. He wrote many works, both before and after his conversion. The works of the first period, in a grammatical and philosophical vein (including commentaries on works of Cicero and Aristotle, as well as translations of Aristotle, *Porphyry of Tyre and perhaps *Plotinus), are not our current concern. We stop to consider only those of Christian content, the *theological and *exegetical works.

In the first group we include a series of anti-Arian writings, arranging them acc. to the chronological and logical order given by Pierre Hadot: (1) Candidi Arriani ad Marium Victorinum de generatione divina; (2) Marii Victorini ad Candidum Arrianum; (3) Candidi Arriani epistola ad Marium Victorinum; (4) Adversus Arrium l. I (part one; chs. 1-47). Liber primus de trinitate; (5) Adversus Arrium l. I (part two; chs. 48-64). Quod trinitas homoousios sit; (6) Adversus Arrium l. II. De homoousio contra haereticos; (7) Adversus Arrium l. III. De homoousio; (8) Adversus Arrium l. IV. De homoousio; (9) De homoousio recipiendo. Numbers 1-4 constitute a sort of dossier of letters between *Candidus the Arian and Marius Victorinus. In no. 1, Candidus presents the *Arian doctrine on the basis of themes and procedures of a *Neoplatonic type, and in no. 2 Marius Victorinus responds to him, presenting the *Catholic doctrine on the same philosophical basis. In no. 3 Candidus makes the counterargument, harkening back to the spokesmen for Arianism, Arius and *Eusebius of *Nicomedia, of whom he presents two letters in Latin translation. Marius Victorinus responds in no. 4, taking into account not only these themes but also the situation created in 358 with the overwhelming prevalence of *Basil of *Ancyra and of the *homoiousians. Pierre Nautin and Manlio Simonetti have demonstrated that Candidus is none other than a literary pretense of Marius Victorinus, who exploits this clever device for the sake of better presenting the discussion in utramque partem.

There is a sharp contrast in the formal plans of nos. 4 and 5, because Marius Victorinus completely abandons Candidus, all the while continuing to debate the homoiousians. Then no. 6 refers to the situation of the pro-Arians prevailing at the Council of *Rimini in 359; in the defense of the *homoousios declared at Rimini, he is more balanced toward the homoiousians. Numbers 7-9 continue to develop the defense of the homoousios, but do so without close connection to the political situation that stabilized for some time after 359. Thus we date nos. 1-4 to 358–359, no. 5 to 360 and nos. 6-9 to 361–363. More or less contemporaneous to these writings, the *hymns Adesto, Miserere Domine and Deus Dominus contain a doctrinal argument. They follow an approximate rhythmical structure that does not allow for an interpretation based on classical meter. Deus Dominus accentuates Neoplatonic elements.

Having converted later in life, Marius Victorinus knew *Platonic philosophy much better than Christian theology. Therefore, although handling very technical arguments that involve the defense of the *Nicene homoousios, he frequently resorted to the Platonic and ended up in a solitary position within the Christian tradition. He conceives of the *Trinity as a double dyad. The first is defined as Father/Son, with the divine generation seen as a process of self-limitation and a qualification of God who is absolutely transcendent: Father/Son = esse, to be in potential/sic esse, to be in act (Adv. Arrium I, 29). In being in act the Son is activity, he is the being in action of the Father, who is being inclined toward himself: Father/Son = esse/moveri; agere/operari; substantia/operatio; actio/motus (Adv. Arrium I, 4.42; III, 3). The second pole of the dyad, the Son as motus in turn is articulated in two instances: Christ = vivere, vita; *Holy Spirit = intellegere, sapientia. As a line extends from a point, the motus (Son), developing from the esse (Father), first of all he (Christ) is *life, who then creates and vivifies the *world; then he is intelligence, wisdom (Holy Spirit), who then leads the world back to *God (Adv. Arrium I, 26; IV, 7). The splitting of the motus into vita and intelligentia is a process of separation from the Father, a descent, for creating the world, and in returning to the Father, an ascent, together with the world: status progressio regressus (Hymn. 3,71-73), in which the Holy Spirit has the function of rejoining the Son to the Father: patris et filii copula (Hymn. 1,4).

On the basis of this Platonizing interpretation of the Trinity, the relationship between the three divine persons is understood in the sense of true and proper identity, in which, however, each of the three has potentiam suam (personality, individuality) on the basis of the diverse operationes, by which each is other than the other two on the basis of the specific act that is inherent in his potentia (Adv. Arrium I, 13.18.41.59). In this way, Marius Victorinus defends the homoousios against the Arians, thus distancing himself from *Sabellianism, thanks to the distinction of the divine substance in three existentiae. He prefers the term existentia over persona, a term that he finds to be less individualizing.

After 362, Marius Victorinus wrote a series of *commentaries on Paul. With some lacunae, we have received the commentaries on Ephesians, Galatians and Philippians. He also wrote commentaries on Romans and on 1 and 2 Corinthians. He was the first to write a *Latin commentary on Paul. Although he did make recourse to *Greek sources (*Origin), he wrote everything on his own, being well qualified by his experience as a commentator on *pagan philosophical texts. Every commentary is preceded by an introduction in which the author explains the occasion and the content of the individual letters, although we have not received the introduction to Philippians. Each is based on sound textual criticism and explains the Pauline text in a literal way, without recourse to the sort of *allegorical interpretation that was treasured by the Greek commentators. In the process, Marius Victorinus accentuates the tone of Paul's antilegalistic polemic, and he tends to show antipathy for the *Jewish religion as well as a staggering ignorance of the OT. Furthermore, there are some who have detected in his commentaries the influence of the *Marcionite prologues to the letters of Paul. The theme of justification by *faith is also explored in depth. The devaluation of good works is viewed in the light of a Platonizing interpretation of the Pauline opposition of faith to works, understood as an opposition of intellectual, *contemplative activity to practical activity.

The MSS that have transmitted these exegetical writings to us claim for Marius Victorinus three works that are not his: De verbis scripturae: factum est vespere et mane dies unus; Liber ad Iustinum Manichaeum; De physicis. Yet as a whole his work had little resonance, due both to the not so perspicacious style and to the isolated position of his trinitarian reflection within the earlier and contemporaneous theological tradition. Only *Augustine would come to make use of such a concept: Holy Spirit, copula of the Father and of the Son; the human *soul, in the sense of esse vivere intellegere, an *image of the Trinity.

CPL 94-100; PL 8, 993-1310; SC 68-69 (theological works); CSEL 83 (id.); ed. Locher, Leipzig 1972–1976 (BT); F. Gori, Corona Patrum 8, Turin 1981 (Pauline commentaries); Patrologia III, 65-75 (bibl.); P. Hadot, Marius Victorinus. Recherches sur sa vie et ses œuvres, Paris 1971 (bibl.); W. Erdt, Marius Victorinus Afer, der erste lateinische Pauluskommentator, Frankfurt am M. 1980; G. Lettieri, L'esegesi neoplatonica dei generi sommi del sofista: Plotino e Mario Vittorino: AnSE 10 (1993) 451-493; G. Raspanti, Mario Vittorino esegeta di S. Paolo, Palermo 1996; N.

Cipriani, Agostino lettore dei commentari paolini di Mario Vittorino: Augustinianum 38 (1998) 413-428.

M. Simonetti

MARK, Gospel of

I. The consensual tradition - II. The textual tradition - III. The use of the gospel of Mark in the ancient liturgy - IV. Exegetical interpretation.

I. The consensual tradition. The ancient church considered Mark and his gospel to be the authentic voice and the true interpreter of the *apostle Peter. This opinion came to be affirmed in the first centuries of Christianity and remained unchallenged through the entire span of the patristic era. The first testimony to the authorship of this gospel is given by Bishop *Papias of Hierapolis (*Eus., HE 3, 39,14-15). Precisely in *Phrygia, it was a common opinion that Mark was the author of the gospel, with an emphasis on the book's direct dependence on the preaching of the apostle Peter. A second testimony belongs to *Clement of *Alexandria, who seems to confirm the earlier *tradition and who describes Mark as a trustworthy and sincere narrator of the authoritative and widely recognized public teaching on Christ, of whom Peter made himself a spokesperson while he was at *Rome (Hypotyposeis [Fragments] VII). During the 2nd c. in the West and specifically in *Gaul, *Irenaeus of *Lyons, heeding the tradition coming out of Phrygia and *Egypt, left a written testimony on the tradition of *Smyrna that he himself had received concerning the identity of Mark (Adv. haer. 3,1,1). Even *Origen, who had a wide and direct knowledge of the *Palestinian, Alexandrian and Roman traditions, confirmed this opinion, advancing the hypothesis that the same Peter, in person, had told Mark what to put into writing. According to *Origen, these traditions show that Mark was the same person whom the apostle called "my son" in 1 Pet 5:13 (Eus., HE 6, 25,4-5).

The multiple traditions spread both in the East and the West, independent of each other but all appearing to promote and promulgate the same message regarding the authenticity of this gospel, seem to demonstrate that the church unanimously approved the promulgation of the text of the apostle Mark. Even *Jerome (De vir. ill. 8), an expert in the traditions coming out of Rome, *Dalmatia, Gaul, *Antioch, *Constantinople and Palestine, argues not only that the consensus on such a tradition was unanimous among all the churches right from the beginning but also that the validity of the evangelical message had a particularly elevated importance, since the same Peter had read and approved the work of Mark, who would have then promulgated it in Alexandria, the city of which he was the first bishop and where he died.

Therefore, by the time of *Augustine (De cons. Ev. 1,1,2-2,4), a universal and widely sustained tradition had developed over three centuries of precedent that the *Holy Spirit had inspired the precise transmission of the Markan gospel tradition from the *testimony of the apostles to the ecumenical fellowship of the church.

II. The textual tradition. As far as the textual tradition is concerned, it has always been evident that Mark presented a version of the good news that is shorter than *Matthew's version, but the premise of the literary dependence has not always been generally recognized. At least since the time of Irenaeus, it was assumed that Mark's gospel had been written after Matthew's gospel. As Augustine was inclined to think, one got the impression that Mark was nothing other than an abbreviated version of Matthew (De cons. Ev. 1,2,4; 3,3,6; 4,10,11). The opinion that Matthew and Luke are based directly on the text of Mark did not develop until the 19th c., and even though the majority of contemporary scholars are inclined to adopt such a solution, it continues to be discussed. The argument of those who lean toward a dependency of Mark on Matthew is still strong.

III. The use of the gospel of Mark in the ancient liturgy. The fact that Mark is frequently cited in the ancient literature demonstrates its use in every locality where the pastoral and missionary activity of the early church extended. The evidence, therefore, indicates that this text represented a normative component of the corpus of *liturgical resources in primitive Christianity. From the distant past the church included it in the *canon of the NT with a broad and seemingly unanimous consensus. From the beginning of the universal Christian witness, Mark has been mentioned as a part of the depository of resources for gaining knowledge of Jesus Christ.

Eusebius used to argue that the work of Mark obtained the approval of Peter's authority for the purpose of "being used in the churches" (HE 2,15,2). Jerome agrees with the claim that Peter "approved it and authorized its distribution for the reading in the churches" (De vir. ill. 8). No other gospel was received more clearly or with a broader consensus for its use in public worship. Augustine affirmed that Mark, who did not take part in the company of the *twelve, was chosen by the *Holy Spirit, along with Luke, to demonstrate that the wellspring of divine *grace did not dry up with the twelve *apostles (Discourses 239,1). For his part, *John Chrysostom, in demonstrating that Matthew "composed his gospel in the language of the Hebrews," adds, "and even Mark, as they say, did the same on the request of the disciples in Egypt" (Homilies on the Gospel of Matthew 1,3).

IV. Exegetical interpretation. Mark presents some problems for the history of *exegesis. While there are a variety of verse-by-verse patristic commentaries on Matthew, Luke and John, no complete commentaries on Mark have come down to us. Without doubt, at the exegetical level Mark was rather overlooked. With its emphasis on spiritual exegesis, a Tractatus in Marci Evangelium (CCL 78, 449-500) was first reckoned among the *Latin *homilies of Chrysostom and then attributed to Jerome. We do not know of any other commentary on Mark that predates the one from a writer of the 5th or perhaps the 6th c., known by the name of *Victor of Antioch (Catena in Marcum, in J.A. Cramer, Catenae graecorum Patrum, Oxford 1840, I, 263-477), who claims that he had no predecessors to his work. Whether the Commentarius in Evangelium secundum Marcum of *ps.-Jerome (PL 30, 589-644) dates to the 1st half of the 5th c. or after the 7th c. is a matter of debate. In the 8th c. there appeared the extensive commentary on Mark by the Venerable *Bede (d. 735).

In the end, if we want to retrace the footsteps of an exegetical principle followed by the Fathers in the reading and interpretation of this particular gospel, we have to sort out the distinct references that we find scattered in the homilies, letters and tractati, adhering to the controlling principle in early Christian exegesis, acc. to which every text is illuminated by the other sacred texts and by the essence of the history of *revelation.

H.M. Humphrey, A Bibliography for the Gospel of Mark, 1954–1980, Studies in the Bible and Early Christianity, I, New York 1982; Id., The Gospel of Mark: An Indexed Bibliography 1980–2005, Lewiston, NY 2006; G. Wagner, ed., An Exegetical Bibliography of the New Testament: Matthew and Mark, Macon 1983; F. Neirynck, The Gospel of Mark: A Cumulative Bibliography 1950–1990, Louvain 1992.

Editions: CPL 594; Ps.-Jerome, Expositio in Evangelium secundum Marcum, PL 30, 560D-567B; Id., Commentarium in Evangelium secundum Marcum, PL 30, 589-644; PLS 2, 125-171; Tractatus in Marci Evangelium, CCL 78, 449-500; Victor of Antioch, Catena in Marcum, in J.A. Cramer, Catenae graecorum Patrum, Oxford 1840, I, 263-477; Bede, In Marci Evangelium Expositio, CCL 120, 431-648.

Studies: LTK³ 6, 1395-1404; J. Kuerzinger, Papias von Hierapolis und die Evangelien des Neuen Testaments, Regensburg 1983; ed. H. Cancik, Markus-Philologie. Historische, literargeschichtliche und stilistische Untersuchungen zum zweiten Evangelium, Mohr 1984; P. Dschulnigg, Sprache, Redaktion und Intention des Markus-Evangeliums, Stuttgart 1984; F. Nerynck, The Apocryphal Gospels and the Gospel of Mark, in J.-M. Sevrin (ed.), The New Testament in Early Christianity: La réception des écrits néotestamentaires dans le christianisme primitif, Leuven 1989, 123-175; F. Fendler, Studien zum Markusevangelium: zur Gattung, Chronologie, Messiasgeheimnistheorie und Überlieferung des zweiten Evangeliums, Göttingen 1991 (Göttinger theologische Arbeiten 49); R. Trevijano, La obra de Papías y sus noticias sobre Mc y Mt: Salmanticensis 41 (1994) 181-212; M. Cahill, The Identification of the First Markan Commentary: RBi 101 (1994) 258-268; D. Farkasfalvy, The Papias Fragments on Mark and Matthew and Their Relationship to Luke's Prologue: An Essay on the Pre-History of the Synoptic Problem, in A.J. Malherbe, F.W. Norris and J.W. Thompson (eds.), The Early Church in Its Context: Essays in Honor of Everett Ferguson, SNT 90, Leiden 1998, 92-106; Marco: BCP NT 2, Italian edition ed. G. Pilara, Rome 2003; T.C. Oden - C.A. Hall, eds., Mark, ACCS NT 2, Downers Grove, IL 2005 (1998).

G. Pilara

MARK, poet (7th c.). The only secure facts on the identity of the poet Mark can be assembled from a carmen of 33 elegiac couplets that he composed in praise of *Benedict of Nursia, and that Aimoin de Fleury inserted into his Sermo in festivitatibus sancti patris Benedicti. In this carmen, in which Monte Cassino is described and some marvelous deeds of Benedict are illustrated, reference is made to the life of *sin led by the author before he arrived on a *pilgrimage to Monte Cassino, where the carmen was composed after the death of Benedict (vv. 13-16 and 65-66). It is difficult to date the carmen and to place its author chronologically, about which *Gregory the Great is silent. According to H.S. Brechter, Mark would have been contemporaneous or nearly so to Paul the Deacon, who is the first author that mentions him (Hist. Lang. I, 26). Without proof, *Peter the Deacon maintains that Mark was a monk of Monte Cassino and a disciple of Benedict (De vir. ill. Casin. III, where he considers him to be an author of highly elegant verses: De adventu Sanctissimi Benedicti ad Casinum, de situ loci constructioneque Coenobii). It does not seem that Mark was a monk, as he appears to know the secular poets (Virgil, Propertius, Ovid, Statius), and he does not seem to have been educated at Monte Cassino. In his carmen that is characterized by formal elegance, stylistic clarity and metrical precision, Mark desires above all to celebrate that place where Benedict had worked; his verses are first of all a *prayer to the *saint, to whom the author devotes himself. Perhaps the carmen of Mark is a little later than the Rule of Saint Benedict*.

CPL 1854; PL 80, 183-186; M. Galdi, Il carme di Marco Poeta e l'apoteosi di San Benedetto, Naples 1929; H.S. Brechter, Marcus

Poeta von Monte Cassino, in Benedictus, der Vater des Abendlandes, Munich 1947, 341-359; S. Rocca, Versus in Benedicti laudem (with text and critical apparatus): Rombarb 3 (1978) 335-363.

S. Zincone

MARK, pope (d. 336). His pontificate lasted less than ten months, from 18 January to 7 October 336. According to the Liber pontificalis, he was of Roman origin, a son of a certain Priscus. Mark established that the bishop consecrating the pope would be the bishop of Ostia (LP I, 202; see Aug., Brev. coll. cum don. III, 16, 29: PL 43, 641). He ordered the construction of various churches in *Rome, including the basilica of S. Marco, incorporated much later into the Palazzo Venezia. Mark was buried in the *cemetery of the catacomb of St. Balbina (see Jaffé 181).

Eus., HE 10,5,18; LP I, 8-9, 80-81, 202-204; II, 47, 77; III, 81; A. Ferrua, La basilica di papa Marco: La Civiltà Cattolica 99 (1948) III, 503-513; BS 9, 699-700 (G.D. Gordini); J.N.D. Kelly, The Oxford Dictionary of Popes, Oxford-New York 1986, 28-29; M. Cecchelli, La basilica di S. Marco a piazza Venezia (Roma). Nuove scoperte e indagini, in Akten des XII. internationalen Kongresses für christliche Archäologie, Münster 1995, 640-644; BBKL 5, 781-782; LTK[3] 6, 1407 (G. Schwaiger); EPapi 1, 333-334 (G.M. Vian).

M. Spinelli

MARK, Secret Gospel of. An alleged discovery—on the part of Morton Smith in 1958–1973, in the Mar Saba *Monastery near *Jerusalem—of two fragments of a secret gospel, cited in an otherwise lost letter penned by *Clement of Alexandria to a certain Theodore. Clement speaks of three gospels of Mark: the *canonical one; the second, a more extended version for the "perfect ones" in the *faith (the Secret Gospel); and finally a third, that would be an expansion of the "secret gospel" on the part of *Carpocrates of Alexandria. In historical terms, the "discovery" would harken back to a historical Jesus who was a bit of a libertine and *magician. This secret gospel has been accepted as authentic by prominent scholars, but has also been considered by others to be an all-too-clever and recent fabrication (JECS 11/2 [2003] 155-163). In any case, the Secret Gospel of Mark, if it is not a text of recent invention, could constitute a manipulation of the canonical gospel of *Mark on the part of a libertine sect in the final years of the 2nd c. For the most recent discussions of the issues, see works Carlson, Brown and Grafton in the bibliography.

New Testament Apocrypha, ed. W. Schneemelcher, Louisville 1991, I, 106-109; R. Trevijano, La Bibbia nel cristianesimo antico, Brescia 2003, 345-347; JECS 11 (2003) 133-163 (articles of Hendrick, Stroumsa, Ehrman); S. Carlson, The Gospel Hoax: Morton Sminth's Invention of Secret Mark, Waco, TX 2005; S.G. Brown, Morton Smith as M Madiotes: Stephen Carlson's Attribution of Secret Mark to a Bald Swindler, Journ. Study of Historical Jesus 6.1 (2008) 106-125; A. Grafton, Gospel Secrets: The Biblical Controversies of Morton Smith, in The Nation, January 26, 2009.

R. Trevijano

MARK of Arethusa (4th c.). Mark was a bishop of Arethusa (Er Rastan) in *Syria. He participated in a delegation led by *Eusebius of Caesarea that in 342 went to *Milan, to present to the emperor *Constantius II a formula of *faith derived from the formula of the Council of *Antioch in 341, in the attempt to heal the conflicts that arose in 340–341 between the Western supporters and Eastern opponents of the Nicene Creed. We find him in 359 as an opponent, together with *Acacius of Caesarea, of the *homoousians, and a developer of an intermediate theological line between these partisans and the radical *Arians. In this context he drafted the Fourth Formula of *Sirmium of 22 May 359, which defines Christ as like the *Father in all ways, acc. to the *Scriptures. It is not certain that he took part in the Council of *Seleucia in 359. At the accession of *Julian the Apostate to the throne, in the context of the anti-Christian acts of violence that were tolerated or favored by this emperor, he was cruelly tortured and killed by the *pagans who blamed him for the destruction of their *temples. His *feast is celebrated on 27 March.

DCB 3, 825; Simonetti 592; BS 8, 701; H.C. Brennecke, Studien zur Geschichte der Homöer: der Osten bis zum Ende der homöischen Reichskirche, Tübingen 1988, 134-135; F. Sforza Barcellona, Martiri e confessori dell'età di Giuliano l'Apostata: dalla storia alla leggenda, in Pagani e cristiani da Giuliano l'Apostata al sacco di Roma, ed. F.E. Consolino, Soveria Mannelli 1995, 53-83.

M. Simonetti

MARK the Deacon. The author of the Vita Porphyrii. *Porphyry was bishop of *Gaza (395–420). In the Vita Mark appears as a calligrapher of *Asian origin who at *Jerusalem joined the monk Porphyry, who had become ill, occupying himself with distributing his belongings to the *poor. Healed as a result of such circumstances, ordained a priest and then becoming bishop of Gaza, Porphyry used Mark, by now his deacon, in missions to the emperor to solicit support in his commitment to the total destruction of *paganism. Mark acts as an eyewitness of the narrated events. Beginning in the 17th c., the critical scholarship has pointed to a series of inaccuracies within the Vita Porphyrii, as well as to a literary dependence on the Historia religiosa of *Theodoret of Cyrrhus, which suggest a date after 444–445 for the redaction of the Vita Porphyrii. The question becomes increasingly complicated by the discovery of a *Georgian *translation of the Vita based on a *Syriac text that is strikingly different from the *Greek text, and even this is reworked. It is supposed that the original Vita Porphyrii was written in Syriac, probably by the deacon Mark, and it is argued that the dates on Mark that are obtained from the redactions of the Vita Porphyrii in our possession must be taken with extreme caution.

CPG 6722; BHG 1570: PG 65, 1211-1262 (only the Lat. tr.); Vie de Porphyre, évêque de Gaza, ed. H. Grégoire - M.-A. Kugener, Paris 1930 (with a Fr. tr.); P. Peeters, La vie géorgienne de saint Porphyre de Gaza: AB 59 (1941) 65-216 (Georgian text and Lat. tr.); C. Carta, Vita di san Porfirio scritta da Marco Diacono, Jerusalem 1971 (It. tr. In addition to the introductions of the cited editions of Grégoire, Kugener and Peeters: F.-M. Abel, Marc Diacre et la biographie de saint Porphyre, Conférences de Saint-Étienne, Paris 1919, 219-284; J. Zellinger, Die Proömien in der Vita Porphyrii und in der "religiosa historia" des Theodoret: Philologus 85 (1930) 209-221; DACL 14, 1464-1504; M. Gigante, Sul testo della "Vita di Porfirio," Studi medievali in onore di Antonio de Stefano, Palermo 1956, 227-229; J. Rougé, Tempête et littérature dans quelques textes chrétiens: Nuovo Didaskaleion 12 (1962) 55-69; BS 10, 1039-1043; DSp 10, 265-267; R. Van Dam, From Paganism to Christianity at Late Antique Gaza: Viator 16 (1985) 1-20; G. Mussies, Marnard, God of Gaza: ANRW 2, vol. 18/4, 2412-2457; M. Blume, La Vie de Porphyre et les papyrus: quelques aspects de la vie municipale à la fin du IVe et au début du Ve siècle: Chronique d'Égypte 66 (1991) 237-244; F. Trombley, Hellenic Religion and Christianization c. 370–529, 1, Leiden 1995, 188-243; 246-282; M. Scopello, Julie, manichéenne d'Antioche (d'après la Vie de Porphyre de Marc le Diacre, ch. 85-91): Antiquité Tardive 5 (1997) 187-209; Patrologia V, 275-277.

F. Scorza Barcellona

MARK the Gnostic (2nd c.). A disciple of *Valentinus, Mark the *Gnostic belongs to the E branch of the school of *Valentinus. According to the testimony of *Irenaeus of Lyons (Adv. haer. I, 13-16), Mark taught in *Asia Proconsularis, adhering to the Valentinian doctrines on the *aeons. Characteristic are his speculations on the letters of the alphabet and *numbers. Irenaeus presents Mark as a *magician, who used to celebrate the *Eucharist with spells and wonders and who used to seduce many women. Not content to claim for himself the gift of prophecy, he used to pretend to be able to pass it on to others as well. His disciples (Marcosians) went on preaching journeys as far as *Gaul, and Irenaeus personally knew some of them. Irenaeus likewise comments that these disciples were making use of many *apocryphal writings that they themselves had composed.

The sources on Mark are presented in the original language and translated into German with analysis and commentary by N. Forster in Marcus Magus. Kult, Lehre und Gemeindeleben einer valentinianischen Gnostikergruppe. Sammlung der Quellen und Kommentar, Tübingen 1999. Studies: H. Leisegang, Die Gnosis, Leipzig 1924, 326-349; F. Dornseiff, Das Alphabet in Mystik und Magie, Leipzig ²1925, 126-133; M. Sagnard, La gnose valentinienne et le témoignage de saint Irénée, Paris 1947, 358-386; G. Casadio, La visione in Marco il Mago e nella gnosi di tipo sethiano: Augustinianum 29 (1989) 123-146; LACL³ 490; Frede 1995, 695-719.

C. Gianotto

MARK the Hermit. The author of six *ascetical opuscules (I and II forming a single series of sentences) and two *christological opuscules. Critical editions and MSS also attribute to him some pieces belonging to *Marcianus or to *Macarius of Egypt (CPG 6090-6102; PG 65, 893-1140; J. Kunze, Marcus Eremita, Leipzig 1895). He came to be identified with a *monk named Mark in the vicinity of *Tarsus around 518, one whom *Severus of *Antioch compelled to endorse the declarations against *Nestorianism (= *Chalcedonianism) and *Messalianism. Hesse and Grillmeier, however, would place him prior to the First Council of *Ephesus (431) and even around 390. Durand notes that the author does not refrain from *allegorical *exegesis that employs 2 Peter (excluded from the biblical canon by *John Chrysostom, *Theodore of Mopsuestia and *Theodoret of Cyrrhus), and that he does not resemble Macarius-Symeon (ps.-Macarius). Durand concludes that the author would have begun a monastic lifestyle twenty or thirty years before the council, and that he would have written the tractatus on the *incarnation immediately after the council in a secondary city of Asia Minor. He further notes an insistence on a *theopaschitism that was compatible with *orthodoxy. However, the author avoids typically Alexandrian terminology such as theotokos.

CPG/S 379-380. 496; DSp 10, 274-283; O. Hesse, Markos Eremites und Symeon von Mesopotamien, Göttingen 1973; A. Grillmeier, Marco Eremita e l'origenismo: Cristianesimo nella storia 1 (1980) 9-58; J. Gribomont, Marc l'Érémite et la christologie évagrienne: Cristianesimo nella Storia 3 (1982) 73-81; M. le Moine, Traités spirituels et théologiques, translated Cl.A. Zirnheld, introduced by K. Ware, Bégrolles-en-Mauges 1985; G.-M. de Durand, Marc le Moine, Traités (SC 445-455), Paris 1999–2000.

J. Gribomont

MARO, anchorite monk (d. ca. 410). *Theodoret of Cyrrhus (d. ca. 466), the author of the Religious History, is the only historian or biographer roughly contemporary with the *anchorite Maro (Marūn) to tell us anything of his existence (Hist. Relig. chapters 16, 21 and 22; HE: PG 82, 1418). He withdrew to a mountaintop once used in pagan worship, where he put up a tent for himself, but spent most of his time in the open air, thus establishing a different form of eremitical life. His *asceticism and holiness won for him the gift of being able to heal both physical and spiritual ailments. This ability earned him a reputation that drew many crowds. Theodoret alludes to disciples of Maro—e.g., James—but he does not speak of a *cenobitic community as having gathered around Maro, still less of one under his direction. He died after a brief illness. His body was fought over by those who wished to have it. Later, the inhabitants of a nearby village managed to acquire it, and at the time of Theodoret's writing, Maro's tomb was a place of pilgrimage. We do not know the exact whereabouts of the holy anchorite's retreat near *Apamea (the modern city of Homs), in Syria Secunda.

A further detail of chronology is supplied by the same author, when he mentions the disciple named James of Cyrrhestica, who had been under Maro's direction thirty-eight years earlier. If one allows that the bishop of Cyrrhus wrote his Religious History about the year 444, Maro must have still been alive in 406. This conclusion does not, however, permit us to identify Maro with the priest of the same name to whom St. *John Chrysostom wrote a letter between 404 and 407 (Ep. 36: PG 52, 629), as there is nothing in that letter to suggest that the anchorite mentioned in the Religious History was ever a priest.

Did the presence of Maro's tomb in Cyrrhestica and its veneration result in the building of a monastery in the same place? No definitive answer has yet been given to this question.

It is not our intention to address here the problem of the relationship between Maro and the monastery N of *Apamea that shares his name—which was established in 452 through the generosity of the emperor—nor of the relationship that would make this community of the Maronite Church a direct descendant of the anchorite.

Théodoret de Cyr, Histoire des moines de Syrie, ed. P. Canivet - A. Leroy Molinghen, 2 (SC 257), Paris 1979; A.J. Festugière, Antioche païenne et chrétienne: Libanius, Chrysostome et les moines de Syrie, Paris 1959, 295ff.; P. Canivet, Le monachisme syrien selon Théodoret de Cyr, Paris 1977 (esp. pp. 197–302). On the monastery of S. Maro, see P. Naaman, Théodoret de Cyr et le monastère de S. Maroun, Beirut 1971; B. Daou, Le site du couvent principal de S. Maron en Syrie: PdO 3 (1972) 145–151. Concerning Maro and his cult see BS 8, 1194–1200. It is not possible to give here a bibl. relating to the Maronite Church; the essentials are dealt with in M. Hayek, Liturgie maronite. Histoire et textes eucharistiques, Paris 1964 (esp. pp. 3–60); P. Dib, Histoire de l'Église maronite, 2 vols., Beirut 1962; DIP 5, 1002f.; LTK[3] 6, 1410.

J.-M. SAUGET

MARO, John (7th–8th c.). According to some later *Maronite traditions, he was the first Maronite patriarch of *Antioch (685–707). Some writings are ascribed to him, among which there is an *anaphora. Owing to the lack of objective information, he is to be considered legendary, perhaps confused with *Maro the anchorite.

BS 8, 1194-1200; Cath 8, 703.

S.J. VOICU

MARO of Edessa. *Anastasius the Sinaite (7th c.), in his Hodegos (XIII, 10, 98-111 and XXII), quotes texts—otherwise unknown to us—written by one Maro of *Edessa, a *monophysite author. Their authenticity is doubtful. Both testimonia presuppose the christological debates of the 6th c., and Anastasius claims he got his second citation at *Alexandria. The commentator of the Codex Vindobonensis theol. gr. 166 is clearly mistaken when he states that Maro had been the recipient of a letter in which *Ibas of Edessa gave an account of the Council of *Ephesus (431) and of *Cyril of Alexandria's alliance with the Eastern bishops (CPG 6500).

CPG 6986 and 7745; K.-H. Uthemann, Anastasii Sinaitae Viae dux (CCG 8), Turnhout-Leuven 1981, 255-256 and 304.

K. DEN BIESEN

MARONITES. A Christian community of Syrian origin. Its existence is said to go back to *Maro, a friend of *John Chrysostom (d. 407). St. Maro's Monastery was established by his disciples on the banks of the river Orontes, N of *Apamea (modern Homs) in *Syria. It enjoyed a great reputation, and its monks were among the staunchest defenders of the definition of *Chalcedon (451) during the christological controversies of the 6th c. For this reason about 530 of them were killed in 517. At the Council of *Constantinople a certain Paul was present as a delegate of the monastery of the "blessed Maro."

The region was invaded by the Arabs in 636. Cut off from the discussions and decisions of the Council of *Constantinople held in 680/681, which condemned *monothelitism, the Maronites remained attached to the old view and rejected the dyothelite (see *dyophysitism) formulas. They suffered persecution from the *monophysites (*Jacobites) and from the *Melkites. Owing to persecution by the caliph Al-Mamun (813–833), they moved into the mountains of Lebanon, and some eventually moved as far as Cyprus. The Lebanese mountains became their spiritual center in about 939, when the patriarchate was transferred there from *Antioch. During the Crusades the Maronite Church entered into communion with the Church of Rome; in 1216 their patriarch, Jeremiah, was recognized as patriarch of Antioch, and since then the Maronites have remained in communion with Rome. It is remarkable that this union was total, not leaving behind any separate group.

The Maronite liturgy is of the West Syrian variety, although, like many of the Maronite Church's structures, has suffered heavy Latinization.

DSp 10, 631-644; DTC 10, 1-142; P. Dib, L'église maronite. I-II, Paris-Beirut 1930–1962; P. Naaman, Théodoret de Cyr et le monastère de Saint Maroun, Beirut 1971; Id., Histoire de l'église maronite, Beirut 1962; B. Daou, Le site du couvent principal de Saint Maron en Syrie: PdO 3 (1972) 145-152; J. Gribomont, Documents sur les origines de l'Église Maronite: PdO 5 (1974) 95-132; G. Sorge, I maroniti nella storia, Rome 1978; A.A. King, The Rites of Eastern Christendom. I, Rome 1947, 211-320; M. Hayek, Liturgie maronite . . ., Paris 1964; R. Hiestand, Die Integration der Maroniten in die römische Kirche: OCP 54 (1988) 119-152; H. Suermann, Die Gründungsgeschichte der Maronitischen Kirche, Wiesbaden 1998.

S.J. Voicu

MARRIAGE

I. Theology of marriage - II. Liturgical rites. - III. Iconography - IV. Spiritual marriage - V. Mixed marriages.

I. Theology of marriage. The patristic doctrine on marriage derives from the OT and NT, yet it has absorbed the influence of Greek philosophy (esp. *Stoic and *Platonic) and of Roman law. The church fathers rarely talk about a definition of marriage as an accord of two wills, the pactio coniugalis (Amb., Inst. virg. VI, 41). They have an implied understanding of this concept in Roman law (see nuptiae sunt coniunctio maris et feminae, consortium omnis vitae, divini et humani iuris communication [Mod. D. 23.2.1.]), in which marriage was distinguished from concubinage, precisely by the expression or suggestion of the affectio maritalis (a constitutive sign of marriage, along with the domum mariti deductio). Instead, it seems that certain church fathers make changes in emphasis as they interpret this juridical institution. *Ambrose of Milan stresses the consensual element; in the Middle Ages, the school of Paris known as the "consensualists" would do the same. *John Chrysostom retains the juridical effect of the expression of the affectio maritalis for the moment of the copula carnalis; compare the school of Bologna known as the "realist consensualists."

Yet the innovation of *Christianity consists in the fact that this accord is ratified by God, in accordance with Gen 2:23-24, the primary text that constitutes the model for every marriage. As the nymphostolos (Aster. Amasea: PG 40, 228 C) in the wedding ceremony, God leads the bride to the groom and ratifies their union. Here is the principle of unity and indissolubility. As Jesus says in Mt 19:4-5, this text is pronounced by God himself; it expresses the "law of marriage," acc. to *Origen, the school of *Antioch and others.

Thus the magisterial figures of Christianity in the early centuries were aware that matrimonial unions were regulated by their very own norms, as well as by the laws of state. However, the view of inequality in the pagan mentality of marriage was changing very slowly. The reason for it taking a long time is that even the lower social classes within Christianity felt the supernatural "bond" that was established by God and expressed in various ways (Theod. Mops., in Reuss, TU 61, p. 107). They knew that not only the wife but also the husband is connected to the joint party (John Chrys., Hom. 1 Th 5: PG 62, 425). In order to realize and strengthen this sentiment, the church fathers came to stress the religious value of marriage, formulated and expressed in Eph 5:21-33: marriage represents in time the image of the union of Christ and the church in eternity. In the subsequent development of the theology of marriage, *Augustine of Hippo argued that marriage is already a *symbol or sign of the sacramentum magnum, and that it reproduces the reality of the same (De nupt. et conc. I, 10 [11], 21 [23]). The explanations given by Augustine on the matter of the sacramentum* of marriage do not completely correspond to the sacramental theory of later centuries, but nevertheless they sketch out the theory. In accordance with the religious character of marriage, in the later legislation of *Justinian, marriages no longer dissolve automatically in certain cases. As an example, in classical law an imprisonment of war dissolves a marriage, but in Justinianian law this does not occur.

Yet if marriage is the image of the union of Christ and the church, its purposes must also harmonize with the story of salvation. For this reason, procreation is clearly underlined as the aim of marriage. While the *Stoic influence plays a part, a distinctive argument is that procreation participates in the creative work of God. In any case, the recommendation of the apostle *Paul in 1 Cor 7:1-7 ("It is good for the man to abstain from the wife . . . but let every husband have a wife and every woman have a husband") presupposes that procreation is not the only element that justifies the conjugal union. The same recommendation also pertains to abstaining from carnal *temptations. Yet the church fathers often misunderstood the verses in which the apostle admonishes us on how to abstain from sexual activity, "at most, only for the sake of prayer and only for a time" (1 Cor 7:5): this is interpreted as if sexual abstinence were a prerequisite of *prayer (Orig., De orat. 31,4; Com. Mt. XIV, 23; Fragm. 1 Cor. 12). The reasoning behind such an interpretation goes something like this: the church fathers, having read in the OT that there is a certain impurity in sexual relations, whatever may be the true significance contained in certain passages (e.g., Ex 19:14-15; Lev 8:33; 15:1-33; 1 Sam 21:5-6) and after having found a seemingly analogous exhortation in Heb 13:4 ("let the marriage bed be without stain") and a parallel statement in the gathering of the "chaste" in Rev 14:4 ("that shall be the saved among humanity"), still being bound by the pagan mentality of obligatory cultic *continence in the Greco-Roman cults, comparing everything with Paul's "saying" in 1 Cor 7:5 and seeing it as a mutual obligation to deny oneself in a joint agreement to dedicate oneself to prayer, came up with the idea of a "stain" that is inherent in even the most legitimate conjugal act.

Origen, e.g., sees here a "certain" impurity (Com. Mt. XVII, 35), yet clearly distinct from that of *sin, as the parallel sense of Com. Rom. IX, 1 and Hom. Num. XXIII, 3 indicates. This impurity is explained by the theological and metaphysical vision that presupposes it, to the effect that it is none other than an expression of a level that rises above the carnal condition. For Origen, the sensible realm is good, but it is a source of temptation for humanity. Along with egoism, it is inclined to claim the adoration that rightly belongs to "true" realities, the mysteries. The sensible is the visible likeness of the mysteries, weakening the impulse of the *soul, which has *mystery as its rightful end. Every sin is *idolatry, and the sin of idolatry constitutes the impurity that is present in the most legitimate sexual relations. *Jerome, deepening this theological vision with his peculiar shades of meaning, would declare in at least a few texts (Adv. Iovin. I, 7-8) that the conjugal act is sinful to the degree that it impedes prayer (see 1 Cor 7:5), but nonetheless is tolerable to the degree that it is less serious than *fornication. In *John Chrysostom one does not find the idea of impurity, but sexual relations are often seen as the "remedy of concupiscence," a concept taken more or less successfully from 1 Cor 7. For Augustine, above all in the Contra Iulianum III, 53, the conjugal act is in itself good, but with fallen humanity it is always connected in some degree to an evil called concupiscence. He offers the analogous idea (Serm. 51,13,22; Serm. 278,9,9) that the tabulae nuptiales were binding on procreation, but not on sexuality: liberorum procreandorum causa.

What has been described so far applied to young married couples. So what then can be said in defense of the elderly? For this group, one finds structures that are even more rigorous, considering that for its members the positive effects of marriage are experienced less with age. Procreation is no longer possible, and the temptations are no longer so strong (Orig., Hom. Lc. VI). All things considered, sexuality is not therefore treated as an important element of marriage. By way of illustration, even the una caro of Gen 2:24 is taken to mean the accord of will rather than a corporeal union, since this precept is formulated at the very moment in which the woman is fashioned in the *paradise of Eden. It is only after having been expelled on the basis of their sin, acc. to Gen 4:1, that "*Adam knew Eve as his wife" (Orig., Fragm. 1 Cor. 29). Therefore, it does not seem that the consummation of marriage plays a role in its juridical definition. The Roman jurist Domitius Ulpianus gave the formula, nuptias enim non concubitus, sed consensus facit [Ulp. D. 35.1.15]). In a similar sense, marriage is already ratified by the sponsalia prior to the deductio in domum mariti (Council of *Elvira, can. 54; Pope *Siricius, *Letter to Himerius of Tarragona). This position is not generally accepted by the church fathers, as seen by the fact that Ambrose and Chrysostom (see J.M. Soto, 71ff.), in contrast with Augustine (see, e.g., Sermo 51,12), do not treat the union of *Joseph and *Mary as a true marriage, on the basis of the renunciation of the sexual union.

Thus if sexuality is not an important element in itself, the other purpose of Christian marriage is all the more important. This is mutual love, a component of the Augustinian fides, which for Origen consists in "concord, agreement, harmony" (Com. Mt. XIV, 16), in imitation of the love of Christ for the church (Com. Ct. II, 1) and with the elimination of the egoist passion that seeks satisfaction of its own desire and contains within itself an element of the "unharmonious" (Fragm. Eph. 30).

Procreation, abstention from the temptations and mutual love are the positive effects of marriage. Still, they count for less than the positive effects of their counterpart, *virginity. To mention some negative arguments concerning marriage: 1 Cor 7:32-34 sets apart the liberty with which the continent person or the virgin can serve God from the servitude of the person who is married and must attend to the needs of the spouse. The married man belongs to the spouse, and the self-giving love that must be the basis of conjugal love moves beyond the desire of *chastity that would be incompatible with this relationship (Orig., Fragm. 1 Cor. 33). According to *Tertullian, marriage is an impediment in the relationship between human beings and God. And if marriage represents in time the union between Christ and the church in eternity (see above), virginity is already a here-and-now participation in this divine mystery, acc. to Mt 22:30 (Orig.: H. Crouzel, Virginité, 15-44). In this context, the hierarchy between virginity and marriage arises.

Countering the excesses of such a hierarchical interpretation, the church fathers defend the value of marriage against *encratites, *Marcionites, *Montanists, *gnostics (defense from *Clement of Alexandria and from Origen), *Novatians (from *Epiphanius), *Manicheans (from Augustine) and *Priscillianists. They also counter the excesses of some ascetics, as in the Council of *Gangra against *Eustathius of Sebaste. They insist that marriage is a path of salvation and must not be devalued. Indeed, Clement recognizes that marital chastity in a Christian context is more difficult than total chastity. Conjugal chastity consists in the performance of the acts of marriage "with order and at an opportune time" (Orig., Fragm. 1 Cor. 37). Even Tertullian, in his Catholic period, praises marriage in the Ad uxorem. One usually finds a corresponding treatment of virginity with respect to marriage, even if it is excessive (Jerome).

Be that as it may, if virginity has greater value than marriage, the question arises: So why not separate from the spouse for religious reasons, for the heavenly kingdom? Despite the biographical interpretation suggested by the γνήσιε σύζυγε in Phil 4:3, locating in the phrase the wife that Paul had left behind for his ministry, Clement and then Origen are resistant to the idea of spouses separating in order to live in continence. In this sense they are more faithful to the Pauline theology than their post-Nicene counterparts; it is noteworthy that Clement, Origen and again Tertullian fought against the heretics who tore up marriage for religious purposes. The post-Nicene fathers would eventually praise those spouses who led a life of continence, impose this lifestyle on the clergy and even accept the separation of spouses along the lines of *Basil of Caesarea, since one of the two could enter the religious life.

The tendency to equalize the joint parties of marriage is due to Christianity. In the society of Antiquity it is quite common that the wife—even in Christian families—almost becomes an ancilla of the husband (dominus) (Aug., Confess. IX, 9,19). This approach to equality is further detectible in the judgment on *adultery developed by the church fathers.

A. d'Alès, La théologie de Tertullien, Paris 1903; J. Peters, Die Ehe nach der Lehre des hl. Augustinus, Paderborn 1918; A. Moulart, Saint Jean Chrysostome, Paris 1923; H. Preisker, Christentum und Ehe in den ersten drei Jahrhunderten, Berlin 1927; B. Alvès Pereira, La doctrine du mariage selon saint Augustin, Paris 1930; G. Violardo, Il pensiero giuridico di san Girolamo, Milan 1937; Id., Appunti sul diritto matrimoniale in Sant'Ambrogio, in Sant'Ambrogio nel XVI centenario della nascita, Milan 1940, 485-516; O. Ghiacchi, La dottrina matrimoniale di Sant'Ambrogio nel decreto di Graziano, ibid., 523-551; N. Ladomerszky, Saint Augustin, docteur du mariage chrétien, Rome 1942; A. Reuter, Sancti Aurelii Augustini doctrina de bonis matrimonii, Rome 1942; G.H. Joyce, Christian Marriage, London [2]1948; W.J. Dooley, Marriage According to Saint Ambrose, Washington 1948; Ch.H. Naudet, Position de saint Jérôme en face des problèmes sexuels, in Mystique et continences (Études carmélitaines), Paris 1952, 306-356; H. Crouzel, Virginité et mariage selon Origène, Paris and Bruges 1963; J.P. Broudéhoux, Mariage et famille chez Clément d'Alexandrie, Paris 1970; J.L. Larrabe, El matrimonio cristiano como edificación de la ciudad de Dios según san Agustín: La Ciudad de Dios 185 (1972) 671-689; M. Turcan, Le marriage en question? Ou les avantages du célibat selon Tertullien, in Mélanges de philosophie, de littérature et d'histoire ancienne offerts à P. Boyancé, Coll. de l'École franç. de Rome 22, Rome 1974, 711-720; A. Treloar, St. Augustine's Views on Marriage: Prudentia 8 (1976) 41-50; J.M. Soto, El matrimonio "in fieri" en la doctrina de S. Ambrosio y S. Juan Crisóstomo, Rome 1976; R. Cantalamessa, ed., Etica sessuale e matrimonio nel cristianesimo delle origini, Milan 1976; R. Desjardins, Une pastorale augustinienne du mariage: BLE 77 (1976) 161-172; A. Orbe, Los Valentinianos y el matrimonio espiritual. Hacia los orígenes de la mística nupcial: Gregorianum 58 (1977) 5-53; M. Mees, Clemens von Alexandrien über Ehe und Familie: Augustinianum 17 (1977) 113-131; J. Gaudemet, L'interprétation du principe d'indissolubilité du marriage chrétien au cours du premier millénaire: BIDR 81 (1978) 11-70; U. Navarrete, Influsso del diritto romano sul diritto matrimoniale canonico, in Atti del Colloquio romanistico-canonistico (Rome 16-18 February 1978), Rome 1979, 299-318; D.L. Balch, 1 Cor 7, 32-35 and Stoic Debates About Marriage, Anxiety and Distraction: JBL 102 (1983) 429-439; P. Schmitt, Le mariage chrétien dans l'œuvre de saint Augustin, Paris 1988; O. Vannucchi Forzieri, La risoluzione del matrimonio nel IV-V secolo. Legislazione imperiale e pensiero della Chiesa: Atti e memorie dell'Accademia Toscana La Colombaria 50 (1985) 65-172; M. Sargenti, Matrimonio cristiano e società pagana. Spunti per una ricerca: SDHI 51 (1985) 367-391; C. Tibiletti, Matrimonio e verginità in S. Agostino, in Fede e sapere nella conversione di Agostino, ed. A. Ceresa Gastaldo, Genoa 1986, 27-42; E.A. Clark, Adam's Only Companion: Augustine and the Early Christian Debate on Marriage: RecAug 21 (1986) 139-162; H. Crouzel, La concupiscence charnelle dans le mariage selon saint Augustin: BLE 88 (1987) 287-308; J.A. Brundage, Law, Sex and Christian Society in Medieval Europe, Chicago 1987; J. Marcilla Catalán, El matrimonio en la obra pastoral de san Agustín: Augustinus 34 (1989) 31-117; D.G. Hunter, On the Sin of Adam and Eve: A Little-Known Defense of Marriage and Childbearing by Ambrosiaster: HTR 82 (1989) 283-299; M.D. Hart, Reconciliation of Body and Soul: Gregory of Nyssa's Deeper Theology of Marriage: ThS 51 (1990) 450-478; J. Gaudemet, L'évolution de la notion de sacramentum en matière de mariage: RDC 32 (1991) 71-79; J. Triantaphyllopoulos, La definition du mariage par Modestin: Nomos (1991) 53-79; P. Urso, Il matrimonio del prigioniero in diritto romano: SDHI 58 (1992) 85-142; C. Mazzucco, Matrimonio e verginità nei Padri tra IV e V secolo: prospettive femminili, in La donna nel pensiero cristiano antico, ed. U. Mattioli, Genoa 1992, 119-153; E. Monjas Ayuso, Visión del matrimonio en las obras de Tertulliano: Ad uxorem, De exhortatione castitatis et De Monogamia, in Actas del VIII congreso español de estudios clásicos II, Madrid 1994, 759-766; P.L. Reynolds, Marriage in the Western Church: The Christianization of Marriage During the Patristic and Early Medieval Periods, Leiden and New York 1994; D.G. Hunter, Augustinian Pessimism? A New Look at Augustine's Teaching on Sex, Marriage and Celibacy: Augustinian Studies 25 (1994) 153-177; L. Dattrino, Il matrimonio secondo Agostino: contratto, sacramento e casi umani, Milan 1995; W. Otten, Augustine on Marriage, Monasticism, and the Community of the Church: ThS 59,3 (1998) 385-405; B. Leyerle, Theatrical Shows and Ascetic Lives: John Chrysostom's Attack on Spiritual Marriage, Berkeley 2001.

H. Crouzel - L. Odrobina

II. Liturgical rites (wedding procedure and liturgy). The Christians of the early centuries did not live detached from society. They married like everyone and had children (Athenag., Leg. 33; Tertull., Apol. 42; Diogn. 5). Marriage was considered to be an earthly and secular reality, and like everything in life this institution was to be lived out in a Christian spirit.

As such, even in the formative Christianity of the early centuries (approximately until the era of *Constantine), marriage was not considered to be so much a legal matter but more of a social reality comprising two circumstances: the cohabitation of the joint parties and the so-called affectio maritalis, i.e., the couple's awareness of their experience of living together as a marriage. Even if a legally established form for contracting a marriage was not in existence, yet in order for society to consider cohabitation as a marriage (and not, e.g., a *concubinage), recourse was increasingly made to certain visible practices, namely, the domum deductio and the public expression of the consent of the joint parties in contracting the marriage. Indeed, an important element of the influence of Christianity is the tendency to treat marriage not as a simple social reality but more and more as a legal matter, so that from the time of Constantine an increasingly great importance was given to the legal documentation of marriage, e.g., to the tabulae nuptiales or matrimoniales. Although already in existence in earlier times, the tabulae contained important information on the joint parties and on the circumstances of the marriage. At the conclusion of the official act, they were read out in a loud voice before all the witnesses (see Tertull., Uxor. II, 3, I). The obligatory procedures, above all the in domum mariti deductio, were then accompanied by some pagan rites, though they were not constitutive components of marriage.

Since the church of the early centuries was not an institution that held its own jurisdiction, it did not have any effective methods to influence Christians in their marriages, except for verbal admonition. The first intervention of the church into the field of marriage is that of *Ignatius of Antioch. Even if his demand (to "marry only with the approval of the bishop" Polyc. 5,2) is a pastoral and not a juridical intervention, the bishops knew the writings of Ignatius and probably tended to assert the demand in their own communities.

One might surmise that the Christians of the first three centuries strove to eliminate the typical pagan elements that were not constitutive components of marriage from the wedding rites, perhaps replacing them with Christian practices. A seeming example is the coronation of the spouses: Tertullian (De corona XIII, 4) advises against mixed marriages (see section below) with pagans, particularly since they would cause the Christian party to be contaminated by idolatry. Yet the archaeological evidence testifies to certain pagan rites being adopted by the Christians, such as the coronation or the dextrarum iunctio. With the increasing disappearance of paganism, it was possible for these symbols to become neutralized or even Christianized; their survival is evident in later liturgies.

However, the Christianization of weddings came slowly. At *Alexandria in the time of Clement, it does not appear that weddings were even accompanied by a liturgical celebration. While over the course of time such liturgical activities did not become an indispensable part of the marriage ceremonies, beginning in the 3rd c. marriages were blessed by the church. Such use is found again in Tertullian, acc. to whom, if two believers marry each other, "the church unites them, the oblation confirms the marriage, the blessing seals it" (Tertull., Ad uxorem 2,8). The blessing thus had a role in the community or with the participation of the joint parties in the eucharistic rite, although the *Eucharist is explicitly introduced in connection with marriage only in the 5th c. with the Praedestinatus III. According to other sources, the participation of the joint parties is in an isolated act. The purpose of expressing the intent of marriage or even the consensus of the joint parties was to avoid the risk that their union would be treated as fornication or adultery (Tertull., Pudic. 4,4; see also Monog. XI, 1-2, where the writer speaks of "summoning" [postulare] members of the clergy to the marriage who "will unite" [will celebrate the union, coniungere]).

Certainly nothing allows us to make generalizations on the basis of what Tertullian wrote in the 2nd and 3rd c., or to assume that such rites were obligatory. Yet the treatment of the marriage of Christians moves in this direction. Indeed, it seems that in 4th-

c. Rome (Pope Siricius, Letter to Himerius of Tarragona, ch. 5, in the year 385), after or during the sponsalia but still before the in domum mariti deductio there took place a blessing of the betrothed on the part of a priest, after which the bishop of Rome considers the union to be no longer dissoluble.

Apart from the blessing, marriage was always valid as long as it did not contravene the basic rules of administering the constitutive components of marriage, namely, the expression of consensus through the tabulae matrimoniales and the expression of cohabitation with the deductio in domum mariti. The concept of ecclesial invalidity or validity was still not in existence. Proof of the nonessential and nonconstitutive character of blessing for the first Christians is given by the fact that while the first nuptials were celebrated with the blessing of God (sub benedictione Dei celebrantur sublimiter in *Ambrosiaster, Comm. in Ep. I ad Cor. VII, 40), the second nuptials were excluded from such a blessing. The sanctification of marriage velamine sacerdotali et benedictione (Ambr., Ep. 62,7), the prayers and even the blessings of the priests have the purpose of consolidating the union of marriage (John Chrys., Hom. In Gen. 48,6: PG 54, 443; Basil, Hom. in Hexaemeron VII, 5-6), thus taking the place of the prayers and sacrifices in pagan marriages. *Paulinus of Nola (early 5th c.) describes a liturgical rite: in the church the bride and groom receive the blessing of the bishop, who yokes their heads in the conjugal bond and spreads the veil over them, sanctifying them with the prayer (Carm. 25). According to Augustine, even the bishop must sign the tabulae nuptiales (Serm. 332,4). Nonetheless, the bishop probably assisted in the ceremony in a testimonial capacity and not with juridical functions. In later times, the ecclesial contribution becomes increasingly important. In this regard, *Hormisdas, who became pope in 514, decrees: nullus fidelis occulte nuptias faciat, sed benedictione accepta a sacerdote publice nubat in Domino (PL 63, 525), i.e., with a Christian spirit.

Along with the blessing, there is an external element that is carried from Christianity to the pagan concept of marriage. This is the prohibition against mixed marriages and the prohibition of marriages contracted with persons consecrated to God: virgins, widows and, beginning with the era of *Justinian, even priests and deacons from the time of ordination. The laws sanctioned by the Christian emperors were very severe, yet their functions were merely dissuasive in the sense that if the marriage was already contracted, tolerance was the rule. In the course of the first millennium, the church therefore becomes ever more aware that marriage, though regulated by civil norms, has a Christian meaning for the baptized. In the 11th and 12th c., after the recognition in the 10th c. of marriage as a sacrament, the church claims complete jurisdiction, with related consequences for the ritual component.

A.L. Ballini, Il valore giuridico della celebrazione nuziale cristiana dal primo secolo alla età giustinianea, Milan 1939; E. Schillebeeckx, Le Mariage. Réalité terrestre et mystère de salut, translated from the Dutch, I, Paris 1966, 211-247 (Eng. tr., Marriage: Human Reality and Saving Mystery, New York, 1965); J.P. Broudéhoux, Mariage et famille chez Clément d'Alexandrie (Théol. hist. 11), Paris 1970, 95-96; K. Ritzer, Le mariage dans les Églises chrétiennes du premier au onzième siècle, Paris 1970; M. Humbert, Le mariage à Rome. Étude d'histoire juridique et sociale, Milan 1972, 1-58; H. Crouzel, Deux textes de Tertullien concernant la procédure et les rites du mariage chrétien: BLE 74 (1973) 3-13; M. Marin, Le tabulae matrimoniales in S. Agostino: Siculorum Gymnasium 39 (1976) 307-321; H. Le Bonniec, Le témoignage d'Arnobe sur deux rites archaïques du mariage romain: REL 54 (1976) 110-129; C. Walter, The "dextrarum junctio" of Lepcis Magna in Relationship to the Iconography of Marriage: Antiquités africaines 14 (1979) 271-283; K. Stevenson, Nuptial Blessing: A Study of Christian Marriage Rites, London 1982; H. Crouzel, Liturgie du mariage chrétien au V^e siècle selon l'épithalame de S. Paulin de Nole, in Mens concordet voci. Misc. A.G. Martimort, Paris 1983, 619-626; G.L. Falchi, Osservazioni sulla natura della "coemptio matrimoni causa" nel diritto preclassico: SDHI 50 (1984) 355-382; C. Castello, Remarques sur des cas concernants le début du "iustum matrimonium": RIDA 32 (1985) 237-246; M. Della Luna, Antiquitus libera matrimonia esse placuit. Profili evolutivi del matrimonio nel diritto romano e nel diritto moderno: Atene e Roma 32 (1987) 126-136; L. Desanti, Sul matrimonio di donne consacrate a Dio nel diritto romano cristiano: SDHI 53 (1987) 270-296; J.M. Torres, La tradición nupcial pagana en el matrimonio Cristiano según Gregorio de Nacianzo: Studia historica. Historia antigua 8 (1990) 55-60; J. Evans Grubbs, "Pagan" and "Christian" Marriage: The State of the Question: JECS 2 (1994) 361-412; P.L. Reynolds, Marriage in the Western Church: The Christianization of Marriage During the Patristic and Early Medieval Period, Leiden 1994.

C. Tibiletti - L. Odrobina

III. Iconography. In the Christian iconography of the early centuries, the scene that figuratively communicates the sacrament of marriage is that of the dextrarum iunctio. Notwithstanding the Christianized context in which it appears, the scene remains substantially unchanged from traditional Roman iconography. The bride and groom, facing each other, hold out their right hands. The groom almost always holds in his right hand the roll (tabulae nuptiales, libellus), i.e., the official act of marriage; in turn, the woman turns her arm around the shoulders of the husband. It is the culminating moment of the wedding rite, but above all it is the representation of conjugal concord of fidelity beyond the grave. Beginning with the era of the tetrarchs, the scene appears on five-sectioned strigilated *sarcophagi. While it follows the pagan typology, it replaces the mythological motifs in the corner panels with biblical scenes (Ws 156). Juno Pronuba, having become a personification of Concordia, appears in a fragment of a sarcophagus preserved at the Villa Doria Pamphili (Ws 86,1).

In the evolution of form from the late Constantinian era to *Theodosius I, Concordia disappears, and the two spouses come to be represented within a clypeus (Ws 128,2; 96) or within the valve of a conch (Ws 86,3; 91). In the act of joining, the right hands are configured on the width of a sarcophagus at Mantua, "at the gates of the city" (Ws 74). Another variation of the scene is constituted by the presence of Christ and of the hand of God crowning the bride and groom (Ws 74,3; 94,1). Here the motif of the coronation has a purely symbolic character, and it is connected to the triumphal iconography of the post-Constantinian era. Yet the most extensive documentation of marriage iconography is constituted by the decorative arts, above all from the 5th c., and in particular by gold glass (C.R. Morey, Gold Glass, pls. VI, 39; VII, 43; IX, 59). The intermediary figure who unites the bride and groom in marriage, placing their hands on their shoulders, constantly appears in the scenes that allude to marriage and also to the sacramental bond. Concordia, who appears in the early representations on funerary reliefs, is eventually replaced by Christ. Iesus pronubus is defined as the Christ present at the wedding of Cana in an epithalamium of *Paulinus of Nola (Carm. XXV, 15 1-2: PL 61, 636). Alternatively, Concordia is replaced by the father of the bride, who blesses the wedding, as in the mosaic on the right side of the nave in the basilica S. Maria Maggiore in Rome, where Jethro, priest and father, unites in marriage his daughter Zipporah with *Moses (A. Grabar, Christian Iconography, p. 47, fig. 133). We find an analogous structuring of the scene on a small silver plaque from Rocca di Papa (M. Borda, Lares, 32-33) and on a silver plate from *Cyprus, with the wedding of *David and Michal, datable to the first few centuries of the 7th c. (var. aus., Age of Spirituality, 482). Christ is represented as sealing the sacramental act in the central medallions of two gold chains from *Syria (ibid., 283-284), and on some wedding rings of likely Eastern origin with the inscription in Greek, ΟΜΟΝΟΙΑ and ΘΕΟΥ ΧΑΡΙϹ (DACL 10, 1940ff.; E.H. Kantorowicz, Marriage Belt and Rings, figures 1, 27-28).

Numerous as well are the *epigraphic witnesses concerning marriage. In both Greek and Latin funerary inscriptions from the 3rd to the 7th c., expressions concerning the marital life frequently occur. These include affirmation of fidelity, of Christian integrity in the conjugal life (ICUR VI, 11798), of incomparable love and of an affectionate wish that the spouse might rest with the saints in eternal *peace. Rarer expressions include the biblical term costa (Lat. for "rib"), which is used to designate the wife of a particular Ianuarius diaconus in the Ad decimum cemetery, on the Via Latina (ICUR VI, 15710). In the year 362, a certain Viscilius dedicates an inscription to Niceni costae suae.

DACL 10, 1873-1981; J. Wilpert, La fede della chiesa nascente secondo i monumenti dell'arte funeraria antica, Vatican City 1938, 249ff.; M. Borda, Lares. La vita familiare romana nei documenti archeologici e letterari, Rome 1947; L. Reekmans, La "dextrarum iunctio" dans l'iconographie paléochrétienne: Bull. Inst. Hist. Belge de Rome 31 (1951) 29-96; Id., Dextrarum iunctio: EAA 3, 82-85; C.R. Morey, The Gold-Glass Collection of the Vatican Library with Additional Catalogues of Other Gold-Glass Collections, Vatican City 1959; A. Grabar, Christian Iconography: A Study of Its Origins, Princeton 1968, 47ff.; E.H. Kantorowicz, On the Golden Marriage Belt and Marriage Rings of the Dumbarton Oaks Collection: DOP 14 (1960) 2-16; P. Testini, Vita matrimoniale nelle iscrizioni funerarie cristiane: Lateranum 52 (1976) 150-164; C. Frugoni, L'iconografia del matrimonio nel Medio Evo, in Atti della XXIV Settimana di Studi sull'Alto Medioevo, Spoleto 1977, 901-963; var. aus., Age of Spirituality, New York 1979; J. Janssens, Vita e morte del cristiano negli epitaffi di Roma anteriori al VII sec., Rome 1981, 112ff.; TIP 166-168.

A.M. Giuntella

IV. Spiritual marriage. The idea of a spiritual wedding and of a divine marriage predates Christianity. For example, *Philo of Alexandria teaches that when God enters into contact with the *soul, the soul receives a seed that produces as an effect the birth of *virtue (De cherubim, 42-52). For the Christians, marriage is a sacrament, i.e., an efficacious symbol of *grace, and the symbol itself becomes an *allegory of a more sublime spiritual reality. Now let us consider *ecclesiology and *sacraments, *eschatology, *virginity, and *mystical theology.

Ecclesiology. Right from the start, we find that the union of the man and the woman in the divine realm refers to the union of Christ with the church, the first union representing and indicating the second union. But if one considers the matter from above, from the summit and not from the base, it is not the union of Christ and the church that derives from the creation of the human couple, but on the contrary it is the man-woman relationship at the core of marriage that has in the Christ-church union its practical and living archetype, the supreme reason for its existence.

Eschatological perspective. A.C. Rusch (Death as a Spiritual Marriage: Individual and Ecclesial Eschatology: VChr 26 [1972] 81-101) has gathered together various texts (*Ambrose, *Methodius of Olympus, *Gregory of Nyssa, acts of the martyrs). They lead us to the conclusion that in Antiquity, even *death had an aspect of a spiritual wedding.

Virginity. It is *Tertullian who is the first among the church fathers to adopt the expression sponsa Christi as a designation of the Christian virgin (see H. Koch, Virgines Christi, TU 31, 2, Leipzig 1907, 31). Beginning with the 3rd and 4th c., such an expression becomes the trend.

Mystical perspective. In the patristic tradition, there is a further interpretation that applies the idea of marriage to the peaks of the spiritual life. *Origen is the creator of this marriage mysticism.

DSp 10, 388-408; Dizionario enciclopedico di spiritualità, ed. E. Ancilli, Rome 1975, 1163-1168; T. Špidlík, La concezione cristologica del matrimonio nelle liturgie orientali, Bessarione, I, Rome 1979, 139-152; D. Elliott, Spiritual Marriage: Sexual Abstinence in Medieval Wedlock, Princeton 1995; B. Leyerle, Theatrical Shows and Ascetic Lives: John Chrysostom's Attack on Spiritual Marriage, Berkeley 2001.

T. Špidlík

V. Mixed marriages. The distinction between a mixed marriage of a Catholic Christian and a non-Catholic Christian (with a prohibitive impediment) and a marriage of a Catholic Christian and a non-Christian with a disparity of religion (with a diriment impediment) arises at the end of the 12th c., with the work of the jurists *Gratian, Peter Lombard, Bernard of Pavia and Uguccione da Pisa. For the earliest era of Christianity, with such a distinction not existing, it seems legitimate to apply the label of "mixed marriage" equally to every marriage contracted between a Catholic Christian and a non-Catholic Christian, esp. since until the end of Christian Antiquity these marriages were not considered to be invalid, even if they were not encouraged. The problem of mixed marriages on a religious basis was not in existence in the pagan Roman world. The idea of repudiating such marriages comes from the OT, where there is relevant evidence of alternating rigorous and lax responses. At the beginning, these marriages carried a certain social reprobation, even though they were not forbidden. The standard of famous characters among the people was endogamy. After the destruction of the northern kingdom, the leaders of the southern kingdom, intending to resist the surrounding nations, establish the prohibition against marriage with these peoples, a prohibition of a political and religious nature (Dt 7:1-4). The ban relates to the return of the people from Babylon in the time of Ezra and Nehemiah. Intending that Hebrew society should be self-contained, the prophets expel the foreign wives to keep the husbands from sinning against God. The ban has a racial religious nature (Dt 23). The Book of Jubilees in the era of *Hellenism contains a prohibition that refashions Lev 18:21: the basis of the prohibition is a religious purity, and no longer a national one. After the destruction of the temple in *Jerusalem, the Judaic position gains new vigor. Such marriages come to be treated as nonexistent, yet as sexual unions. As such the idea took shape only after the separation of Christianity from *Judaism, so Christianity, when it first encountered the question posed by mixed marriages, did not have this model at hand to resolve the problem. During its first millennium, Christianity considers these marriages as valid, even if it discourages them.

The NT is not generally concerned with the problem of contracting mixed marriages, and this phenomenon probably did not often occur in the first years of Christianity. The cases taken into consideration are those in which a party to a marriage that was first contracted between two pagans converts and becomes a Christian. According to passages of the NT, the Christian must continue to live with the non-Christian, unless the non-Christian rejects the marriage (1 Cor 7:12-16).

After this transitional period, the church fathers, experimenting with our problem and not finding univocal norms in the NT, made recourse to specific biblical passages. Along with the dissuasive passages of the OT, they turned in the first place to 1 Cor 7:39, which specifies for the wife whose husband dies if she remarries she must do so only "in the Lord." They also turned to 2 Cor 6:14-16, where the apostle gives a general argument against relations maintained with pagans on an ethical and moral basis.

In the first two centuries of the patristic era, we do not find evidence on the matter of mixed marriages. They were not forbidden by the church and by the books of the NT (see the analysis given by Aug., De fide et operibus 19,35; De adult. coni. 1,25,31). Yet beginning in the 3rd c., some authors (and later on some councils) express their opposition to the matter, and they strive to dissuade the faithful from contracting such marriages if the non-Christian party does not want to convert. To a great degree they depend upon one another in various ways. Depending on the times and places in which the bans pertaining to the problem were formulated, the content of the prohibitions and of the dissuasions changed. Not all authors are solidly opposed to such practices; Chrysostom and Augustine are relatively permissive. While Chrysostom seems to allow the matter in one of his homilies, Augustine, while putting emphasis on the dangers of such unions and strongly advising against them in actual practice, recognizes that in his time mixed marriages are no longer considered to be a vice because the NT does not speak against them. Otherwise there is a great variety of situations and opinions: the Christian groups for whom the bans are valid (Christian girls and/or boys, whether "common" or the children of clerics), the prohibited groups (pagans, whether "common" or even priests, then heretics, *schismatics and/or Jews), the sanctions for the transgressors (*excommunication for life or for some number of years), the sanctioned groups (the Christian girl and boy, or their parents), the scriptural passages on the basis of which the prohibitions or the dissuasions come to be formulated (passages from the OT and from the NT, above all those cited above), and the arguments in which these types of union were not advised (the equivalent of the stuprum, adultery of the soul, no association between a faithful and an unfaithful person, fornication of the members of Christ, *prostitution of the church of Christ with pagan *idols, various dissuasive examples of mixed marriages taken from the OT, danger for the *faith and the morals of the Christian, impossibility of the husband and wife praying together etc.).

The prohibitions of the councils are as follows: *Elvira (306), cans. 15-16 (17); *Arles (314), can. 11; *Hippo (393), can. 12; *Laodicea (2nd half of the 4th c.), cans. 10 and 31; *Chalcedon (451), can. 14; *Agde (506), can. 67; Orléans II (533), can. 19; Clermont (535), can. 6; Orléans III (538), can. 13; *Toledo III (589), can. 14; Toledo IV (633), can. 68; *in Trullo (692), can. 72. The texts that are relevant to our theme are found as follows: Tertull., De corona militis 13; De monogamia 7,39; Ad uxorem 2,3; ps.-Origen, Philosophumena 9,12; *Cyprian of Carthage, De lapsis 6; Testimoniorum libri III, 62; *Origen, Fragm. in 1 Cor 7,34-36; *Epiph. Sal., Adv. haereses II, 1,61,5; *Zeno of Verona, Hom. II, 7; John Chrys., Hom. in Eph. 20,5; Hom. in 1 Cor 19,3; Ambrosiaster, Comm. in 1 Cor 7,15; Ambr., De Abraham I, 9,81-86; Ep. 62 ad Vigilium; Expositio Evangelii secundum Lucam 8,2-4; Expositio psalmi 118,20,48; Jer., Commentarii in IV epistulas Paulinas, Ad Ephesios 3,5; Epistula 107,1-2; Commentarii in Isaiam 7,19,23; Ep. 123,5; Aug., De fide et operibus 19,35; De adult. coniug. 1,25,31, Ep. 23; 33; 220; 252-255; 258.

The primary reason for opposition by the church to these marriages was the intention to protect the faith of the Christian spouse, the purity of the ecclesial community and the Christian education of the children born of the marriage. Along with these arguments, the authors also stress the theological dimensions of Christian marriage. As a type of the union between Christ and the church, such an interpretation is threatened by the possibility of a mixed marriage.

Along with the church, the Christian emperors also made laws concerning marriages between Christians and Jews. If the law of the CTh 16,8,6 dating to 339 punishes with death a very narrow group, probably for reasons not so much religious but rather economic (see Falchi), the law of CTh 3,7,2 dating to 388 sanctions on religious grounds the death penalty for all of these unions, putting them on the level of adultery for punishment. Therefore, the fact that the authors and the councils strove to dissuade the faithful, even after the law of 388, is a sign that the concept of invalidity does not yet emerge in this era. Centuries later (as seen in Zonaras and Theodore Balsamon), when the church already had complete jurisdiction in marriage and the concept of the impedimentum dirimens was already elaborated, the canons presented above are interpreted by this concept. The first council that truly declares as invalid a marriage contracted with a heretic is that in Trullo (692), signaling a fundamental turning point in the history of the prohibition in the East. This canon was never received in the West.

J. Köhne, Über die Mischehen in den ersten christlichen Zeiten: die allmähliche Zunahme der Ehen zwischen Christen und Heiden: Theologie und Glaube 23 (1931) 333-350; A.M. Petru, Can. 14 Chalcedonensis Concilii irritatne matrimonia mixta?: Angelicum 29 (1952) 130-133; Id., De impedimento disparitatis cultus in iure orientali antiquo, Rome 1952; P. Lombardía, Los matrimonios mixtos en el concilio de Elvira: Anuario de Historia del Derecho Español 24 (1954) 543-558; S. Solazzi, Unioni di cristiani e ebrei nelle leggi del Basso Impero, in Scritti di Diritto Romano, 4, Naples 1962, 49-53; J. Haiduk, Mischehe. Eine pastoral-historische Untersuchung der Mischehe von der apostolischen Zeit bis zum Konzil von Agde (506), Düren 1965; P. Mahfoud, Les mariages mixtes: étude historico-canonique: Apollinaris 28 (1965) 84-95; R.G.W. Huysmans, De ortu impedimentorum mixtae religionis ac disparitatis cultus: Ephemerides Iuris Canonici 23 (1967) 187-261; W.W. Bassett, The Impediment of Mixed Religion of the Synod in Trullo (A.D. 691): The Jurist 29 (1969) 383-415; J. Gaudemet, La décision de Callixte en matière de mariage, in Sociétés et mariages, Strasbourg 1980, 104-115; A. Del Castillo, Los impedimentos para el matrimonio con paganos en el concilio de Elvira: Hispania 42 (1982) 329-339; G. Torti, Non debet imputari matrimonium. Nota sull'Ambrosiastro: GIF 36 (1984) 267-282; M. Bianchini, Disparità di culto e matrimonio: orientamenti del pensiero cristiano e della legislazione imperiale nel IV secolo dopo Cristo: Serta Historica Antiqua 1 (1986) 233-246; G.L. Falchi, La legislazione imperiale circa i matrimony misti fra cristiani ed ebrei nel V secolo, in Atti dell'Accademia Romanistica Costantiniana, VII Convegno Internazionale, Naples 1988, 203-212; A.M. Rabello, Il problema dei matrimoni fra ebrei e cristiani nella legislazione imperiale e in quella della Chiesa (IV-VI secolo), ibid., 213-224; M. Bianchini, Ancora in tema di unioni fra barbari e romani, ibid., 225-250; D. Ceccarelli-Morolli, I matrimoni misti alla luce dei Sacri Canones del primo millennio: Nicolaus 22/2 (1995) 137-143; H. Sivan, Rabbinic and Roman Law: Jewish-Gentile/Christian Marriage in Late Antiquity: Revue des études juives 156 (1997) 59-100; L. Odrobina, Ancora sul divieto dei matrimoni misti al concilio di Elvira, in I concili della cristianità occidentale (secoli III-V). XXX Incontro di studiosi dell'antichità cristiana, Rome, 3-5 May 2001, Rome 2002, 581-588; Id., Le CTh 3,7,2 et les mariages mixtes, Rome 2006.

L. Odrobina

MARSEILLE

I. The city - II. Christian origins - III. The church from 300 to 430 - IV. Marseille from the 5th to the 8th c.

I. The city. Founded by the Phoenicians in ca. 600 BC, it was conquered by Caesar in 49 BC and, though incorporated into the Roman province of Gallia Narbonensis, it remained *Gaul's most important Mediterranean port. Known as the "Athens of the West," where Roman youth would begin their study of Greek, it became Latinized in the 2nd c. AD. Economic and cultural decline began in the same c. and continued up to the time of the invasion of the Germanic tribes, when the havoc they caused to land travel gave renewed importance to seafaring. However, the later Arab invasions subsequently compromised traveling by sea, putting an end to trade in the Mediterranean.

II. Christian origins. The 11th-c. legend in which the resurrected St. Lazarus evangelizes the city and becomes its first bishop is a clumsy interpretation of the Christian antiquities to be found in the crypt of St. Victor. The inscriptions of *Volusianus and Fortunatus (CIL 12, 489) found at Marseille, as well as that of Q. Vetinius Eunetus (ibid. 611) found at Aubagne, are no longer considered to be specifically Christian, and so cannot shed light on the origins of Christianity in the city. Besides, the excavations carried out in the crypt of St. Victor in 1965 appear to have uncovered a Christian burial complex, and a tomb containing two martyrs, which F. Benoit dated to 250, based on a coin showing the emperor *Decius. The identity of the martyrs remains unknown, despite Benoit's suggestion of Volusianus and Fortunatus.

III. The church from the 300 to 430. The church in Marseille is first heard of in 314, when its bishop Oresius attended the Council of *Arles. However, it is only with *Proculus (381–428) that it fully emerges from obscurity. This bishop, together with two Gallic colleagues, took part in the Council of *Aquileia (381), and is one of the probable addressees of the letter sent by *Celestine I to the bishops of Provence (428). Meanwhile, he had himself officially recognized by the Council of *Turin (398) as having the rights of a metropolitan over the provinces of Gallia Narbonensis Secunda (Aix, Antibes, Apt, Fréjus) and Alpes Maritimae (Nice, Digne, Embrun). He effectively exercised these rights against the primatial claims of *Patroclus of Arles, founding the short-lived dioceses of Garguier and Ceyreste. During his episcopate, the first cathedral was built. Its baptistery, 23 m (75.5 ft) in diameter, is the largest in Provence. The monastery founded ca. 415 by St. John *Cassian at St. Victor was also built during his time as bishop.

IV. Marseille from the 5th to the 8th c. *Monastic life flourished in Marseille from the 5th c. It was at that time that the martyrium of St. Victor was organized, in which *Cassian had established the first monastic center: there survives an altar of classical construction. The monastery founded by Cassian produced many bishops for Marseille and S France. The monastery was also a center of Eastern-style theology, i.e., anti-*Nestorian, with little propensity for *Augustinianism. A women's monastery was also founded in the city, which later became St. Savior's Abbey. It was in this culture of *monasticism that the legend of St. Victor was born (BHL 8569ff.).

Among Marseille's important writers at this time are the priest *Museus, who composed a number of liturgical books during the episcopacy of Venerius (431–452); the rhetor *Claudius Marius Victorius, whose work Aletheia paraphrases Genesis; *Salvian, a native of *Trier, who, while in Marseille fleeing the Germanic invasions, wrote his De gubernatione Dei (ca. 440); *Gennadius (toward the end of the 5th c.), the author of De viris illustribus. He is also credited with having written the Statuta Ecclesiae antiqua; and also *Paulinus of Pella, nephew of *Ausonius, who wrote the autobiographical poem Eucharisticos in 459, when he was 84.

After the vicissitudes of the 6th c., the church in Marseille reappears at the time of *Gregory of Tours and *Gregory the Great. It was at this time that the bishop Serenus gained notoriety for his iconoclasm. Among the other figures, mention should be made of *Theodore, who took part in the Council of Mâcon (585), and of Peter who was at the Council of *Paris (614). Marseille would have fallen into almost total obscurity were it not for the occasional appearance of an abbess's name on the odd sarcophagus here and there. Monastic life went into decline. We have not a single abbot's or abbess's name between 687 and 751, nor that of any bishop between 614 and 780.

J.H. Albanès, Gallia christiana novissima, vol. 2, Montbéliard 1889; DACL 10, 2204-2293; Cath 8, 714-722; J.R. Palanque, Le diocèse de Marseille, Paris 1967; P. Borraccino, Sarcofagi palocristiani di Marsiglia, Bologna 1973; R. Boyer, ed., Vie et mort à Marseille à la fin de l'Antiquité. Inhumations habillées des V^e et VI^e siècles et sarcophage reliquaire trouvés à l'abbaye de Saint-Victor, Paris 1987; J.-C. Moulinier, Saint Victor de Marseille: les récits de sa passion, Vatican City ²1995; Id., Autour de la tombe de saint Victor de Marseille: textes et monuments commémoratifs d'un martyre, Marseille 2000.

V. Saxer

MARTIAL and BASILIDES. These two Spanish bishops, one from Mérida, the other from León-Astorga, had been deposed by a Spanish synod for serious failings (namely, apostasy during the Decian persecution: they had obtained libelli of sacrifice), and were replaced by Felix and Sabinus respectively. Basilides fell ill and acknowledged his error; then, having done penance, was received back into communion, though as a layman. Martial was further rebuked for having taken part in a pagan funeral gathering, for having given his sons a pagan burial and for having engaged in a public act of idolatry, as confirmed by the ducenarius procurator. Having regained his health Basilides appealed to Rome against his colleagues' sentence, obtaining from Pope Stephen his rehabilitation and restoration to his former functions within the church. Spanish bishops had recourse to the Council of Cartagena against Basilides (254/255). The synodal letter addressed to the priest Felix and to the clergy of León-Astorga, to the deacon Elias and to the clergy of Mérida informs us about the question. The death of Pope Stephen must have made the sentence of deposition final.

Cyprian, Ep. 67; Monceaux 2, 54-56; Z. García Villada, Historia eclesiástica de España, Madrid 1929, I, 1, 185-194; Cath 1, 1288; V. Saxer, Vie liturgique et quotidienne à Carthage vers le milieu du III^e siècle (Studi di antichità cristiana 29), Vatican City 1969, 15-20, 84-88; DHEE 1, 196.

V. Saxer

MARTIN I, pope (649–655). Pope Martin I was elected on the death of Pope *Theodore (14 May 649) during the full fury of the *monothelite struggles and a little after the publication of the Typos by the emperor Constans II. He was a native of Todi, a deacon of the Roman Church, and had been apocrisarius in Constantinople. During this time he had become well-informed about the theological questions being debated and about the world of Constantinople. He immediately convoked and presided over a synod in Rome, which took place at the Lateran on 5 Oct 649, with the participation of mainly Italian bishops at first, but by the second session (8 Oct) the Eastern bishops had also arrived, e.g., Stephen, bishop of Dor in *Palestine, together with 37 monks and ecclesiastics, among whom was *Maximus the Confessor, who was much respected in Rome and who certainly had a major influence on the positions taken by the synod, which ended up approving whatever Pope Martin proposed. The presence of the Eastern bishops allowed the Acts to be recorded in both Latin and Greek, as indeed they have come down to us. The council reiterated the symbol of Chalcedon with the addition of an article about the two wills and two operations in Christ (DS 500). It issued twenty anathemas and condemned both the Ekthesis of *Heraclius and the Typos (DS 501-522). So he sent out letters to both East and West, though not to the dissenters, in order to bring the adherents together (LP 1, 337; Jaffé 2058-2078). In response, the emperor, before the synod had finished, sent *Olympius the exarch of *Ravenna to impose the Typos and to arrest the pope; Olympius, however, having seen the difficulties, went off to Sicily. But in June 653 the new exarch *Theodore Calliope, under sufferance, had Martin arrested and sent to *Constantinople, which the pope reached only after a grueling journey. Once there, he was tried and condemned to death for political reasons. The sentence was commuted to exile in Cherson (Sebastopol) in the Crimea, where he died on 16 Sept 655. In his final two years he suffered atrocious torments and humiliations, which are known from his letters (Jaffé 2078-2081) and from the Commemoratio of an eyewitness (BHL 5594; PL 129, 591-604). During Martin's journey to Constantinople, the Roman Church had already elected his successor, *Eugenius I (LP 1, 341). His feast used to be celebrated on 12 Nov; since 1969 it has been celebrated on 13 April, the same day as in the Greek Church.

CPL 1733-1734; ACO II/I (1984) (cf. CPL 1174); PL 87, 119-212; Jaffé I, 2058-2080; PLS 4, 2004-2010; Mansi 10, 790-1188. - DTC 10, 182-194; BS 8, 377-381; Hfl-Lecl 3, 439-460; Fliche-Martin V, 236-243; 533-534; E. Caspar, Die Lateransynode von 649: ZKG 51 (1932) 75-137; O. Bertolini, Roma di fronte a Bisanzio e ai Longobardi, Bologna 1941, 329-465; P. Conte, Il sinodo lateranense dell'ottobre 649, Rome 1989; E. Menestò, Martino I Papa: Atti del 28° Conv. storico internazionale, Spoleto 1992; R. Riedlinger, Die latein. Übersetzung der Ep. Encycl. Papst Martin I: Philologia Mediolat. 1 (1994) 45-69; Patrologia IV, 180 (bibl.); LTK³ 6, 1425; LACL³ 491; EPapi 1, 598-603.

B. Studer

MARTIN of Braga (d. after 579). Known as the apostle of the Suevi (see Isid., Vir. ill. 8), Martin was born in the Roman province of *Pannonia, probably to a family of important Roman officials, which had links with *Gaul. We assume this from his acquaintance with *Gregory of Tours, who held him in high regard. He received a thorough literary education in Greek and Latin; this is attested by Gregory of Tours (Hist. Franc. V, 37) and by *Paschasius of Dumium (Apoth. prologue.); it is also presumed by *Venantius Fortunatus (Ep. V, 1).

He lived a long time in the East, where he was ordained priest. His arrival by sea in *Gallaecia, presumably after being urged by the emperor *Justinian, coincided with the translation of the relics of St. *Martin of Tours to Orense. (These events, fortuitously recorded, are presented by Gregory of Tours as having happened at the same time through Providence.) Upon the arrival of the relics, the son of the Sueve king (whom Gregory names Carrarico) was healed of his illness, whereupon the king renounced his *Arianism and had Martin made a bishop. Martin founded a monastery at *Dumium, near Braga, of which he was abbot and probably abbot-bishop. Before 572, he became metropolitan of Braga, and as such presided over the Second Council of *Braga, summoned by order of King Miro. Being of a rigorist bent, he found the Christianization of the Suevi to have been deficient: pagan hangovers masquerading as mere folklore; a lack of formation among the faithful and their complete isolation; further, certain tendencies of *Priscillianist origin enjoyed great favor. A particular spirituality was attached to this, which Martin fought against by making use of his classical education and knowledge of the Greek pastoral system.

At first he was reluctant to write, only later turning his mind to it with a specific pastoral end in view. Familiar with Seneca, he summarized the moral treatises in his small book titled De Ira, dedicated to Vitimer, bishop of Orense, and in his Formulae vitae honestae, dedicated to King Miro. He also composed a series of very short catechisms, in which he locates the essence of spirituality, like *Cassian, in humility and self-discipline. These are titled Pro repellenda iactantia, De superbia, Exhortatio humilitatis. Mention must also be made of his Sententiae Patrum Aegyptiorum, written for the formation of monks, which contains spiritual maxims translated from Greek and perhaps intended for personal use in the monastery at Dumium. He wrote two treatises, one dedicated to Bishop Polemius titled De correctione rusticorum, which contains various considerations about the popular customs of Gallaecia; the other, De trina mersione, was intended for a bishop by the name of Boniface; it defended the practice of triple immersion at *baptism. In addition, three other items are attributed to Martin: De Pascha, on the method of calculating the date of Easter; two poems in honor of St. Martin; and the epitaph for his tomb.

CPL 1079c-1090; Díaz 20-30; PL 72, 21-52; 74, 387-394; 84, 574-586; C.W. Barlow, Martini episcopi Bracarensis opera omnia, New Haven, CT 1950; M. Martíns, Correntes da filosofía religiosa em Braga, Porto 1950, 215-286; var. aus.: Bracara Augusta 8 (1957); L. Ribeiro Soares, A Linhagem Cultural de sâo Martinho de Dume, Lisbon 1963; G. Martínez Díez, La colección canónica de la Iglesia sueva: los Capitula Martini: Bracara Augusta 21 (1967) 224-243; A. Fontán, Martín de Braga: un testigo de la tradición clásica y cristiana: Anuario de Estudios Medievales 9 (1974-9) 331-341; M.J. Pinheiro Maciel, O De Correctione Rusticorum de S. Martinho de Dume: Bracara Augusta 34 (1980) 483-561; Martino di Braga, Contro le superstizioni, ed. M. Naldini, Florence 1991; U. Domínguez del Val, Historia de la antigua literatura latina hispano-lusitana, II, Madrid 1998, 375-430.

M. Díaz y Díaz - P. Marone

MARTIN of Tours (316/317–397). Born in Sabaria in the Roman province of *Pannonia in 316/317, he was an officer's son "and, in his youth, pursued a military career, serving in the cavalry under the emperor *Constantius, and then under Caesar Julian" (Vita Martini 2,1). For this information we rely on *Sulpicius Severus's letter. Leaving the army in 356, he departed for Worms in order to meet *Hilary of Poitiers. He probably organized secret anti-*Arian missions in Illyricum, and spent some time as an *anchorite on the Ligurian island of Gallinara. From 361 he was superior of a community of *ascetics in Ligugé, 11 km (6.8 mi) SE of *Poitiers, perhaps on property belonging to *Hilary's family. This is the first monastic foundation in Europe that can be dated. Although he did not wish it, he became bishop of *Tours.

For twenty-five years he carried out evangelization in the pagan countryside of the mid-Loire region. He did this from his two bases, one pastoral, the other ascetic: the bishop's palace at Tours and the monastery at Marmoutier (4 km [2.5 mi] upriver from Tours, on the N bank of the Loire). As a missionary and a miracle worker Martin had a considerable role in Christianizing urban, Gallo-Roman society (judging from an inscription to Foedula, which reads, "baptized by His Greatness Martin" at *Vienne in the Dauphiné, on the River Rhône, S of *Lyons), but esp. among the people of the countryside: there, in his own churches (so, at Levroux in the Indre region, or at Mont-Beuvray, S of Morvan), he dealt systematically with the Celtic peasantry's old paganism (by now in its more or less Romanized form). He was warmly welcomed by the provincial aristocracy, who had been won over by monastic *asceticism, but also became an intrepid defender of the poor (e.g., he defended those imprisoned by Count Avitus for not paying their taxes) and of the persecuted (note his appeal—like that of *Ambrose—to the usurper *Maximus at *Trier attempting to rescue the heresiarch *Priscillian and his disciples from being judged by the "secular arm"). He died at Candes in 397, despised by many clergy but held in honor by many of the laity and ascetics.

The cult of St. Martin began while he was alive (the Life of St. Martin by *Sulpicius Severus undoubtedly predates the saint's death, if only by a little) and was commensurate with the wide extent of his apostolate. It stretched from Normandy to Aquitaine and from *Trier to *Vienne by way of Chartres and *Paris; the diffusion of his cult followed on the spread of early Gallo-Roman monasticism (which was founded on the Egyptian model, involving strict *ascesis, *mysticism and *miracle working, with community structures that were not so rigid or "regular"). He was a man of quite rough manner and a visionary, not intellectual (despite what Sulpicius would have us believe), and given to prophetic gestures of charity (he shared his military cloak with a poor man at the gate of Amiens: Life of St. Martin 3). It is difficult to discover the Martin behind Sulpicius's hagiographical portrait. His cult at *Tours was associated after *Clovis's time with the political ascendancy of the Merovingian dynasty and radiated throughout Gaul. Of places named after a saint, "St. Martin" was, in France, by far the most common; this was also the case in the rest of Europe, esp. in Italy. The mosaic craftsmen of the church of S. Apollinare Nuovo in *Ravenna placed St. Martin at the front of the martyrs' procession, and St. Benedict consecrated a chapel to him in place of a pagan temple on top of Monte Cassino.

Principal source: the three works (Life of St. Martin, Letters, Dialogues) by Sulpicius Severus, which medieval copyists often grouped together under the title Martinellus; Ch.E. Babut, Saint Martin de Tours, Paris 1912 (hypercritical); C. Jullian, Notes gallo-romaines: REA 24 (1922) 37-47; 25 (1923) 49-55; Saint Martin et son temps, Mémorial du XVI^e^ centenaire des débuts du monachisme en Gaule (361-1961), SA 46, Rome 1961, in particular J. Fontaine, Verité et fiction dans la chronologie de la "Vita Martini," 189-236; Id., Martin de Tours: DSp 10 (1980) 687-694; Cl. Stancliffe, St. Martin and His Hagiographer: History and Miracle in Sulpicius Severus, Oxford 1983; L. Pietri, La ville de Tours du IV^e^ au VI^e^ siècle: naissance d'une cité chrétienne, Rome 1984. See also the bibl. below the entry Sulpicius Severus; R. Van Dam, Images of Saint Martin in Late Roman and Early Merovingian Gaul: Viator 19 (1988) 1-27; S. Farmer, Communities of Saint Martin: Legend and Ritual in Medieval Tours, Ithaca, NY 1991; J.-P. Delville - M. Laffineur Crépin - A. Lemeunier, Martin de Tours: du légionnaire au saint évêque, Liège 1994; XVI^e^ centenaire de la mort de Saint Martin: Conférences martiniennes (October 1996), Mémoires de la Société archéologique de Touraine 62 (1997); R. Pernoud, Martino di Tours, Milan 1998.

J. Fontaine

MARTINA. "Martina, unfortunately, is one of the very few Roman saints of whom it must be admitted that even her existence cannot be proved." This disappointing conclusion from Pio Franchi de' Cavalieri summarizes the problems posed by the cult and legend of Martina.

It is thought she was a martyr of the 3rd c. who died at the time of *Alexander Severus (222–235). As far as her cult is concerned, the oldest attestation comes from *Honorius I (625–638), who dedicated a church to her in the Forum. Her feast, listed in the Capitulare Evangeliorum (740), is on 1 Jan. Her Passio comes from the same century, but is of no historical value.

P. Franchi de' Cavalieri, S. Martina: RQA 17 (1907) 232-236, then in ST 222, 49-62; T. Klauser, Das römische Capitulare Evangeliorum: LQF 28,59 n. 9, 173 n. 9; BS 8, 1220-1221; BBKL 5,935-936.

V. Saxer

MARTYR – MARTYRDOM

I. Christian martyrdom - II. Cult of martyrs, saints and relics - III. Acts, passions, legends - IV. Inscriptions relating to the martyrs - V. Iconography.

I. Christian martyrdom. The main period of martyrdom in the early church was during the first three centuries of the first millennium, when Christianity was still considered a religio illicita in the Roman Empire, and was often *persecuted. After *Constantine, there were to be more martyrs: martyred heretics (the first was *Priscillian of Avila) and Christian martyrs in countries not belonging to the Roman Empire (e.g., the persecutions in Persia between 309 and 438); moreover, martyrdom was to receive a spiritual interpretation, esp. in monastic circles: any physical or mental suffering in a believer is considered to be a kind of martyrdom (A. Solignac).

1. The meaning of martyrdom. It is frankly amazing that the term "witness" (martys) in Christian vocabulary began, during the 2nd c., to exclusively signify a believer who suffers and dies for his faith; a mere witness had already become a "confessor" (see Eus., HE 5, 2, 3-4). The only plausible explanation for this change in terminology is to admit that the very spectacle of martyrdom was considered a kind of "testimony": the suffering and death of the martyr are a manifestation of the power of the resurrection, because in the martyrs Christ suffers and conquers death. Indeed, the martyrs are bearers of the Spirit. They have visions, and miracles happen around them; their martyrdoms also have a propitiatory nature: not only are their own sins forgiven (baptism of blood: Tertull., Bapt. 16; Orig., Exh. mart. 30; Trad. Apost. 19), but also the whole community of believers is to benefit from them (they give reconciliation to penitents: Tertull., Ad mart. 1; Cypr., Ep. 23, etc.; they repel the devil's power: Ignat. Ant., Eph. 1,1; Mart. Pol. 1,1; Orig., Comm. Joh. VI, 281-283; they intercede for the living: see the inscriptions on martyrs' tombs). The martyrs are "with the Lord" (Iren., Adv. haer. IV, 33, 9; Hipp., Comm. Dan. II, 37, 3; Tertull., Scorp. 10, 12; De res. 43; De an. 55).

2. Non-Christians and martyrs. In the pagan world the testimony of the martyrs was received in two ways: with indifference and contempt, or with clear admiration that might even lead to conversion.

a. Contempt. For *Tacitus, Christians were "resolute in their hatred for the human race" (Annals XV, 44, 6); while *Pliny the Younger saw in them "rebelliousness and invincible obstinacy" (Ep. X, 96, 3) and *Marcus Aurelius a "vulgar effrontery" with which they face death (Meditations XI, 3, 3; Epict., Dissert. IV, 7, 6). Such negative reactions might sometimes have been caused by the behavior of the Christians in question. Indeed, in some accounts of martyrdom we find offensive language being used against persecutors (Mart. Polic. 11, 2; Acta Carpi . . . 40; Passio Perp. er Fel. 17; 18, 4; Mart. Pionii 4). Behavior allegedly at odds with that of Jesus on the cross (Lk 23:34; words repeated by Stephen, Acts 7:60 and by James the brother of the Lord; see Eus., HE 2, 23, 16). Furthermore, some Christians, in their eagerness to make known the depth of their faith and reach their heavenly reward, demonstrated at times an excessive desire for death. This did not only occur among the *Montanists (Tertull., De fuga 9, 4; De anima 55, 5), but among the church's members too (Tertull., Ad Scap. 5; Apol. 50, 1).

b. Admiration. By contrast, the assuredness of the martyrs could also arouse the interest and admiration of pagans, as *Tertullian observes: "When faced with the demonstration given by the martyrs, who is not caused to wonder what lies underneath? And once he has discovered, who does not become an adherent, and once an adherent, who does not long to suffer?" (Apol. 50, 15: perhaps Tertullian here offers us the reasons for his own conversion). Justin claims to have been converted by observing the courage of the martyrs: "Seeing them fearless before death . . . , I thought it impossible that they lived in vice and in the love of pleasures" (2 Apol. 12). The testimonies of those who witnessed martyrdoms are numerous: the man who brought James son of Zebedee to trial (Eus., HE 2, 9, 2-3); the soldier Basilides, present at the martyrdom of *Potamiana (HE 6, 5, 3); the soldier Pudens with regard to the martyrdom of *Perpetua and her companions (Passio Perp. et Fel. 16; 21). *Hippolytus writes: "At the sight of these prodigious events, everyone is filled with amazement . . . and a great number of those drawn to the faith by the martyrs become martyrs of God themselves" (Com. in Dan. 2, 38).

So, it is indeed true that Christian martyrdom in the first centuries had a missionary effect, as Tertullian famously expressed it: plures efficimur quotiens metimur a vobis: semen est sanguis christianorum (Apol. 50, 13; Ad Diog. 7, 7-9).

H. v. Campenhausen, Die Idee des Martyriums in der alten Kirche, Göttingen 1936 ([2]1964); M. Simonetti, Studi agiografici, Rome 1955; M. Lods, Confesseurs et martyrs. Successeurs des prophètes dans l'Église des trois premiers siècles, Neuchâtel-Paris 1958; T. Klauser, Christlicher Märtyrerkult, heidnischer Heroenkult und spätjüdische Heiligenverehrung. Neue Einsichten und neue Probleme, Cologne-Opladen 1960; N. Brox, Zeuge und Märtyrer. Untersuchungen zur frühchristlichen Zeugnis-Terminologie, Munich 1961; M. Pellegrino, Le sens ecclésial du martyre: RSR 35 (1961) 151-175; P.Y. Emery, L'unité des croyants au ciel et sur la terre, Taizé 1962; S. Pezzella, Gli Atti dei martiri. Introduzione a una storia dell'antica agiografia, Rome 1965; E. Dassmann, Sündenvergebung durch Taufe, Busse und Martyrerfürbitte in den Zeugnissen frühchristlicher Frömmigkeit und Kunst, Münster 1973; W. Rordorf - A. Solignac, Martyre: DSp 10, 717-735; T. Baumeister, Die Anfänge der Theologie des Martyriums, Münster 1980; Id., Genèse et évolution de la théologie du martyre dans l'Église ancienne (Traditio Christiana 8), Berne 1991 (It. tr. Turin 1995); D. Boyarin, Dying for God, Stanford, CA 1999; S.T. Pinkaers, La spiritualité du martyre, Versailles 2000; A. Di Berardino, Il modello del martire volontario, in Euplo e Lucia, 304–2004, ed. T. Sardella - G. Zito, Catania 2006, 63-105.

W. Rordorf

II. Cult of martyrs, saints and relics. Originally, there was no difference between the rites used in the cult of the dead and that of the martyrs, as the latter is derived from the former; nor is there any between those of martyrs and saints who are not martyrs, because, very early on, the latter were associated with the former by a common veneration. Furthermore, there was no difference originally between the cult of the saints (martyrs and nonmartyrs) and the cult of their relics, which were considered to be the sign of their presence and the instrument of their action, spiritually speaking, among the living. This is because all these religious practices grew out of each other, like the branches of a tree from a single root.

1. The single root. From the cult of the dead any traditional practices not incompatible with the Christian faith were transferred to the cult of the martyrs. The same thing happened with regard to specifically Christian customs in the cult of the dead, born of the desire to correct and complement pagan customs.

These general observations are confirmed by particular cases. Funerals are mentioned only in exceptional circumstances (Act. Cypr. 5, 6). Reference to spices in the Acta of the martys (besides those used for embalming) became a hagiographical cliché, but nonetheless reflects a real custom (Act. Eupl. II, 3, 3). Mention of the place of burial frequently occurs in the Passions from Africa (Act. Cypr. 5, 6; Act. Maximil. 3, 4; Act. Fel. Thibiuc. 6, 2), and the practice is confirmed in the Depositio episcoporum* and the Depositio martyrum in *Rome. The same goes for the date of death, the recording of which was recommended by Cyprian (Ep. 12, 2; 39, 3). This practice is also confirmed by the Depositiones in Rome. All these data, taken together, give us the same impression: in the cult of the martyrs all the previous funerary customs that could be kept continued to be used.

The most striking example of this conservative tendency is to be seen in the custom of libations and funeral banquets, which the Christians of Rome practiced on behalf of their dead who were buried in the immediate vicinity of Peter (tomb γ), in honor of Peter and Paul (see the triclia inscriptions at S. Sebastiano). The same thing occurred in *Spain (Cypr., Ep. 67, 6), although in *Africa *Tertullian and *Cyprian prohibited their faithful from observing this custom. At St. Peter's Basilica in Rome it still existed at the end of the 4th c. (Aug., Ep. 29, 10).

2. The cult of martyrs. Just as Christian practices relating to the cult of the dead were derived from a common root, so were the practices relating to the cult of the martyrs. But from the 2nd c. they began to diverge. We learn this from hagiographical literature, which originated at this time. The religious practices described in the Martyrdom of Polycarp, the veneration expressed toward the martyrs of 177 in the joint letter from the churches of *Lyons and *Vienne, and the religious practices that presuppose the hagiographical documents from Africa show how, even in its origins, the cult of the martyrs took on both a communitarian (or even intercommunitarian) dimension, and a liturgical one. (These texts were read out.) In the 3rd c. Cyprian clearly attests to the Christian practice of celebrating the *Eucharist on behalf of the martyrs; he also affirms that the practice has ancient roots (Ep. 12, 2; 39, 3). It is linked, on the one hand, with the anniversary of the deceased, as may be gleaned from the Martyrdom of Polycarp and from the letters of Cyprian and, on the other hand, with the tomb, in the vicinity of which the rite was celebrated. Again this is known from the Martyrdom of Polycarp, as well as from the Roman Depositiones, esp. the Depositio martyrum. Regarding the character of this Eucharist on behalf of the martyrs, it is necessary to underline, first of all, how it possesses the same character as every other Eucharist; i.e., right from the very dawn of Christianity, it has always been eschatological, inasmuch as it is at once the *anamnesis of Easter (death and resurrection of the Lord) and an expectation of his coming (1 Cor 11:26). This would have been particularly marked during the martyr liturgy. Furthermore, precisely because of this, the Eucharist celebrated on the anniversary of martyrdom sometimes retained a secondary meaning, that of intercession for the martyrs, which we see as an archaic survival in Cyprian (Ep. 12, 2; 39, 3) and in the Liturgy of St. *John Chrysostom (F. E. Brightman, Liturgies Eastern and Western, Oxford 1896, 131, 1.12 ff).

The 4th c. represents a period of change with regard to the cult of the martyrs. First, any lingering elements that might have permitted the belief that the church was praying on their behalf were eliminated. *Augustine states that we must not pray for them, since the martyrs are already in the glory of God; rather, it is they who pray for us. The religious acts on behalf of the martyrs do not make them equal to God, but leave them in their human condition of dependence on the Lord, even if the holiness they achieved through martyrdom renders them worthy of our veneration, and they can be our advocates with God (Aug., Serm. 285; De Civ. Dei 8, 27). The second important change relating to the cult of the martyrs consists in the gradual suppression of funerary banquets on their behalf. By the time Augustine arrived in *Milan with his mother (Confess. 6, 2), *Ambrose had forbidden them. Augustine himself, after his return to Africa, launched his own campaign against them (see Saxer, Morts, martyrs, reliques, 133-147). Third, it is to be noted that a special liturgy for the martyrs was developed, characterized by large gatherings of people, in which the banquets were replaced by prayer vigils, with a selection of readings taken from the Bible and of a hagiographical nature, accompanied by special chants, circumstantial discourses or *panegyrics popular in the East, while in the West the Passions were commented upon. In the 4th c. great basilicas were constructed in honor of the martyrs (Rome, *Jerusalem), sometimes with one or more annexes to welcome pilgrims who had traveled long distances (Kalaat Seman, Tebessa [Thebaste] etc.).

3. The cult of nonmartyr saints. Up to the end of the 4th c. only the martyrs were objects of honor and cult, but once the persecutions were over, the equivalent of the martyrs was created. The first apparently derived from the liturgical use of readings from diptychs during the Eucharist. At Rome in 336 readings of this kind were the Depositio episcoporum and the Depositio martyrum. What was inserted during the Mass is known from the letters of *Innocent I to *Decentius of Gubbio, of *Boniface I to *Honorius, and of *Leo the Great to *Anatolius (DACL 4, 1051, 1063). In the Cal. Carth., from the beginning of the 6th c., the two series are together, and this corresponds to a final stage in the evolution, when a distinction no longer exists between martyrs and bishops from the point of view of cult. This stage is arrived at, in Rome and Milan, at about the same time as the Communicantes in the canon of the Mass presents a unified series of both martyrs and nonmartyr saints (DACL 4, 1066). It is precisely because of this same reasoning that *Basil the Great and *Martin of Tours were ranked with martyrs, without having shed their blood. There is another reason, though: as well as being bishops, they led a life of asceticism and virginity, and the development of ideas in the 4th c. tended more and more toward regarding this kind of life as equivalent to martyrdom. *Anthony (Vita Antonii 91), *Hilarion (Soz., HE 3, 14) among the ascetics who became popular thanks to the Vitae Patrum, and, among women, *Radegund, Batilde, Gertrude of Nivelles and Austreberta of Pavilly showed how asceticism and virginity went hand in hand and were reasons for being venerated first by the faithful and then by the church. *Gregory of Tours in his minor hagiographical opuscula and *Gregory the Great in his Dialogues can also give us a picture of their country and period toward the end of the 6th c.

4. The cult of relics and images. In origin the cult of relics formed a single whole with the cult of the mortal remains of the saints. The body was interred whole in the tomb, where it received the honors established by tradition. It was not possible to divide the body up, nor to remove any part of it, nor transfer it; a fortiori no sale of relics could have been carried out. These practices were prohibited by the Codex Theodosianus, based on the ancient legislative norms contained in the twelve tables. Indeed, bones that had been dispersed were to be reunited, as far as possible, and kept together with the rest of the body. Even if this typically Roman legislation and practice was not found throughout the empire, they served to justify the refusal on the part of those in the West to divide up the bodies of the saints, and to justify substitution for them representational relics that had touched or been close to the bodies (brandea). By contrast, in the East, they were more tolerant in this regard. Translation of relics and dividing them up became commonplace, beginning with those of St. *Babylas of Antioch (351–354), and thereafter these customs passed on to *Constantinople (where they became a typical feature) and to the rest of the East. In the 2nd half of the 4th c. some relics arrived in N Italy from the East, and this could perhaps explain the spread (almost the fashion) of the practice of translating relics. St. Ambrose became a promoter of the practice in that region. Undoubtedly, the finding of the relics of St. Stephen (415) caused in the West the most profound and most long-lasting change by reason of their diffusion everywhere. We have an excellent example of it in St. Augustine, whose initial indifference to the cult of relics was transformed in the last years of his life into active and informative promotion. The final stage in the development of the practice in the West comes with Gregory of Tours, and in the East with *John of Damascus. The hagiographical works of Gregory were entirely orientated toward the cult of relics, and they form a catalog of the miracles worked by them. His Historia Francorum also presents numerous hagiographical anecdotes. John of Damascus (De fide orthodoxa 4, 15) sums up the Greek theology supporting the cult of relics, and his works form a prelude to that of Thomas Aquinas, as far as this question is concerned: since it is the temple of God on earth, the body of a saint receives the "honor of veneration" (προσκύνησις τιμητική), which should be given to all those who demonstrated such a dignity; since this dignity is a reflection of divine glory, the honor it receives redounds ultimately to God himself. What John of Damascus says concerning relics, he also says of images. However, the latter element is typical of the East, where the difficult iconoclastic period was soon to begin. In the West, it is not until the Middle Ages that the cult of images develops along similar lines.

RAC 14, 111-136; Storia del Cristianesimo 3, 968-1009; E. Lucius, Les origines du culte des saints dans l'église chrétienne, Paris 1908; F. Pfister, Der Reliquienkult im Altertum, Giessen 1909; Delehaye OC 50-140; Id., Sanctus, Brussels 1927; A. Grabar, Martyrium, Paris 1943; V.L. Kennedy, The Saints of the Canon of the Mass, Vatican City ²1963; M. Righetti, Manuale di storia liturgica 2, Milan ³1969, 396-470; A. Amore, Culto e canonizzazione dei santi nell'antichità cristiana: Antonianum 52 (1974) 38-80; V. Saxer, Morts, martyrs, reliques en Afrique chrétienne aux premiers siècles, Paris 1980; O. Pasquato, Religiosità popolare e culto ai martiri, in particolare a Costantinopoli nei secc. IV-V, tra paganesimo, eresia e ortodossia: Augustinianum 21 (1981) 207-242; J. Camarero Cuñado, La figura del santo en la liturgia hispanica, Salamanca-Madrid 1982; P. Brown, Il culto dei santi, Turin 1983; Ph. Harnoncourt - H. Auf der Maur, Feiern im Rhythmus der Zeit 2,1, Regensburg 1994, 87-134; M. Lamberigts - P. van Deun (eds.), Martyrium in Multidisciplinary Perspective, Louvain 1995; G.W. Bowersock, Martyrdom and Rome, Cambridge 1998; A. Dihle, Theodorets Verteidigung des Kults der Märtyrer, in E. Dassmann (ed.), Chartulae, Münster 1998, 104-108; W. Jacobsen, Altarraum und Heiligengrab als liturgisches Konzept, in N. Bock et al. (eds.), Kunst und Liturgie im Mittelalter, Munich 2000, 65-74; A. Legner, Reliquien in Kunst und Kult, Darmstadt 1995; A. Angenendt, Heilige und Reliquien, Munich [2]1997; V. Saxer, Il culto dei santi nelle diocesi suburbicarie di Roma in età paleocristiana, in S. Boesch Gajano - E. Petrucci (ed.), Santi e culti del Lazio, Rome 2000, 13-59; E. Ofenbach, Sulle orme dei santi a Roma. Guida alle icone, reliquie e case dei santi, Vatican City 2003; S. Heid, Märtyrer oder Mörder? Friedensliebe und Kampf christlicher Glaubensstreiter: Carbones 2 (2003) 47-64.

V. Saxer - S. Heid

III. Acts, passions, legends. The literature relating to the martyrs received different names: Acts are documents that record the decisions of the judicial authorities regarding the death sentence given to the martyrs; Passions and Martyria are of a somewhat narrative character and deal with the martyrs' last days and death; Legends are accounts that contain more fanciful elements than historical truth. Even if these definitions are, at least in part, conventional, still the concept of literary genre is applied even to hagiographical literature. The concept is normally used in nonreligious literature, and has been common in hagiography only since the 20th c., and in biblical criticism only since the end of the 20th c.

1. Brief history of textual criticism regarding the martyrs. The Bollandist H. Delahaye used the retirement forced upon him by World War I to expound the theory of this hagiographical criterion and apply it to martyr literature. In it he distinguished historical passions from *panegyrics, and the latter from epic passions. All possible contaminations were highlighted in these principal genres. About thirty years later, Canon R. Aigrain, in a manual that has already become a classic, gave a didactic exposition of these ideas. G. Lazzati, a little later, developed them further: limiting himself to writings from the first four centuries, he determined the limits and the historical and liturgical conditions for establishing their authenticity, and he peeled away what had been overlaid toward the end of the period owing to different attitudes. Finally, the work of G. Lanata regarded the Acts as procedural documentation in virtue of which Christians had been condemned to martyrdom. One had thus arrived, after a gradual limiting of the material, at a fine-tuning of criticism of the documents concerning the martyrs, and at a separation of all the liturgical, redactional and novelistic passages present in the literary form from the authentic factual kernel. From the analysis of these criteria it became clear the panegyrics did not belong to the same literary genre as acts, passions and legends. The characteristic these three documents have in common is the fact that they contain narrative texts which describe, more or less faithfully, what happened to the martyrs from the time they appeared before the tribunal until the execution of the sentence passed on them. And it is in virtue of this criterion that the texts must be included in this literature.

2. Passion narratives. The oldest text in this genre is the Martyrdom of Polycarp (BHG 1556). It is generally agreed that the martyrdom occurred in 167, which makes it possible to date the letter that records it to 170. The Christians of *Smyrna encourage the confreres of Philomelia, who had asked for information on the death of their bishop *Polycarp, presenting him as a martyr acc. to the gospel. This is the leading idea inspiring the composition of the letter, which was furthermore considered a circular letter that the inhabitants of Philomelia were asked to make known to all the Catholic communities. From the very start, the account of the martyrdom is structured like a demonstration and presented as a circular letter.

The same occurred with the letter of *Lyons. Indeed, the churches of *Lyons and *Vienne each inform their sister churches in *Asia and *Phrygia of the events of 177, in which a very large group of Christians from both cities fell victim (BHG 1573). The text is edited acc. to the epistolary style of the first Christians, and aims to show that martyrdom is equivalent to combat, that the martyrs are the combatants of God, that the devil is the enemy and that the persecutors are his troops. When the enemy believes he has annihilated them, at that moment they are victorious because they have imitated Christ's own humiliation and exaltation, and that with him they have become faithful and truthful witnesses. In these ideas we are able to recognize the basic theme of the Christian understanding of martyrdom, already sketched out in the Martyrdom of Polycarp, and which receive a biblical setting of exceptional richness in the letter of Lyons. This does not remove the fact that modern criticism is generally in agreement with *Eusebius of Caesarea (HE 5, 1, 2) when it recognizes in this document a fidelity to history that matches its desire to be spiritually edifying. The letter also constitutes a source of primary value for the history of the origins of Christianity in Lyons.

These literary models gave impulse to the proper series of martyrdoms and passions found in both the Greek East and in the Latin West. The term Martyrion stands at the head of the accounts dealing with *Justin and his companions in ca. 163–167 (BHG 973); with *Apollonius in ca. 183–185 (BHG 149); with Carpus, Papylus and *Agathonice in 250 (BHG 294); with *Agape, Chionia and Irene in 304 (BHG 34); and with *Euplus in 304 (BHG 629-630).

These texts are principally indebted to earlier hagiographical traditions, in their respect for historical accuracy and in their concern for an apologetical presentation, but all together they usher in a new literary form. The epistle was abandoned in favor of an account, pure and simple; in addition, the balance between history and apologetics was about to tilt in the direction of the latter. In other words, these texts often preserve elements, more or less important, of the judicial acts, but the rhetorical elements with which they are mingled become ever more prominent. The importance of and concern for the testimony, as given and reported for its own sake, began to disappear, giving way to a fresh presentation of the Christian faith. Christian apologetics became militant in its defense of Christian identity, and began to attack the other religions of the day, i.e., paganism and Judaism. This new attitude, proper to apologists from *Athenagoras to *Tertullian, was introduced in the martyrdoms written in Greek, in which it became almost universal. In the meantime, the passions written in Latin, which were mainly from Africa, had a different purpose and followed a separate line of development. These involve the passions of Perpetua (BHL 6633), of *Marianus and Jacobus (BHL 131), of *Montanus and Lucius (BHL 6009), of the martyrs of *Abitina (BHL 7492), of the *Donatist martyrs (BHL 2303b, 4473, 5271). This choice of texts allows us to discern two periods in ancient African hagiography.

The first includes the passion of Perpetua, that of Marianus and James, and that of Montanus and Lucius, belonging in large part to the 3rd c., in which visions have a very important role. The Passio Perpetuae is the first of the group in the earlier period. The passions coming from that period all share another characteristic: accounts of visions are autobiographical, written by the martyrs themselves and incorporated into the whole by the final redactor. Finally, the Passio Perpetuae reveals an apologetical intention on the part of the redactor to show that the martyrs' visions are equivalent to a prophetic charism, and that their autobiography constitutes a text inspired in the same way as the canonical Scriptures, and destined like them to be read in the liturgy. The same intention underlies all the literature on visions.

The second period consists of the Donatist hagiography. It includes passions of martyrs who died prior to the *schism, but who, after some embellishment and addition, were adopted by the sect (e.g., the Passio Saturnini, BHL 7492). Then there are the passions of the Donatists proper, who are presented in different ways (accounts, sermons, letters), all of which were intended to show that the Donatist church was the church of the martyrs, and so the only true one, whereas the Catholic Church was the false one and the church of traitors (traditores*). It can be seen that not only did the passions of the martyrs become tools for polemic and propaganda, but they also served to establish the criteria of orthodoxy. Ideology became more important than history.

3. Judicial acts. During the same era there appeared and developed the literary genre of the judicial acts, which consist of the dialogues, of variable length, between the martyr and the judge. The redaction of these records conforms to the customs of the chanceries of Roman courts. Such customs are known about because of a number of verbal records used in Antiquity: the case of *Dionysius of Alexandria (Eus., HE 6, 40; 7, 11, 1-19), Gesta apud Zenophilum (CSEL 26, 185-197), Acta purgationis Felicis ep. Aptung. (CSEL 26, 197-204), Gesta collationis Carthaginensis (SC 194, 195, 224); or recent papyrus findings (U. Wilcken - L. Mitteis, Grundzüge und Chrestomatie der Papyruskunde, Leipzig-Berlin 1912). Resorting to the public archives in which the documents were kept was possible, and is a well-attested practice (Aug., Serm. Denis 19, 18). Did one resort to the archives in order to obtain information on the acts of the martyrs? To answer this question affirmatively the acts of Taracus, Probus and Andronicus are usually adduced (BHL 7981), the redactor of which affirms that he obtained, for a sum of gold, a copy of the public acts of the proceedings relating to them. H. Delahaye was inclined not to give much credence to this example, while R. Aigrain felt it was possible to resort to it. For his part, G. Lanata admitted it in principle, but thought that the particular case in BHL 7981 had been invented. In any case, even supposing there was no deceit on the part of the redactor, these acts constitute a unique example from which one cannot generalize, and therefore other explanations are preferred. In the case of brief, single hearings whose existence is only known about because of the public nature of the case, it is to be imagined that what was put into writing were the remembrances of one or more of the witnesses who had heard the proceedings with their own ears. In the case of multiple or prolonged hearings, there was nothing to stop the same witnesses from taking down the questions and answers and using them in their own versions of events with more freedom than an official chancellor, except perhaps the fear of betraying themselves as Christians.

Since the custom of transmitting the acts had become a general practice, what might we conclude regarding the cases? Being Christian was a crime punishable by death; only provincial governors (in Rome, the prefect of the city or the prefect of the Praetorium) had jus gladii and were able to pass a capital sentence. So, Christians who lived in a city that was home to a governor were handed over to his court, and this might shorten the interval between the investigation of the case and sentencing. Thus we see some cases concluded in a single session (Acta Scillitanorum, BHL 7527), though usually there was more than one session: the acts of *Phileas indicate there were certainly five sessions in his case (AB 81, 12). Perennius had granted three days' reflection to *Apollonius (BHG 149); Saturninus proposed thirty for the *Scillitani martyrs. If after this period the accused persisted in calling himself or herself a Christian, the magistrate, aided by counsel, passed sentence and the chancellor transcribed the act of condemnation onto a tablet, which the magistrate read to the condemned in front of everyone (ex tabellis recitare). The sentence was carried out immediately. In the case of Christians living outside provincial capitals, they appeared first before the municipal body whose duty it was to investigate the case (cognitio pro tribunali) in order to verify the defendant's identity and affiliation (where appropriate, within the hierarchy) with Christianity. A verbal record (Acta) was drawn up, made into a dossier (elogium), which was sent to the governor together with the defendant (which was the most common occurrence), or one had to await the governor's arrival in that place, if he was in the process of performing an inspection (Acts of Pionius, BHG 1545). The Acta were read in the presence of the governor, and the defendant was able to confirm or retract his previous statements. He was then condemned or released depending on the case.

The circumstances of the case could vary: the governor could preside in secretario, i.e., privately, in his office, or pro tribunali, in open court. The municipal authorities investigated the case in a public place; for *Pionius, in the forum at *Smyrna. The investigation could include the quaestio, i.e., torture (quaestio per tormenta), and the course of the inquiry itself was left to the governor's initiative, who also enjoyed the power of postponing a condemnation, or of not facilitating an inquiry (Tertull., Ad Scap. 4, 3-5). Often the governor behaved with courtesy toward the defendants, as in the case of Perennius with Apollonius, of Paternus with Cyprian, and of Culcianus with Phileas. Saturninus also in no way wished to condemn the Scillitani, and believed an out-of-court settlement possible. But the difference lay in this: in the face of pagan syncretism, Christian monotheism was intransigent; hence the reply of the Scillitani and of Cyprian: for such a just cause, there is no need for deliberation!

Judicial acts, from the point of view of their most authentic nature, vividly show us the abyss that separated two worlds, between which opposition and incomprehension had a reciprocal permanence, despite strict and diverse relations; although usually dormant, opposition and incomprehension erupt in periods of crisis.

Judicial acts had the same purpose as the Passio Perpetuae, which was produced, as its compiler explicitly admits, to be read during the liturgy. The opening is well known: dating in accordance with the division of the Roman month the consular year, indication of the place, questioning to confirm the defendant's identity. These formulas were often preceded by a title or preamble, in Christian texts, in which the appellation "martyr" or "blessed martyr" was applied to the saint, a title unknown in the public chanceries; or, in the acts of Justin, by a reference to the circumstances of the martyrdom, during the time of the "impious and idolatrous persecutions" (an expression that is equivalent to a kind of Christian signature on the document, but which in no way affected the essence of it). In the course of the acts other features may be noticed: the hero is always described as "martyr"; the minutiae of the verbal proceedings may be abbreviated; the Christian character of the martyr's replies is carefully underlined; the relation of the audience is completed by an account of the execution. Finally, the end of the text, given the doxology it contains, has a distinctly liturgical style. All these touches do not change the substance of the original document, but merely give it a Christian context.

Based on the type of minor edit, we are able to distinguish two series of judicial acts. On the one hand, the acts of the Scillitani martyrs (BHL 7527); of Cyprian (BHL 2037); of *Maximilian (BHL 5813); of *Marcellus (5253-5255), of *Fructuosus, Augurius and Eulogius (BHL3196); and on the other hand, the acts of Justin (BHG 973); of Apollonius (BHG 149); of Carpus, Papilus and Agathonice (BHG 294); of Agape, Chionia and Irene (BHG 34); and of Euplus (BHG 629-630). While acts in Latin (except those of Fructuosus, preserved in a 4th-c. edition) follow with great fidelity the general development of judicial acts, those in Greek witnessed an evolution very early on. Only those of Justin (preamble aside, which dates from the 4th c.), and already to a lesser extent those of Apollonius, consist for the most part of court documents, which do still exist in other acts, but in a context in which the editor intervenes more and more, until by the time of the Martyrdom of Pionius (at the end of the 4th c. or beginning of the 5th) only two chapters out of twenty make reference to the verbal proceedings. This evolution prepared the ground for the imaginative renderings of the Passiones.

4. Epic and fictional legends. These represent a genre of document in which the historical part was reduced in favor of purely fantastic elements. They approached epic literature or historical novels, and could merge with the common genre of folklore.

This tendency to transform hagiographical texts into fiction is evident in documents that are indisputably historical in essence. In the passion that deals with Apollonius, the Roman martyr of 183–185, his name has been changed to Apollo, the contemporary of St. Paul (Acts 18:24; 19:1; 1 Cor 1:12; 3:4; Tit 3:13), Perennes the prefect of Rome becomes Perennius, proconsul of Asia, though that splendid province was in fact unknown to him; in the *Armenian version (BHO 79), Apollonius keeps his name but the proconsul of Asia loses his, becoming Terence, together with his office, becoming prefect or chiliarch. In the Martyrdom of Pionius (BHG 1546), there are not only chance examples resulting from textual transmission, but also alterations that affect the substance of the document. The author of the text claims to base himself upon writings of the martyr (σύγγραμμα) and upon notes from the court (υπομνήματα), and in fact some fragments do remain, but the author's input is as blatant as in the visions of Catherine Emmerich, edited by C. Brentano. Yet more problematic is the case of the Martyrdom of Dasius (BHG 491): if we take the account of the Saturnalia, which serves to frame the martyrdom and gives it much local color, the martyrdom is reduced to a few commonplaces with no historical consistency.

The story of *Dasius introduces us to the properly epic passions, a genre whose characteristics have been fully discussed by H. Delahaye. These as a rule comprise conventional characters (emperors, magistrates, murderers, eyewitnesses, gravediggers) and scenes (interrogations, torture, miracles, resurrections), elements of which the Egyptian passions indulge in for the sake of apologetics, with the intervention of *Julius of Aqfahs, who appears as a judge's secretary, burier of martyrs and redactor of their passions, before becoming himself the hero of his own passion. These passions are comparable to epic, as they are guided by the same need to exalt the hero by the multiplication of his accomplishments and the difficulty of them.

Together with epic passions, from the 3rd c. on fictional passions developed. The hagiographical romance was able to take on all the forms of the secular romance. The most famous Christian adventure story is without doubt the Clementine drama known as the Recognitiones. Pope *Clement, who was without a shadow of doubt a genuine historical figure and the author of the Christian literature from the last years of the 1st c., is transformed by St. Peter's preaching and by his own into a hero looking for his scattered family. To this genre also belong the Acts of Paul and Thecla (BHG 1710). The author of this romance was dismissed as a liar, despite his protestations to have written it for love of the apostle. However, the very height of improbability is reached with the adventures of the general Placidas, who died with the name Eustace or Eustachius (BHL 2760-61), unknown in the prosopography of the Roman army. As much could be said of numerous saints who were transformed into soldiers.

Similar to the adventure story is the idyllic romance: in place of the sexually explicit dramas typical in Antiquity, Christians turned them into edifying stories. The Passion of Marcian of Caesarea in Mauretania (BHL 5256-5257) focuses exclusively on *virginity. The story of St. *Cecilia carries this theme further: the heroine promises on her wedding night to remain a virgin, and gets her husband to respect this promise (BHL 1495). The account is a tracing from the end of the 5th c. of a scene recounted by Victor of Vita (Hist. pers. Afr. I, 30-35), in which the protagonist is one Maxima from Africa. The account makes use of Roman martyrs and characters as its heroes, whose tombs were known and could be venerated by anyone, while the church in Trastevere, named St. Cecilia's, actually bears the name of its foundress and illustrates a historical process well known in Roman churches, i.e., the making of founders of churches into saints. As for the story of *Alexius (BHO 36-44; BHL 289), it develops a theme that has earned fame over the years, the theme of the young spouse who leaves his wife on his wedding night in order to pursue a life of poverty and begging for the love of Christ. Similar edifying themes abound in hagiographical literature, and from the martyrs these themes passed to saints who were not martyrs. One may cite, inter alia, the martyrdom that purifies the soul from sin; innocence persecuted till death; the forgiveness of offenses pushed so far as to despise oneself; the martyrdom of charity whereby an innocent person takes the place of the condemned; the actor who allows himself to be involved in conversion as a joke; the virgin disguised as a man in a male convent, whose identity is discovered only after her death.

This development brings with it a confusion in the literary genres, such that the boundary between hagiography, fictional writing, folklore and myth becomes blurred. This brings us to a point where genuine saints have become wizards, and where myth has assumed the form of the lives of the saints. One of the most curious phenomena in this evolution is the creation of hagiographical cycles: a saint, who gives his name and a fictitious unity to the whole, is surrounded by a group of other saints who have been put together in the calendar (cycle of Polychronius for the saints from the end of July to the middle of August) or in topology (St. Sebastian's, *The Four Crowned Martyrs). This process is familiar to novelists like A. Dumas, Balzac or Bourget.

In conclusion, one can see that hagiographical literature covers a domain as wide and varied as secular literature: documents only just or barley sketched out, or roughly reworked; stories composed in order to instruct and edify coreligionists, or with an explicitly apologetic or polemic purpose; work of pure fantasy in which history serves as no more than a handle for the imagination's acrobatics. Upon this stage of variable consistency tread characters whose historical worth is itself varied: next to authentic and recognizable martyrs, charted acc. to well-known and verifiable coordinates, there are those whose features, disfigured by hagiography, have become unrecognizable under several coats of paint caused by constraints of literary form or by transformation into legendary figures; and there are also some invented deliberately, using characters from fables, romances, myths and other fictional literature.

The duty of hagiographical criticism is to apply the notion of literary form to this varied oeuvre, and to do so with sufficient discernment as to be able to distinguish in the end what is truly historical.

BHG; BHL; BHO; CPL 2049-2248; Frede, Kirchenschriftsteller 49-90; S. Döpp - W. Geerlings (eds.), LACL 470-477; H. Delehaye, Légendes hagiographiques, Paris 1927; B. de Gaiffier, La lecture des Actes des martyrs dans la prière liturgique en Occident: AB 72 (1954) 134-166; Id., La lecture des Passions des martyrs à Rome avant le IXe s.: AB 87 (1969) 63-78; G. Lazzati, Gli sviluppi della letteratura sui martiri nei primi quattro secoli, Turin 1956; G. Wiessner, Zur Märtyrerüberlieferung aus der Christenverfolgung Schapurs II, Göttingen 1967; G. Lanata, Gli Atti dei martiri come documenti processuali, Milan 1973; G. Caldarelli, Atti dei martiri, Milan ²1996; A.A.R. Bastiaensen et al., Atti e passioni dei martiri, Milan 1987; G.A. Bisbee, Pre-Decian Acts of Martyrs and "Commentarii," Philadelphia 1988; Th. Baumeister, La teologia del martirio nella Chiesa antica, Turin 1995; R. Aigrain, L'hagiographie, Brussels ²2000, 132-155, 417-421.

V. Saxer - S. Heid

IV. Inscriptions relating to the martyrs.

1. Types of inscriptions. For the development of the cult of the martyrs, which affected the diversification of epigraph writing from the 4th c. onward, we shall refer to the treatise by H. Delehaye, which is largely based on inscriptions. The following distinctions can be made:

a. Epitaphs of the martyrs. These are funerary inscriptions characterized by the mention of the title martyr, either singly, or together with the word passus, with the date and sometimes with details about the circumstances of the martyrdom. Epitaphs of martyrs, though common in Rome, where their cult remained for a long time attached to cemeteries (and so to the catacombs), were more rarely seen in places where the practice of translating their bodies and dispersing their relics was first known. However, few of these texts are contemporary with their burial: there are many late copies or new versions that were made when the tombs were embellished (inscriptions from Pope Damasus's time).

b. Inscriptions that indicate the presence of relics. Whether the relics are real (from the 4th c. in the East) or just symbolic (generally in the West brandea of cloth or consecrated earth), one or more inscriptions can serve to signal their presence and to make clear the circumstances of the depositio. Epigraphs can be distinguished acc. to the type and placement of the reliquary. When the reliquaries are large and visible or accessible (e.g., the reliquaries ad oleum in the East), the one and only inscription was written on the lid or body of the coffin. More commonly, in places where the reliquary was set under the altar or in its base (Greece and the West), three types of text can be found: (1) text written on the coffin, an authentica, which gives the name or names of the martyrs approved by ecclesiastical authority. Such an inscriptions may also be found away from the coffin or container; (2) the verbal account of the depositio with the name of the relics (more often memoriae than reliquiae), the designation of the saints, the word positius or depositus, the name of the bishop who performed the consecration (introduced by ab then by the expression per manus), the date, with just the day of the month (for the purposes of commemorations), or the precise year, sometimes also the name of the person who commissioned the tomb or of its donor; (3) when the authentication or verbal account of the depositio are not visible, the name of the martyr was simply displayed on the exterior with, in most cases, the date that serves for the commemoration. (See also the lists of the martyrs below.)

c. Dedications. The name of the venerated martyr often appears as part of a dedication or a votive formula—generally together with the name of the one making the dedication, and there is sometimes a prayer or the reason for the ex voto, and at the end the date—above the area dedicated to the martyrs. It can be part of the same structure, but in that case the text may be written on the façade, on the architrave of the door, on a mosaic on the ground, etc.; besides words designating an important building (basilica, ecclesia), neutral terms are also found (domus N. martyris) or poetic terms (sedes), and often memoria, which is ambiguous in meaning, being both abstract (remembrance) and concrete (the commemorative object or monument itself) at the same time. The dedication may be fixed to something inside (altar, civory, enclosure, table, see below) or to some furnishing (esp. a lamp, corona, or metal votive cross).

d. Mensae martyrum. A category peculiar to Africa, but only sporadically documented elsewhere (e.g., at *Axiopolis in Scythia Minor), is that of the mensae martyrum, inscriptions on a molded rectangular or semicircular slab laid flat, with the name of the martyrs above introduced by the words mensa, memoria, nomina, or sometimes by a votive formula. The form is derived from a tradition of funerary mensae in many parts of Africa. But the mensae martyrum, all of which are of uncertain provenance, do not have a funerary character. They are not altars, as was long believed, and they do not indicate the presence of relics. Their purpose in a church has not been ascertained: are they merely ex votos or tables for offerings?

e. The inhumations ad sanctos and the invocations of martyrs in epitaphs. Very early on the custom developed of placing the deceased's tomb under the protection of a patron, who could intercede for him or her on heaven, either through proximity to the tomb or through a formula of invocation. For this there is the mention of the presence of the saint (ad sanctum N.) or else indication of the building dedicated to the martyr (in basilica sancti N.) in the epitaph; sometimes one comes across a simple invocation (sancti N.N. orate pro nobis).

f. Other categories. Apart from these categories, relatively clearly defined by evidence, geography and formulation, there are other references to the martyrs found in texts of different kinds: elogia written in verse (which can be confused with epitaphs or dedications, like the Damasus inscriptions in Rome), invocations or simple lists. Two terms have given rise to numerous discussions: memoria (see above) and nomina, which were once considered equivalent to relics. When the latter term precedes a list of names with or without a date, it must serve only to encourage or permit the commemoration of the martyrs (like the lists found on top of movable bases, e.g., diptychs attested by texts).

2. Geographical division. Inscriptions relating to the martyrs have been found in every country, and the principal manuals on Christian *epigraphy propose a classification of them. Up to 1920 the Latin texts were conveniently contained within a collection by E. Diehl. Two centers are favored for the number of inscriptions and their historic value: Rome, esp. with the famous "Damasus" series of inscriptions in verse collected by Pope Damasus (366–384) and engraved by Philocalus; and North Africa, where more than 300 varied texts are known, which reflect the particular development of the cult of the martyrs in that province. These texts, annotated until 1907 by P. Monceaux, are now in a new and more specialized edition (Y. Duval).

Studies: 1. On the cult of the martyrs: H. Delehaye, Les origines du culte des martyrs, Brussels 1933; Id., Sanctus, Brussels 1927; H. Leclercq, DACL, s.v. Martyrs, 10, 2359ff., esp. 2494-2512; V. Saxer, Morts, martyrs, reliques en Afrique chrétienne aux premiers siècles, Paris 1980 (with a bibl. on the cult of the martyrs). 2. On inscriptions relating to the martyrs: O. Marucchi, Epigrafia Cristiana, Milan 1910, esp. 152ff., 336ff.; C.M. Kaufmann, Handbuch der altchristlichen Epigraphik, Munich 1917, 203ff., 338ff.; F. Grossi Gondi, Trattato di Epigrafia Cristiana, Rome 1920, esp. 364ff.; M. Guarducci, Epigrafia Greca, IV (Epigrafia Cristiana), Rome 1978, 301ff.; P. Testini, Archeologia Cristiana, Bari [2]1980, esp. 480ff.; E. Diehl, Inscriptiones Latinae Christianae Veteres, I, Berlin 1925, esp. Part II, chs. XI-XII, and vol. IV, Supplementum, ed. J. Moreau - H.I. Marrou, 1967 (cf. A. Ferrua, Nuove osservazioni alla Silloge del Diehl, Vatican City 1981); A. Ferrua, Epigrammata Damasiana, Rome 1942; The "Christians" for "Christians." Inscriptions of Phrygia, Greek texts, tr. and comm. by E. Gibson, Missoula, MT 1978; Y. Duval, Loca sanctorum Africae, Rome 1982; Ch. Pietri, Grabinschrift: RAC 12, Stuttgart 1983, cols. 514-590; Inscriptiones Christianae Italiae, vols. I-X, Bari 1985-1995 (= ICI); D. Mazzoleni, Epigrafi del mondo cristiano antico, Rome 2002.

N. Duval

V. Iconography

In the oldest Christian art, proverbially joyful and positive, there is an avoidance of sad and violent scenes pertaining, e.g., to the passio Christi, with the exception perhaps of the so-called Coronatio scene at the catacombs of Pretestato (Wp 18) and those which symbolically reproduce the holy sepulcher on the so-called passion *sarcophagi (Saggiorato, I sarcofagi, passim). For the same reason, early scenes showing the martyrdom itself or pro tribunali are rare when compared with those which depict their apotheosis, coronation or entry into heaven. *Prudentius informs us of some pictorial decorations that include scenes of martyr hagiography and, in particular, the martyrdom of St. John the Baptist (Dittochaeon XXXIV, vv. 133-136), of St. Stephen the Protomartyr (Dittochaeon XLIV, vv. 177-180), the crucifixion of Christ (ibid. XLII, vv. 165-168) and the massacre of the Holy Innocents (Dittochaeon XXIX, vv. 113-116). Again Prudentius describes the scenes that decorate the outside of a martyrion-like building at Imola showing the passion of St. Cassian (Perist. IX, vv. 8-20) and a cycle that figuratively describes the tomb of *Hippolytus in the Roman catacomb of the same name (Perist. XI, vv. 123-151). Of interest from the Eastern Fathers are the testimony of *Gregory of Nyssa, which records the representation of the martyrdom of St. *Theodore, and that of *Asterius of Amasea, which gives us a precious and vivid description of a representation of St. *Euphemia's execution. Among the depictions that survive today, that which adorned a part of the intrados of an arcosolium of the Cimitero Maggiore on the Via Nomentana in Rome was considered significant (Wp 224, 2). It can be dated to the 2nd half of the 4th c. Once interpreted as the miraculous conversion of Papias and Maurus while they were leading Sisinnius to martyrdom (evidenced by the presence of Christ with a virga), the scene is today understood to be the representation of a double Petrine theme (Bisconti, Dentro e intorno). On a stray fragment of painted plaster, now housed at the Roman cemetery of St. Thecla (Nestori, 144-145, n. 5) and datable to around the middle of the 4th c., one can see a female figure in the orans position and a male figure that is grabbing the woman and trying to drag her away. All this suggests the violent action of martyrdom, or as the only possible alternative, an illustration of the episode of Susanna harassed by one of the elders (Santagata, Su due discusse figurzaioni, 7ff.).

In the top pane of the right-hand wall of the confessional of Ss. Giovanni e Paolo on the Caelian Hill is painted a scene of decollatio, performed by two executioners—in typical military tunics—on three figures kneeling down, blindfolded, with their arms tied behind their backs (Prandi-Ferrari, The Basilica, 128). It seems opportune to recognize in the three figures, of which one certainly shows female characteristics, the hagiographical group *Crispinus, Crispinianus and Benedicta. (The last was associated with the two greater martyrs by a late passio legend.)

At the beginning of the 5th c., mosaic images appear depicting the martyrdom of St. *Thecla in the mausoleum of El-Bagawat in Egypt; there is also a symbolic one of the martyrdom of St. Laurence in the mausoleum of Galla Placidia in *Ravenna (WMM III, 49), the plan of which is substantially repeated in the Successa medal in the Vatican Museum.

In the Roman cemetery of Calipodius on the Aurelia vetus, a pictorial document is preserved, albeit in a very fragmentary condition, which can be dated to the 7th–8th c., and which captures certain moments relating to Pope *Callistus's execution, who is buried there (Nestori, 1993, 153, n.2). It does so in a manner typical of the narrative cycles that embellish basilicas and martyria of that period. Throughout the 4th c. and part of the 5th, a theme developed relating to the martyrdom of the apostles Peter and Paul. We refer to the decollatio Pauli, which appears about the middle of the 4th c. particularly on the so-called passion sarcophagi (Rep. 26, 57, 61, 189, 201, 212 a, 215, 377, 667, 680). The scene sculpted on the slab of Elia Afanacia preserved in the cemetery of Pretestato seems to be a scene depicting religious initiation rather than a Christian martyr event (AC III, 212 = Rep. 558).

But the most interesting document of sculpture left to us is without doubt the design created on a marble pedestal of the ciborium in the basilica Pope *Siricius had built over the tomb of the martyrs *Nereus and Achilleus in the Roman cemetery of *Domitilla (Fasola, La basilicaI, 46, fig.10); here one can make out Achilleus (further indicated by a caption in Vulgar Latin: ACILLEVS) at the moment when, already degraded and disheveled, he receives the mortal blow from his murderer. In conclusion, we recall an interesting clay element in the depiction of the martyrdom of St. *Eulalia of Mérida in Hispania, probably a product of *Visigothic art (Recio Veganzones, Probable representación, 77ff.), and a painting in the cemetery of St. *Januarius in Naples (Fasola, Le catacombe di S. Gennaro, 68) merely hypothetically interpreted as the martyrdom of St. Stephen.

AC 3, 212; U.M. Fasola, Osservazioni su una pittura del cimitero Maggiore, in Miscell. G. Belvederi, Vatican City 1954–1955, 287-302; Id., La basilica dei SS. Nereo ed Achilleo e la catacomba di Domitilla, Rome (n.d.), 46; A. Prandi - G. Ferrari, The Basilica of Saints John and Paul on the Caelian Hill, Rome 1958; A. Saggiorato, I sarcofagi paleocristiani con scene di passione, Bologna 1968; A. Nestori, La catacomba di Calepodio al III miglio dell'Aurelia vetus e i sepolcri dei papi Callisto e Giulio I: RivAC 47 (1971) 199-212; U.M. Fasola, Le catacombe di S. Gennaro a Capodimonte, Rome 1975; P. Testini, Di alcune testimonianze relative ad Ippolito, in Ricerche su Ippolito, Rome 1977, 55-60; J.W. Salomonson, Voluptatem spectandi non perdat sed mutet, Amsterdam-Oxford-New York 1979; A. Recio Veganzones, Probable representación martirial de Santa Eulalia de Mérida en la plástica visigoda, in Misc. A.P. Frutaz, Rome 1980, 77-96; G. Santagata, Su due discusse figurazioni conservate nel cimitero di S. Tecla: Esercizi 3 (1980) 7-14; F. Bisconti, Scene di martirio nell'arte paleocristiana romana: Mondo Archeologico 47 (1980) 37-40; F. Bisconti, Dentro e intorno all'iconografia martiriale romana: dal "vuoto figurativo" all'"immaginario devozionale," in Martyrium in Multidisciplinary Perspective. Memorial Louis Reekmans, Louvain 1995, 247-292; Id.: TIP, 278-279.

F. Bisconti

MARTYRIO MACHABAEORUM, De. A Latin poem of 394 hexameters (its title varies: Versus in natali Machabaeorum martyrum; De fratribus sep- tem Machabaeis, Schanz, Gesch, 159). Various attributions link it with *Hilary of Poitiers, *Hilary of Arles, *Victorinus (CPL 1428) or Cyprianus Gallus (CPPM 2161). Two redactions of this little poem exist (CSEL 23, p.240ff.). On the one hand, it is certainly later than the 4th c., as it cites not only Victorinus of Petovium (Petau), but also *Primasius of Hadrumetum; on the other hand, it must be earlier than the 6th c. The subject matter is taken directly from the biblical text (2 Macc 7:1-41). However, apart from strong resonances on the subject of the prize reserved for God's faithful people, only a few traces remain of the theological richness enjoyed by the sacred page (creation ex nihilo, 7:28; resurrection, 7:9-14; reward of martyrdom, 7:36; punishment of the persecutor, 7:17 and 35). The rest of the poem is limited to a paraphrase of the biblical text.

CPL 1428; BHL 5112; CPPM 2, 2161; 2603; 2610; 2630; PL 50, 1275-1286; CSEL 23, 240-254 // 255-269; BHL 759 n. 7; Schanz IV, 1, 159. For full information on the cult relating to the Maccabean brethren see M. Schatkin, The Maccabean Martyrs: VChr 28 (1974) 97-113.

L. Dattrino

MARTYRIUS (Sahdona) (7th c.). *Nestorian monk and bishop, today known mainly because of the studies of P. Bedjan and A. De Halleux, who published what is left of Martyrius's works, scattered among MSS in several libraries (see CSCO 200, I-XVI). The MSS appear under the name of Mar Turis (Martyrius), which it seems ought to be identified with the Nestorian Sahdona, as known also from other sources. Originally from a village in the mountain regions near Kirkuk (in Iraq), he was a monk of Bet Awe around 635–640. He suffered exile for his christological ideas. He must have had a solid theological training in the school at *Nisibis since he was also familiar with the Cappadocian Fathers. His christological works are lost; there remain some spiritual writings. His principal work is the Book of Perfection, composed when he was 28 and partly lost; in it he expounds his ascetical ideas: it is important for our knowledge of the spiritual doctrine of Nestorian monasticism in Persia during the 7th c. Five letters and some short Maxims of Wisdom by him also remain.

DSp 10, 737-742; P. Bedjan, S. Martyrii, qui et Sahdona, quae supersunt omnia, Paris-Leipzig 1902; A. de Halleux: CSCO 200-201 (1960) (for his life, see intro. in vol. 201, I-XVIII); 214-215 (1961); 252-255 (1965): Fr. tr., ed. and tr. de Halleux; S.P. Brock, A Further Fragment of the Sinai Sahdona Manuscript: Muséon 81 (1968) 139-154; A. de Halleux, Un chapitre retrouvé du Livre de la perfection de Martyrius: Muséon 88 (1975) 253-296 (Fr. tr.); A. de Halleux, La christologie de Martyrios-Sahdona dans l'évolution du nestorianisme: OCP 23 (1957) 5-32; Id., Martyrios-Sahdona. La vie mouvementée d'un "hérétique" de l'Église nestorienne: OCP 24 (1958) 93-128; L. Wehbé, Textes bibliques dans les écrits de Martyrios-Sahdona: Melto 5 (1969) 61-112; J.-M. Fiey, Iso'yaw le Grand. Vie du catholicos nestorien Iso'yaw III d'Adiabène (580-659): OCP 36 (1970) 5-46; BBKL 8, 1177-1179; LACL[3] 491-492.; Patrologia V, 478-479; J.A. McGuckin, The Book of Mystical Chapters: Meditations on the Soul's Ascent from the Desert Fathers and Other Early Christian Contemplatives, Boston 2002.

A. Di Berardino

MARTYRIUS of Antioch (bishop 459–470/471). Chalcedonian bishop, deposed by *Peter the Fuller. He is the addressee of a canonical letter from *Gennadius of Constantinople about the rituals to be used in reconciling heretics. The following were wrongly attributed to him: an Encomium of John Chrysostom, preached at *Constantinople in 407–408 to pro-Chrysostom audiences, and some fragmentary Erotapokriseis.

CPG 6517-6518; PG 47, cols. XLIII-LII; CSCO 84, 237; 88, 164; NPB 2, 552; F. van Ommeslaeghe, La valeur historique de la Vie de S. Jean Chrysostome attribuée à Martyrius d'Antioche (BHG 871): SP 12 (TU 115), Berlin 1975, 478-483; M. Wallraff, L'epitaffio per Giovanni Crisostomo (Ps. Martirio). Inquadramento di una fonte biografica finora trascurata, in Giovanni Crisostomo tra Oriente e Occidente, Rome 2005.

S.J. Voicu

MARTYRIUS of Jerusalem (bishop 478–486). A monk of Cappadocian origin who lived at *Nitria in *Egypt. In 457 he moved to *Palestine to live in the desert of *Judea (*Cyril of Scythopolis, Vita Euth. 32) and to join the laura of *Euthymius. In 478 he was elected patriarch of *Jerusalem, cultivating good relations with the anti-Chalcedonians (*monophysites). His policies succeeded in reestablishing ecclesial communion. We have a letter written by him to *Peter Mongus and a brief sermon, which appear in the Ecclesiastical History of *Zacharias Scholasticus. The sermon was preached during the ceremony of reconciliation with the monophysites, which entailed the acceptance of the first three ecumenical councils with no explicit condemnation of the Council of Chalcedon (451) or of the Tomus ad Flavianum by Pope *Leo.

CPG 6515; CSCO 83, 220-223 and 237-238; 87, 153-155 and 164; L. Perrone, La Chiesa di Palestina e le controversie cristologiche, Brescia 1980, 127ff.; Patrologia V, 257-258.

S.J. Voicu

MARTYROLOGY

I. Ancient martyrologies - II. Medieval martyrologies - III. Roman martyrology.

It is necessary first of all to distinguish between a calendar and a martyrology. As both types of document are in the form of a list of saints (or of martyrs originally) and follow the order of the Roman Calendar, at times they were assimilated with each other: thus there are some who make no distinction in speaking of a martyrology and of the Syrian Compendium (which is a calendar), or in speaking of a calendar and the Martyrology of Carthage. But they are two distinct genres. The calendar, on the one hand, provides only one name per day of saints relating to a single church, like the calendars of Carmona, Naples and Oxyrhynchus. The martyrology, on the other hand, generally gives several names each day and includes feasts, whatever their origin may be, as is the case with the Mart. rom. A further distinction must be made between ancient martyrologies and medieval or historic ones. The former only give the date and place of the feast together with the name and title under which it is celebrated. Historic martyrologies add to these dates further information about historical events to do with the saint (hence the designation historic), which are usually drawn from the Life or from some other source of a historical or literary nature. In both types of martyrology, next to the anniversary of the saint other feasts are also indicated: findings and translations of relics, consecrations of bishops, dedications of churches or altars and also—though very rarely—the saint's conception and birth (Christ, the Virgin, John the Baptist).

I. Ancient martyrologies. The oldest known martyrology is Syrian, from 411 (London, Addit.MS 12150; ed. AASS, *Nov.*II, 1, pp. L–LXIX; PO 10, 7-26). It is a translation of a Greek original composed at *Nicomedia about 360–362, and makes particular use of the Collection of Ancient Acts of the Martyrs of *Eusebius of Caesarea. It embraced the eastern part of the Roman Empire and became one of the principal sources for *Jerome's own martyrology. The Mart. hier. was composed in S Italy (in the Aquileia region?) between 431 and 450. It constitutes the first example of a universal martyrology and was compiled using three main sources: (1) the Roman Depositio martyrum* and Depositio episcoporum; (2) the Syrian martyrology; (3) the antecedent of the *Carthage martyrology. At Auxerre in 592 a new edition was made, characterized by its additions relating to *Gaul found at the end of each day's list. For this reason it became known as the Gallican edition; all the MSS surviving from the Mart. hier. date back to this one. They are divided into two groups: one group represented only by the Epternacensis (begun in the 8th c.), the second group comprising all the others (Bernensis, Laureshamensis, Wissemburgensis, from the end of the 8th c., etc.). The diplomatic edition of the four MSS was made by Duchesne in 1894 (AASS Nov., II, 1), the critical edition in 1931 by H. Quentin, and a critical commentary by H. Delehaye (AASS Nov., II, 2). These two editions are fundamental for any scientific work on ancient hagiography. The Carthage martyrology dates back to 505–523/535: it is derived from a combining of the Depositio martyrum and Depositio episcoporum of Carthage, to which notes were added about universally known African and non-African saints. The first editing of the document might be dated to the 2nd half of the 4th c., which became without any doubt the version used in the Mart. hier. together with African lists of various origin.

II. Medieval martyrologies. The first medieval martyrology was compiled by Bede (d. 735), and was based on a copy of the Mart. hier. that has similarities with the Epternacensis. Next came the martyrologies of the Carolingian period: the anonymous martyrology of Lyons from ca. 800; the two editions by Florus of Lyons from 806–838; the work of Adon of Vienna (the Parvum Romanum, falsely attributed to him, and his own martyrology in three editions from 850-870); last, the martyrology of Usuard of Saint-Germain-des-Prés, which continuously evolved between 850 and 877, of which the MS.lat.13745 in Paris is the copy that was used by the author himself. Other medieval martyrologies exist, but are of only minor importance. This literature taken as a whole has been studied by H. Quentin, while J. Dubois dedicated himself to the martyrology of Usuard.

III. Roman martyrology. Usuard's martyrology had such success in the Middle Ages that it ended up being considered as the Mart. rom. In fact, it was a Roman copy of Usuard's martyrology (that of St. Cyriacus) of which C. Baronius produced an edition at the behest of Gregory XIII, which appeared in 1584. Of the later editions it suffices to mention those of Benedict XIV in 1748, of Pius X in 1913 (the official martyrology) and of the Bollandists in 1940 (AASS, Prop.Dec.). The commentary on the last of these limits the risk of indiscriminate employment of the martyrology. Although it does not have beginners in mind, it remains an indispensable tool for scholars able to use it. It served as a basis for the postconciliar reform of the Roman calendar, though not always made use of with discretion.

CPL 2028-2046; Repertorium Fontium Historiae Medii Aevi 7, 493-503; LMA 6, 357-361; J.B. de Rossi - L. Duchesne, Martyrologium Hieronymianum (AASS Nov. 2,1), 1894; A. Urbain, Ein Martyrologium der christlichen Gemeinde zu Rom, Leipzig 1901; H. Quentin, Les martyrologes historiques du moyen âge, Paris 1908; J.P. Kirsch, Der stadtrömische christliche Festkalender im Altertum, Münster 1924; B. de Gaiffier, De l'usage et de la lecture de Martyrologe: AB 79 (1961) 40-59; J. Dubois, Le martyrologe d'Usuard, Brussels 1965; Id., Les martyrologes du moyen âge latin, Turnhout 1978; J. Dubois - G. Renaud, Le martyrologe d'Adon, Paris 1984; V. Saxer, Baronio e il Martirologio romano: Antichità paleocristiane e altomedievali del Sorano (Sora 1985) 115-126; Ph. Harnoncourt - H. auf der Maur, Feiern im Rhythmus der Zeit 2,1, Regensburg 1994, 55-58; R. Aigrain, L'hagiographie, Brussels [2]2000, 11-106, 404-414; V. Saxer, Santi e Culto dei santi nei martirologi, Spoleto 2001; P. Ó Riain, Four Irish Martyrologies, London 2002; D.A. Bullough, York, Bede's Calendar and a Pre-Bedan English Martyrology: AB 121 (2003) 329-355.

V. Saxer - S. Heid

MARUTA of Maiferqat (4th–5th c.). Maruta, notwithstanding the fact that his biography and his writings rather than shedding light, cast more shade upon him, remains a fundamental character in the evolving drama of the Persian church at the beginning of the 5th c., i.e., after the period of anti-Christian persecution by the *Sassanids. A Roman citizen, he studied first the natural sciences and devoted himself to medicine. After commencing a career in administration, thereby following in his father's footsteps, whom he was to succeed, he suddenly changed course and took holy orders. He soon became, it would appear, bishop of Maiferqat during the reign of *Theodosius I (375–395). Under Theodosius and his successor Arcadius (395–408), Maruta was charged with several missions to the Persian emperor, the king of the kings. Hence, in 399, Maruta was sent to the newly enthroned *Yazdegerd I, and would have exerted a strong influence upon the election of the new catholicos by getting Isaac (Ishaq) chosen. According to tradition, it was after this mission, or one following, that Maruta was to carry back the relics of the martyrs from the persecutions under *Shapur II and deposit them in his episcopal city, Maiferqat. For this reason it would become Martyropolis (city of the martyrs). Today, after many opposing opinions have been formed, there is general acceptance of the attribution to Maruta of a 4th-c. collection of passions of Persian martyrs. The other action that renders him a decisive figure is his participation in 410 in the synod of Persian bishops that took place at *Seleucia-Ctesiphon: there a form of the Nicene Creed and its canons were approved, adapted to local circumstances. By this act the Persian church was placed in an ideal position for interaction with the churches of the Greek East. However, the name of Maruta does not appear among the signatories at the Council of Seleucia-Ctesiphon (424): it could be legitimately concluded that by this time Maruta had already died.

BS 8, 1305-1309; Duval 122, 123, 159; Baumstark 53-54 (and passim); Chabot 41, 81-82; Ortiz de Urbina 51-54; J. Noret, La vie grecque ancienne de S. Maruta de Mayferqat: AB 91 (1973) 77-103; O. Braun, De sancta Nicaena Synodo. Syrische Texte des Maruta von Maipherkat, Münster 1898, 34-40; A. Vööbus, The Canons Attributed to Maruta of Maipherkat and Related Sources (CSCO, Script. syri 191-192), Louvain 1982 (canons); M.-J. van Esbroeck, Abraham le Confesseur (V^e s.) traducteur des Passions des martyres perses - À propos d'un livre récent: AB 95 (1977) 169-179; L. Ter-Petrossian, L'attribution du recueil des Passions des martyrs perses à Maroutha de Maypherqat: AB 97 (1979) 129-130; P. Bruns, Bemerkungen zur Rezeption des Nicaenums in der ostsyrischen Kirche: AHC 32 (2000) 1-22; L. Sako, Le rôle de la hiérarchie syriaque-orientale dans les rapports diplomatiques entre la Perse et Byzance aux V^e-VII^e siècles, Paris 1986.

J.-M. Sauget - A. Camplani

MARUTA of Tagrit (d. 649). Born at Šūrzaq in the neighborhood of Bālād in Persia, Maruta studied in various *monophysite schools of the *Sassanid Empire, which he then left for the Byzantine Empire. There he studied for ten years in the monastery of Mar Zakkai at Kallinikos (today Rakkah, in *Osroene) and for another three years in the monastery of Bēt Regūm. In 605 he returned to Persia, where he became a teacher in the monastery of Mar Mattai at Mosul. When in 628/629 the West-Syrian catholicos Athanassos I named him mafrian of Tagrit, Maruta became the first of the dignitaries who would later govern the diocese of Tagrit and its twelve suffragans and perform a role analogous to that of the catholicos. Maruta died in Tagrit in 649. His successor, Denha, wrote one of the Lives of Maruta (published by Nau), in which he gives a list of his writings. One of his homilies, on the blessing of holy water at Epiphany, has been published (Brock), as has his account of the development of *Nestorianism in the Eastern church, which was incorporated into the chronicle of Michael the Syrian (12th c.).

Baumstark, 245; BO I, 418-419; Duval, 373-374; F. Nau, Histoires d'Ahoudemmeh et de Marouta (PO 3), Paris 1905, 61-96; S. Brock, The Homily by Marutha of Tagrit on the Blessing of the Waters at Epiphany: OC 66 (1982) 51-74; M. Kmosko, Homilia in "Dominicam novam" Maruthae adscripta: OC 3 (1903) 384-415; J.B. Chabot, Chronique de Michel le Syrien, Paris 1900, 1910, I, 424-429 (text) and II, 435-440 (transl.).

K. den Biesen

MARY

I. Mary, mother of Jesus - II. Feasts of Mary - III. Iconography

I. Mary, mother of Jesus. While sometimes taking account of *apocryphal texts, the church fathers develop their reflections on Mary above all in the light of biblical material, testimonies of *faith among the Christian people and *liturgical practice. They always consider Mary in light of the *incarnate Word and treat the matter not in a systematic way, but only in contesto, commenting on the salvific event of Christ, explaining the faith, advocating Christian holiness and refuting *heresies. Each one is like a tessara of the entire mosaic that depicts particular doctrinal subjects and the *ethical figure of the Mother-Virgin. In the early years, they did not yet assemble theological terms that were adequate to express the *christological *mystery and the dignity of the Mother of God. Nonetheless, by correctly interpreting the witnesses of *Scripture and *tradition, they opened the way to successive developments in Mariology, addressed popular *piety and countered erroneous opinions. Here I present some of the major developments in patristic Mariology.

*1. The postapostolic age up to the First Council of Nicaea (325). *Ignatius of Antioch (d. ca. 110) is the first author to include mariological doctrine within the *dogmatic heritage of the church. He affirms the double generation of Christ, *eternal from *God the *Father and earthly from Mary (Eph. 7), thus paving the way for the definitions to come from *Chalcedon. He treats Mary as a participant in the divine project and the history of salvation: her *virginity, her conception and the *death of the Lord are "three great mysteries" (Eph 19,1). Against the *docetists, he defends the reality of the incarnation of Christ (Smyrn. 1), and as a presupposition for a right understanding of the divine motherhood of Mary, he recalls the communicatio idiomatum: "Our God, Jesus the Christ, was conceived in the womb of Mary, from the branch of *David, yet through the work of the *Holy Spirit, acc. to the salvific plan of God" (Eph. 18,2). *Justin Martyr (d. around 165) defends above all the virginitas of Mary before the *birth of Jesus, against the *pagans who were rejected it as a *myth and against the Jews who did not recognize the fulfillment of the prophecy of Is 7:14 (LXX) applied to Mary (Dial. 84). For starters he introduces the antithetical parallelism Eve-Mary (Dial. 100,5), showing the importance of Mary in the story of salvation and her ethical figure as a model of obedience and acceptance of the Word of God. *Irenaeus of Lyons (d. 202) plays an important role in the history of Mariology. He places Mary in a unique position at the center of incarnational *soteriology and the plan of salvation. He elaborates the double theme of a *recapitulation and a closing of the circle, developing the contrast between Eve and Mary, who unties the knot of the disobedience of Eve, becoming the Causa salutis for herself and for humanity (III, 22,4) and Advocata Evae (V, 19,1; Epid. 33). He introduces the use of other epitheta ornantia that would converge much later in the litanies, and he opens the door to the inclusion of Mary in the *creed (Adv. haer. I, 10,1). Irenaeus dwells on the prophecy of Is 7:14: it is the "sign of the Virgin" that becomes as well a "sign of human salvation." Christ in his incarnation has *purified the womb of the Virgin (IV, 33,11), and he must be acclaimed as the "Immanuel of the Virgin," namely, as Savior (I, 19,1). To profess in faith the virginal motherhood of Mary is a necessary presupposition for participating in salvation.

*Clement of Alexandria (d. before 215) upholds the perpetual virginity of Mary (Paed. 1,6,21), also appealing to the Protevangelium of James* (Fragm. In Iud. ep.: GCS III, 206), and he correlates the maternal role of Mary and the maternal role of the church: these give to the faithful the Word of *Truth, by which they bear fruit (Strom. 7,16). A parallel of Mary-Church is recognizable as well in the so-called *Inscription of Abercius (before 216): "The faith sustains me above all and offers me a Fish of the Fount, very large and pure, that a holy virgin had caught. And she gave this *fish to her friends, to eat forever" (DACL 1,69-70). *Hippolytus of Rome (d. 235) defines an "incorruptible wood" that formed the Ark that is the Lord (Fragm. in Ps. 22: GCS II, 41), alluding to a sinless purity. In the Traditio Apostolica* (attributed to Hippolytus), the author places Mary within the central event of the incarnation, both in the verbal formulations of faith (Trad. Ap. 21) and in the eucharistic celebration (Trad. Ap. 4). Against the docetists and *gnostics, *Tertullian (d. after 220) vigorously affirms the realism of the incarnation: Christ has assumed from Mary a true human body, not an apparent one (De carne Chr. 19). He explicitly affirms the virginity of Mary before the birth, but seems more hesitant about the virginity in and after the birth (De monog. 8,2; De virg. vel. 6,3; De carne Chr. 23). *Origen (d. 254) argues that Mary is always a virgin, holy in body and spirit. For women, she is the "firstfruits of virginity" (Co. Mt. X, 17). Moreover, she is a model for every Christian who gives birth to the Christ in his or her own *soul (Co. Mt. frag. 281: GCS XII, 126 and Hom. Lc. 22,3), who meditates on the divine Word (Hom. Lc. 6,7) and who advances toward the peaks of perfection (Hom. Lc. 7,2). His interpretation of the "sword" in Lk 2:34 as Mary's doubt at the foot of the *cross (Hom. Lc. 17,6-7) would later influence *Basil of Caesarea and *Cyril of Alexandria. An invocation of Mary transmitted through a papyrus of the end of the 3rd c., the Sub tuum praesidium, expresses faith in the protection of Mary, "mother of God" (θεοτόκος). With the declaration that "Christ has assumed *flesh and has been made man" and with the christological confession (homoousios), the First Council of Nicaea (325) paves the way for the affirmation of the divine motherhood of Mary. In his address to the fathers of the council, the emperor *Constantine I gives the definition Θεοῦ μῆτερ (Eus., Ad coetum Sanct. 11,9: PG 20, 1265 A-B).

2. Up to the fifth ecumenical council (Constantinople 553*). In this era marked by the christological controversies, the two most ancient Marian dogmas were established: the divine motherhood and the perpetual virginity of Mary. The church fathers exalt Mary as a model of the Christian and *ascetic life, define her parallelism with the church, promote her cult and oppose its abuses, and inaugurate new Marian themes (Dormition/*Assumption and immunity from sin).

2.1. The title θεοτόκος first appears in the context of *Alexandria, perhaps already in Origen (Co. Rom. 1) on the basis of the testimony of *Socrates Scholasticus (HE 7,32). Patriarch *Alexander of Alexandria (d. 328) and *Athanasius of Alexandria (d. 373), followed by the Cappadocian Fathers, plant it in the soil of Christian thought. For Basil of Caesarea (d. 379), Mary has offered her collaboration, because "the flesh as bearer of God" was placed within human lineage (Ep. 261,2). For *Gregory of Nazianzus (d. ca. 390), the appellative θεοτόκος is a secure criterion of orthodoxy: whoever does not so believe "separates himself from the divine being" (Ep. 101). Thus Gregory confirms the integrity of the human nature of Christ, born "of a holy virgin . . . entirely God and completely man (Poem. Dogm. I, 10,21-23) in opposition to the *Apollinarians and *Arians, who were not assigning proper significance to θεοτόκος. *Nestorius (d. after 450), asserting that the two natures in Christ are conjoined in an extrinsic way, proposes the title χριστοτόκος as a compromise between θεοτόκος and ἀνθρωποτόκος. Meanwhile, Cyril of Alexandria (d. 444), apprehending in Christ a sole *hypostasis through which the two natures are united in the one person of the incarnate Logos, demonstrates that Mary is "Mother of God," as provided by the communicatio idiomatum (Ep. 2 ad Nest.: ACO I, 1,1,25-28). The First Council of Ephesus (431) solemnly sanctions this title (CoeD 40-42), and the Council of Chalcedon (451) confirms it as a consequence of the *hypostatic union. Christ, consubstantial with the Father through his divinity, is consubstantial with us through his humanity, having been born of Mary (CoeD 86). Thus Mary guarantees the authenticity of the human nature, distinct from the divine nature even after the union of the two natures. In this way the canons of the Second Council of Constantinople (553) set forth the divine motherhood (CoeD 114-116 and 121-122).

2.2. The perpetual virginity is promulgated in the East above all by the Cappadocian Fathers and by *Epiphanius of Salamis (d. 403), and in the West by *Ambrose of Milan (d. 397), *Jerome (d. 419) and *Augustine of Hippo (d. 430). Basil attests that the faithful "refuse to hear that the Mother of God ceased at a certain moment of her life to be a virgin" (Hom. in s. Chr. gener. 5). *Gregory of Nyssa (d. 392), making reference to Lk 1:34, seems to hypothesize a sort of offering of *chastity by Mary (In nativ. Dom.: PG 46, 1140); Augustine seems to do the same (Serm. 186,1 e 291,5). Jerome engages in polemic against *Helvidius and *Jovinian, deniers of the perpetual virginity of Mary, calling upon arguments from Scripture, philosophy, convenience and the silence of the gospels (Adv. Helv. 4-8.14s.19; Adv. Iovin. 1,32). *Zeno of Verona points out the tripartite formula before–during–after the birth (Tract. 1,54,5). Pope *Leo the Great (d. 461) asserts that in giving birth to Christ, "the inviolate virginity of the mother did not know concupiscence" (Ep. 28,4). Highly significant is the insertion of the formula ex Maria virgine into the Symbolum of Nicaea and Constantinople, at the conclusion of the second ecumenical council of 381 (ACO 2/1/II,80), in the wake of analogous expressions in local baptismal symbola. The perpetua virginitas of Mary is ratified at the fifth ecumenical council (Second Council of Constantinople, 553): "Whoever does not believe that the Word of God has two natures, one from the Father, immaterial, before time and ab aeterno, the other in the latter days when, descended from the heaven, he takes up flesh in the womb of the holy woman, the venerable and always-virgin Mary mother of God [ἐκ τῆς ἁγίας ἐνδόξου θεοτόκου καὶ ἀειπαρθένου Μαρίας] from whom he was born, let this person be *anathema" (CoeD 114).

2.3. Mary is presented as a model for Christians and esp. of consecrated virgins, going all the way back to Origen (Co. Mt. 10,17), then by Athanasius (De virginibus), and above all by Ambrose (De virg. 2,6-15) and Jerome (Ep. 22,38). The ethical figure of Mary is exemplified by her discernment (Eph. Syr., Hymn de Eccl. 48), her courage at the foot of the cross (Ambrose, De inst. virg. 6,49) and esp. her faith (Aug.: fides in mente, Christus in ventre: Serm. 196,1; Leo the Great, Serm. 26,1), her discipleship in Christ that renders her more blessed than being the mother of Christ (Aug., Serm. 72A,7 = Denis 25,7), and other virtues. Even *John Chrysostom (d. 407), although attributing some imperfection to Mary, nonetheless holds her up as the *example of the woman who overcomes human weaknesses (Co. Io. 20-21).

2.4. The relationship between Mary and the church (already sketched out by Clem. Alex., Paed. 1,6,21 and Strom. 7,16) is developed, esp. in the West. Ambrose is the first to institute a parallelism of *type between the church and Mary, both virgins, spouses and mothers (Exp. Lc. 2,7). *Chromatius of Aquileia (d. ca. 407) proposes a complementary relationship between Mary and the church: "The church is united in the upper room [of the cenacle] with Mary, who was the mother of Jesus, and with his brothers. One cannot therefore speak of the church if Mary, the mother of the Lord, is not present with his brothers" (Serm. 30,1). For Augustine, Mary is included in the church as a holy and preeminent member (Serm. 72A,7 = Denis 25,7) through a relationship of similitude. She brings forth the Christ while the church gives spiritual birth to the faithful in the *sacraments (ibid.). She cooperates with and is an example for the church (Virg. 6,6).

2.5. The fact that Mary has been closely connected to Christ in the plan of salvation and in her sublime holiness, as well as the plea of *intercession to her as intermediary, support an ever-increasing *devotion to Mary. Mary is mentioned in the eucharistic prayer as early as the 2nd–3rd c. (see Trad. Ap. 4), as well as in various liturgical invocations and intercessory supplications. Gregory of Nazianzus is the first to refer to the efficacious recourse to Mary on the part of the virgin martyr *Justina in her hour of mortal danger (Or. 24,9-11). Gregory of Nyssa is the first to recount a Marian apparition (Vita Greg.: PG 46, 912). The historian *Sozomen (d. after 450) reports that at Constantinople during the time of Gregory of Nazianzus, "a divine Power" was distributing various graces, and adds: "One believes that this was the Mother of God, Mary" (HE VII, 5). However, the abuses of devotion to Mary needed to be curbed. Epiphanius protests against the tendency to attribute a latreutic worship to Mary: "Even though Mary is the one who is full of *grace and holy and worthy of veneration, she does not merit this adoration" (against the supposed *Collyridians of Arabia, in Haer. 79,7). Parallels from the history of religion and borrowings from other cults, such as those of Isis, Artemis and pagan mother-goddesses, were firmly rejected by the church fathers. Yet the feminine element of pagan religiosity constitutes a cultural predisposition, as seen in the transformation of the city of Ephesus from a cultic site of the goddess Artemis into a Marian center. All things considered, it is important to make a clear distinction between analogy and genealogy—in other words, between similarity of religious phenomena and identity of origins.

2.6. The church fathers introduced two other Marian themes. In 374, Epiphanius posed the question of the final destiny of Mary, perhaps stimulated by contemporary apocrypha of the Assumption. He gathers together various hypotheses, but he does not make a pronouncement, not being able to claim clear testimonies of Scripture or of tradition: "We do not know whether she was dead and was buried" (Haer. 78,11). The immunity of Mary from original *sin is another problem discussed by the church fathers. *Cyril of Jerusalem (d. 387) believes that at the annunciation, Mary was sanctified by the *Holy Spirit through welcoming Christ (Cat. 17,6). So also, Gregory of Nazianzus argues that likewise at the annunciation, Mary was preveniently purified (προκαθαρθεῖσα: Or. 38,13) in both soul and body by the Holy Spirit, in order to pass onto the Son a flesh absolutely immaculate. The increasing use of epitheta ornantia such ἄχραντος and immaculata and esp. the Marian attributes "holy" and "all holy," together with the antithetical parallel Eve-Mary, favor the conviction that Mary was not subject to original sin. Augustine, drawn into the problem of Mary's holiness by *Pelagius, affirms against the opinion of his adversary that Mary, propter honorem Domini, is the only woman without sin (De nat. et gratia 36,42). Against the argumentation of the Pelagian theologian *Julian of Eclanum, who consigned even Mary to the power of the devil through the force of original sin, Augustine hesitated in his response (Op. imp. c. Iul. 4,122). On one hand he did not want to negate the universal transmission of original sin (even through the presumed theory of *traducianism) and undervalue the necessity of the *redemption, but on the other hand he did not want to undermine the spiritual splendor of Mary.

3. Up until the end of the patristic era. The two most ancient Marian dogmas are reaffirmed, whether in the writings of the church fathers of this final period, or in the documents of the magisterium, esp. in the Lateran Council of 649: "If anyone does not confess, acc. to the holy fathers, that the holy mother of God and always virgin and immaculate Mary [. . .] has conceived, without seed, by the Holy Spirit, very God the Word, and without corruption has generated this Word, leaving intact her virginity even after the birth, let him be condemned" (DS 503). Yet most of all the church fathers concentrate on the person of Mary and her biographical elements, from conception to the glorious conclusion of her life, such that these elements start to take shape as theological themes. They develop an abundant *homiletical literature that exalts the virgin Mother of God, and add Marian feasts to the liturgical calendar.

3.1. In the East the hymnographer *Romanus Melodus (d. 560) presents Mary, in the most significant moments of her earthly life, together with the Son and invokes her intercession as mediator on behalf of humanity (Hym. Nat. II, 11). Also the famous hymn Acathistus (Gk. Akathistos, 5th–6th c.) celebrates Mary as virgin and spouse, and as the one who succors humanity. In his Homily of the Assumption, *Theotecnus of Livias (near Jericho; d. ca. 600), while also employing *narratives of the Assumption, accounts for the elevation of Mary to heaven with biblical and theological arguments. In his Homily on the Dormition, *Modestus of Jerusalem (d. ca. 632) asserts that the body of Mary, through having brought forth the Christ, has not experienced corruption. Furthermore, the fathers of this final period seek to clarify the elevation of Mary to heaven, relating it to the dogmas of her divine motherhood and of her perpetual virginity. They discern the very close connection between the truth of the Assumption and that of the Immaculate Conception, thus introducing the axiom assumpta quia immaculata. They connect her presence in heaven with her maternal intercession, and they invoke her as Queen, placing their trust in her powerful intervention for obtaining grace. Furthermore, as evidences of Mary's bodily assumption, they interpret her empty tomb and the absence of *relics of the holy Virgin. With discretion, they make reference to various apocrypha of the Assumption that circulated since the 6th c. in different versions. The Easterners arrive with difficulty at a total comprehension of the later dogma of the immaculate virgin as a praeservatio, but they stress the Assumption/Dormition and heavenly mediation of Mary. Patriarch *Germanus of Constantinople (d. 733) promotes Marian piety and the veneration of images, and treats the Assumption as the crowning of the divine motherhood (Hom. I in Dorm). *Andrew of Crete (d. 740) excludes Mary from the corruptibility of the body (Hom. II in Dorm.). *John of Damascus (d. 749) glorifies Mary as the one who dispenses grace and an everlasting benediction for humanity (Hom. I in Dorm.).

3.2. In the West, *Gregory of Tours (d. 594) is the first to describe the Assumption of Mary (Mirac. lib. 1,4), and he recounts the numerous events attributed to the intervention of the blessed Virgin (ibid., 1,9) that contribute to the development of devotion to the Mother of God. *Isidore of Seville (d. 636) ascribes various titles of biblical derivation to the name of Mary (De ortu et ob. Patr. 111), presents her as a figure par excellence of the church (All. 139) and influences the *Visigoth liturgy, similarly characterized by a conspicuous Marian element. *Ildefonsus of Toledo (d. 667) strenuously defends the virginity of Mary (Libell. de virg. s. M.), and to the "Lady" he consecrates himself as "servant" (ibid., XII, 2.7), thus revealing a new layer of Marian *spirituality. An obstacle to the acceptance of the dogma of the Immaculate Conception was the conviction that only a procreation without libido (as with Christ) would have been able to guard against original sin, as well as the opinion of Augustine that her biological origin or "vitalization" would have come about by means of the procreating act (conceptio activa) of the parents, while the origin of the soul or "animation" (conceptio passiva completa) would have occurred only 40 days after the bodily procreation. Patristic theology did not manage to resolve the problem as it was defined. A window is opened by the Venerable *Bede (d. 735), who interprets the sanctification of *John the Baptist in the womb of his mother Elizabeth (Lk 1:41) as a liberation a peccatis omnibus, and thus implements the argumentum a fortiori in the case of Mary (Hom. 13: PL 94, 208; Hom. II, 19: CCL 122, 325).

Furthermore, in this final period, the iconoclastic struggles were overcome, and in the West many typical Marian feasts were borrowed from the East. The Mary-church parallel experienced a gradual reaffirmation with the ipsa conteret of Gen 3:15, and with the *allegorical interpretation of Scripture, esp. in the *commentaries on the *Song of Songs in the medieval period. Moreover, an extraordinary blossoming of Marian literature appeared. Especially in the homiletical literature, there was a trend toward the historic figure of Mary. As she was considered in her role of "glorious Lady" and her *virtues were exalted, Marian devotion increased. The church fathers deserve recognition for having identified and elaborated all the essential elements of the doctrine of Mary. Over the centuries they have become guides and interpreters of the faith and of the devotion of God's people, all the while demonstrating their *love for the Virgin Mother of God.

For a nearly exhaustive Marian bibl., see G. Besutti, Bibliografia mariana, 9 vols., Rome 1950–1993 (the last volume is ed. by E. Toniolo). For a collection of Marian patristic texts in Latin or Greek, see E. Casagrande, Enchiridion Marianum Biblicum

Patristicum, Rome 1974; S. Alvarez Campos, Corpus Marianum Patristicum, 8 vols., Burgos 1970–1985. Only with Italian translation, see var. aus., Testi mariani del primo millennio, 4 vols., Rome 1988–1991 (currently the most complete anthology of texts in It. tr.). For studies of patristic Mariology: G. Jouassard, Marie à travers la patristique, in H. du Manoir (ed.). Maria, I, Paris 1949, 71-157; C. Balić, Testimonia de Assumptione Beatae Mariae Virginis ex omnibus saeculis, Rome 1948–1950; I. Ortiz de Urbina, La mariologia nella patristica orientale, in P. Sträter (ed.), Mariologia, I, Turin 1952, 81-102; H. Rahner, La mariologia nella patristica latina, in Sträter, Mariologia, I, 129-170; W. Burghardt, Mary in Western Patristic Thought, in J.B. Carol (ed.), Mariology, I, Milwaukee 1955, 109-155; A. Wenger, L'Assomption de la Très Sainte Vierge dans la Tradition byzantine du VI^e au X^e siècle, Paris 1955; W. Burghardt, Mary in Eastern Patristic Thought, in J.B. Carol (ed.), Mariology, II, Milwaukee 1957, 88-153; F. Spedalieri, Maria nella Scrittura e nella tradizione della Chiesa primitiva, 2 vols., Messina 1961–1975; H.V. Campenhausen, Die Jungfrauengeburt in der Theologie der alten Kirche, Heidelberg 1962; D. Fernández, Doctrina mariologica antiquorum Patrum occidentalium, in var. aus., De Mariologia et Oecumenismo, Rome 1962, 179-216; W. Delius, Geschichte der Marienverehrung, Munich 1963, 35-148; H.C. Graef, Maria. Eine Geschichte der Lehre und Verehrung, Freiburg im Breisgau 1964; L. Cignelli, Maria nuova Eva nella patristica greca (sec. II-V), Assisi 1966; I.M. Alonso, La espada de Simeon (Lc 2,35a) en la exégesis de los Padres, in Maria in Sacra Scriptura, IV, Rome 1967, 183-285; T. Koehler, Maria nei primi secoli, Vercelli 1969; var. aus., De primordiis cultus mariani. Acta congressus mariologici-mariani in Lusitania anno 1967 celebrati, 6 vols., Rome 1970 (various contributions for the patristic era); J.A. de Aldama, María en la patrística de los siglos I y II, Madrid 1970; T. Koehler, Storia della mariologia I-VI, Pallanza 1970–1977; R. Caro, La homilética mariana griega en el siglo V, 3 vols., Dayton 1971–1973; var. aus., La Virgen María en los Padres de la Iglesia, Buenos Aires 1979; var. aus., Marie (Vierge): DSp 10,409-482 (It. tr.: Maria è il suo nome, Rome 1985); G. Söll, Storia dei dogmi mariani, It. tr., Rome 1981; T. Koehler, Storia della mariologia, in S. De Fiores and S. Di Meo (ed.), Nuovo Dizionario di Mariologia, Cinisello Balsamo ²1988, 1385-1405; Institutum Marianum Regensburg, R. Bäumer and L. Scheffczyk (ed.), Marienlexikon, 6 vols., St. Ottilien 1988–1994; E. Peretto, Mariologia patristica, in A. Quacquarelli (ed.), Complementi interdisciplinari di patrologia, Rome 1989, 697-756; S. Felici (ed.), La mariologia nella catechesi dei Padri (età prenicena), Rome 1989; id. (ed.), La mariologia nella catechesi dei Padri (età postnicena), Rome 1991; Ch. Pietri, Les premières images de Marie en Occident, in Quaeritur inuentus colitur: Miscellanea in onore di Padre Umberto Maria Fasola, Vatican City 1989, II, 587-603; L. Gambero, Maria nel pensiero dei Padri della Chiesa, Milan 1991; S.C. Mimouni, Dormition et Assomption de Marie. Histoire des traditions anciennes, Paris 1995; R. Calì, I testi antimariologici nell'esegesi dei Padri, Caltanissetta 1999; E. Peretto, Percorsi mariologici nell'antica letteratura cristiana, Vatican City 2001. Beginning in 2001, the journal Theotokos dedicates volumes to patristic Mariology. There are also various guides to the history of dogma, and numerous monographs on the Mariology of individual fathers (among which see the previously cited 9 vols. of Besutti).

M. Maritano

II. Feasts of Mary. The memoria of the Virgin quickly took hold in the Christian *tradition, through its mentioning in the gospels, Acts of the Apostles, Galatians (4:4), and the 2nd-3rd-c. apocryphal literature. The collection of biographical episodes is an early preview of the devotion that has adorned the centuries, and it is remarkable that an indisputable allusion came to be formulated in Gal 4:4, where the proclamation has connotations of a deliberate summary of Mary's role. Not all of the feasts of Mary that punctuate the liturgical calendar have a clearly defined origin. Some are based on the *Bible, while others suggest a tradition that perished at a certain point in time. The celebrations of the Annunciation and of the divine motherhood focus on Mt 1–2 and Lk 1–2, and they join those of the Immaculate Conception and of the Assumption to form the four great solemnities. Even though the Apostolic Exhortation of Pope Paul VI titled Marialis Cultus (1974) restored and remembered this ancient Catholic liturgical cycle, we cannot pinpoint the historical point of reference for the latter two feasts. The evolution of the Marian feasts does not always correlate with their intrinsic significance, and frequently it does not depend on biblical or patristic criteria. Some feasts appear in the biographical cycle of Mary, others do not; those that do not, while connected to particular needs and circumstances, still have a broader liturgical significance. Following a biographical and chronological criterion with respect to Mary, one can draft the following list: (1) The Immaculate Conception of the Blessed Virgin Mary (8 December). The feast celebrates how Anna conceived Mary in her womb, without the contraction of original *sin. The first signs of the feast appear in the 7th-8th-c. *Byzantine Church. In the West it is first affirmed during the 9th c. within the territories under Byzantine occupation, and later in the rest of Europe. For Roman Catholics, it is a dogma of the faith defined by Pope Pius IX in 1854. (2) The Divine Motherhood of Mary (1 January). *Proclus of Constantinople (d. 446) dedicates a discourse to this feast (PG 65, 679). The basis is Holy Scripture. The divine motherhood of Mary was solemnly proclaimed at the First Council of Ephesus (431). (3) The Annunciation of Our Lord Jesus Christ (25 March). The feast functions as a feast of the Lord and of the Virgin through the very close connection established by Scripture and by tradition: the angel announces to Mary that she will be the Mother of the Savior (Lk 1:28-38). It originated in the 4th-c. East, with the date of 25 March first appearing in the Chronicon Paschale of 624; in the West, the same date appears in the Gelasian and the Gregorian *sacramentaries. Pope *Sergius I (687–701) of the so-called Byzantine papacy led a great revival of this feast. (4) The Assumption of Mary to Heaven (15 August). Better known in the Byzantine Church by the name of koimēsis ("dormition," "sleep"), the feast was celebrated in *Rome from the time of Sergius I. The date of 15 August appears in an edict of the Byzantine emperor Maurice (582–602). The subject was explained in different ways. In the East, the central event is the falling asleep of the Madonna on earth for the purpose of her eternal waking up to God; in the West, the heart of the matter is the assumption into heaven in soul and body of the Virgin Mary.

To these four solemnities are matched other feasts that come under the category of remembrances. The Nativity of Mary (8 September) is very early, probably originating in *Jerusalem; in the 5th c. a basilica was constructed on the presumed site of her birth in Jerusalem. In the West, the Visitation of Mary (31 May), a feast suggested by Lk 1:39-46, arrived between the end of the 6th and the beginning of the 7th c.; first assigned to 2 July, it entered the Western liturgical calendar after the year 1000. Probably arising at the end of the 5th c., the Presentation of the Lord in the Temple (2 February) is a joint remembrance of Christ and of the Virgin. The "*monophysite" East, in particular the *Armenian Church, celebrates it 14 February, in order to maintain the connection of 40 days with Christmas Day 6 January. The feast is known by the name of Hypapante. In the 7th c. it arises in the West. The Presentation of Mary in the *Temple (21 November), traced back to the 8th c. in the East, is celebrated from the 11th c. in the West.

By perusing the liturgical calendars of many dioceses, clerical congregations and various religious institutions, one notices that the Marian festivals celebrated throughout the universal church and reported in the many official liturgical texts are not numerous, and that the universally received festivals have a foundation in the Bible or in ancient tradition. The widespread diffusion of Marian piety is simultaneously the effect and the cause of celebration. In both the popular origin and the ecclesial affirmation of the festivals, a considerable part is played by the attraction that the figure of the Mother of the Lord has always exerted on the heart of the faithful.

E. Campana, Maria nel culto cattolico, Turin 1941, 135-383; var. aus., La Madonna nel culto della Chiesa, Brescia 1966; I. Deug-Su, La festa della Purificazione in Occidente (sec. IV-VIII): Stud Med 15 (1974) 143-216; G. Gharib, La festa bizantina dell'Immacolata Concezione: Mater Ecc. 10 (1974) 200-205; I. Calabuig, Immacolata Concezione: Servizio della Parola 73 (1975) 323-339; J. Polc, La festa della Visitazione e il Giubileo del 1300: RSCI 29 (1975) 149-172; A.H.M. Scheer, Aux origines de la fête de l'Annonciation: Quaest. Lit. 5 (1977) 97-169; A.M. Roguet, La fête de la Présentation: Cah. Mar. 22 (1977) 11-17; Hypapante: Cath V, 1142-1143; Assomption (liturgie II): Cath I, 952-953; Messe della Beata Vergine Maria. Raccolta di formulari secondo l'anno liturgico, Vatican City 1985; G. D'Onorio De Meo, Dottrina culto e devozione alla Madre del Signore, 2 vols., Rome 1991; Ch. Renoux, L'Annonciation du rite armenien et l'Épiphanie: OCP 71 (2005) 315-342.

E. Peretto

III. Iconography. Mary enters into the repertoire of Christian art as Mother of Christ. In this sense, she occupies a singular place in the scenes of the infancy of the Lord, yet all the scenes aim at the glorification of the Logos, his *incarnation, his royalty and the universality of his power. Thus they are christological rather than Marian representations. The earliest scenes, connected to a funerary context, only indirectly allude to the incarnation. In fact, they are associated with the prophecies of the OT pertaining to the birth of Jesus from a Virgin, or they represent the aurum coronarium of the Magi to the child, a new Lord of the universe. From the 1st half of the 4th c., in the triumphal context engendered by the religious peace, fully realistic compositions predominate over the scenes of prophesying, capable of directly re-creating the reality of the earthly itinerary of Jesus. For many of the scenes related to the infantia Salvatoris, the details of the figural episodes, given the brevity of the *canonical texts, turn out to be derived from the apocryphal narratives. With their storytelling richness, these apocrypha better respond to the demands of popular veneration, to the desire to humanize facial expressions as well as events, reducing them as much as possible to the real-life dimensions of ordinary people. Beyond the depictions of the infancy of the Lord, Mary is present in the representation of the miracle at *Cana, if only rarely. Then she is present alongside Christ, even in the earliest scenes of the *crucifixion, with the pious *women at the sepulcher, and in the images of the *Ascension and of Pentecost. With the First Council of Ephesus (431) and the solemn proclamation of the parthenogenesis, the iconography of the Madonna departs entirely from the existing repertoire. Glorified as Queen of the virgins and as Theotokos, Mary assumes an ever-increasing prominence in the figural repertoire. At first, the introduction in the first person of the figure of the Virgin required that the previously formulated schemes be adapted to the new iconography, through the elaboration or modification of some traditional components and the addition of enrichments suited to better exalting her figure. Therefore, it would be considered natural to insert a theme expected and to some degree prepared by popular devotion and by the same figural tradition, even more so than by the solemn theological proclamations. Meanwhile, particularly in the Eastern regions the apocryphal compilations suggested the creation of new scenes that not only significantly enriched the repertory but also quickly came to transform this highly relevant development into its essence. In this sense, the Christocentrism that characterizes the iconography prior to the First Council of Ephesus gradually yet inevitably extends to a Marian preeminence. The Virgin assuming the position of Christ at the center of the apsidal conch of the basilica, seated like her Son upon a royal jeweled throne, is a clear manifestation of this tendency.

1. Mary in the images of the christological cycle. Putting aside the chronology offered by the monumental edifices, by tracing the succession of episodes within the narrative of the gospels and of the apocryphal texts, a listing of christological representations in which Mary appears include the following: (a) the*prophecy that Jesus would be born of a Virgin; (b) the *Annunciation; (c) the visit to Elizabeth, evidenced by two different formulations: (1) the meeting (e.g., in the *mosaic of the 6th-c. Euphrasian basilica at *Porec: Wellen, Theotokos, p. 42, fig. 6d); (2) the embrace (e.g., in a caisson of the archiepiscopal throne of *Maximian at *Ravenna: Cecchelli, Cattedra, 182ff.); (d) the sleep of *Joseph; (e) the ordeal of the bitter water; (f) the wedding; (g) the journey to *Bethlehem ; (h) the *Nativity; (i) the adoration of the *Magi; (j) the adoration of the shepherds; (k) the *presentation in the temple; (l) the flight into Egypt; (m) Christ among the teachers: examples for the early period are the Milan diptych (Volbach, Elfenbeinarbeiten, n. 119), an ivory relief in the British Museum (Dalton, 51 n. 293), and miniatures of the gospel book of Corpus Christi College (Beissel, Evangelienbücher, p. 87, pl. 21); (n) the *wedding at Cana; (o) the crucifixion; (p) the *pious women at the sepulcher: dubious in the scene at *Dura Europos; Mary is identified with the figure of the woman cloaked in purple, in a miniature of the gospel book of Rabbula (Cecchelli, Rabb. Gosp., 69ff.); (q) the *ascension; (r) *Pentecost.

2. Separate images of Mary.

a. Mary on the throne. In the lost great mosaic of the apse or of the interior façade of the basilica of S. Maria Maggiore at Rome, commissioned by Pope *Sixtus III (432–440) after the First Council of Ephesus, Mary was depicted with the child upon a throne with five martyrs approaching, each one bearing a *crown. This theme, based on an imperial *typology of the aurum coronarium, had already been attributed to Christ and was now being further extended to Mary (Ihm, Apsismalerei, 55). During the same period, there was an image of Mary and the child adorning the apse of the great basilica of S. Maria Suricorum at Santa Maria Capua Vetere, perhaps surrounded by vine tendrils (see Ihm, op. cit., p. 55). At Rome, the scheme of the Virgin enthroned with the child among *saints is presented in a 6th-c. fresco of the catacomb of Commodilla (WMM, pl. 136; Russo, Affresco di Turtura, 35ff.).

b. Mary enthroned between angels. In ivory diptychs from the late 5th to early 6th c., Mary appears on high together with Christ enthroned among the chief *apostles and archangels (Volbach, Elfenbeinarbeiten, nos. 137, 142, 145, 156). The scene makes its way into the art of *icons and of mosaics, as demonstrated by the icon of the Madonna among angels and two saints at the monastery of Mt. Sinai (Kitzinger, Icons, pp. 132ff.) and by the lost mosaic of the basilica of St. *Demetrius at *Thessalonica (Sotiriou, Basilikè).

c. Maria Regina. The name derives from the inscription that accompanies an image of this type in the church of S. Maria Antiqua at Rome. The type portrays Mary in royal garments, with a diadem, a loros and other characteristic attributes of imperial costume. The type is definitely of Western origin. Indeed, in the Byzantine world, notwithstanding the extension to the Virgin of imperial insignia legitimated by a long tradition connected to the symbology of *apotheosis, and notwithstanding the imperial acclamations addressed to her along with the associated acts of devotion that were taking place before her images conveyed by the icons, the attribution to Mary of insignia directly connected to earthly power must have seemed tantamount to a violation of her essence as Theotokos. The situation is different in the West, where an early representation in nuce of the theme of Queen Mary is to be recognized in the various scenes in the mosaics of the triumphal arch of the basilica of S. Maria Maggiore at Rome, commissioned under the pontificate of Sixtus III, showing the Virgin dressed in royal garments woven in gold and studded with jewels, with angels surrounding her (Cecchelli, Mosaici, plates XLIX, LII, LIX). Moreover, the type functions explicitly in the silver reliquary from Grado of the 5th–6th c. (Zovatto, Capsella, 119ff.), with Mary enthroned, a cruciform scepter and a *monogrammed *nimbus. A version codified by the time of the 6th c. appears in the fresco of the church of S. Maria Antiqua at Rome, in which Mary with the child in her womb, dressed in a complete imperial costume, is seated on a throne under a baldacchino which two angels approach, in the ceremony of the aurum coronarium (WMM, pl. 133-134). At the end of the 6th c., the theme is reiterated by the icon of the church of S. Maria in Trastevere, also at Rome (Andaloro, Tavola, 139ff.).

d. Maria lactans. *Coptic frescoes, datable to the 7th and 8th c., represent Mary enthroned between two angels, in the act of breastfeeding the child (Wellen, Theotokos, 163ff.). The existence of an iconographic type of the Madonna lactans is confirmed by an apocryphal letter of Pope *Gregory II to the Byzantine emperor *Leo III the Isaurian (717–741), included in the proceedings of the seventh ecumenical council (the Second Council of Nicaea; Mansi 12, 966f.).

e. Maria orans. On some gold-glass pieces of the 4th to 5th c., Mary with her name inscribed is represented in the orans* position, sometimes between Peter and Paul or with other saints (see, e.g., Morey-Ferrari, Gold-glass, n. 265). The same theme recurs in one panel of the wooden door in the basilica of S. *Sabina at Rome (Wellen, Theotokos, figure on 201).

f. Mary standing with the child in her arm. The earliest instances of this type, derived from the icon of the Monastery of the Panagia Hodegetria at Constantinople that is supposed to have been painted by St. Luke himself, are given by a miniature contained in the *Syrian gospel book of Rabbula dated to 586 (Cecchelli, Rabb. Gosp., 48ff.) and by the icon of the Pantheon at Rome dated to 609 (Bertelli, Pantheon, 24ff.). Keeping in mind that the painting on wood in the Pantheon is only a fragment of a much larger painting, we see that in these depictions the Virgin is shown in full view, with the child in her arm and her face encircled by a large nimbus.

O.M. Dalton, Catalogue of Early Christian Antiquities and Objects from the Christian East in the Department of British and Medieval Antiquities and Ethnography of the British Museum, London 1901; S. Beissel, Geschichte der Evangelienbücher in der ersten Hälfte des Mittelalters, Freiburg im Breisgau 1906; C. Cecchelli, La cattedra di Massimiano ed altri avori romano-orientali, Rome 1936; G.A. Sotiriou - M.G. Sotiriou, Ἡ Βασιλική τοῦ Ἁγίου Δημητρίου Θεσσαλονίκης, Athens 1952; W.F. Volbach, Elfenbeinarbeiten des Spätantike und des frühen Mittelalters, Mainz 1952; P. Zovatto, La capsella di Grado con l'immagine di Maria Regina: Aquileia Nostra 24-25 (1953–1954) 119-128; E. Kitzinger, On Some Icons of the Seventh Century, in Late Classical and Mediaeval Studies in Honor of Mathias Friend Jr., ed. K Weitzmann, Princeton 1955, 132-150; C. Cecchelli, I mosaici della basilica di S. Maria Maggiore, Turin 1956; C.R. Morey - G. Ferrari, The Gold-glass Collection of the Vatican Library with Additional Catalogues of Other Gold-glass Collections, Vatican City 1959; C. Ihm, Die Programme der christlichen Apsismalerei vom vierten Jahrhundert bis zur Mitte des achten Jahrhunderts, Wiesbaden 1960; C. Bertelli, La Madonna del Pantheon: Boll. d'Arte 46 (1961) 24-32; G.A. Wellen, Theotokos. Eine ikonographische Abhandlung über das Gottesmutterbild in frühchristlicher Zeit, Utrecht and Antwerp 1961 (biblio.); C. Bertelli, s.v. Maria: EAA 4, 839-851; Id., La Madonna di S. Maria in Trastevere, Rome 1961; R. Lange, Das Marienbild der frühen Jahrhunderte. Iconographia Ecclesiae Orientalis, Recklinghausen 1969; J. Lafontaine Dosogne, Iconographie de l'Enfance de la Vierge dans l'empire byzantine et en occident: Scriptorium 25 (1971) 155ff.; G.A. Wellen, s.v. Maria, Marienbild: LCI 3,156-161; F. Rademacher, Die Regina Angelorum in der Kunst des frühen Mittelalters, Düsseldorf 1972; A. Grabar, L'Hodigitria et l'Eleusa, Zbornik za likovne umetnosti 10, Novi Sad 1974, 3-14; M. Andaloro, La datazione della tavola di S. Maria in Trastevere: RIA 19-20 (1972–1973) 139-215; J. Lafontaine Dosogne, Iconography of the Cycle of the Life of the Virgin, in P.A. Underwood, The Kariye Djami 4, Princeton 1975, 161-194; G. Bovini, L'immagine della Vergine nelle opere d'arte ravennati d'età paleocristiana: CCAB 1975, 87-109; A. Grabar, Les images de la Vierge de tendresse. Type iconographique et thème: Zograf 6 (1975) 25-30; M. Tatič Djurič, Eleousa. À la recherche du type iconographique: JÖBG 25 (1976) 259-267; A. Grabar, Remarques sur l'iconographie byzantine de la Vierge: CArch 26 (1977) 169-178; E. Russo, L'affresco di Turtura nel cimitero di Commodilla, l'icona di S. Maria in Trastevere e le più antiche feste della Madonna a Roma: Bullettino dell'Istituto Storico Italiano per il Medio Evo e Archivio Muratoriano 88 (1979) 35-85; 89 (1980–1981) 71-150; G. Schiller, Ikonographie der christlichen Kunst, 5 vols., Gütersloh 1966–1986; P. Amato, s.v. Arte, in S. De Flores and S. Meo, Nuovo Dizionario di Mariologia, Cinisello Balsamo 1985, 138-154; A. Quacquarelli and F. Bisconti, L'iconografia mariana antenicena e i suoi presupposti, in S. Felici (ed.), La Mariologia nella catechesi dei Padri (Età prenicena), Rome 1988, 241-256; U. Utro, L'immagine di Maria nell'arte delle origini. Dalle prime raffigurazioni al Concilio di Nicea (325): Theotokos. Ricerche interdisciplinari di Mariologia 11 (2001) 455-480; many entries in Marienlexikon, e.g., 2, 318ff.; 2, 598-602; 2, 657; 5, 11ff.; 5, 142-143; U. Utro: TIP 212-215

M. Marinone

MARY (patristic literature). The patristic literature concerning *Mary can be divided into two parts: (1) *biographical-*apocryphal, and (2) *homiletical-*theological. Both categories are dependent on the internal life of the church, and more precisely from its *dogmatic development and its doctrinal controversies. The Council of *Ephesus (431) proved to be a milestone for the development of Marian doctrine and *liturgy, but it is also particularly relevant for the development of Marian literature (homiletics, *poetry), while the development of biblical *exegesis favors the emergence of a poetical Marian *symbolism. The other important councils for such development are the Council of *Chalcedon (451), with Pope Leo the Great's Tomus ad Flavianum, and the Second Council of *Nicaea (787) regarding the veneration of *icons.

The first category is Marian texts of a biographical and apocryphal genre (in the broadest sense of the term)—i.e., those that speak of the life of Mary. First of all, we encounter the apocryphal texts that speak of Mary's parents, her *nativity, her dedication in the temple, her wedding with *Joseph, the birth of Jesus and the *flight into Egypt. To this group of texts belongs the Protevangelium of James of the 2nd c. (in ancient MSS, the Genesis Marias, The Birth of Mary), which upholds the *chastity of Mary against Jewish and *pagan attacks. There exists another writing, titled Genna Marias, cited by *Epiphanius of Salamis (Haer. 26,12,1-4) and used by the *Sethians. From the Protevangelium, other later texts proceed: the Gospel of ps.-Matthew and The Birth of Mary, both *Latin; the infancy gospels in Arabic, *Georgian and *Armenian; and many other texts. The apocryphal writings do not address the role of Mary during the public ministry of Jesus. Mary makes an appearance during the passion: certain MSS of the Acts of Pilate, the *Ethiopic text called the Gospel of Gamaliel, the texts of *Cyriacus of al-Bahnasa and the Arabic texts all present Mary's laments during the via crucis and beneath the *cross.

A. Mingana, Lament of the Virgin: BRL 12 (1928) 459-488; 427-458 (Arabic text, Eng. tr.); M.A. van Oudenrijn, Gamaliel, Freiburg 1957 (Eth. text, Ger. tr.).

There exists as well a large group of apocryphal writings of the 5th and 6th c., and even later but with many more traditional elements, concerning the dormition (death) and the assumption of Mary (Transitus Mariae; Dormitio Mariae). These apocrypha exist in various languages (*Greek, Latin, *Coptic, Arabic, Ethiopic and esp. *Syriac), and are ascribed to *John the Baptist, *Melito of Sardis, *Evodius of Antioch, Theodosius of Alexandria, an obscure Eutimius (Euthymian History) or to anonymous writers. In a letter to Bishop Titus, ps.-*Dionysius the Areopagite speaks of the transitus of Mary. Some of these texts exist in the form of a story, other in the form of a homily (Theodosius, ps.-*Cyril of Jerusalem, Cyriacus). The transitus texts have profoundly influenced the Christian *iconography of both East and West.

CANT 100-177; texts on the assumption, in It. tr.: Erbetta 1/2, 409-635; Gk .texts in Fr. tr.: S.C. Mimouni, S.J. Voicu, Paris 2003; as well as Moraldi, Craveri, Starowieyski. Studies: A. Wenger, L'Assomption de la Tres Sainte Vierge dans la tradition byzantine du Ve au VIIIe s., Paris 1955; M. van Esbroeck, Aux origines de la Dormition, Norfolk 1995 (a collection of articles); S.C. Mimouni, La tradition de la Dormition et de l'Assomption de Marie, Paris 1995 (see Transitus Mariae*).

To the Marian apocrypha also belong the Apocalypse of Mary*, stemming from the Apocalypse of Paul, in Greek, Arabic, Georgian, Syriac and Old Slavonic versions. The text narrates the journey of Mary through heaven and through hell, and her *intercession on behalf of sinners. The Apocalypse of Mary was particularly popular in medieval *Byzantium and among the Slavs.

CANT 327-330; BHG 1050-1054; BHO 646-654; Apocalypse of Mary in Romanian: M. Ruffini, Florence 1954; A. Wenger, Foi et piété en Byzance, in Maria, ed. H. du Manoir, 5 (1958) 257-282; S. Mimouni, Les Apocalypses de la Vierge: état de la question: Apocrypha 4 (1993) 101-112 (bibl.). It. tr.: Erbetta 3, 447-470; Moraldi 3, 257-282; Polish tr.: Starowieyski 3, 279-293.

The Vitae of Mary: the earliest is that attributed to *Maximus the Confessor (7th c., CSCO 478-479/ Iber 21-22, 1986), preserved in Georgian (the question of its authenticity is still open), followed by those of the monk *Epiphanius (8th c.; see ed. Dressel, 13-44), John Geometres (10th c.; A. Wenger, Assomption de la T.S. Vierge . . . , Paris 1955, 363-415), Symeon Metaphrastes (10th c.; B. Latišev, Menologii anonymi byzantini . . . fragmenta, St. Petersburg 1912, 345-383) and a *Nestorian vita (E.A.W. Budge, The History of the Blessed Virgin Mary . . . , 1-2, London 1899, 3-146, 3-160). The Catecheses of the ps.-*Cyril of Jerusalem constitute a short vita of Mary. In the Middle Ages, this genre grew in popularity with both the vitae in prose and the metrical vitae. Also belonging to this group are the accounts of *miracles pertaining to particular churches (Blachernai and Chalkoprateia being two examples in *Constantinople) or stories of miracles (such as the Ethiopic stories: BHO 655-661).

CANT 90-96; S. Mimouni, Les Vies de la Vierge: état de la question: Apocrypha 5 (1994) 211-248 (biblio.); It. tr. in Vite di Maria: Testi mariani del primo millennio, Rome 1989, 2, 185-287 (Maximus); 979-1019 (Symeon Metaphrastes); Catecheses: Erbetta 1/2, 604-615.

There exist numerous other apocrypha that contain Marian topics. Passages from some of these texts were read aloud in *liturgical celebrations and in some of the festivals associated with the events that the texts describe. For example, from the Protevangelium derive the feasts of the Presentation of Mary, of the Conception of Mary by Anna, and of the Annunciation to Joachim and Anna.

The second group of passages on Mary are the texts of a doctrinal and liturgical type, inserted into other texts or sometimes independent. In the literature prior to the Council of Ephesus, the documents on Mary usually occur as sections of other works; from 431 they appear instead as independent works. The only independent Marian work prior to the Council of Nicaea is the aforementioned Protevangelium; in the 4th c. the first Marian homilies appear, the tractatus* of Jerome titled On the Perpetual Virginity of Mary, and a poetic text, the Psalmus responsorius*. The first evidence of Marian doctrine is found in the Letters of *Ignatius of Antioch; in the Dialogue with Trypho of *Justin Martyr; in the writings of Melito of Sardis; in the polemical tractati of *Tertullian; in the writings of *Irenaeus of Lyons and *Hippolytus; and in the works of *Origen (in the exegetical and homiletical tractati, esp. in the Homilies on the Gospel of Luke, and in polemical tractati). In the 4th c., the Marian theme also appears in the tractati on virginity (*Athanasius, *Ambrose); *Jerome writes the aforementioned Marian tractatus against *Jovinian; and there is a resurgence of the Psalmus responsorius. Another important Marian work is written in the 7th c. by *Ildefonsus of Toledo. Passages concerning Mary are found throughout the works of *Augustine, and they also appear in the works of *John Chrysostom. The Marian theme frequently occurs in the texts connected to the Nestorian controversy (*Cyril of Alexandria, *Theodoret of Cyrrhus, *Nestorius), but esp. in the documents of the synods and of the ecumenical *councils. Of particular importance are the proceedings of the Council of Ephesus in 431 and of the Council of Chalcedon in 451 (Tomus ad Flavianum). Abundant references to Mary are found in homilies and in *commentaries on the first two chapters of the gospel of *Luke, in the first chapter of the gospel of *Matthew and in some passages of the gospel of *John (wedding feast at Cana, Mary at the foot of the cross, etc.). The Council of Ephesus subsequently develops the Marian homiletical tradition; one particular genre synthesizes homiletics and poetry. The development of the Marian homiletical tradition is concomitant with the growth of Marian *devotion, with the rise of new Marian feasts and with the construction of churches dedicated to the Virgin, decorated with important frescoes and *mosaics. The principal feasts for which homilies are preserved include the Annunciation (Evangelismos; 25 March), the *Nativity of Mary (28 September), the Presentation of Mary in the Temple (Eisodos; 21 November), the Dormition (Koimesis; 15 August), the Conception of Mary by Anna (8 December), and the *Synaxis of the *Theotokos (26 December), together with the liturgy of the Akathistos/Acathistus* (5th Saturday in *Lent). There are also feasts of *dedication for the Marian churches, including two churches in Constantinople: Blachernai (where the vestments of Mary are enshrined) and Chalkoprateia (where the cincture of Mary is preserved). The feasts of the *Nativity of Our Lord and of Hypapante (Feast of the Presentation, 2 February) also had a certain Marian content, and as a result we find Marian elements in the homilies for these feasts. An enormous number of Marian homilies are preserved, and some of them remain to be edited. The most famous Greek authors are *Proclus, *Theodotus of Ancyra, *Atticus, *Hesychius, *Antipater of Bostra, *Modestus, *Sophronius, *Germanus of Constantinople, *Andrew of Crete, *John of Damascus, *John of Euboea and *Photius. There are also a great number of Byzantine writers, including Theodore the Studite and Neophytus the Recluse. There is a group of anonymous homilies, such as those of ps.-*Gregory Thaumaturgus and ps.-*John Chrysostom. In the West we have homilies with strong Marian accents, including those of Augustine, Leo the Great and even *Peter Chrysologus of Ravenna, not to mention High Medieval texts. Some of these homilies have important theological content, but often they also demonstrate significant artistic merit. Alongside these homiletical texts we find Marian texts of a rather speculative and polemical sort, such as those incorporated into the works of *Cyril of Alexandria, as well as the tractatus of Ildefonsus, On the Perpetual Virginity of Mary.

The birthplace of Marian poetry is Syria in the 2nd c., with the Odes of Solomon; *Ephrem the Syrian wrote many Marian poems, and other Syrian poets such as Jacob of Sarug (5th c.) followed in his footsteps. Probably in the 3rd c. the oration Sub Tuum praesidium arose. The first Marian poem in Latin is the Psalmus responsorius of the 4th c.; poetic passages are found in the works of *Juvencus, *Sedulius and others. The great tradition of Marian poetry develops in the *Byzantine empire of the 6th c., with the kontakia of *Romanus Melodus and other poets; particularly beautiful is the anonymous hymn Akathistos, sung or recited even today in the Eastern rites. The kanon emerged in the 8th c.; its leading poets included Andrew of Crete and John of Damascus. In the West, Marian poetry was cultivated by *Venantius Fortunatus and by *Aldhelm; *Bede left behind some Marian *hymns. Marian liturgical texts are found in books both Eastern (collections of troparia, kontakia and kanones) and Western (*sacramentaries and missals). The artistic richness of the Marian literature—esp. the homilies and poetry—flows out of the development of biblical *allegory, in the sense that the OT prefigures the persons and events of the NT. Authors discovered a new artistic landscape, as Mary assumed comparisons with characters (Eve, Rachel, Judith etc.), connections with events and associations with objects (as in the hortus conclusus and porta aperta). Does not such artistic and literary wealth deserve greater attention?

BHG 3, 1046-1161; BHL 5334-5414; BHO 611-681; BS 8, 814-962.

The most important series of Marian texts is J.J. Bourassé, Summa aurea de laudibus Beatissimae Virginis Mariae Dei Genitricis sine labe conceptae, 1-13, Paris 1862–1866; O. Bardenhewer, Marienpredigten aus der Väterzeit, Munich 1936; H. Barré, Prières anciennes de l'Occident à la Mère du Sauveur, Paris 1963; D. Casagrande, Enchiridion marianum biblicum patristicum, Rome 1974 (Gk. texts with Lat. tr., Latin texts, and indexes); S. Alvarez Campos, Corpus marianum patristicum, 1-8, Burgos 1970–1985 (the most complete series of Gk. texts, texts in Eastern languages with Lat. tr., Latin texts, and indexes); var. aus., Testi mariani del primo millenio, Rome: 1, 1988, ed. G. Gharib, Gk. texts; 2, 1989, ed. G. Gharib, Greek and early Byzantine texts; 3, 1990, ed. L. Gambero, Lat. texts; 4, 1991, ed. G. Gharib, with Eastern, Syriac, Armenian, Coptic and Ethiopic texts; (It. tr., bibl.).

Studies: G. Jouassard, Marie à travers la Patristique, in Maria 3, Paris 1949, 69-157; M. Gordillo, Mariologia Orientalis, Rome 1954; F. Spedaglieri, Maria nella Scrittura e nella tradizione della Chiesa, Messina 1962; D. Montagna, La lode alla Theotokos nei testi greci dei secoli IV-VII, Rome 1963; R. Caro, La Homilética mariana griega en el siglo V, 1-3, Marian Library Studies, 3-5, Dayton, OH 1971–1973; G. Söll, Storia dei dogmi mariali, Rome 1981 (It. tr. is preferred over the original); E. Peretto, Mariologia patristica, in Complementi interdisciplinari di patrologia, ed. A. Quacquarelli, Rome 1989, 697-756; Theotokos vol. 1-2 (2001); 1-2 (2002) and ff. Liturgy: M. Righetti, Storia liturgica, 2, Milan 1969, 348-395; M. Augé, in Anamnesis 6, Genoa and Milan 1989, 229-245. Bibliography: G. Bessutti, Bibliografia Mariana, Rome 1950–. Encyclopedias: Nuovo dizionario di Mariologia, ed. S. De Fiores, Rome 1985; M. O'Carroll, Theotokos: A Theological Encyclopedia of Blessed Virgin Mary, Wilmington [2]1986; Marienlexikon, 1-6, ed. R. Bäumer and L. Scheffczyk, St. Ottilien 1988–1994. Many interesting studies concerning Mary in the patristic era are found in the work titled Maria, 1-8, ed. H. du Manoir, Paris 1949–1971.

M. Starowieyski

MARY MAGDALENE. In the canonical gospels, we find a trio of female figures: the anonymous sinner (Lk 7:36-50), Mary of Bethany, sister of Lazarus (Lk 10:38-42, among others), and Mary Magdalene (Lk 8:2; Mk 15:47 [and par.]; Jn 20:1-10, among others). In the West, these three women were subsumed into the figure of Mary Magdalene (*Gregory the Great, Homil. in Evang. 33,1), while the East continued to distinguish Mary Magdalene from Mary of Bethany. Mary Magdalene was celebrated in the East on the "Sunday of the three Myrrhbearers" (the third Sunday of *Easter), as we find in the homilies of *Gregory of Nyssa. The tomb of Mary Magdalene was in *Ephesus, next to the grotto of the *Seven Sleepers, after 449 but before the 6th c., since *Gregory of Tours mentions it (De gloria martyrum 29); the information is confirmed a century later by *Modestus of Jerusalem (*Photius, Cod. 275); in the 9th or 10th c., the *relics of Mary Magdalene were then translated to *Constantinople. In the West, Mary Magdalene was praised or mentioned a good many times by *Augustine, *Leo the Great and *Gregory the Great. The development of the legend and cult of Mary Magdalene belongs to the Western medieval era, but already in the patristic era various texts dedicated to Mary Magdalene arise. In gnostic circles there arise the Questions of Mary Magdalene, cited by *Epiphanius (Haer. 26,8,1-3), and the Gospel of Mary [Magdalene], preserved in papyri fragments, both *Coptic (P. Berol 8502) and *Greek (P. John Rylands 463 and P. Oxy 3525). The first work contains a dialogue of Jesus with the disciples; in the second, Mary narrates a *revelation received from the Redeemer, who loved her more than the other women. In the Greek texts of the Pontius Pilate cycle, Mary Magdalene appears as an accuser of *Pilate, writes a letter and then goes to *Rome. After her return to *Jerusalem, she becomes a disciple of Peter. Finally, chased from Jerusalem, she goes to *Marseille (Gospel of Nicodemus - vers. B, Letter of Tiberius to Pilate, Anaphora Pilati, Life of Mary Magdalene and the Byzantine historians Michael Glykas, George Kedrenos, Nikephoros Kallistos Xanthopoulos and others). In these texts, Mary Magdalene assumes the role once held by *Veronica in the *Latin literature. In Coptic there exists a *homily on Mary Magdalene, translated from the Greek and attributed to Cyril of Jerusalem, a rather peculiar pairing of the legend of Mary Magdalene with the text of the Cave of Treasures.

CANT 30; 32; 72-73; BHG 1161x-1162c; BHL 5439-5513; CPG 1223. A Greek Vita: F. Halkin: ABol 105 (1987) 5-23; LCIK 7, 516-541; BS 8, 1078-1107; V. Saxer, Les saintes Marie Madeleine et Marie de Béthanie dans la tradition liturgique et homilétique orientale: RSR 32 (1958) 1-37; Id., Le culte de Marie Madelaine en Occident, dès origines à la fin du Moyen-Âge, Cahiers d'archéologie et d'histoire 3, Auxerre and Paris 1959; M. Geerard, Marie-Madeleine, dénonciatrice de Pilate: SE 31 (1989–1990) 139-153. Gospel of Mary Magdalen: A. Pasquier, Québec 1983; A. Recio Veganzones, María Magdalena, protagonista de la escena "Mulieres ad sepulcrum Domini," en la iconografía sepulcral de Occidente (siglos IV-V), in Memoriam Sanctorum venerantes, Misc. Victor Saxer, Vatican City 1992, 667-688; J.Y. Leloup, Il Vangelo di Maria, Gorle 2000; Which Mary? The Marys in Early Christian Tradition, ed. F. Stanley Jones, Atlanta 2002; K.L. King, The Gospel of Mary of Magdala: Jesus and the First Woman Apostle, Polebridge 2003; E.A. de Boer, The Gospel of Mary: Beyond a Gnostic and a Biblical Mary Magdalene, Edinburgh 2004; D. Good, Mariam, the Magdalen, and the Mother, Bloomington, IN 2005.

M. Starowieyski

MARY of Egypt. The core of her legend, probably merely fictional, is the oral account of the 6th c., circulated among *Palestinian monks, of a woman who was leading a solitary life at *Jerusalem. Taking refuge in the desert of the river Jordan, she lived to *expiate her sins. One day it happened that she was discovered by a traveling *anchorite, who reported her life story (*John Moschus, The Spiritual Meadow 179; *Cyril of Scythopolis, Vita Cyr. 18). ps.-*Sophronius wrote out an independent version (CPG 7675) on the model of the Vita of St. Paul the Hermit, written by *Jerome, in which the *saint becomes an *Egyptian prostitute who makes a *pilgrimage to Jerusalem. She tries to enter into the atrium of the Rock of Calvary at the church of the Resurrection, during the exaltation of the *cross. She has a *conversion experience in the presence of an *image of the Mother of God. This very late Vita became decisive for Byzantine and *Latin *hagiography. The cult quickly arrived at *Rome (acc. to the AASS Apr. 1, 72 under Pope *Hormisdas). In Europe, a great number of churches were dedicated to the saint. Her feast is 1 April in the Byzantine Synaxaria, in the Typicon of St. Sava, and in the *Syriac *calendars; it is 2 April in the Western *martyrologies.

BHG 1041-1044; BHO 683-687; BHL 5415-5421; BS 8, 981-994; LCI 7, 507-511; BBKL 16, 985-986; K. Kunze, Studien zur Legende der heiligen Maria Aegyptiaca im deutschen Sprachgebiet, Berlin 1969; Id., Die Legende der heiligen Maria Aegyptiaca, Berlin 1978; E. Poppe and B. Ross, The Legend of Mary of Egypt in Medieval Insular Hagiography, Dublin 1996.

V. Saxer and S. Heid

MARYS (the three). There were four women present at the foot of the cross: (1) *Mary, mother of Jesus (Jn 19:25); (2) *Mary Magdalene (Mt 27:56; Mk 15:40; Jn 19:25) (= Mary of Bethany?); (3) Mary, mother of *James (the younger/less) and of Joseph/Joses (Mt 27:56; Mk 15:40) and possibly the wife of Clopas (Jn 19:25); (4) Salome (Mk 15:40), mother of the sons of Zebedee (Mt 27:56)—namely, the apostles *James and *John—and perhaps a sister of Jesus' mother (Jn 19:25). Ado of Vienne inserted Salome in his Parvum Martyrologium Romanum, following Mark, on 22 October. As the pious "Myrrhbearers," Mary Magdalene, Salome and Mary (mother) of James, appear in the Synax. Eccl. CP following the *apostles and disciples of the Lord on 30 June. The reference to Mary of Clopas, presented in the Mart. rom. on 9 April, is of unknown origin, while the reference of 25 May to Maria Iacobi (Mary of James) is connected to the *relics claimed by both the city of Veroli and the commune of Saintes-Maries-de-la-Mer in the Camargue (BHL 5429, 5434). The combined cult of the trio consisting of Mary Clopas, Salome and Mary Magdalene developed in the 13th c., through the legend in which the three once journeyed with Martha and Lazarus to Provence. A legend of the 11th c. developed the theme of the three Marys, daughters of Anna, but born of three different husbands: Trinubium Annae or De tribus Mariis et tribus maritis (BHL 505, 5431).

BS 8, 972-977; 11, 583-586; LCI 7, 545; ed. F.S. Jones, Which Mary? The Marys of Early Christian Tradition, Atlanta 2002.

V. Saxer - S. Heid

MASONA (Massona, Mausona) of Mérida. *Metropolitan bishop of *Mérida from 570 to 606. A descendant of a noble family of *Goths. His apostolic work provoked the *Arian king of the *Visigoths, *Leovigild, who designated Sunna as the Arian bishop of Mérida, a highly educated man and a hardline Arian.

Finding an incentive in both the Catholic conversion and the rebellion of *Hermenegild, Masona took a very tactful stance in the face of these events. He did so only from a religious perspective; from a political perspective he did not give any support to Hermenegild. In fact, Mérida was subject to the rule of the rebellious prince. King Leovigild was intent on securing the collaboration of Masona, but he did not succeed. As a result, he first provoked a public theological debate between Sunna and Masona, and then exiled Masona for three years. Only after 584 did Masona return to his episcopal office. He participated in the Third Council of Toledo (589) and in the Provincial Synod of Toledo held in 597. Although we do not know the date of his death, it is often placed after 605, on the basis of the date of a letter that *Isidore of Seville addressed to him; the letter is probably authentic, although this is still a matter of debate.

In addition to participating in anti-Arian polemic, he established numerous churches in Mérida, and above all a xenodochium*, a combination of a hospital and a hostel for foreigners. He also created a monetary fund for loans to needy members of his church. His *virtues and his industriousness received special attention from a cleric of Mérida who wrote the Lives of the Fathers of the Church of Mérida sometime around 650. Masona did not leave behind any writings.

F. Görres, Mausona Bischof von Mérida: Zeitschrift für wissenschaftliche Theologie 28 (1885) 326-332; J. López Prudencio, San Masona Arzobispo de Mérida, colaborador en el cimiento de la Hispanidad, Badajoz 1945; J.N. Garvin, The Vitae Sanctorum Patrum Emeritensium, Washington 1946, 426-429, 445-449; R. Collins, Mérida and Toledo: 550–585, in Visigothic Spain, Oxford 1980, 189-219.

M. Díaz y Díaz - P. Marone

MASS

I. The term Mass - II. The first four c. - III. From the 5th to the 8th c. - IV. Deviant forms of celebration.

I. The term Mass. The word Mass (missa) derived from missio ("dismissal"), which in *Roman times indicated the conclusion of a meeting or the dismissal of some group (*Avitus of Vienne, Ep. 1: PL 59, 199).

Western Christians adopted the same terminology for the solemn formal dismissal of the *catechumens (e.g., of the penitent) and only later and secondarily for the dismissal of the *faithful at the conclusion of the *eucharistic *assembly. Around the 5th c. the word began to be applied not only to the action of the dismissal but also to the entire eucharistic celebration. Probably the first use of missa in this latter sense is that of *Ambrose (Ep. 20: PL 16, 995). With the disappearance of the catechumenate at the end of the 5th c., there remained only one dismissal in the eucharistic *liturgy, that of the faithful at the end of the celebration. The word thus began to be almost exclusively related to the entire action of which the dismissal was the final act; however, references to missa in the sense of dismissal are found also until the 7th c.

II. The first four c. *1. From the *apostolic age until the *Apostolic Tradition. The first Christian communities spoke of the eucharistic celebration with the expression "breaking of the *bread" (1 Cor 10:6; Acts 2:42; 20:7; Didache, 14,1; Ign., Ad Eph. 20,2), a term derived from the Jewish *tradition of breaking the bread as an introductory act to the meal. One must inevitably conclude that the eucharistic framework was that of the Jewish evening meal ritually modeled on the Passover meal. Most probably the eucharistic action was that of bread-meal-*chalice. The combination of a liturgy of the Word with the breaking of bread appeared rather early (Acts 20:7), but it did not seem to remain prominent until the separation of the eucharistic action from the true and actual meal, at the end of the 1st c. The ritualized action that resulted reduced the scheme of the seven actions of the Last Supper to one ritual of four actions: (1) preparation of the bread and *wine; (2) *prayer of thanksgiving; (3) breaking of the bread; (4) *Communion. The meal in common gradually assumed another meaning (for the poor, see *agape), but it was not known as "agape" until the 2nd c. Already at the end of the 1st c., the term Eucharist began to refer to the breaking of the bread (Ign., Smyrn. 7.1; 8.1; Eph 13,1; Phil 4,1), and this action was transferred to Sunday morning. That led to another concealed weakness of the presentation of the meal and, thus, to the emphasis on the prayers of thanksgiving. The description of the Eucharist in the Didache challenges every attempt at clarification. What can be affirmed with certainty is that it concerns a Sunday celebration with breaking of the bread and rendering thanks, preceded by confession, and in which the bishops (presidents) and deacons/minister (see *diakonia – diaconate) assumed important roles. The first concrete description of the eucharistic liturgy is that of *Justin, ca. 150 (1 Apol. 65-67) in *Rome: readings of apostles or of *prophets; *homily; (dismissal of the catechumens); prayer of *intercession; *kiss of peace; preparation of the elements (bread, wine, water); improvised prayer of thanksgiving; Amen; Communion (two types); collection on the part of the most affluent. The *tradition that he who had the ministry of the presidency recited the prayer of thanksgiving in the name of all is already affirmed and the emphasis is more on the thanksgiving than on the *sacrifice. The liturgical language was *Greek. The Eucharist described by the Apostolic Tradition, attributed to *Hippolytus, comprised the greeting of peace, preparation of the bread and wine, eucharistic prayer (suggested text), breaking of the bread, distribution. His *baptismal Eucharist comprised two more supplementary chalices, one of *milk and honey and the other of water, linked to the original convivial structure. Without doubt, the Eucharist of Hippolytus also included readings, a homily and the return of the catechumens.

2. From the 3rd to the 5th c. Three considerations facilitate the comprehension of this period: (1) in the 3rd and 4th c. there was not a uniform liturgical action, but rather a fixed frame that included Scripture readings, the singing of *psalms (Aug., Confess. IX, 14), return of the catechumens, prayer of the faithful, eucharistic prayers with the Amen as the final response, breaking of bread and Communion. (2) The texts of the 3rd and 4th c. are also flexible and open to adaptation and creativity. (3) In the 3rd c. the distinction between the various liturgical centers was not yet clearly defined. The Didascalia Apostolorum* (starting in the 3rd c.) briefly describes the eucharistic liturgy of a community in *Syria in the N; there were biblical readings, singing (or reciting?) of psalms and offering of the Eucharist, and if a bishop was present as a visitor, the presiding bishop invited him not only to preach but also to take part in the consecration of the elements (Didasc. II, 58; Funk I, 168). The Eucharist of *Tertullian at *Carthage, celebrated to all appearances every day and early in the morning, can be generally pieced together: readings (above all scriptural), sung psalms (?) in responsorial form, homily, dismissal of the catechumens, prayer with raised hands, concluded with the *Lord's Prayer, kiss of peace, presentation of the bread and wine on the behalf of the faithful, prayer of thanksgiving over the elements, Communion (two types) obligatory for all and with the response "Amen." Whoever did not participate in Communion could not be present. Milk and honey were included between the gifts for the Mass of initiation. From the testimony of *Cyprian, bishop in 249–258 (Ep. 63,16;

De or. Dom. 18), it is evident that, between small groups, everyday Eucharist in Carthage was still united to an evening meal, even though Cyprian expresses his disapprobation for the hour of the celebration and establishes that the time for the Eucharist must be the morning. It seems very probable that the liturgical language in North *Africa must have been *Latin since the times of Tertullian, which would have largely anticipated the introduction to Latin in Rome.

The 4th c., starting from the *Edict of Milan (313), bore witness to an unprecedented spread of Christianity, a development that encouraged the evolution of fixed forms typical of the subsequent centuries. Buildings constructed expressly for worship permitted the large-scale organization of the liturgy (basilica worship), allowing it to be informed by the surrounding culture. The distinction between various liturgical centers had become de rigueur by now, with *Alexandria and *Antioch dominating the East. The most authoritative texts of the 4th c. are the Euchologion of Serapion of Thmuis (Alexandrian, liturgy of St. Mark; Funk II, 159-179) and the Apostolic Constitutions (Antiochene, liturgy of St. James; Funk I). The Euchologion of Serapion indicates the normal scheme of readings, homily, prayers of intercession, eucharistic prayer, breaking of the bread, Communion and prayer after Communion. The prayer before the readings, the one after the homily, the wide development of prayers of intercession, the invocation of the Word in the place of the habitual *epiclesis and the reading of the diptychs after the story of the institution are notable, however. Even though book VIII of the Apostolic Constitutions (late 4th c.) is based on the Apostolica Traditions, the liturgy of the Mass is profoundly different from the alleged one of Hippolytus. The liturgy of the Word includes four biblical readings and the homily, the dismissal of different groups (catechumens, penitents etc.), each one after a prayer and the benediction of the bishop, and concludes with a bipartite prayer of the faithful (litany of the deacon and prayer of the bishop), accompanied by the kiss of peace. The liturgy of the Eucharist begins with the ablution of the hands and the preparation of the gifts and continues with a complex *anaphora (with Sanctus); rather than the Pater noster another diaconal litany precedes the prayer of the bishop in preparation for Communion; the announcement of the Communion is greeted in response with a hymn from the assembly, and during the Communion they sing Ps 33; the prayer of thanksgiving and the final benediction follow Communion.

Even though the *Jerusalem rite is fundamentally the Antiochene one, the development of the city as a liturgical center reflects its character as the destination of pilgrimage. However, when *Byzantium (*Constantinople) became the Eastern imperial capital after 330, the liturgical center of the East moved gradually to this city. Here the basic Antiochene rite was elaborated under the influence of the ceremonial of the imperial court and of the Christian reaction against *Arianism, with its emphasis on the divinity of *Christ and a growing sense of *sin. From here grew the gradual separation of the liturgical action from the assembly and the development of the iconostasis. The eucharistic celebration is particularly characterized by a highly elaborate rite of preparation (proskomidē), by two processional entrances ("little," before the readings, and "great," to carry the gifts from the prothesis to the altar) and by the use of the anaphoras of *Chrysostom and *Basil. From the 4th c. on, the liturgy of Constantinople gradually became one of the preeminent rites of the Eastern church.

The Mass of N Africa at the end of the 4th c. (*Augustine; see Van der Meer, 388-402) coincides for the most part with the Roman one, with a few traits that distinguish it in respect to that of *Tertullian: the bread of *exorcism is given to the catechumens before the dismissal; the diptychs are read before the eucharistic prayer; the "Our Father," the kiss of peace and the benediction of the people follow the breaking of the bread; during the communion Ps 33 is sung (DACL, 633-635). The canons of the synods of *Hippo (393) and of Carthage (397) indicate that the liturgical texts were not yet fixed at this time (Mansi III, 884, 895, 922). The 4th c. also bore witness to the definitive adoption of Latin as the liturgical language in Rome, a process concluded around 380 when the Roman *Canon was said in Latin rather than in Greek (see also *Ambrosian Liturgy; *anaphora; *Eucharist; *anamnesis; *Gallican liturgy; *Hispanic liturgy; *Addai; *Egypt [liturgy]; *Armenian rite; *Basil, Liturgy of; *Basil of Caesarea [liturgy]; *Celtic liturgy; *Ethiopia [liturgy]; *liturgical year; *liturgy).

III. From the 5th to the 8th c. From the end of the 4th c. to the start of the 5th, the Roman Mass began with the greeting of the minister and the initial collect or prayer. Before the *gospel there were two readings (OT, NT) with the singing of the gradual psalm inserted, which was followed by the Alleluia. Following the gospel were the homily and the prayer after the readings. The dismissal of the catechumens was followed by the prayer of the faithful and the kiss of peace. During the offertory the faithful bore the gifts to the altar while the offertory psalm was sung. Then came the prayer over the offerings, the preface and the canon, the breaking of the bread, the Pater noster and the commixtio of the consecrated bread and wine. During the distribution of the Communion a psalm was sung. The prayer after Communion was followed by the benediction (prayer super populum) and by the dismissal (Ite missa est). In the next 200 years a few changes were introduced into this scheme that gave the final structure to the eucharistic celebration of the Roman Church for subsequent centuries. With the decline of the catechumenate (4th–5th c.), the dismissal of the catechumens fell gradually into disuse, and the prayer of the faithful was suppressed (probably starting with *Gelasius I, 492–496) and replaced with a liturgy of petition of Eastern origin with the acclamation-response kyrie eleison, inserted at the beginning of the rite of the Mass. From the time of *Gregory the Great (590–604), the litany disappeared, with the exception of Sundays and feast days, and only the acclamation kyrie eleison remained. The removal of the prayer of the faithful must have been without doubt the occasion in which the kiss of peace came to be placed before Communion. The responsibility for the relocation of the Lord's Prayer immediately after the canon must certainly belong to Gregory the Great. The canon itself must have received its definitive form at this time. Certainly the Gloria existed in Latin in Rome before the 6th c., but it could only be intoned by the bishop. The singing of the Agnus Dei* in accompaniment to the rite of the breaking of the bread was introduced at the end of the 7th c. by *Sergius I (687–701). The description that the Primus Ordo Romanus gives of one stational Mass of the pope at the end of the 7th c. indicates the slow liturgical decline that had begun (Andrieu, Les Ordines Romani, II, 67-108). The preparatory prayers of the bishop (previously private and silent) were introduced into the Mass as specifically spoken aloud; what had been originally songs of the assembly were performed now by a schola cantorum and the clergy; it seems that there was no homily; the prayer of the faithful was removed, there was no clear distinction between liturgy of the word and eucharistic liturgy; the offertory procession had given place to a collect on the part of the clergy; Communion of the faithful was not considered an integral part of the celebration for a long time, and those who didn't commune left early; in other words, the clarity of the old Eucharist had become obscured by a sumptuous ritual derived from the imperial court. The dissolution of the liturgical assembly had had its beginning, and that, together with the clericalization of the ministry, reduced the eucharistic liturgy to a rite performed by clergy on behalf of passive spectators.

IV. Deviant forms of celebration (see DTC 10, 947-955). In the past there were attempts at eucharistic celebration that did not follow the essential scheme in use in the churches. We mention a few of them: the *Ebionites, holding that Jesus was only human, celebrated the *mysteries with unleavened wafers and water only once a year (Iren., Adv. haer. V, 1,3: PG 7, 1123: Epiph., Panarion: PH 41, 432). The *docetists refrained from the Eucharist, because they did not accept Christ as incarnate (Ign., Ad Smyr. 7,1). *Mark the Gnostic, to demonstrate that he possessed the *aeon Charis, would consecrate the wine, turning it purple and increasing its volume with "medicines" (Iren., Adv. haer.s 1,7; Hippol., Ref. omn. haer.: GCS 26 [1916] 170-172; Epiph., Pan.: PG 41, 583-586; Anacephalaiosis: PG 42, 853). The *Ophites venerated the serpent as the figure of Christ and used it to consecrate the bread (ps.-Tertull., Adv. omnes haereses: CSEL 47, 216, 13; Epiph., Pan.: PG 41, 647; ps.-Jer., Ind. haer.: PL 81, 637; Aug., De haer.: PL 42, 28; Praedest.: PL 53, 592).

The *Encratites imitated the mysteries of the *Catholics, celebrating them with water because they abstained from wine (Epiph., Pan.: PG 41, 854). Perhaps they are connected with the *Severians, a sect that prohibited the use of wine, inasmuch as it was a seed of the devil and of woman (Epiph., Pan.: PG 41, 834; Anacephalaiosis: PG 42, 683; Aug., De haer.: PL 42, 30). The *Marcionites also used only water (Iren., Adv. haer. IV, 18, 4f.). The practice of using only water spread in ancient times and was combated also by Cyprian (Ep. 63) (see *Aquarians). The *Cataphrygians, a generic name that indicated seven different *Montanists, with designations depending on their characteristics, celebrated *Easter by combining the bread to be consecrated with the blood of a one-year-old male child (see Epiph., Pan.: PG 41, 878: Quintillian; Anacephalaiosis: PG 42, 863; Filaster, Div. haer.: PL 12, 1166; ps.-Jer., Ind. haer: PL 81, 641; Aug. De haer.: PL 42, 30; Montanists, PL 42, 31: Pepuziani-Quintilliani; Praedestinatus: PL 53, 596). The *Artotyritae also belonged to the Montanist category, and they offered in oblation bread and cheese, the gifts of the first men (Epiph., Pan.: PG 81, 641: Quintilliani; Filaster, Div. haer.: PL 12, 1186; ps.-Jer., Ind. haer.: PL 81, 641; Aug., De haer.: PL 42, 31: Pepuziani; Praedestinatus: PL 53, 597). The elect of the *Manicheans took as Eucharist bread sprinkled with human semen to liberate the divine essence contained in it (Aug., De haer.: PL 42, 36; Praedestinatus: PL 53, 602). Finally, the Aquarians offered in the chalice only water, differing from every other church. Perhaps the name doesn't indicate anything more than the Ebionites or the Encratites (Filaster, Div. haer.: PL 12, 1188; Aug., De haer.: PL 42, 42; Praedestinatus: PL 53, 609).

Primary sources: F.X. Funk, ed., Didascalia et Constitutiones Apostolorum, Paderborn 1935, 2 vols. (Le Constitutiones SC 320, 329, 336); M. Andrieu, Les "Ordines Romani" du haut moyen âge, Louvain 1931–1961, 5 vols.; B. Botte (ed.), La Tradition Apostolique, Paris 1946, [2]1968 (SC 11, 11bis); new ed., La Tradition Apostolique de saint Hippolyte, essai de reconstitution, Münster 1963 (LQF 39); E. Peretto, Pseudo-Ippolito, La tradizione Apostolica, Rome 1996; J.P. Audet, La Didachè, Instructions des Apôtres, Paris 1958; G. Visonà, La Didache, Milan 2000; Ambrose of Milan, Des sacrements, Des mystères. Explication du symbole, ed. B. Botte, Paris 1961 (SC 25 bis); L. Deiss, Springtime of the Liturgy: Liturgical Texts of the First Four Centuries, Collegeville, MN 1979 (Also pub. as Early Sources of the Liturgy, 1967); E. Lodi, Enchiridion euchologicum fontium liturgicorum, Rome 1979.

Basic References: H. Leclercq, Messe: DACL 11,1 (1933) 513-774; var. aus., Messa: EC 8 (1952) 757-830; CE 9,419-426; LTK[3] 7,162 (s.v. missa).

Secondary Sources: F.E. Brightmann, Liturgies Eastern and Western, I (the sole edited volume), Eastern Liturgies, Oxford 1896; G. Dix, The Shape of the Liturgy, London 1945, [2]1952, [3]2005; A. Baumstark, Liturgie comparée, rev. B. Botte, Chevetogne [2]1953; J. Jungmann, The Early Liturgy to the Time of Gregory the Great, London 1960; H. Schmidt, Introductio in Liturgiam Occidentalem, Rome 1960; F. van der Meer, Augustine the Bishop, London 1961; J. Jungmann, Missarum Sollemnia, Vienna [5]1962; C. Mohrmann, Missa: Études sur le latin des chrétiens, III, Rome 1965, 351-376; A. Hamman, Vie liturgique et vie sociale, Paris 1968; N.M. Denis-Boulet, La messa, in A.G. Martimort (ed.), La Chiesa in preghiera (It. tr.), Rome [2]1966, 279-483; M. Righetti, Storia liturgica, III, Milan [2]1966; J. Jungmann, The Mass, Collegeville, MN 1976; W. Rordorf et al., The Eucharist of the Early Christians, New York 1978; H. Lietzmann, Mass and Lord's Supper, A Study in the History of the Liturgy, tr. (from the German) with appendices by D.H.G. Reeve, Leiden 1979; var. aus., Anamnesis 3/2: La liturgia eucaristica, Casale Monf. 1983; D. Callam, The Frequency of Mass in the Latin Church ca. 400: ThS 45 (1984) 613-650; B. de Margerie, Eucharistie et communauté dans le contexte de la Règle de saint Augustin: Augustiniana 41 (1991) 507-530; M. Klinghardt, Gemeinschaftsmahl und Mahlgemeinschaft, Soziologie und Liturgie frühchristliche Mahlfeiern, Tübingen 1996; Scientia liturgica, III, L'eucaristia, Casale Monf. 1998; A. McGowan, Ascetic Eucharists, Food and Drink in Early Christian Ritual Meals, Oxford 1999; P. Carlotti - M. Maritano (eds.), L'Eucaristia nel vissuto dei giovani, Rome 2002, 217-261: L'eucaristia nella vita dei cristiani dei primi secoli; P: Bradshaw, The Search for the Origins of Christian Worship, London [2]2002, 118-143; V. Raffa, Liturgia eucaristica, Rome [2]2003; E. Mazza, La celebrazione eucaristica, Bologna 2003.

P. Fahey

MASSA. A rather common term in the writings of *Augustine (O. Rottmanner, Der Augustinismus, 2) and is followed by a word such as luti ("of filth"), peccati ("of sin"), irae ("of wrath"), mortis ("of death"), damnata ("damned") etc. to indicate the human race corrupted by sin. There has been much discussion on the origin of this expression; indeed, it is thought that there is a contamination with the *Manichean word bôlos (a great ball encapsulating the damned and the demons, which is also called massa in the Acta Archelai). But an analysis of the Contra Felicem, in which Augustine reuses the Manichean term and utilizes the word massa without suggesting any identity in meaning between the two would seem to exclude such a hypothesis (R. Jolivet and M. Jourjon, BA 17, 788-789). Furthermore, Pincherle draws attention to the essential difference between the use of the term by the Manichees and by Augustine: among the former it is eschatological in meaning; in Augustine it is soteriological. A dependency on *Ambrosiaster by Augustine (Comm. Rom. 5,12) has been variously and copiously evaluated (Buonaiuti, Casamassa, Leeming, Pincherle). The term comes from Scripture, from Rom 9:21 to be precise. In this verse, in most cases, Augustine refers in those contexts in which the expression is present; and in *Ep.*186, 6, 19 he makes clear that in many codices massa is a translation of the word φύραμα in Rom 9:21, at other times translated by consparsio or conspersio. But Augustine was also familiar with a positive sense the term had: in fact, it appears at least 25 times (M.G. Mara) followed variously by purgata ("purged"), candida ("white"), beata ("blessed") or sanctorum ("of the saints").

An analysis of the works in which one or other (negative or positive) interpretation of the term occurs leads to the following observation: in the negative sense, Augustine indicates humanity lost in *Adam and living on the sixth day (and in this case these works are situated thematically within the sphere of grace and free choice); in the positive sense the discussion concerns humanity redeemed in Christ and destined with him for rest on the seventh day (in this case, it is the *Donatist polemic that is the point of reference in these works). Moreover, Augustine many times mentions the martyrs as a massa candida (Serm. 306; 311, 10; Enarr. in Ps. 49, 9; 144, 17), so called because of their number and their glory. According to *Prudentius (Periseph. 13, 76) their name would indicate the manner of their martyrdom: being the martyrs of Utica, they would have been covered with lime during the persecution of *Valerian. But it is not out of the question that massa candida is the name of a place near Utica where the martyrdom took place.

O. Rottmanner, Der Augustinismus, Münich 1892; P. Franchi de' Cavalieri, I martiri della Massa Candida, ST 9, Vatican City

1902; E. Buonaiuti, Manichaeism and Augustine's Idea of "Massa perditionis": HThR 20 (1927) 117-127; A. Casamassa, Il pensiero di sant'Agostino nel 396–397, i "Tractatores divinorum eloquiorum" di Retract. I, 23, 1 e l'Ambrosiastro, Rome 1919; B. Leeming, Augustine, Ambrosiaster and the massa perditionis: Gregorianum 11 (1930) 58-91; A. Pincherle, La formazione teologica di Sant'Agostino, Rome 1947, 188ff.; M.G. Mara, Agostino di Ippona: massa peccatorum, massa sanctorum: SSR 4 (1980) 77-87; Y. Duval, Loca sanctorum Africae, Rome 1982, 176ff., 477-478, 672-673, 700-702; G. Folliet, "Massa damnata"—"Massa sanctorum" chez Saint Augustine: Revista Augustiniana 33 (1992) 95-109; BA 71 (1993) 865-866.

M.G. Mara

MATHEMATICI. In the world of *Late Antiquity, this term referred to the interpreters of the science (mathēsis) of *astrology, who were capable of formulating "remedies" for the use of those seeking consultation, together with personal horoscopes and behavioral guidelines for attracting positive astral influences and avoiding negative influences.

Experts in the divinatory and *oracular arts enjoyed great popularity throughout the empire and often suffered persecution by the public authorities for possessing occult and *evil powers. In their antiastrological and antioracular rhetoric, the church fathers were prone to give highly negative judgments against the practices of the mathematici. Remarkably, *Augustine of Hippo acquired broad familiarity with astrology and practiced the related art of divination during the long stage of his *Manichean militancy. Yet in actually observing that the astrological predictions were wrong, he discovered one of his reasons for making a definitive break from Manicheism. Once he became a bishop, he employed doctrinal arguments and pastoral action to contest the astrological beliefs and associated practices that were quite common even among Christians.

F. Cumont, Astrology and Religion Among Greeks and Romans, New York and London 1912; G. Bezza, Arcana mundi. Antologia del pensiero astrologico antico, Milan 1995; var. aus., Les Astres. Actes du Colloque International de Montpellier 23-25 mars 1995, I-II, Montpellier 1996; G. Sfameni Gasparro, Fra astrologi, teurgi e Manichei: itinerario agostiniano in un mondo che si interroga su destino, male e salvezza, in L. Alici - R. Piccolomini - A. Pieretti (ed.), Il mistero del male e la libertà possibile (IV): ripensare Agostino, Atti dell'VIII Seminario del Centro Studi agostiniani di Perugia, SEA 59, Rome 1997, 49-131, repr. with changes in Id., Agostino. Tra etica e religione, Brescia 1999, 75-142.

G. Sfameni Gasparro

MATRISTICS. This term is introduced in order to correlate the Greco-Roman enculturation of ancient church fathers (mainly 3rd-5th c.) with the N European enculturation of medieval church mothers (mainly 12th-15th c.), both considered to be leading agents in the formation of Christian theology (Børresen - Vogt 1993, 153-339; Børresen 2000; eds. Børresen - Cabibbo - Specht, 2001, 203-218; Børresen 2002, 142-272). Following the 20th-c. collapse of androcentrism in Western civilization, the female half of humanity is increasingly focused in biosocioeconomic and cultural sciences. Among the humanities, studies of religion are at the scholarly forefront by applying male or female "genderedness" as a main analytical category (Bynum 1991; ed. King 1995; eds. King - Beattie 2004). This innovative approach highlights the connected interaction between psychophysical sex and sociocultural gender, which is equally fundamental for women and men. Consequently, the initial accent on women's studies has shifted to inclusive gender studies. Applied to the Christian tradition, human discourse on God and humanity is understood in terms of verbalized male or female experience. In a context of doctrinal history, where most church fathers were bishops exercising apostolic authority, the term matristics is an oxymoron. Since women are excluded from priesthood and episcopacy on the basis of their gender, women's God-language did not function as authoritative theology, but was relegated to edifying spirituality. Despite their invocation of charismatic empowerment, female prophets and mystics were not institutionally authorized church mothers (eds. Minnis - Voaden 2010).

In this context, the medieval debate on women's impedimentum sexus is essential and well researched. Despite women's sexless imago Dei, their bodily subordination in this world makes the female sex a God-given impediment to ordination. Since a practicing priest needs a sexed body, only human males are deemed capable of representing the excellence of Christ and therefore bear the requisite sacramental symbolism (Minnis 1997; Raming 2001, 2004; Martin 2002). In consequence, the recent emulation of patristic and matristic theology results from the epistemological revolution of feminism, where men are deposed from their traditional status as exemplary human beings (Børresen 1995; ed. Børresen 2004).

Since 1970 research on women in the Christian tradition has proliferated. In 1993 my extensive review of 553 selected studies of the period from Antiquity to the 15th c. covers the fields of theological anthropology, sexology, canon law, history, hagiography and women writers (Børresen - Vogt 1993, 11-127). A comprehensive list of female authors from the same period, termed matrology, with text editions and selected translations published since 1800, is presented by Kadel (1995). An exhaustive survey and analysis of practically all extant sources concerning women in early Christianity, with a complete bibl., is provided by Jensen (2003), accompanied by a collection of texts (2002). Equally important is Trevett's thorough study of women in 1st- to 2nd-c. Christian texts (2006). Women's factual influence in mainstream Christianity and diverse fringe movements is now explored in a wide range of studies on Christian Antiquity.

Female liberation from subordinate sex roles by means of virginal defeminization is a central theme (Giannarelli 1980; E.A. Clark 1986, 1999; Petersen-Szemerédy 1993; Elm 1994; Feichtinger 1995; Cooper 1996; ed. Levine 2008). Women's redemptive identification with Christ through ascetic "becoming male" is an important factor (Mazzucco 1989; Aspegren 1990; Vogt 1993, 217-242; Cloke 1995). A comparison with pre-Christian chastity as practiced by the virgines Vestae is pertinent (Stahlmann 1997). Antagonism between love of God and sexual activity is documented to be equally fundamental in Christian and in so-called *gnostic sources (Sfameni Gasparro 1984). A similar topic of alienated femaleness is found in ancient Greek protology (Songe-Møller 2002). This fateful impact of enkrateia on Christian sexology is analyzed by Rousselle (1983, 1988), also with an accent on medical theories (1998). Brooten's diligent study on female homoeroticism also provides ample documentation of general attitudes to sexuality in early Christianity (1996).

Concerning hagiographical models for women, the shift from apostolic *Thecla (Jensen 1995; Davis 2001) to enclosed Macrina is important (Albrecht 1986; Silvas 2008). Texts from Eastern Christianity are studied by Synek (1994) and from the Syrian East by Brock and Harvey (1998). Lives of Roman holy women are presented by Wittern (1994). Apocryphal literature is analyzed from the perspective of sexual continence as a liberatory device (Burrus 1987).

Documentation of women's religious activity in the Greco-Roman world remains indispensable (Kraemer 1992; Clark 1993; eds. Kraemer - D'Angelo 1999; ed. Kraemer 2004; eds. Lefkowitz - Fant 2005). Women's status in Greco-Roman Palestine is analyzed by Ilan (2006) and in the Mishnah by Wegner (1988). When Brooten (1992) interprets the epigraphical evidence for women leaders of synagogues in a functional rather than honorific sense, she makes the necessary distinction between male Jewish attitudes toward female humanity and women's history. Clarifying women's roles in the house churches of earliest Christianity is equally useful (MacDonald - Tullock 2005). The documentation of female ministries in early Christianity is very solid, esp. concerning the ordination of female deacons (Eisen 1996, 2000; Madigan - Osiek 2005). Female priests and bishops are attested in fringe groups (see *Montanism). This actualization of eschatological gender equivalence already on earth is carefully studied by Trevett (1996). Like the few extant texts of women from *Late Antiquity, sayings of the prophets Prisca and Maximilla are preserved through the Christian tradition, together with Sayings of four desert mothers (Vogt 1993, 193-216), the diary of the martyr *Perpetua (Dronke 1988; Hefferman 2012) and the biblical paraphrase of the aristocratic matron *Proba (Clark - Hatch 1981; Margoni-Kögler 2001). *Jerome's collaborator, the learned *Marcella, is studied by Letsch-Brunner (1998). Much material has not been considered worthy of transmission and is therefore lost, the 17th-c. discovery of Perpetua's diary in her Passio is quite symptomatic.

From the early medieval period onward more female authors were preserved, mainly erudite nuns in N European monasteries (Dronke 1988; eds. Minnis - Voaden 2010; eds. Børresen - Valerio 2011, 2012, 2013). It is important to observe that the term matristics only applies to women writers who reshape previous God-language, thereby participating in the continuously enculturated formation of Christian doctrine and symbolism. This creative interplay between patristic innovation and matristic achievement is particularly visible in the gradual attribution of fully human Godlikeness to women (ed. Børresen 1995). The historical process of overcoming Christianity's fundamental incompatibility between divinity and femaleness is acted out through three main stages. In early Christian *anthropology, women were promoted to exemplary manhood by redemptive incorporation into Christ. From the 3rd c. onward "feminist" church fathers, like *Clement of Alexandria and *Augustine, managed to include women as Godlike already from creation. With a combined *Stoic and *Platonic exegesis of Gen 1:26-27b; 1 Cor 11:7; and Gal 3:28, the imago Dei was defined as a sexless privilege, and therefore accorded to women despite their non-Godlike femaleness (Børresen 1995; Børresen 2002, 15-89; eds. Børresen - Prinzivalli 2013).

In the Middle Ages, both male and female writers made an important shift in traditional *Christology, from incarnate vir perfectus to womanlike kenōsis (see Eph 4:13 and Phil 2:7). This imagery of suffering vulnerability was then applied to Christ's human nature, whereas his divinity continued to be andromorphic (Bynum 1982; Newman 1995). In consequence, women could identify with the redeeming Christ without gender reversal and serve as God's chosen instruments by mystical gifts and prophetic charisma.

Thereby discarding the ancient strategies of "becoming male" in Christ or claiming sexless image quality, medieval church mothers like Hildegard of Bingen (d. 1179) and Julian of Norwich (d. after 1416) sought to provide a model of female Godlikeness at the divine level by metaphorical feminization of the Godhead.

The exceptionally gifted abbess Hildegard represents a culmination of women's monastic culture, which declined when higher learning was transferred from male and female monasteries to medieval universities, where women were excluded. This adversity, strengthened during the Renaissance and enforced by the Catholic Reformation, is already noted in a pioneering study on female monasticism (Power 1922). Proclaimed a female Doctor Ecclesiae in 2012, Hildegard's writings are available in critical editions (CCCM 43, 43A, 90, 91, 91A, 91B, 92). Her main theological work, Scivias, describes God's Sapientia as a preexistent female figure, who continuously shapes and upholds the whole universe. Starting from a previous sapiential tradition (1 Cor 1:23-24), where God's incarnate, suffering Son and God's revealing Wisdom converge, Hildegard is original in describing God's divine Sapientia as a model of Godlike female humanity, feminea forma. Her *Mariology is consequently rather subdued, although Mary as new Eve is a prime figure of human wholeness, realized by virginity (Gössmann 1995; Flanagan 1998; Newman 1998).

Recent studies on the beguine Mechthild of Magdeburg, who retired to the Benedictine monastery in Helfta (d. ca. 1282), mainly concern her literary creativity, but also clarify her innovative God-language (Heimbach 1989, Vollmann-Profe 2003; Keul 2007). Gertrude of Helfta (d. 1301 or 1302) is qualified as a German church mother because of her holistic trinitarian and Christocentric theology. Her works are available in critical editions (SC 127, 139, 143, 255, 331).

A paradoxical example of deviated matristics is given by the aristocratic widow Birgitta of Sweden (d. 1373). She was canonized by the Roman pope in 1391, and her insistence on God's command to return the papacy from Avignon was invoked against the French rivals. After the papal schism, Birgitta's canonization was canonically confirmed by Martin V in 1419. The critical editions of her Reuelaciones and Opera Minora are completed (SSFS 1956–2001). Birgitta's complete writings are also published in well-annotated translation (Saerby - Morris 2006, 2008, 2012, 2014). Instead of metaphorically feminizing the divine, like Hildegard and Julian, Birgitta seeks to divinize Mary by making her Christotypic (Morris 1999; Sahlin 2001). Therefore, she constructs an equivalent typology where Christ and Mary collaborate in the redemption of humankind. Birgitta's feminist intention is imitable, but her mariocentric amendment of man-centered Christology by making Mary a coredemptrix remains erratic. Nevertheless, Birgitta's original understanding of herself as a chosen instrument of God's continuous revelation, on a par with prophets, apostles and evangelists, can inspire female God-language (Børresen 2002, 171-230; 2004). When Birgitta was proclaimed copatroness of Europe in 1999, this matristic affirmation was obscured by pontifical mariology.

Describing Christ as Mother, the erudite anchoress Julian of Norwich attributes this quality not only to his human nature but also explicitly to his preexistent divine nature as second person of the *Trinity, where "our Mother Christ" is our "Mother God all Wisdom" (Heimmel 1982; Kolletzki 1997). Apparently less read in the fifteenth and the sixteenth centuries, Julian's writings are fortunately preserved. The earliest surviving version of the short text was identified by chance in 1909, but the long text survived in 16th/17th-c. MSS and was already published in 1670. Written in the vernacular, Julian's work demonstrates her thorough knowledge of biblical, patristic and medieval sources both in Latin and in the vernacular. This breadth of learning indicates an advanced monastic training, eventually received as a Benedictine nun before becoming a recluse.

When mortally ill in 1373, Julian received a healing vision of God's all-embracing mercy, acted out through Christ's redeeming death on the cross (Nuth 1991; Baker 1994). Julian described and interpreted this crucial event in her Showings (eds. Colledge - Walsh 1978; eds. Watson - Jenkins 2006). It is important to observe that Julian's basic trust in universal salvation is strikingly opposed to Augustine's and later Luther's anguished seeking for a merciful God. In order to verbalize her experience of God's re-creating love: "that all things shall be well" (short text XV), Julian elaborates her original concept of divine Motherhood (Long Text 48, 52, 54, 57-63, 83). Placing Christ's metaphorical Motherhood in his unified divine humanity, Julian overcomes the gender hierarchy of traditional typology, which structures Catholic and Orthodox Christology, ecclesiology and Mariology. Here, God-given gender hierarchy is transposed from creation to redemption, so that Christ is the divinized new Adam, and the church or Mary is his subordinate new Eve. Perspicaciously understanding the necessary interaction between gynecomorphic God-language and female Godlikeness, Julian describes trinitarian interaction in terms of human wholeness. In this manner, her use of both male and female metaphors to describe God anticipates the third stage of an inclusive imago Dei, where both women and men are defined as fully Godlike, as male or female human beings (ed. Børresen 1995, Børresen 2002, 231-246). Since the 20th c., this matristic pioneer of feminist theology is therefore valued as an exemplary church mother, both in intention and in doctrinal content.

It is important to observe that the holistic concept of human Godlikeness is a radically new enculturation of Western theological anthropology. Introduced by 19th-c. feminists as an argument for women's civil rights (Aasta Hansteen in 1878, Elizabeth Cady Stanton in 1895), inclusive imago Dei was soon endorsed by early 20th-c. Protestant theologians, less from feminist motives than by rejecting the church fathers' Platonized anthropology. Apparently accepted in Catholic doctrine after the Vatican II, the patristic definition of asexual Godlikeness is still upheld in Orthodox theology. The resulting incoherence between an updated conception of the imago Dei and previous androcentric typology has recently been focused on by Catholic feminist theologians, and invoked to support women functioning as worship leaders (ed. Gross 1996; Demel 2004). In fact, when the medieval impedimentum sexus is preserved by the Codex Iuris Canonici (1983, canon 1024), it follows that Godlike women are deemed unable to function as Christlike priests (Børresen 2002, 275-308).

In historical perspective, it is essential to observe that the rising number of gender studies in theology display impressive female dismantling of male-constructed barriers. The obstacles raised by Christian anthropology, sexology and canon law were surmounted by many women, as seen in their history, writings and hagiographical accounts (eds. Minnis - Voaden 2010; The Bible and Women 2009–). The contradictory norms of men's creational priority and women's salvational equivalence were accepted as established by divine law (Børresen 1995; ed. Børresen 2004). It is remarkable that this androcentric gender hierarchy was apparently endorsed by all female writers whose texts have survived within the Christian tradition. Their works were transmitted by ecclesiastical establishments and often censured, redacted or translated by male confessors or clerics. This procedure can explain why no premodern female text challenges the axiomatic precedence of male humanity in the order of creation. Nevertheless, matristic writers demonstrate an assertive exploitation of salvational advancement, thereby preparing a new paradigm in the continuous formation of Christian tradition. From the third millennium onward eschatological gender equivalence is transformed to be normative already in the present world.

R. Albrecht, Das Leben der heiligen Makrina auf den Hintergrund der Thekla-Tradition: Studien zur den Ursprungen des weiblichen Mönchtums im 4. Jahrhundert im Kleinasien (Forschungen zur Kirchen- und Dogmengeschichte 38), Göttingen 1986; K. Aspegren, The Male Woman: A Feminine Ideal in the Early Church (Acta Universitatis Upsaliensis, Uppsala Women's Studies, Women in Religion 4), Uppsala 1990; D.N. Baker, Julian of Norwich: Showings from Vision to Book, Princeton NJ 1994; S. Birgittae, Reuelaciones extrauagantes, SSFS, Ser. 2, V, Uppsala 1956; Id., Reuelaciones I-VIII, SSFS, Ser. 2, VII, 1-8, Uppsala 1971–2001; Id., Opera Minora I-II, SSFS, Ser. 2, VIII, 1-2, Uppsala 1972–1975; S.P. Brock - S.A. Harvey, eds., Holy Women of the Syrian Orient, Berkeley CA 1998; B.J. Brooten, Women Leaders in the Ancient Synagogue: Inscriptional Evidence and Background Issues (Brown Judaic Studies 36), Chico CA 1982; Id., Love Between Women: Early Christian Responses to Female Homoeroticism, Chicago IL 1996; V. Burrus, Chastity as Autonomy: Women in the Stories of the Apocryphal Acts, Studies in Women and Religion 23, Lewiston NY 1987; C.W. Bynum, Jesus as Mother: Studies in the Spirituality of the High Middle Ages, Berkeley CA 1982; Id., Fragmentation and Redemption: Essays on Gender and the Human Body in Medieval Religion, New York 1991; K.E. Børresen - K. Vogt, Women's Studies of the Christian and Islamic Traditions: Ancient, Medieval and Renaissance Foremothers, Dordrecht-Boston-London 1993; K.E. Børresen, Subordination and Equivalence: The Nature and Role of Woman in Augustine and Thomas Aquinas: A Reprint of a Pioneering Classic, Kampen 1995 (Updated ed. of Fr. original Oslo-Paris 1968); K.E. Børresen, ed., The Image of God: Gender Models in Judaeo-Christian Tradition, Minneapolis MN 1995; K.E. Børresen, Matristics: Female Godlanguage in the Middle Ages, in RHE 95, Louvain 2000, 343-362; Id., Matristics: Ancient and Medieval Church Mothers, in K.E. Børresen - S. Cabibbo - E. Specht, eds., Gender and Religion: European Studies (= Genre et Religion: Études européennes), Rome 2001, 203-218; K.E. Børresen, From Patristics to Matristics: Selected Articles on Christian Gender Models, Rome 2002; Id., Religious Feminism in the Middle Ages: Birgitta of Sweden, in L. D'Arcens - J.F. Ruys, eds., Maistresse of My Wit: Medieval Women, Modern Scholars, Making the Middle Ages 7, Turnhout 2004, 295-312; K.E. Børresen, ed., Christian and Islamic Gender Models in Formative Traditions, Studi e Testi TardoAntichi 2, Rome 2004; K.E. Børresen - A.Valerio, eds., Donne e Bibbia nel Medioevo (secoli XII-XV): Tra ricezione e interpretazione, La Bibbia e le donne 6,2, Trapani 2011; Id., Medioevo II (siglos XII-XV). Entre recepción e interpretación, La Biblia y las Mujeres 14. Medioevo y comienzo de la Edad Moderna, Estella (Navarro) 2012; Id., Frauen und Bibel im Mittelalter: Rezeption und Interpretation, Die Bibel und die Frauen 6,2, Stuttgart 2013; K.E. Børresen - E. Prinzivalli, eds., La donna nello sguardo degli antichi autori cristiani: L'uso dei testi biblici nella costruzione dei modelli femminili di genere, La Bibbia e le donne 5,1, Trapani 2013; E.A. Clark - D.F. Hatch, eds., The Golden Bough, the Oaken Cross: The Vergilian Cento of Faltonia Betitia Proba, Chico CA 1981; E.A. Clark, Ascetic Piety and Women's Faith: Essays on Late Ancient Christianity, Studies in Women and Religion 20, Lewiston NY 1986; Id., Reading Renunciation: Asceticism and

Scripture in Early Christianity, Princeton NJ 1999; G. Clark, Women in Late Antiquity: Pagan and Christian Lifestyles, Oxford 1993; G. Cloke, "This Female Man of God": Women and Spriritual Power in the Patristic Age: 350–450 AD, London 1995; C.F. Cooper, The Virgin and the Bride: Idealized Womanhood in Late Antiquity, Cambridge MA 1996; E. Colledge - J. Walsh, eds., A Book of Showings to the Anchoress Julian of Norwich 1-2, Studies and Texts 35, Toronto 1978; S.J. Davis, The Cult of Saint Thecla: A Tradition of Women's Piety in Late Antiquity, Oxford 2001; S. Demel, Frauen und kirchliches Amt: Vom Ende eines Tabus in der katholischen Kirche, Freiburg im Breisgau 2004; P. Dronke, Women Writers of the Middle Ages: A Critical Study of Texts from Perpetua († 203) to Marguerite Porete (†1310), Cambridge 1988; U.E. Eisen, Amtsträgerinnen im frühen Christentum: Epigraphische und literarische Studien, Forschungen zur Kirchen- und Dogmengeschichte 61, Göttingen 1996; Id., Women Officeholders in Early Christianity, Epigraphical and Literary Studies, Collegeville MN 2000; S. Elm, "Virgins of God": The Making of Asceticism in Late Antiquity, Oxford Classical Monographs, Oxford 1994; B. Feichtinger, Apostolae Apostolorum: Frauenaskese als Befreiung und Zwang bei Hieronymus, Frankfurt a.M. 1995; I. Fischer - C. de Groot - M. Navarro Puerto - A. Valerio, eds., The Bible and Women: An Encyclopedia of Exegesis and Cultural History, Trapani-Estella (Navarro)-Stuttgart-Atlanta GA, 2010–; several volumes of this international, four-language series are important for ancient and medieval Matristics: 5.1, K.E. Børresen - E. Prinzivalli, eds.; 5.2, E. Giannarelli - E. Synek, eds.; 6.1, F.E. Consolino - J. Herrin, eds.; 6.2, K.E. Børresen - A. Valerio, eds; S. Flanagan, Hildegard of Bingen 1098–1179: A Visionary Life, London, New York 1998; G. d'Helfta, Œuvres Spirituelles I-V, Sources Chrétiennes 127, 139, 143, 255, 331, Paris 1967, 1968, 1978, 1986; E. Giannarelli, La tipologia femminile nella biografia e nell'autobiografia cristiana del IV secolo, Studi Storici 127, Rome 1980; E. Gössmann, Hildegard von Bingen: Versuche einer Annäherung, Archiv für philosophie- und theologiegeschichtliche Frauenforschung, Sonderband, Munich 1995; W. Gross, ed., Frauenordination: Stand der Diskussion in der katholischen Kirche, Munich 1996; T.J. Hefferman, The Passion of Perpetua and Felicity, Oxford 2012; M. Heimbach, "Der ungelehrte Mund" als Autorität: Mystische Erfahrung als Quelle kirchlich-prophetischer Rede im Werk Mechthilds von Magdeburg, Stuttgart 1989; J.P. Heimmel, "God Is Our Mother": Julian of Norwich and the Medieval Image of Christian Feminine Divinity, - Literature, Elizabethan & Renaissance Studies 92,5, Salzburg 1982; H. Bingensis, Scivias I-III, CCCM 43, 43A, Turnhout 1978; Id., Liber vitae meritorum CCCM 90, Turnhout 1995; Id., Epistolarium I-III, CCCM 91, 91A, 91B, Turnhout 1991, 1993, 2001; Id., Liber divinorum operum CCCM 92, Turnhout 1996; T. Ilan, Jewish Women in Greco-Roman Palestine: An Inquiry into Image and Status, Texts and Studies in Ancient Judaism 44, Tübingen 2006; A. Jensen, Thekla—Die Apostolin: Ein Apokrypher Text neu endeckt, Freiburg im Breisgau 1995; Anne Jensen, Frauen im frühen Christentum, Traditio Christiana 11, Frankfurt a.M. 2002; Id., Gottes Selbstbewusste Töchter: Frauenemanzipation im frühen Christentum? Münster-Hamburg-London 2003 (1st ed. Freiburg-Basel-Vienna 1992); Id., God's Self-Confident Daughters: Early Christianity and the Liberation of Women, Louisville KY 1996; A. Kadel, Matrology: A Bibliography of Writings by Christian Women from the First to the Fifteenth Centuries, New York 1995; H. Keul, Mechthild von Magdeburg: Poetin, Begine, Mystikerin, Freiburg im Breisgau, 2007; U. King, ed., Religion and Gender: New Perspectives, Oxford 1995; U. King - T. Beattie, eds., Gender, Religion and Diversity: Cross-Cultural Perspectives, New York, London 2004; C. Kolletzki, "Christus unsere wahre Mutter": feminine Konnotationen im Denken der Julian von Norwich, Frankfurter theologische Studien 56, Münster 1997; S. Kraemer, Her Share of the Blessings: Women's Religions Among Pagans, Jews, and Christians in the Greco-Roman World, Oxford, New York 1992; R.S. Kraemer - M.R. D'Angelo, eds., Women and Christian Origins, Oxford, New York 1999; R.S. Kraemer, ed., Women's Religions in the Greco-Roman World: A Sourcebook, Oxford, New York 2004; M.R. Lefkowitz - M.B. Fant, eds., Women's Life in Greece and Rome: A Sourcebook, Baltimore MD 2005; S. Letsch-Brunner, Marcella: Discipula et Magistra Auf den Spuren einer römischen Christin des 4. Jahrhunderts (BZNW 91), Berlin-New York 1998; A.-J. Levine, ed., A Feminist Companion to Patristic Literature, Feminist Companion to the New Testament and Early Christian Writings 12, London-New York 2008; M.Y. MacDonald - J. Tullock, A Woman's Place: House Churches in Earliest Christianity, Minneapolis MN 2005; K. Madigan - C. Osiek, Ordained Women in the Early Church: A Documentary History, Baltimore MD-London 2005; M. Margoni-Kögler, Women Promoting Literary Inculturation: A Case Study of the Aristocratic Roman Matron Faltonia Betitia Proba, in K.E. Børresen - S. Cabibbo - E. Specht, eds., Gender and Religion/ Genre et Religion: European Studies/Etudes européennes, Rome 2001, 113-141; J.H. Martin, The Ordination of Women and the Theologians in the Middle Ages, in B. Cooke - G. Macy, eds., A History of Women and Ordination 1, Lanham MD-London 2002, 31-175; C. Mazzucco, "E fui fatta maschio": La donna nel Cristianesimo primitivo, Università degli Studi di Torino, Letterature 1, Turin 1989; A.J. Minnis, De impedimento sexus: Women's Bodies and Medieval Impediments to Female Ordination, in P. Biller - A.J. Minnis, eds., Medieval Theology and the Natural Body, York 1997, 109-139; A.J. Minnis - R. Voaden, eds., Medieval Holy Women in the Christian Tradition c. 1100–c. 1500, Turnhout 2010; B. Morris, St. Birgitta of Sweden, Studies in Medieval Mysticism 1, Woodbridge 1999; B. Newman, From Virile Woman to Woman Christ: Studies in Medieval Religion and Literature, Philadelphia PA 1995; Id., Sister of Wisdom: St. Hildegard's Theology of the Feminine, with a New Preface, Bibliography and Discography, Berkeley CA 1998 (1st ed. 1987); J.M. Nuth, Wisdom's Daughter: The Theology of Julian of Norwich, New York 1991; G. Petersen-Szemerédy, Zwischen Weltstadt und Wüste: Römische Asketinnen in der Spätantike: Eine Studie zur Motivation und Gestaltung der Askese christlicher Frauen Roms auf den Hintergrund ihrer Zeit, Forschungen zur Kirchen- und Dogmengeschichte 54, Göttingen 1993; S.S. Poor, Mechthild of Magdeburg and Her Book. Gender and the Making of Textual Authority, Philadelphia 2004; E. Power, Medieval English Nunneries c. 1275 to 1535, Cambridge 1922; I. Raming, Priesteramt der Frau—Geschenk Gottes für eine erneuerte Kirche, Münster-Hamburg-London 2001 (1st ed. Cologne 1973); Id., The Priestly Office of Women: God's Gift to a Renewed Church (2nd ed., in B. Cooke - G. Macy, eds., A History of Women and Ordination 2, Lanham MD-Toronto-Oxford 2004, 3-305); A. Rousselle, Porneia: De la maîtrise du corps à la privation sensorielle, II^e^-IV^e^ siècles de l'ère chrétienne, Paris 1983 (Eng. tr. Porneia: On Desire and the Body in Antiquity, Oxford 1988); Id., La contamination spirituelle: Science, droit et religion dans l'Antiquité, Paris 1998; D.M. Saerby, tr., B. Morris, introd., notes, The Revelations of St. Birgitta of Sweden, Vol. 1, Liber Caelestis, Books I-III; Vol. 2, Liber Caelestis, Books IV-V; Vol. 3, Liber Caelestis, Books VI-VIII; Vol. 4, Regula Salvatoris, Sermo angelicus, Quattuor orationes, Revelationes extravagantes, Oxford-New York 2006, 2008, 2012, 2014; C.L. Sahlin, Birgitta of Sweden and the Voice of Prophecy, Studies in Medieval Mysticism 3, Woodbridge 2001; G. Sfameni Gasparro, Enkrateia e antropologia: Le motivazioni protologiche della continenza e della verginità nel cristianesimo dei primi secoli e nella gnosticismo, Studia Ephemeridis “Augustinianum” 20, Rome 1984; A.M. Silvas, Macrina the Younger, Philosopher of God, Medieval Women: Texts and Contexts 22, Turnhout 2008; V. Songe-Møller, Philosophy Without Women: The Birth of Sexism in Western Thought, New York-London 2002; I. Stahlmann, Der gefesselte Sexus: Weibliche Keuschheit und Askese im Westen des römischen Reiches, Berlin 1997; E.M. Synek, Heilige Frauen der frühen Christenheit: Zu den Frauenbildern in hagiographischen Texten des christlichen Osten, Das östliche Christentum, N.F. 43, Würzburg 1994; C. Trevett, Montanism, Gender, Authority and the New Prophecy, Cambridge 1996; Id., Christian Women and the Time of the Apostolic Fathers (AD c.80–160): Corinth, Rome and Asia Minor, Cardiff 2006; K. Vogt, The Desert Mothers: Female Asceticism in Egypt from the 4th to the 6th Century, in K.E. Børresen - K. Vogt, Women's Studies of the Christian and Islamic Traditions, London 1993, 193-216; K. Vogt, “Becoming Male”: A Gnostic, Early Christian and Islamic Metaphor, in ibid., 217-242; G. Vollmann-Profe, ed., Mechthild von Magdeburg: Das fliessende Licht der Gottheit, Bibliothek des Mittelalters 19, Frankfurt a.M. 2003; N. Watson - J. Jenkins, eds., The Writings of Julian of Norwich: A Vision Showed to a Devout Woman and a Revelation of Divine Love, Turnhout 2006; J.R. Wegner, Chattel or Person? The Status of Women in the Mishnah, Oxford-New York 1988; S. Wittern, Frauen, Heiligkeit und Macht: Lateinische Frauenviten aus dem 4. bis 7. Jahrhundert, Ergebnisse der Frauenforschung 33, Stuttgart, Weimar 1994.

K.E. Børresen

MATTAI, mar. This man is said to have been one of the numerous monks who, at the time of the persecution of the emperor *Valens (364–378), left N *Syria (the region of Amida, acc. to the *Jacobite legend of mar Behnam) in order to seek refuge in a Persian city 30 km (18.6 mi) to the NE of Mossul.

At the end of the 4th c. or the beginning of the 5th, he is said to have founded a monastery on Jabal Maqlub in Iraq, which became the most prosperous of the many monasteries which were on this mountain, and the only one which has lasted until the present. It was soon inhabited by so many monks and hermits that it was called Tur Alpheph (“mount of thousands”). This “Athos of Assyria” was, at the cost of fierce struggles, one of the principal bastions of anti-*Nestorian resistance of the orthodox, then of the *monophysites, who established their hierarchy there in 540 (only later, in 629, at Takrit).

P. Sfair, art. Beḥnam in BS 2, 1079 (1962); W. de Vries, LTK² 7, 99; J.M. Fiey, Assyrie chrétienne, Beyrouth 1965–1968, esp. II, 756-784.

F. Rilliet

MATTHEW, evangelist. We have little information from the NT concerning the evangelist Matthew-Levi, called a “publican”: only his name is found in the catalog of the apostles; we also have the description of his calling under the name of Levi (Mk 2:13-17). *Clement of Alexandria identifies him as Zacchaeus (Strom. 4,6,35). Concerning the place of his apostolate the ancient authors do not agree: *Palestine, where he preached in Hebrew (Eus., HE 3,24,6), Ethiopia (*Rufinus, HE 10,9; *Socrates, HE 1,19), among the Parthians (*Paulinus of Nola, Carm. 19,81), in Persia (*Ambrose, In Ps 45,21) and in other places. Matthew seems to have died a martyr. His relics are in Salerno. In patristic literature, esp. in apocryphal writings, there is a certain confusion of the names Matthew/Matthias.

The gospel of Matthew is said to have been written in Hebrew or Aramaic for Jews in Palestine and then translated into Greek; this version is said to be the Gospel According to the Hebrews, seen by *Jerome, as he himself relates. The gospel of Matthew is said to have been seen by *Pantaenus in India and the original Hebrew found by Barnabas in Cyprus and sent to *Constantinople. The gospel of Matthew was the most popular of all the gospels in the patristic era. It was commented on by Greek writers: *Origen (Homilies and Commentary), *John Chrysostom (his best commentary), ps.-*John Chrysostom (Opus imperfectum in Matthaeum, in Latin); in addition, fragments of commentaries of *Clement of Alexandria, *Gregory Thaumaturgus, *Eusebius of Caesarea, *Athanasius, *Theophilus of Alexandria, *Basil the Great, *Gregory of Nazianzus, *Theodore of Heraclea, *Apollinaris of Laodicea, *Epiphanius, *Cyril of Alexandria, *Anastasius of Antioch, *Severus of Antioch, *John of Damascus; fragments are also found in the Greek catenae. There are many Greek homilies on the gospel of Matthew, from the following writers: John Chrysostom, *Basil of Seleucia, *Eusebius of Emesa, *Gregory of Nyssa and others (see CPG 5, index, 132-136). In the Latin church we have the commentaries of *Ambrosiaster, *Hilary of Poitiers, ps.-Origen, *Jerome, *Chromatius of Aquileia, anonymous Irish commentaries and that of *Bede (see CPL, index, 777). There are numerous homilies on this gospel; the *Sermon on the Mount and the *Lord's Prayer are usually commented on acc. to the text of Matthew.

The apocryphal writings regarding Matthew are not many. In apocryphal literature it is difficult to know whether to attribute certain texts to him because of the confusion of the names Matthew/Matthias (as in the apocryphal writing Acts of Matthew in the City of the Anthropophagi). Book 6 of ps.-Abdias is dedicated to Matthew. There exists a Greek passion of Matthew with a Latin translation, Arab and Coptic passions, the Acts of Matthew in the City of Kahenat (an idealized city) and a commentary of Simeon Metaphrastes. Attributed to Matthew are a Latin gospel of the infancy (ps.-

Matthew), paraphrases of the Protevangelium of James with the addition of the chapters on the flight into Egypt. According to the letter preceding the text, this gospel was written by Matthew in Hebrew and translated by Jerome.

Acts: CANT 267-271, cf. 280-281; Lipsius-Bonnet 2, 1, 217-262; A. in Kahenat: A. Smith-Lewis, Horae Semiticae 3-4, London 1903, 83-94, 100-112 (with Eng. tr.); Passio: G. Talamo Atenolfi, I testi medioevali degli Atti di S. Matteo, Rome 1958 (with It. tr.). Translations: It. - Erbetta 2, 506-526; Moraldi 2, 709-713; Ger. - A. de Santos Otero, in Schneemelcher 2, 414-417. Gospel According to Ps.-Matthew: CANT 51; BHL 5334-5342b; J. Gijsel, CCAp 9, 1997 (comm.); Fr. - EApC I, 107 140; Pol. - Starowieyski 1, 291-316—The only tr. on the text of Gijsel, which corrected much of Tischendorf's text. BS 9, 110-145; LCIK 7, 588-600. Lipsius 2, 2, 109-141; E. Massaux, L'influence de S. Matthieu sur la littérature chrétienne avant S. Irénée, Louvain 1950; N. Acocella, La traslazione di S. Matteo. Documenti e testimonianze, Salerno 1954; A. Carucci, L'Etiopia di S. Matteo, Subiaco 1940; Id., Etiopia di S. Matteo nella letteratura patristica (secolo III-VI), Salerno 1954; E. Pontieri, Salerno "Civitas Matthaei": Atti dell'Accademia Pontiana 14 (1964–1965) 13-48 = Id., Divagazioni storiche e storiografiche, Naples 1964–1965, 59-124; R. Trevijano, La obra de Papías y sus noticias sobre Mc y Mt: Salmanticensia 41 (1994) 181-212.

M. Starowieyski

MATTHEW, Gospel of. The primitive community attributed the first gospel to Matthew. *Heracleon (Clem. Alex., Strom. IV, 9) and *Origen (C. Celsum I, 62)—among others—distinguished Levi from Matthew. According to *Eusebius (HE 3, 24,6), Matthew had evangelized the Hebrews, and, before departing for others peoples, he had left the gospel in writing in their mother tongue. In 387, *Jerome, in the preface to his Commentary on Matthew (PL 26, 20), left us the first list of Greek and Latin commentaries on Matthew. The gospel of Matthew appears as the most ancient and the first in the canonical list (Didache*, *Ignatius of Antioch, *Papias, *Irenaeus). Even before it was commented on in the strict sense, the first gospel, esp. in certain passages, enjoyed a special privilege. One often referred to the *Sermon on the Mount acc. to the text of Matthew, and to the frequent use of certain passages such as Mt 5:28, 32, 39-42, 44-47; 7:12, 21, using the common (Western) text. The commentators did not develop the text, but were content to relate its true sense. They did not consider so much the accounts of the miracles, and occupied themselves with the doctrine rather than with literal citations. They went to Matthew for the teachings of Jesus which are the foundation of Christianity. Such we find in the writings of *Clement of Rome, *Barnabas, *Ignatius of Antioch, 2 Clement, *Polycarp, the Apocalypse, Odes of Salomon, Shepherd* of Hermas, the noncanonical gospels, Agrapha*, some *gnostic writings, *Aristides, *Justin, *Tatian, *Apollinaris of Hierapolis, *Athenagoras, *Theophilus of Alexandria, and the Didache.

*Greek and Latin commentators through Bede (d. 735). 2nd-3rd c.: *Theophilus of Antioch, known through Jerome, who preserved, in De Vir. Ill. 11.25 and in Ep. 121,6, the interpretation of the dishonest steward; *Hippolytus, of whom we have only fragments; *Origen: fragments of homilies and a partial Latin translation of his commentary. 4th c.: fragments of the commentary of the Antiochene *Theodore of Heraclea. *Ephrem the Syrian gave great importance to Matthew in his commentary on Tatian's Diatessaron. *Athanasius did not comment on Matthew, but he did gather texts on it. Only fragments of *Apollinaris have remained. *Didymus's commentary has been lost. 5th c.: *John Chrysostom's 90 homilies on Matthew are the most complete commentary of the patristic age. The fragments of *Theophilus of Alexandria, *Theodore of Mopsuestia and *Ammonius of Alexandria are of a *parenetic and homiletic character.

Among the Latins: 4th c.: The commentary of *Victorinus of Ptuj (Petovium) (Cassiod., Inst. 7), now lost, but used by Jerome. The commentary of *Hilary, which manifests the influence of Hippolytus, Theodore, Origen and Victorinus. The fragments which have been preserved of *Fortunatian of Aquileia and the treatises and sermons of *Chromatius of Aquileia, the commentaries and homilies of Jerome and the Quaes. in Matth. and De Sermone in Monte of *Augustine. 5th c.: *Eucherius of Lyons and *Arnobius the Younger.

The most ample commentary on Matthew in Latin and the most used in the Middle Ages is the incomplete Opus imperfectum in Matthaeum, which contains passages of Jerome, Chromatius and *Leo I (the Great), has an *allegorical-symbolic character. This was the age of the pseudos, such as ps.-Peter of Laodicea and ps.-Jerome. In the Greek world, it is the age of the unexplored area of the catenae.

G. Wagner (ed.), An Exegetical Bibliography of the New Testament: Matthew and Mark, Macon, GA 1983; F. Neirynck - J. Verheyden - R. Corstjens, The Gospel of Matthew and the Gospel Source Q: A Cumulative Bibliography 1950–1995, Leuven 1998. Editions: Hippolytus: GCS 1, 195-208; Origen: PG 13, 829-1800; GCS 38, 1-299; 40/1, 1-703; 41. Anonymous writer of the 3rd c.: G. Mercati, ST 11 (1903) I, 1-49; Theodore of Heraclea: J. Reuss, TU 61 (1957) XXVI-XXIX. 55-95; Ephrem: ed. L. Leloir, CSCO 137, 145, 180 (Armen. tr.); ed. and tr. L. Leloir, Dublin 1963 (Syriac orig.); Athanasius: PG 25, 207-220; 27, 1364-1389; Apollinaris: J. Reuss, TU 61, XXIII, XXVI, 1-54; John Chrysostom: PG 57, 13-472; 58, 471-794; Theophilus of Alexandria: J. Reuss, TU 61, 151-152; Theodore of Mopsuestia: PG 66, 703-713; J. Reuss, TU 61, XXX-XXXIX and 153-269; Ammonius of Alexandria: PG 85, 1381-1392; J. Reuss: Biblica 22 (1941) 13-20; Hilary: PL 9, 917-1076; CSEL 65, 232; 17, 383; SC 254, 258; Fortunatian: PLS 1, 216-219; CCL 9, 365-370, RBen 32 (1920) 160-174; Chromatius: PL 20, 327-368; CCL 9, 381-442; R. Étaix: RBen 70 (1960) 469-503; Jerome: PL 26, 15-218; PLS 2, 172-175; CCL 78, 503-506; Augustine: PL 34, 1071-1216 and 1229-1308; 35, 1323-1335 and 1365-1376; CSEL 43, 81-393; Eucherius: PL 50, 756-798; CSEL 31, 105-109; Arnobius: PL 53, 571-578; Opus imperf. in Math.: PG 56, 611-946; R. Étaix: RBen 84 (1974) 271-300; M. Simonetti, Patrologia III, 93 and 97; ps.-Peter of Laodicea: PG 86, 3323-3336; R. Devreesse, DB Suppl. 1, 1165-1167; ps.-Jerome: PL 30, 551-579; Catenae on Matthew: CPG IV, C 110. Studies: RGG IV, 809; LTK 6, 1477-1482; C.H. Turner, The Early Greek Commentators on the Gospel According to St. Matthew: JTS 12 (1911) 99-112; E. Massaux, L'influence de l'Évangile de saint Matthieu sur la littérature chrétienne avant saint Irénée, Louvain 1950; M. Simonetti, ed., Matteo, 2 vols.: BCP NT 1/1-2, Rome 2004–2006 (= Eng., Matthew 1–13 and Matthew 12–28, ACCS NT 1a and 1b, Downers Grove, IL 2001–2002); J.A. Kellerman, tr., Incomplete Commentary on Matthew (Opus imperfectum), 2 vols., ed. T.C. Oden, ACT, Downers Grove IL 2010.

E. Romero Pose - G. Pilara

MATTHIAS, apostle. Abbreviated nominal form of Mattanjah (= gift of Jahweh). He is the only person in the Bible to have this name. He was joined to the group of the apostles as a substitute for *Judas Iscariot, following an election in which they chose between him and Joseph Barsabas (Acts 1:15-20). After this episode, he is not spoken of again in Acts. Even if the vote of the community chose Matthias rather than Joseph, both possessed the necessary requirements which Peter mentioned in the discourse he gave before proceeding to the completion of the number of the apostolic college: They had been with Jesus from the baptism of John until the ascension; thus they could be faithful witnesses of the resurrection. Peter's effort to complete the group of the apostles even before the coming of the Holy Spirit shows the special divine providence which watches over the group, authentic depository of the mission of the Risen One. This is also the interpretation of *Eusebius, who states that Matthias was one of the 70 disciples (HE 1,12), which is not impossible. This ancient story soon attached itself to Matthias; he was sometimes identified with Zacchaeus (*Clem. Alex., Strom. IV, 6,35), sometimes with *Barnabas (Recog. Clem. 1,60), sometimes with Nathaniel or others. The area he evangelized is not clearly indicated by the tradition, which speaks of *Palestine (where he is said to have been stoned as an enemy of the law of *Moses) and of Ethiopia (where he is said to have preached and suffered martyrdom). According to the *gnostic *Heracleon he died a natural death (Clem. Alex., Strom. IV,9).

The gnostic tradition knew some writings which pertained to him: The Gospel of Matthias, The Traditions of Matthias, The Secret Discourses of Jesus and Matthias, The Acts of Andrew and Matthias in the Land of the Anthropophagi. Scholars are uncertain whether one ought to read these as Matthias or Matthew; some unhesitatingly prefer Matthew. Matthias, patron of engineers and butchers, is commemorated 14 May in the Latin church and 9 August in the Greek church.

BHG 1229; BHL 5695-5719; BHO 733-741; BS 9,150-154; J. Renié, L'élection de Matthias (Act 1,15-26). Authenticité du récit: Rev. Bibl. 55 (1948) 43-53; P. Gächter, Die Wahl des Matthias: ZKTh 75 (1949) 318-346; EC 9,500-501; BS 9,150-153; LTK³ 6,1485-1486; Erbetta I, 1,288-290; II, 493-494; A. Weiser, Studien zu Christsein und Kirche, Stuttgart 1990, 161-173.

E. Peretto

MATTHIAS, apostle (apocryphal). According to the testimony of Acts, the only source in this regard, Matthias was elected in place of *Judas the betrayer (Acts 1:15-26). His name is often replaced with that of Matthew. *Eusebius holds that he was one of the 70 (HE 1,12,3), while in the ps.-Clementine writing Recognitiones, Matthias is identified with *Barnabas (1,60). Nicephorus (HE 2,40) and the apocrypha speak of his martyrdom. The area of his apostolate was *Ethiopia or Judea. His relics are in *Trier. Under the name of Matthias were some *gnostic apocryphal writings: the Pistis Sophia and the Gospel of Matthias and/or The Traditions of Matthias (we do not know whether these two titles referred to one work or two), which are mentioned by *Origen, *Clement of Aexandria, *Eusebius and *Hippolytus, speak of his work Tradition (Paradosis). According to the Pistis Sophia (44,19–45,19), Matthias wrote a gospel together with *Thomas and *Philip. *Clement of Alexandria cites an agraphon of Matthias (Strom. 3,26,3). Biographical texts are rare: Acts and Martyrdom in Coptic (and Arabic and Ethiopian translations), and the Traditiones S. Matthiae Barti (Oratio Deiparae in regione Partorum); in addition, there are fragments of a homily in Arabic and Ethiopian of ps.-*Cyril of Jerusalem, which recounts how *Mary helped Matthias in prison.

CANT 280-281; BHG 1229; BHL 5695-5719; BHO 733-741; BS 9,150-154; LCIK 7, 602-607; Lipsius 2, 2, 258-269. Lambertus Parvus de Legia, De vita, translatione, inventione ac miraculis S. Matthiae Apostoli libri V, tr. R.M. Kloos, Trier 1958 (medieval text); U. Holzmeister, S. Matthias Apostolus: VerbDom 24 (1944) 7-14; J. Renié, L'élection de Matthieu: RBen 55 (1948) 43-53; P. Gächter, Die Wahl des Matthias: ZkTh 71 (1949) 318-346; R. Laufner, Matthiasverehrung im Mittelalter: TrierTheolZeitschr 70 (1961) 355-360.

M. Starowieyski

MAURETANIA

I. Civil boundaries and history - II. Christian history.

Roman Mauretania included various African provinces of the Roman Empire. Its territory was equivalent to the present-day Morocco and Algeria, with the exception of the area of Constantine-Tebessa, which constituted *Numidia.

I. Civil boundaries and history. These provinces, after the Roman conquest, were Mauretania Caesariana (Algeria) with Caesarea (Chercell), and Mauretania Tingitana (Morocco) with Tingis (Tangier) as capitals. They depended directly on the emperor, and the governors carried out both civil and military functions. *Diocletian modified the boundaries, uniting Mauretania Tingitana to the diocese of Spain and dividing the rest of the territory into two parts: Mauretania Caesariana, which kept Caesarea, and Mauretania Sitifiana, to the E of the first and having Sitifis (Sétif) as its capital. During the *Vandal occupation, Mauretania was temporarily taken back by the Roman Empire around 442, and the imperial power was established there anew (Novella Valentiniani, CTh, ed. Mommsen-Meyer, t. 2, 96). But since maritime connections were precarious, Mauretania was again taken out of Roman influence. When it was reconquered around 540 by the Byzantines, they spoke of Mauretania I (Sitifiana) and II (Caesariana); this latter had been reduced to a stretch on the coast. In the 8th c. it came under Arab domination.

Scholars are still uncertain of the consistency and extent of the Christianization of Mauretania, in particular Caesariana. In fact, although this is well attested E of the area around Sétif and W of the region of Tiaret, it remains uncertain with regard to the area between Zabi and Columnata. This is due more to the rarity of exploration and of archaeological publications than to a real absence of evidence. Further, many buildings, already modest, have disappeared under modern agglomerations. Recent advances include a more detailed reconstruction of the basilica of Tarmount, excavated in the 1930s, as well as the identification of the ruins in Souk-El-Khemis with the site of Galaxia located on the road between Auxia and Equisetum.

II. Christian history. Christianity is attested in Mauretania from the beginning of the 3rd c.: *Tertullian speaks of Christians there who were persecuted by the governor (Scap. 4,3-6). *Cyprian affirms that (Proconsular) Africa, Numidia and Mauretania formed one ecclesiastical province (Ep. 48,3). The bishops of Mauretania did, in fact, take part in the general councils of Africa (Sent. Epp. Praef.). We know only two names of these bishops, but we do not know their sees: Iubaianus (Ep. 73) and Quintus (Ep. 71; 72,1; 73,1). This latter is specifically qualified as Mauretanian (Ep. 72,1). It is possible that other bishops of the period, whose sees we do not know, are from Mauretania. Christian archaeology in the region confirms the literary data. Already in the 3rd c., Caesarea contained a small Christian community, whose cemetery, acc. to Monceaux, may go back to the persecution of *Septimius Severus. In the funerary inscriptions of the 3rd c. found there, we find the olive, the anchor and the dove, but these symbols do not have a specifically Christian character. Specifically Christian, however, are two votive inscriptions of the 3rd c.: those of the clarissimus M.I.A. Severianus and of the priest Victor (CIL 8, 9585-9586). These inscriptions commemorate the gift of two funerary areas given to the community of the brothers. Not far away, in Tipasa, is the inscription of Rasinia Secunda, in all probability Christian, given its expressions. It is the most ancient in Africa, going back to 238 (CIL 8, 9289 and 20856). The city itself preserves necropolises to the E and to the W, one with the basilica of Alexander and the tombs of the iusti priores (CIL 8, 20903), of which the most ancient go back to the 3rd c.; while the other necropolis, with a martyrium and the basilica of St. Salsa, date to the 4th c. All these necropolises in Chercell and in Tipasa witness to the antiquity and the continuance within Christianity of funerary banquets.

Further information may be gathered from the passions of the martyrs. From the period of persecution prior to *Diocletian are the veteran Typasius (BHL 8354), the signifier Fabius (BHL 2818) and the centurion Marcellus (BHL 5254). This is the period in which the emperor Galerius, in order to render the military more steadfast, demanded of the soldiers and esp. of the officials that they participate in the ceremonies of pagan worship. Other martyrs are from after the persecution of Diocletian, and were victims of pagan popular riots. Such is the case of Marciana, who was from Rusuccuru (Taksebt), who died in Caesarea (BHL 5257), and of Salsa, a martyr of Tipasa (BHL 7467), who had provoked the popular fury by destroying some statues of pagan divinities. This information leads one to suppose that the pagan population in the city was still important.

A confirmation of the unequal distribution of the episcopal sees is possible thanks to the conferences of Carthage in 411/484, in which bishops of all of Roman Africa were present. In 411 there are numbered from Mauretania Sitifiana 12 Catholic bishops and 18 *Donatists, plus, respectively, 4 and 3 doubtful; from Mauretania Caesariana 14 Catholics and 21 Donatists, plus 3 and 3 doubtful. Worthy of observation are the following: (1) The presence of bishops also from distant sees, e.g., Honoratus of Aquae Sirenses (Bou Hanifia, department of Oran); (2) the scarcity, however, of bishops from Mauretania Caesariana; (3) the predominance of the Donatists. But in 484, when Donatism had disappeared, 120 episcopal sees were present (plus 3 without bishops) of Mauretania Caesariana, and 42 of the Sitifiana. We can suppose that, with few exceptions, they had responded to the convocation of *Huneric. Especially the last list gives us an idea of the geographical repartition of the episcopal sees, particularly interesting with regard to the W Caesariana, in which the repartition corresponds perfectly to the criteria of Romanization and militarization of the country. The episcopal sees are placed in the three principal areas of Roman presence: (1) along the sea; (2) on a first line of defense, situated on Albulae (Ain Temuchet), Tasaccora (Sig, once St. Dionysius of Sig), Mina (Relizane); (3) above all, along a second line of military defense, from Numerus Syrorum (Lalla Marnia) to Columnata (Sidi Hosni, formerly Waldeck-Rousseau), passing through Ala Miliaria. These Christian communities could not long survive the disappearance of the Roman military.

PWK 14, 2344-2386; LTK[2] 7, 188-189; EC 1, 393-405 passim; SC 194, 195, 224; Notitia provinciarum et civitatum Africae: MGH, Auct. ant. 3/1, 63-71; S. Lancel, S. Augustin et la Maurétanie césarienne: les années 418–419 à la lumière des nouvelles lettres récemment publiées: REAug 30 (1984) 48-59; Id., II: L'affaire de l'évêque Honorius (automne 419–printemps 420) dans les nouvelles lettres 22, 23* et 23*A*: REAug 30 (1984) 251-262; P.A. Février, Aux origines du christianisme en Maurétanie Césarienne: MEFRA 98 (1986) 767-809; M. Christol - A. Magioncalda, Studi sui procuratori delle due Mauretaniae, Cagliari 1989; N. Benseddik, Nouvelles contributions à l'Atlas archéologique de l'Algérie: L'Africa Romana 7 (1989–1990) 737-751; I. Gui - N. Duval - J.-P. Caillet, Basiliques chrétiennes d'Afrique du Nord, Paris 1992; J.P. Laporte, Deux basiliques chrétiennes de Maurétanie Césarienne Souk-el-khems (Galaxia?) et Tarmount (Aras) et les vestiges chrétiens de la région: Antiquité Tardive 7 (1999) 371-382; N. Duval, s.v. Africa: EAM.

V. Saxer - A. Appella

MAURICE, martyr. Excavations in Agaunum (present-day Saint-Maurice, Valais), at the Great Saint Bernard Pass, have revealed a basilica of the 4th c. (constructed by Bishop Theodore of Martigny (Octodurum) leaning upon the mountain. This basilica was renovated in the 5th c., and stands in the midst of a cemetery of the same period. This is the most ancient witness to the cult of St. Maurice. His name appears in the Mart. hier. for 22 September. Scholars are divided on which to attribute the information to: some favor the Italian recension of the martyrology (after 415), others the Gallican (592). In the mid-5th c. *Eucherius of Lyons wrote the Passio Acaunensium Martyrum (BHL 5737), acc. to which Maurice was primicerius* of the Theban legion martyred under *Maximian; from that period their relics were spread through the West. In 515 the king of Burgundy, *Sigismund, established a monastery in Agaunum, where the Laus perennis was carried out.

BHL 5737-5764; BS 9, 194-205; LCI 7, 610-613; BBKL 17, 918-919; V. Saxer, Parler des martyrs une Bible à la main. L'usage de la Bible dans les Passions des martyrs d'Agaune: Les Échos de Saint-Maurice 21 (1991) 80-115; D. Thurre, Culte et iconographie de saint Maurice d'Agaune: Revue suisse d'art et d'archéologie 49 (1992) 7-18; S.F. Girgis, Saint Maurice, the Commander of the Theban Legion, Bülach 1993; D. Woods, The Origin of the Legend of Maurice and the Theban Legend: Journal of Ecclesiastical History 45 (1994) 385-395.

V. Saxer – S. Heid

MAURISTS. The Benedictine congregation of St. Maur, founded in Paris in 1621, used its centralized organization to promote theological work. Following M. Testière, the founder, G. Tarisse, the soul of the reform, "spent all his efforts to bring about a flowering of the sciences in the congregation." Under his impulse, the abbey of Saint-Germain-des-Près in *Paris rapidly became a center of intense intellectual activity, consecrated to scholarship: a sort of academy for epigraphy, literature and theology in the 17th and 18th c. The library, which was one of the richest in patristic MSS in the world, and which was well cataloged and organized in a user-friendly manner, permitted research and scholarship. The most able religious in the various abbeys were chosen and educated in the mother house, so as to enter into a true group project. This permitted the development of a number of researchers whose names remain connected to the critical editions of the Fathers. The most illustrious was Jean Mabillon (1632–1707), "the most learned man in France." The editorial masterpiece remains that of the works of St. *Augustine (newer editions have now taken their place), carried out by Th. Blampin and P. Coustant. Other editors should be mentioned: J.L. d'Achéry, who published the Spicilegium; J. Du Frische: *Ambrose; Th. Ruinart: the Acts of the martyrs; R. Massuet: *Irenaeus; J. Martinianay: *Jerome; A. Touttée: *Cyril of Jerusalem; P. Coustant: *Hilary and the letters of the popes; D. Le Nourry: *Ambrose; J. Garnier: *Basil; Ch. and V. Delarue: *Origen; B. de Montfaucon: *Athanasius, *Eusebius and *John Chrysostom; P. Maran: *Cyprian and *Justin; Ch. Clémencet: *Gregory of Nazianzus, completed by A.B. Caillau in 1840. The French Revolution suppressed the Abbey.

What is new in the editions of the Maurists is first of all the number of MSS consulted in Paris and in France, but also in Germany, the Netherlands, England, *Italy and *Rome. All the houses of the congregation were involved in the project. For the Greek texts, the apparatus is less rich. J. Garnier consulted some ten MSS for Basil, while there were thousands in the East, in Greece and in Russia.

In these editions, the dubia and spuria are accurately rejected and placed in the appendix. The critical sense was rarely defective. In the choice of variants, the Maurists were concerned more with the content than with the language. They carefully corrected the text with a sure hand and a refined ability, acquired through a long familiarity with the text and thought of the author, rarely equaled by more recent editors. Sometimes theological controversies had a decisive influence in their choices, esp. in the case of St. Augustine.

Despite making progress, the biblical references are not rigorous, but the introductions, notes and indexes, fortunately reproduced by Migne, are still valuable. The exemplary beauty of the typographical characters and the almost perfect correction of the text have been universally recognized. Preuschen stated that they are "the first reliable editions." Despite progress realized afterward, "we will make use of these for a long time still" (J. de Ghellinck).

The Maurists, at first focused on the history of monasticism, quickly enlarged their interests, dedicating themselves likewise to the Gallia christiana and the Acts of the martyrs. They established archives in many collections dedicated to Christian Antiquity: Spicilegium, in 13 vols., ed. by J.L. d'Archéry; Vetera analecta, in 4 vols., ed. by J. Mabillon; Analecta Vetera ed. by B. de Montfaucon; the Thesaurus novus anecdotorum, in 5 vols., ed. by E. Martène. The untiring Mabillon wrote, for the first time, a course in diplomacy, De re diplomatica, which constitutes a milestone in history (1681).

P. Tassin, Histoire littéraire de la Congrégation de S. Maur, Brussels 1770; L. de Broglie, Mabillon et la société de l'abbaye de Saint-Germain-des-Près, Paris 1880, 2 vols.; Id., Montfaucon et les Bernardins, Paris 1891, 2 vols.; R. Kukula, Die Mauriner Ausgabe des Augustinus: SAW 121 (1890) 1-106; 122 (1890) 1-66; 127 (1892) 1-48; 138 (1898) 1-81; DTC 10, 425-443; J. de Ghellinck, Patristique et Moyen Âge, II-III, Brussels 1947–1948; M. Laurain, Les travaux d'érudition des Mauristes: RHEF 43 (1957) 231-271; Cath 8, 966-980; DIP 5, 1082-1089 (bibl.); Les Mauristes à Saint-Germain-des-Prés, Actes du Colloque de Paris (2 déc. 1999), Paris 2001.

A. Hamman

MAURUS of Parentium (4th c.?). Much evidence has emerged by now which shows the falsity of the anonymous legend from Parentium which identified the African monk St. Maurus with the patron of Parentium. The strongest argumentation was offered by the epigraph discovered in Parentium in 1846 under the present-day altar of the Euphrasian basilica: it unequivocally attests to the episcopal dignity of Maurus, and also that he was the local bishop, when it affirms that his body was transferred to the urban basilica of Parentium ubi episcopus et confessor est factus. With regard to his martyrdom, this is attributed to the saint by a constant tradition going back at least to the mid-6th c., despite the epithet of confessor in the epigraph mentioned above; besides that, another acephalous inscription, which can also be dated between the 4th and 6th c., significantly defines his remains as victricia membra.

PCBE 2, 1436f.; G. Cuscito, Cristianesimo antico ad Aquilea e in Istria, Trieste 1977, 124-146; Id., I santi Mauro ed Eleuterio di Parenzo: l'identità, il culto, le reliquie: Atti del Centro di Ricerche Storiche di Rovigno 16 (1985–1986) 33-59; Id., Ancora su Mauro "episcopus et confessor" e sul "locus duplicatus" di Parenzo, in Domum tuam dilexi. Miscellanea in onore di A. Nestori, Vatican City 1998, 185-210.

G. Cuscito

MAURUS of Ravenna (642–673). Archbishop of *Ravenna. He did not have good relations with *Rome. He refused to participate in the Lateran Council of 649, stating as his reason, in his letter to Pope Martin, that the exarch had not yet arrived and the people and army of Ravenna had held him back for fear of the barbarians (PL 87,103). He rejected the Ekthesis and made a profession of faith in the two natures and two wills in Christ. He obtained from the emperor *Constans II, who was in Sicily, metropolitan rights over the bishops of Emilia and Romagna and autocephalous status, which rendered the church of Ravenna independent of Rome (Liber Pont. Eccl. Rav.: PL 106,676). Summoned by Pope *Vitalian, he responded by separating himself from Rome (PL 106, 672; Jaffé 2096-2097), which lasted until his death, in 673. More information on Maurus can be found in the Liber pontificalis of Agnellus (PL 106, 669-671).

CPL 1169; PL 87, 104-105. DTC 9, 303; 15, 3116; A. Guillou, Régionalisme et indépendence dans l'Empire byzantin au VI^e siècle. L'exemple de l'exarchat et de la Pentapole d'Italie, Rome 1969, 147-148; T.S. Brown, The Church of Ravenna and the Imperial Administration: EHR 94 (1979) 11-20; A. Guillou, L'Italia bizantina dall'invasione longobarda alla caduta di Ravenna, in Storia d'Italia, I, Turin 1980, 272-273; 280-281; 295; P. Corsi, La spedizione italiana di Costante II, Bologna 1983; EPapi 1, 606-609.

A. Di Berardino

MAXENTIUS, emperor (d. 312). Marcus Aurelius Valerius Maxentius, son of *Maximian Herculius, married to Valeria Maximilla daughter of *Galerius Caesar. On 28 October 306, he was proclaimed princeps by the Praetorian Guard in *Rome, where he enjoyed a huge following owing to his military achievements and to his shrewd and balanced religious policy aimed at tolerance; he enjoyed the same reputation in the rest of *Italy, *Africa and *Spain. In the spring of 307 he took the title of Augustus. He promoted important public works, including the building of the famous basilica on the Via Sacra. His father, desiring to return to power, wanted Maxentius to be styled Caesar, but only under his own authority as Augustus. Maxentius, confident of his own prestige, rebelled against him. Maximian granted the title of Augustus to *Constantine and gave him his daughter Fausta in marriage. At the encounter in Camuntum, Maxentius was declared a public enemy. He subdued the rebel Domitius Alexander in Africa (308). In 312 he suffered a decisive defeat at the hands of Constantine at the Battle of the Milvian Bridge by the gates of Rome. According to the historian Aurelius Victor (De Caesar. 40, 43) the battle was begun at a place called "ad Saxa Rubra" on the Via Flaminia. While fleeing, Maxentius drowned in the Tiber. From 306 Maxentius did not enforce the decrees of persecution against the Christians. He also intervened in the bitter conflicts of the Christian community in Rome occasioned by the reconciliation of those who had lapsed during the persecution: he exiled Pope *Marcellus. The disturbances did not cease, and so he further intervened, condemning both the new pope *Eusebius and his opponent *Heraclius to exile. Eusebius was sent to *Syracuse on *Sicily, where he died the same year (perhaps 309). At any rate Maxentius's intervention was not an act of persecution against the Christians, but rather an act of public and ecclesial peacemaking in the city of Rome. To Maxentius's credit he began a policy that recognized Christians and restored goods confiscated during the persecution by his father (see SC 195, 540-542).

E. Groag, PWK XIV, 2, 2417-2484; A. Pincherle, La politica ecclesiastica di Massenzio: Studi it. di fil. classica 8 (1929) 131ff.; discussion on the date of the battle of the Milvian Bridge (311?) in P. Bruun, The Battle of the Milvian Bridge: The Date Reconsidered: Hermes 88 (1960) 361-370; D. De Decker, La politique religieuse de Maxence: Byzantion 38 (1968) 472-562; T. Barnes, Constantine and Eusebius, Cambrigde, MA 1981; D. Kienast, Römische Kaisertabelle: Grundzüge einer römischen Kaiserchronologie, Darmstadt 1990, 291-293; B. Kriegbaum, Die Religionspolitik des Kaisers Maxentius: Ann. Hist. Pont. 30 (1992) 7-52; M. Cullhed, Conservator Urbis. Studies in the Politics and Propaganda of the Emperor Maxentius, Stockholm 1994; H.A. Drake, Constantine and the Bishops: The Politics of Intolerance, Baltimore 2000; EPapi1, 313-316.

M. Forlin Patrucco - A. Di Berardino

MAXIMA (Maximilla) and DONATILLA. Maxima and Donatilla were two consecrated virgins of the possessio Cephalitana in Proconsular Africa who suffered martyrdom under *Anulinus. It has been thought since 1889 that the two sisters, together with another Christian woman, were venerated not only as martyrs but also as saints (Sanctas tres Maxima et Donatilla Secunda bona puella . . . ; DAC X, 2769f.). Their martyrdom took place when an imperial decree made it obligatory for all the Christians of the province to sacrifice to the gods in the possessio Cephalitana (per omnem illam provinciam). "Certainly we are not dealing with the Christians of the entire province of Proconsular Africa, nor with those of the city of Thuburbo (as the text that has come down to us might imply), but rather only the rural community of the possessio Cephalitana, a small community under the religious authority not of a bishop, but of priests and deacons" (ST 65, 78). The proconsul Anulinus went into the possessio Cephalitana. Its Christian population apostatized without any resistance out of fear of death. However, two young women, Maxima and Donatilla, were brought before the proconsul for questioning. They refused to apostatize or to sacrifice to the pagan gods. Anulinus had them taken to Thuburbo, where they were condemned to death by the sword. While they were being led to the place of their martyrdom, another young Christian woman, named Secunda, seeing them from her window, came down and joined the condemned. A later interpolator emphasizes that Secunda, after having abandoned and rejected her parents' wealth and all the pleasures of this world, threw herself from a very high balcony and died. As can be observed, this episode of decidedly *Donatist leanings was modified later on by a Catholic hand (see AB [1957] 119-237). The insistence on the immediate death of the young woman is probably an addition by a Donatist interpolator. "The Donatists indeed," writes Franchi de' Cavalieri, "approved of suicide committed for religious reasons, esp. suicide per praecipitium, and accorded those who so killed themselves the honors due to martyrs. However, it is clear Secunda's end did not please a Catholic hagiographer, who a little later thought to change the suicide into an action that was equally heroic but more correct from a Christian point of view" (ST 65, 87). Hence he wrote that the young girl did not die suddenly, but suffered a passio together with Maxima and Donatilla under the executioner's sword at Thuburbo. The later adjustments indicate perplexity about the reason for the condemnation, the trial, the pronouncement and carrying out of the sentence, and the death and burial place of the young women. Other major interpolations further corrupted the ancient text to the extent of making it virtually unrecognizable: unconvincing questions and answers by the interrogator, damnatio ad bestias* and burial in the amphitheater. The text of the passio was published by the Bollandists using the MS of codex 5306 in the Bibliothèque Nationale of Paris and the Martyrology of Adon.

BHL 5809; P. Allard, Storia critica delle persecuzioni, IV, Florence 1928, 417-420; P. Franchi de' Cavalieri, Note agiografiche, ST 65, Vatican City 1935, 75-97; G.D. Gordini, Massima, Donatilla e Seconda: BS IX, 14-15; H. Leclercq, Maxima, Donatilla et Secunda: DACL X, 2769-2774; P. Monceaux, Histoire littéraire de l'Afrique chrétienne, III, Paris 1905, 148-151; G. Ricciotti, L'era dei martiri. Il Cristianesimo da Diocleziano a Costantino, Rome 1953, 121-123.

M.W. Libambu

MAXIMIAN (d. 434). Archbishop of *Constantinople (431–434). Of Roman origin and education, and fellow student with the future Pope *Celestine, he was incardinated in the church of Constantinople during the time of St. *John Chrysostom. After *Nestorius was deposed by the Council of *Ephesus (22 June 431), which was approved by *Theodosius II (August), between the two candidates to succeed him, the learned *Proclus of Cyzicus and the meek Maximian, the people of the capital chose the latter, known for his generosity to the Christian families not able to give a decent burial to their deceased. Ordained 25 October 431 by an episcopal delegation of the Ephesian synod (a delegation in *communion with St. Cyril), he sent his synodal letter (preserved) to Cyril and another letter (lost) to other bishops, including Pope Celestine, insisting on the validity of the Council of Ephesus and the condemnation of Nestorius. His few other acts concern the synodal deposition of four bishops who were followers of Nestorius (*Helladius of Tarsus, *Eutherius of Tyana, *Dorotheus of Marcianopolis and Himerius of Nicomedia) and the restoration of peace between Cyril and *John of Antioch. He died 12 April 434.

CPG 5770-5773; Grumel, *Regestes*², 66-75; G. Dragon, Naissance d'une capitale, Paris 1975, 471; Patrologia V, 28-29.

D. Stiernon

MAXIMIAN, Donatist (4th c.). Related to *Donatus the Great (Aug. Ep. 43, 9.26), Maximian was a deacon of *Parmenian, Donatist bishop of *Carthage. He was excommunicated with three other deacons by *Primian, who succeeded Parmenian in 391 or 392 for reasons unknown to us: perhaps Maximian had been a contender for the succession to the episcopal throne. Surrounding Maximian was a group that managed to gather 43 bishops together to hold a council at Carthage. They summoned Primian to a second council held in 393 at Cabarsussa in *Byzacena, at which about 100 bishops agreed to the deposing of Primian and elected Maximian to replace him. Primian responded with a council of 310 bishops, convoked in 394 at Bagai in *Numidia. Maximian was again excommunicated, together with those who had consecrated him, and the Maximianists were given a deadline to put an end to the *schism: if they did not submit before the prescribed dates, they would be admitted to penance only and deprived of every honor. Primian, having achieved no result, named three of Maximian's consecrators in the proconsul's presence—*Felician of Musti, Praetextatus of Assuras and Salvius of Membressa—to the effect that they should abandon their sees, but without success. A reconciliation with some of the Maximianists took place in 397 after the intervention of the *circumcellions led by Count *Gildo; the latter was allied to the Primianists thanks to the offices of *Optatus of Thamugadi (Timgad). Maximianist bishops presented themselves at the conference of Carthage, but were not admitted (Aug., C. Iul. III, 1, 5). The primary source for our knowledge of this movement is *Augustine (Enarr. in Ps. 36, serm. 2, 19-21. and Books III-IV of the C. Cresc.)

Monceaux 4, 57-62 and 129-132; W.H.C. Frend, The Donatist Church: A Movement of Protest in Roman North Africa, Oxford 1952 (repr. 1971), 215-224; J.-P. Brisson, Autonomisme et christianisme dans l'Afrique romaine de Septime Sévère à l'invasion vandale, Paris 1958, 223-225; E.L. Grasmück, Coërcitio. Staat und Kirche im Donatistenstreit, Bonn 1964, 163-167; A.C. de Veer, L'exploitation du schisme maximianiste par saint Augustin dans sa lutte contre le donatisme, RecAug III, Paris 1965, 219-237; Id., Les origines du maximianisme: BA 31, 825-827; Id., Le concile maximianiste de Cabarsussa: BA 31, 786-789; Id., Le concile primianiste de Bagai: BA 31, 789-791; PCBE 1, 719-722.

F. Scorza Barcellona

MAXIMIAN, emperor (ca. 250–310). Marcus Aurelius Valerius Maximianus, born at *Sirmium about 250. He excelled as a soldier and was made Caesar for the East in 285 by his companion *Diocletian; he was raised to the rank of Augustus in 286; he took the surname Herculius, just as Diocletian had taken Iovius, giving a religious feel to the new institutional attitude toward the empire. He put down a peasants' revolt in *Gaul (the Bagaudae), but did not manage to quell Carausius's insurrection in *Britain (involving the destruction of his fleet in 289). Only later, in 296, did Caesar *Constantius Chlorus bring it under control. He met with Diocletian at Milan in 290/291; in 393 Constantius Chlorus became his Caesar. In 298 he was in *Africa; in 299 he celebrated the vicennalia with Diocletian in *Rome. Having reluctantly accepted abdication in 305, as imposed upon him by Diocletian, he retired to one of his villas, perhaps in Lucania; the success of his son *Maxentius, who was proclaimed emperor by the Praetorian Guard, spurred Maximian on to reclaim his own powers once his son had recalled him. In 307 he went to Gaul and proclaimed *Constantine Augustus and gave him his daughter Fausta to be his wife; in 308 he returned to Rome but was unsuccessful in deposing his son, who in the meantime had been enjoying popularity among the people, and so he returned to Gaul. At the encounter at Carnuntum in 308 he was constrained to abdicate. In 310 he took the purple for the third time and was defeated by Constantine near *Marseille (he appears to have killed himself).

W. Ensslin, PWK XIV, 2, 2486-2516; regarding his retirement, see S. Mazzarino, Sull'otium di Massimiano Erculio: RAL 8 (1953) 417-421; D. Kienast, Römische Kaisertabelle: Grundzüge einer römischen Kaiserchronologie, Darmstadt 1990, 272-277; S. Corcoran, The Empire of the Tetrarchs: Imperial Pronouncements and Government AD 284–324, Oxford 1996; W. Kuhoff, Diokletian und die Epoche der Tetrarchie: das römische Reich zwischen Krisenbewältigung und Neuaufbau (284–313 n. Chr.), Frankfurt a.M. 2001.

M. Forlin Patrucco

MAXIMIAN of Bagai (beginning of 5th c.). Catholic bishop of Bagai (Ksar Baghai), which was a famous center of *Donatism in *Numidia (Aug., C. Cresc. 3, 47); previously, perhaps before he was a bishop, he had been a Donatist, but then joined the Catholic Church. He was the victim of Donatist aggression because of his having managed to obtain the legal restitution of a church in the fundus calvisianus: “While the bishop was at the altar, he was assailed with horrible violence and ferocious cruelty; he was beaten with rods and all manner of weapons and with the very altar table, which had been broken into pieces” (Aug., Ep. 185, 27). After his wounds had healed, he went to the emperor in *Italy to request that violent Donatists be quelled and that Catholics be protected; with other African bishops, he influenced the issuing of the “edict of union” of Feb 405 by *Honorius (CTh 16, 11, 2).

PCBE 1, 723-725; S. Lancel, Saint Augustin, Paris 1999, 407f.

A. Di Berardino

MAXIMIAN of Ravenna (bishop 546–556). On 14 Oct 546 Pope *Vigilius, traveling to *Constantinople for discussion on the *Three Chapters, consecrated Maximian the 27th bishop of *Ravenna. He had been deacon at Pula and was well used to the high circle of the *Byzantine court. The ten years of his episcopate constitute the golden age of the church of Ravenna, which thanks to him was enriched with splendid monuments. Using his Istrian origins, and perhaps also his personal acquaintances, to his advantage, Maximian skillfully managed to make his way into the ecclesiastical province of *Aquileia and to affirm his authority in Istria as the representative of orthodoxy: actually, with Vigilius's absence from *Rome and Dacius's absence from *Milan, he found himself exercising a primatial role over *Italy in order to bring those churches that had embraced the schism of the Three Chapters back to Catholic unity. He also took charge of a collating of liturgical formulas, from which the Leonine *Sacramentary is possibly derived.

PCBE 2, 1446-1453; A. Chavasse, L'œuvre littéraire de Maximien de Ravenne: EphLit 74 (1960) 115-120; G. Cuscito, Cristianesimo antico ad Aquileia e in Istria, Trieste 1977, 286-287.

G. Cuscito

MAXIMIAN of Syracuse (d. 594). A great part of what we know about Maximian comes to us from the Life of Gregory the Great composed by *John the Deacon (PL 75, 59-242) and from the Epistolary of *Gregory the Great (CC 140). According to John the Deacon, Maximian was abbot of the monastery of St. Andrew founded in Rome by Gregory, which he entered while still a youth, dedicating himself to the monastic life there (Life I, 6). His time spent in the monastery fostered close ties between him and Gregory: Maximian accompanied the future pontiff to *Constantinople. When he had become pope, Gregory summoned Maximian, with some other monks, to live out the ascetic ideal with him; then he sent him as bishop to *Syracuse, with extensive powers over the whole of the Sicilian church (Life II, 11; Greg., Ep. II, 5). The letters Gregory wrote to Maximian (Ep. II, 5, 15, 21, 48; III, 12, 50, 53; III, 51; IV, 11, 12, 14, 36, 42) afford a rich account of the life of the Sicilian church and bear witness to the esteem in which the bishop of Syracuse was held by the pope. Maximian died in 594 (Greg., Ep. V, 20).

AASS, Junii II, 241-244; BS 9, 20-21; PCBE 2, 1453-1457.

A. Pollastri

MAXIMILIAN, martyr. Young Christian martyr killed in N *Africa at the end of the 3rd c. The event took place at *Tebessa in 295, acc. to the Passio Sancti Maximiliani, which is the source of our knowledge of Maximilian and considered reliable for the most part. Having been declared fit for duty, Maximilian refused to serve in the army, since for him acting as a soldier (militare) inevitably meant doing evil (mala facere). Notwithstanding all manner of argument by the proconsul Dio Cassius, Maximilian remained firm in his position, was condemned to death and beheaded at the age of 21 years 3 months and 18 days. As far as can be established from the document, we are dealing with a case of objection to military service. Recently, the Irish classicist David Woods has advanced the opinion that the Acta Maximiliani are a later fiction without any historical value for the tradition of the early church regarding military service. In fact, as early as 1965, E. Sandler (in PW, Suppl. vol. X, 680) had expressed the idea that the document was a fake of the 13th c., but without furnishing any proof for his theory. Woods indicated that in his opinion the date of composition was between 384 and 439. In support of this view Woods adduces a series of observations, in particular: the lack of evidence for the martyr's cult until the 11th c.; the historical contradictions, improbabilities and absurdities contained in the text; the assertion that the Passio relies on the later Passio Theagenis. The observations seem unconvincing when one takes account of the historical context (end of 4th c./1st decades of the 5th) in which Woods sets the Passio Maximiliani, and the specific terminology that is very difficult to reconstruct after the passing of so much time. Woods does not consider these two elements; but it is true in any case that the document is controversial, indeed puzzling.

Text of the Passio in H. Musurillo, The Acts of the Christians Martyrs, Oxford 1972 and in Atti e passioni dei martiri, ed. by A.A.R. Bastiaensen - A. Hilhorst - G.A.A. Kortekaas - A.P. Orban - M.M. van Assendelft, Milan 1987, 233-245; P. Siniscalco, Massimiliano: un obiettore di coscienza del Tardo Impero, Turin 1974; P. Brock, Why Did St. Maximilian Refuse to Serve in the Roman Army?: Journal of Ecclesiastical History 45 (1994) 195-209; D. Woods, The Origin of the Cult of St. Maximilian of Tebessa (article of August 1999 is of 3 pages and and can be read on the website www.ucc.ie/milmart/maxorig.html, as referred to by P. Brock in the article The Riddle of St. Maximilian of Tebessa, Toronto 2000 (obtainable from the same author, Dept. of History, Univ. Toronto, Ontario, Canada M5S 3G3).

P. Siniscalco

MAXIMILLA and PRISCILLA (2nd c.) (Priscilla is also called Prisca in *Tertullian). Followers of *Montanus, endowed like him with tongues, ecstasies and inspired speech, on account of which they were called "prophetesses." They were very highly regarded within *Montanism: Montanus and "his women" are often mentioned together as the highest authorities in the movement. They were, it is said, the first to leave their husbands when they were filled with the Spirit (Apollonius in Eus., HE 5, 18,3), in accordance with Montanist practice.

A. Strobel, Das heilige Land der Montanisten, Berlin 1980; A. Jensen, God's Self-Confident Daughters: Early Christianity and the Liberation of Women, Kampen 1996, 133-182 (original German 1992); Ch. Trevett, Montanism: Gender, Authority and the New Prophecy, Cambridge 1996, passim.

B. Aland

MAXIMINUS DAIA, emperor (d. 313). Gaius Galerius Valerius, better known as Maximinus Daia, was made Caesar by *Galerius in May 305 and was confirmed in that role in 308, together with *Constantine I at the meeting at Carnuntum, for the Eastern empire (*Syria and *Egypt) with the title of filius Augustorum. He was proclaimed Augustus (309) and recognized as such by Galerius. On the death of Galerius Augustus in 311, Maximinus took possession of his territory and united the whole of the East under his control. Defeated by *Licinius at Hadrianopolis (*Thrace) in April 313, he fled and killed himself in September of the same year at *Tarsus. He implemented a religious policy that was strictly pagan, having anti-Christian literature distributed in schools and attempting to set up an organization analogous to that of the church. To justify persecution he promoted the wishes of cities to expel Christians. Two inscriptions to that effect and with Maximinus's responses have been found (see Eus., HE 9, 10, 12).

J. Barini, La politica religiosa di Massimino Daia: Historia 2 (1928) 716-730; S. Filosi, L'ispirazione neoplatonica della persecuzione di Massimino Daia: RSCI 41 (1987) 79-91; D. Kienast, Römische Kaisertabelle: Grundzüge einer römischen Kaiserchronologie, Darmstadt 1990, 288f.; S. Mitchell, Maximinus and the Christians in A.D. 312: A New Latin Inscription: JRS 78 (1988) 105-124; O.P. Nicholson, The "Pagan Churches" of Maximinus Daia and Julian the Apostate: JEH 45 (1994) 1-10.

M. Forlin Patrucco - A. Di Berardino

MAXIMINUS (MAXIMIAN) of Anazarbus. Metropolitan of *Cilicia Secunda (5th c.). After having protested in June of 431 against the hasty opening of the council presided over by *Cyril of Alexandria, he shifted at *Ephesus to the side of the synod united behind *John of Antioch, who excommunicated St. Cyril. In the succeeding years, he was strictly allied with the position of the metropolitan of Cilicia Prima, *Alexander of Hierapolis, and was opposed to any attempt at reconciliation with Cyril, even breaking away from John of Antioch. Three letters have come down to us in the Synodicon of *Rusticus (in Latin): one to Alexander of Hierapolis on the conciliar position adopted by John of Antioch, another to Alexander on the defection of John of Germanicia and of *Andrew of Samosata, and a third to seek support at the synod that Maximian convoked at *Anazarbus in 433 to excommunicate Cyril again until such time as he signed the condemnation of the anathemas. Notwithstanding his pro-*Nestorian intransigence, he was not included in the list of bishops exiled for their opposition to the union of 433. He may have died before being affected by the relevant imperial decrees.

CPG 6449-6453; PG 84, 675, 721-725, 773-774; Patrologia V, 180-181, 184.

D. Stiernon

MAXIMINUS of Sinita (d. before 411). *Augustine, having been recently ordained priest, wrote a letter (Ep. 23, in 392/393) to Maximinus, the *Donatist bishop of Sinita, a place not far from *Hippo. He asked him his reasons for having "rebaptized" a Catholic deacon and invited him to an open debate. After some years Maximinus was converted to the Catholic Church when Augustine was in Sinita; in 407, they began together a journey of preaching to reestablish ecclesial unity. According to Dolbeau, Sermon 360—from among the sermons grouped together with Augustine's, which is by a Donatist convert who publicly makes amends for his fault—could have been composed by Maximinus. On the same occasion, Augustine's recently discovered sermon (Dolbeau 27, Magonza 63) was preached, in which Augustine says: "Even my revered brother and colleague Maximinus has been converted to the Catholic Church" (27,3: NBA 35/2, p. 737).

PCBE 1, 728; F. Dolbeau, Par qui et dans quelles circonstances fut prononcé le Sermon 360 d'Augustin?: RBen 105 (1995) 293-307; Id., Augustin d'Hippone, Vingt-six sermons au peuple d'Afrique retrouvés à Mayence, ed. and comm., F. Dolbeau, Paris 1996, 304-310; S. Lancel, Saint Augustin, Paris 1999, 247f.

A. Di Berardino

MAXIMINUS of Trier (d. 346). Bishop of *Trier in the 4th c. and defender of Nicene orthodoxy. Maximinus procured the return to Alexandria of *Athanasius, who had been exiled to Trier, as well as the return of *Paul, bishop of Constantinople, to his see. With the aid of Pope *Julius I and of *Ossius, bishop of Cordoba, he also succeeded in having the Council of *Serdica convoked in 342/343. The information in the first Life of Maximinus (8th c.) is probably false when it states that a council held at Cologne on 12 May 346, presided over by Maximinus, deposed *Euphratas, *Arian bishop of that city (CCL 148, 27-29). Maximinus died on 12 Sept 346 at Mouterre-Silly (near Loudun). According to his Life, Maximinus was transferred to Trier and buried by *Paulinus his successor in the basilica of St. John the Evangelist, which later took his name and became a Benedictine abbatial see (the Mart. hier. gives 29 May as the date of burial).

BHL 5822-5827; BS 9, 33-34; LCI 7, 619-620; BBKL 18, 893-895; N. Gauthier, Topographe chrétienne des cités de la Gaule des origines au milieu du VIII^e siècle, 1, Paris 1986, 28-30; A. Neyses, Die Baugeschichte der ehemaligen Reichsabtei St. Maximin bei Trier 1-2, Trier 2001; H. Heinen et al., Im Umbruch der Kulturen, Trier 2003.

V. Saxer - S. Heid

MAXIMINUS the Arian (ca. 360/365–after 440). Maximinus is unique among Latin *Arians in that we are able to piece together something of him as a person. Born around 360–365 of *Roman rather than *Gothic parentage, he was bishop of an Arian community possibly in Illyricum, and was in *Africa in 427 among barbarian troops sent there to serve Rome. It was on this occasion that he had a public debate with *Augustine at Hippo (427 or 428). Only with difficulty can he be identified with the Arian leader of the same name in Sicily in 440. The Dissertatio Maximini contra Ambrosium is a composite text found in the Cod. Paris. 8907, and contains various Arian testimonies that comment on the Council of *Aquileia in 381. It was put together by Maximinus in about 395. The Collatio Augustini cum Maximino is a verbatim account of the discussion at Hippo in 427 or 428: in it Maximinus expounds at length the Arian doctrine inherited from *Wulfila and shows himself impervious to Augustine's refutation: it is a very important text for knowledge about Western Arianism. Various works found in the Cod. Veron. LI have been attributed to Maximinus by B. Capelle, which were previously thought the work of *Maximus of Turin. Three tractatus are doctrinal in nature, contra haereticos, iudaeos, paganos: by "heretics" Maximinus means Catholics whose teaching on the equality of the divine persons is at odds with traditional Arian arguments. Less polemical are 15 homilies preached by Maximinus on important feast days (Epiphany, Easter, Ascension) or on the commemorations of the martyrs (St. Peter, St. Paul, St. Stephen, St. Cyprian): Maximinus frequently cites St. *Cyprian's writings in various of his works. A third category of writings is made up of 24 short Expositiones de capitulis evangeliorum, explanations of gospel passages of varying length and with no systematic arrangement: they deal with passages taken out of a larger context for use in the liturgy of some Arian churches. The interpretation of the sacred text does not ignore *allegory, but it has a preference for being literal. Recently, several works have been attributed to Maximinus, but without convincing reasons: the Opus imperfectum in Matthaeum and a Commentarium in Iob of Arian authorship; on the other hand, the attribution to Maximinus of the Cod. Veron. LI and the homogeneity of its collected texts has been called back into doubt by R. Gryson (CCL 87, XIXf.). He believes some of these texts were written in *Vandal Africa.

CPL 692-702; PL 57, 781-806, 829-832; PLS I, 691-763; SC 267; CCL 87; Patrologia III, 90-93 (bibl.); J.M. Hanssens, Massimino il Visigoto: Scuola Cattolica 102 (1974) 475-514; M. Meslin, Les Ariens d'Occident, Paris 1967, 92-250; G.M. Vian, Predicazione ed esegesi nell'arianesimo latino: la raccolta di Verona: AnSE 11 (1994) 533-544; Ibid., Ortodossia ed eresia nel IV secolo: la cristologia dei testi ariani di Verona: Augustinianum 35 (1995) 847-858.

M. Simonetti

MAXIMINUS THRAX, emperor (173–238). Gaius Julius Verus Maximinus, born in *Thrace, Roman emperor 235–238. Son of a shepherd, he had a military career and came to power after he had *Alexander Severus murdered, together with his mother in *Germany. With Maximinus came an unforeseen interruption in Severus's policy of tolerance toward Christians. His brief persecution was not of a religious nature, but rather political and personal: he wished to strike at those who formed the familia of Alexander Severus (Hist. Aug., Vita Maximini 9,7-8), "whose household was made up largely of Christians" (Eus., HE 6, 28). Those affected, among others, were Pope *Pontianus, *Hippolytus of Rome, and two friends of *Origen, the deacon Ambrose and the priest Protoctetus. According to some scholars, there was not a genuine and proper edict of persecution in 235: in the same year, the emperor became convinced that Christians, as such, did not constitute a political opposition and the "persecution" was ended. Furthermore, one ought to bear in mind that Maximinus, beset by military problems in the provinces that always kept him far from *Rome, did not have a religious policy (coins from his reign show the continuance of sun cults). In 238 the Senate declared him a public enemy: his own soldiers killed him at *Aquileia.

G.M. Bersanetti, Studi sull'imperatore M. il T., Rome 1940; A. Calderini, I Severi. La crisi dell'impero nel III secolo, Bologna 1949, 127-132; A. Bellezza, M. il Trace, Genoa 1964; G.W. Clarke, Some Victims of the Persecution of Maximinus Thrax: Historia 15 (1966) 445-453; P. Keresztes, The Emperor Maximinus' Decree of 235 A.D.: Between Septimius and Decius: Latomus 28 (1969) 601-618; R. McMullen, Christianizing the Roman Empire A.D. 100–400, New Haven 1984; M. Sordi, I cristiani e l'impero romano, Milan [2]1990; M. Christol, L'empire romain du III[e] siècle. Histoire politique (192–325 après J.-C.), Paris 1997; S. Roda, Profilo di storia romana. Dalle origini alla caduta dell'Impero d'Occidente, Rome 2001.

L. Navarra

MAXIMUS (d. after 416). Catholic bishop of an unknown see, probably serving the proconsul, who signed the synodal letter of the Council of *Carthage in 416 (Aug., Ep. 175, CSEL 44, 653), and possibly wrote to *Theophilus bishop of *Alexandria (Ep. Ad Theophilum, PLS I, 1092-1095) before 412, in order to inform him of decisions that were made in light of the crisis arising from the barbarian invasions. Unless it were another individual of the same name, Maximus may also have been the recipient of a letter from *Augustine, which is known to us only from the testimony of *Possidius (Operum S. Augustini elenchus 17, ed. A. Wilmart, Misc. August. II, 183).

P. Courcelle, Histoire littéraire des grandes invasions germaniques, Paris 1964, 60-64; PCBE I, 737.

P. Marone

MAXIMUS, antignostic. An antignostic writer of the 2nd c., whom we have knowledge of only because he is mentioned by *Eusebius (HE 5, 27) along with several other antignostic authors of the same period. According to Eusebius, Maximus's writings addressed the problem of the origin of evil and that of the creation of matter. None of his works have survived.

C. Gianotto

MAXIMUS, bishop of *Jerusalem (d. 348?). Sentenced to the mines during the time of persecution under *Maximinus Daia in *Palestine, though when precisely is not known (i.e., whether before or during the period in which Maximinus Daia was emperor [311–313]), Maximus suffered various tortures which deprived him of an eye and left him with a mutilated left foot. Having survived this ordeal, which he endured for the Christian faith, Maximus acquired the title of confessor (homologētēs).

After his liberation he was consecrated to God. A date for his consecration, however, cannot be determined, and as a consequence it is not known whether he accompanied Bishop *Macarius of Jerusalem to the *Council of *Nicaea (325). Although historians are not unanimous in recognizing a first episcopal appointment of Maximus to the diocese of Diospolis, they do agree that he was the successor of Macarius to the see of Jerusalem, without, however, concurring on an exact date for this appointment. It is certain, in any case, that Maximus participated in 335 in the Synod of *Tyre, which was intended to resolve the case of *Athanasius of *Alexandria, and that he let himself be dragged into the company of accusers. He apparently modified his position afterward, because he did not participate in the semi-*Arian synod of *Antioch in 341, he fully adhered to the decisions of the Council of *Serdica in 343 (although it is not possible to affirm that he personally attended), and, above all, he officially and solemnly welcomed Athanasius, who had returned from exile, in a synod called for this very purpose in Jerusalem in 346.

Although Maximus might appear somewhat timid and ingenuous, he has always been considered faithful to the *orthodoxy of Nicaea and unfavorable to the Arians and semi-Arians of the time. Further proof of this is found in diverse claims which have circulated about a deposition of Maximus by *Acacius of *Caesarea (the metropolitan which had oversight of Jerusalem at the time). It seems that Acacius was unsuccessful in his attempt at deposing Maximus, and thus that Maximus remained in his see until his death, the date of which is also a matter of discussion. The year 348 can be accepted as most likely.

Acacius and his party did not entirely give up: they fervently opposed the nomination (and consecration) of *Heraclius, a candidate chosen by Maximus and a recognized anti-Arian, in favor of the installation of *Cyril to the post, a man they believed more favorable to the course which they represented.

It is interesting to note that in 335, during his pontificate, Maximus moved the cathedral of Jerusalem from Mount Zion to the martyrium of Calvary. He also initiated work on the towering basilica of Holy Zion.

Maximus has been included in the number of saints venerated in Jerusalem. He is considered such also by the Latin Church.

BS 9, 48-57; M. Simonetti, La crisi ariana, Rome 1974 (see index); R.P.C. Hanson, The Search for the Christian Doctrine of God: The Arian Controversy, 318–381, Edinburgh 1988, 398ff.

J.-M. Sauget

MAXIMUS, martyr. From martyrologies and hagiographical documents it is possible to create of list of twenty-five martyrs with the name Maximus, but only a few of them are likely to be historical. With regard to some we know only their name: (1) the martyr of *Sirmium, 15 July (Mart. hier., p. 376); (2) Maximus of Cyzicus, inscribed 6 Feb in the Synaxarion of *Constantinople (Syn. Ecc. CP. cols. 447-448); (3) Maximus the Illyrican, 18 Aug (ibid., cols. 907-908); (4) Maximus of *Caesarea in Cappadocia, mentioned by the *Syriac martyrology on 18 Tišrin (Mart. hier., p. 607). Of others we have more secure information, but of variable reliability. This applies, e.g., to (5) Maximus, a young martyr of an African group, a victim of the *Vandal persecution, 2 July 483 (*Victor of Vita, Hist. pers. Afr. Prov., CSEL 8, 108-114); (6) the lector of Durostorum, who died together with two companions during the persecution of *Diocletian (H. Delehaye, Saints de Thrace et de Mésie: AB 31 [1912] 272). But for the great majority, historical facts have been obscured by legend. Such was the case for many Roman martyrs named Maximus, among whom it is sufficient to name: (7) he who appears in the legend of St. *Cecilia (Mart. hier., pp. 43, 47, 104, 146); (8) the priest and martyr commemorated on 19 Nov (H. Delehaye, Étude sur le légendier romain, Brussels 1936, 44-45). Some have been duplicated, through the multiplication of places of veneration, such as (9) the martyr of *Apamea, venerated at Cumae (H. Delehaye, Hagiographie napolitaine: AB 57 [1939] 38; R. Calvino, Una inedita inscrizione cristiana rinvenuta a Cuma: Asprenas 7 [1960] 235ff.); (10) a Greek martyr, inscribed with different dates in different martyrologies: 6 and 7 April, 14 May and 19 Nov in Mart. hier. It is impossible to determine the date of his martyrdom and the place of his burial (BS 9, 37-39; 47; 73; 76-82; Cath 8, 993-994); (11) the companion of *Anthimus on the Via Salaria (Mart. hier., pp. 247-248), with whom the companion of Castus and *Magnus should perhaps be identified (ibid., 487-488), and the copatron of the cathedral of Penne (F. Lanzoni, Le Diocesi d'Italia, Faenza 1927, 370-371); (12) the Thracian martyr of 15 Sept or 19 Feb (H. Delehaye, Saints de Thrace et de Mésie, cit., 244).

S. Acerbi, Conflitti politico-ecclesiastici in Oriente nella tarda antichità: il II concilio di Efeso (449), Madrid 2001, 144, 283.

E. Prinzivalli

MAXIMUS of Antioch (5th c.). Patriarch of *Antioch. He was successor to *Domnus, who was deposed by the Robber Council of *Ephesus (449). He should perhaps be identified with the Antiochene deacon named Maximus who was hostile to *John of Antioch, accusing him of weakness toward the *Nestorians. *Cyril wrote this deacon two letters encouraging greater moderation (Ep. 57-58). Maximus strove to have his suffragan bishops subscribe to the Tomus ad Flavianum and was recognized for his efforts by Pope *Leo. He participated in the Council of *Chalcedon (451), where he appealed the excommunication of his predecessor on principles of humaneness. In a meeting 26 Oct he subscribed a compromise with *Juvenal of Jerusalem regarding their respective jurisdictions, yielding the three Palestines to the new patriarchate of *Jerusalem, but retaining *Phoenicia and *Arabia (Mansi VII, 178-183). In 455/456 he was deposed by the *monophysites. He was succeeded by *Basil.

S. Acerbi, Conflitti politico-ecclesiastici in Oriente nella tarda antichità: il II concilio di Efeso (449), Madrid 2001, 144, 283.

E. Prinzivalli

MAXIMUS of Riez (5th c.). Maximus was the second *abbot of the *cenobium of *Lérins and then bishop of Riez. Beyond passing references in *Eucherius of Lyons, *Sidonius Apollinaris, *Honoratus of Marseille (*Vita Hilarii) and *Gregory of Tours, his fame was spread by a *homily (Homilia Maximi), included in the so-called collection of *Eusebius Gallicanus but definitely written by *Faustus of Riez, as well as by a Vita S. Maximi of *Dynamius Patricius that was redacted around 585, packed with fabulous tales and essentially lacking in historical value. No longer very young, Maximus arrived at Lérins in some year prior to 427–428, if we assume that he was recognized and chosen by *Honoratus to be his successor; Honoratus was the abbot of the cenobium who now departed to become the bishop of *Arles. Maximus remained as abbot for seven years. Around 434, after having evaded the requests of numerous dioceses, he became the bishop of Riez (Homilia Maximi 1 and 8). He participated in the *Council of *Riez (439), First Council of *Orange (441), the Council of *Vaison in 442 and the third Synod of Arles. We do not know the date of his death.

BHL II, 855-856, nos. 5852-5853, 5857; Faustus, Homilia Maximi = Eusebius Gallicanus, Collectio Homiliarum, ed. F. Glorie, CCL 101, Turnhout 1970, 401-412; Dinamius, Vita sancti Maximi, episcopi Reiensis, ed. S. Gennaro, Catania 1966; A.C. Cooper-Marsdin, The History of the Islands of the Lerins, Cambridge 1913, 228-230; E. Griffe, La Gaule chrétienne, II, Paris [2]1966, 260-262; S. Pricoco, L'isola dei santi. Il cenobio di Lerino e le origini del monachesimo gallico, Rome 1978, 48-49; F. Prinz, Frühes Mönchtum im Frankenreich, Darmstadt [2]1988, 54-55; R. Nouailhat, Saints et Patrons. Les premiers moines de Lérins, Paris 1988, 163-164.

S. Pricoco

MAXIMUS of Saragossa (d. ca. 620). *Isidore of Seville (Vir. ill. 46) places among the leading lights of *Spain Maximus bishop of *Saragossa, who died around 620, of whom we know only that he participated in the provincial councils of *Barcelona and Egara (now *Terrassa), in 599 and 614. To Maximus are attributed many works in prose and in verse, among which are a brief history of Spain under the rule of the *Goths. Yet out of all his writings, only a few fragments of his historical works have come down to us, transmitted through the margins of the *codices of *Victor of Tunnuna and *John of Biclaro, edited by Mommsen under the title Chronicorum Caesaraugustanorum reliquiae (MGH IX, Chronica minora, II, 222-223). Under the description of Maximus Caesaraugustanus, Migne (PL 70) presents a letter of a Portuguese bishop that relates to the Chronicon and the table that follows immediately thereafter.

CPL 2267; Schanz IV/2, 630; Moricca III/2, 1491 (bibl.), 1520; Domínguez del Val IV, 455-456.

V. Loi and B. Amata

MAXIMUS of Turin (I) (d. after 412). Of Maximus we know only from *Gennadius of *Marseille (Vir. ill. 41); other information is inferred from his *sermons. Gennadius refers to him as bishop of *Turin and informs us that he died "while *Honorius and *Theodosius the Younger were reigning" (408–423); one can therefore suppose that he was born around the middle of the 4th c. In reality he was not of Turin (Serm. 33,1: "from the day when you first began to see me in your midst"), and we do not know from where and when he arrived. If he did not personally know *Ambrose of Milan (d. 4 April 397), he certainly pondered his writings, as is evident from the traces which we find left behind in the sermons. That he was a disciple of bishop *Eusebius of Vercelli (d. 1 August 371) has been confirmed on the basis of two sermons (7 and 8), yet these are not treated as authentic in the critical edition. Certainly he was bishop of Turin in September of 398, when a synod of bishops from N *Italy and *Gaul convened (Serm. 21 and 78). It appears that he was still alive in 412, if there was in this year the eclipse of the *moon of which he speaks in sermons 30 and 31 (see Gallesio, 9-10). Of no help in pinpointing the chronology are the allusions to the barbarian invasions that menaced the city of Turin and the region of Piedmont, extending from the beginning of the 5th c. until the fall of the empire. Around the end of the 5th c., his remains were deposited in the new basilica of Collegno, a few kilometers from Turin. Gennadius makes a list of his works in 28 titles, some of which really constitute a sermon (tractatus, liber, homiliae*) composed by Maximus, and he claims to have read many others that he does not recall, on various subjects. In PL 57 that reproduces the 1784 edition of B. Bruni, under the name of Maximus there occur 240 "homilies" or "sermons," in addition to an appendix containing works considered dubious or spurious (6 tractati, 31 sermons, 3 homilies and 2 epistles). The recent critical scholarship treats around a hundred of the sermons as authentic, the brevity of each one leading to the conclusion that they are extracts or summaries (see Opitz and Heggelbacher; see the end bibl.) on diverse subjects. In the vast majority of cases they follow the *liturgical year: Advent, *Nativity, Calends of January, *Epiphany, *Lent, *Easter, *Pentecost. Quite a few commemorate the *saints: *John the Baptist; the *apostles *Peter and *Paul; *Cyprian of Carthage; *Lawrence of Rome; the martyrs of Turin: Solutor, Adventor and Octavius; the *Roman martyrs Cantius, Cantianus and Cantianella; the martyrs of Trent: *Sisinnius, Martyrius and Alexander; as well as martyrs and saints in general. Some of the sermons comment on passages of the OT or of the NT, treating them generally as starting points for the exposition of moral themes. Whether of general interest or arising from particular occasions, these themes are also treated in other sermons that do not offer commentary on a particular pericope of *Scripture.

A *pastor more than a *theologian concerned with speculation, Maximus considers *preaching above all as a medicine for healing the wounds of the *soul and for bringing about *conversion. "*Prayer, acts of mercy and *fasting": the "weapons" that he recommends to the members of his diocese, frightened by the incursions of the barbarians, indicate the essential features of the Christian lifestyle. Prayer must be practiced not only on *Sunday, a day that remembers the Lord's resurrection, but on every day, morning and evening, with praise and thanksgiving, as a means of elevating the spirit and of obtaining necessary help from God. On fasting, above all during all of Lent, Maximus is very strict, with the condition that it is accompanied with a commitment to interior renewal and that whoever deprive themselves of something should be generous in helping the needy. It is above all with *almsgiving that one obtains the *forgiveness of *sins.

Maximus severely chastises the hypocrisy of Christians who observe the fast but, oblivious to the fact that their servants are brothers and sisters in Christ, treat them in an inhumane way. He is no less severe with the public officials who tolerate corruption out of financial greed, and even more severe with the vultures who buy up at a low price from the barbarian invaders the bounty of their raids. Other abuses denounced by the bishop are the *superstition that induces hysterical behavior among the crowds when they see a lunar eclipse, the persistence of *pagan cults particularly in the countryside and the indifference of Christians who should strive to eliminate them. Although admitting that some church officials behave in an exemplary manner, he does not neglect to harshly reprimand those who fail to attend church and those who allow themselves to become entangled in worldly business rather than attending to their work of ministry, or those who exploit the ministry as a source of profit and react badly when the bishop reproaches them.

More attentive to moral problems, by temperament and out of a sense of necessity in dwelling on this area, Maximus speaks as a master of the *faith. Although on guard for lingering traces of *Arianism, he does so not for the sake of entering into theological controversies but for the sake of edification, reclaiming received truths esp. through *commentary on the biblical texts. In his preaching, a noteworthy place is occupied by the vision of the church, the church of the saints, above all of *Mary, whose *virginal motherhood he exalts. In the sermons based on the annual cycle, the *liturgy is a matter for *meditation on the *mysteries which are being commemorated. Particularly significant is the way in which Maximus reflects on the *sacraments of *baptism and *Eucharist. He "displays the ability to transport his audience to the very place from which the sanctifying energies of the Christian sacrament burst forth: the very person of Christ and his salvific work all addressed to us. He contains within himself a prefigurement of the entire sacramental *economy," through which "Christ can be and has been directly called sacramentum" (Visentin, 40; Heggelbacher, 17). Theological reflection finds a continual basis in the *Bible acc. to the normative criteria of the age, making the widest use of *typology and of *allegory: indeed, Gennadius praises Maximus for his constant attention to the divine Scriptures. Yet this method does not strip the meaning of a theology that contains an internal coherence, even though it is not systematic.

He pastored a young church, being recently disconnected from the church of Vercelli that had been represented by *Eusebius. He also stood as one of a handful of fearless defenders of the *Nicene faith and of the person of *Athanasius of Alexandria, and heroically resisted the will of the emperor *Constantius II, who was a patron of Arianism. He knew how to give life to a community that, despite the deficiencies in religious practice and moral conduct denounced by the bishop himself, shows itself to be aware and alive. Not lacking a solid theological formation despite claims to the contrary, Maximus was above all a pastor attentive to the civil and religious situation in which he operated. He occupied himself with the struggle to eliminate the residual elements of paganism in the Christian community, to win over to the faith the rural populations who still held onto paganism, to warn the faithful against seductive *heresies and above all to help them live out fully their profession of faith. He strove to realize this goal with assiduous, Christ-centered preaching, in a practical way deducing from the Word of God directions for daily conduct. His clear and decisive language stirred up resentment among some in his audience, esp. within the *clergy. Yet the toughness is balanced by overtones of sincere and tender affection, as when he thinks it necessary to justify his absences, assuring the faithful that even then he carries them in his heart.

CPL 220-226b, PLS 3, 351-379; PL 57, 221-760 (B. Bruni 1784: still the standard work); A. Mutzenbecher: CCL 23 (1962) (an indispensable ed.); G.E. Ganss, Selected Sermons of Saint Maximus and Saint Valerian's Homilies, FC 17, Washington D.C. 1965; F. Gallesio, Sermoni di s. Massimo di Torino, Rome 1975. Studies that assume that the one and the other Maximus are identical, or that refer without critical comment to the edition of B. Bruni, have a limited value. U. Moricca, La storia della letteratura latina cristiana III/1, Turin 1932, 1023-1031; E. Crovella, Massimo vescovo di Torino, BS 9, 65-72; C. Benna, S. Massimo di Torino: Rivista Diocesana Torinese 2 (1934) 47-50, 62-67, 102-109, 121-124, 140-145, 185-191; H.G. Opitz, Maximus von Turin: PWK Supplementband VI, 290 (posits a single Maximus, denying the validity of Gennadius); P. Bongiovanni, S. Massimo vescovo di Torino e il suo pensiero teologico (diss., Pontificio Ateneo Salesiano), Turin 1952; A. Mutzenbecher, Zur Überlieferung des Maximus Taurinensis: SE 6 (1954) 343-372; Id., Bestimmung der echten Sermones des Maximus Taurinensis: SE 12 (1961) 197-293; Id., Der Festinhalt von Weihnachten und Epiphanie in den echten Sermones des Maximus Taurinensis: SP 95 (TU 80), Berlin 1962, 109-116; M. Pellegrino, Sull'autenticità d'un gruppo di omelie e di sermoni attribuiti a S. Massimo di Torino: Atti dell'Accademia delle Scienze di Torino 90 (1955/1956) 1-113; Id., Intorno a 24 omelie falsamente attribuite a san Massimo di Torino: SP 1 (TU 63), Berlin 1957, 134-141; Id., La tipologia battesimale in San Massimo di Torino: l'incontro con la Samaritana e le nozze di Cana: RSLR 1 (1965) 260-268; P. Visentin, "Christus ipse est sacramentum" in S. Massimo di Torino, in Miscellanea G. Lercaro II, Rome 1967, 27-51; O. Heggelbacher, Das Gesetz im Dienste des Evangeliums: über Bischof Maximus von Turin, Bamberg 1968; C.E. Chaffin, The Martyrs of the Val di Non: An Examination of Contemporary Reactions: SP 10 (TU 107) 1970, 263-269; G. Rossetto, La testimonianza liturgica di Massimo I, vescovo di Torino, in Ricerche storiche sulla Chiesa Ambrosiana, I, Milan 1970, 158-203; A. Sáenz, La celebración de los misterios en los sermones de san Máximo de Turín (diss., S. Anselmo, Rome), Buenos Aires 1970 (see Stromata 25 [1969] 351-411; 27 [1971] 61-103); J.P. Bouhot, Note sur trois sermons anonymes: REAug 20 (1974) 135-142 (CPL 1157 of Maximus of Turin); R. Étaix, Trois nouveax sermons à restituer à la collection du Pseudo-Maxime: RBen 97 (1987) 28-41; Id., Homéliaires patristiques, Paris 1994, 539-558; RAC V, 1094-1095; PCBE II/2, 1469-1470; A. Merkt, Maximus I. von Turin: Die Verkündigung eines Bischofs der frühen Reichskirche im zeitgeschichtlichen, gesellschaftlichen und liturgischen Kontext, Leiden 1997; F. Trisoglio, La preghiera in S. Massimo di Torino: SEA 66 (1999) 419-431; Id., L'esegesi biblica in S. Massimo di Torino: SEA 68 (2000) 655-673; Id., Pietro e Paolo in S. Massimo di Torino: SEA 74 (2001) 315-333.

M. Pellegrino

MAXIMUS of Turin (II) (5th c.). At a synod of *Milan in 451 and at one of *Rome in 465, there was in attendance a Maximus, bishop of *Turin. Many historians, treating as erroneous or modifying the *chronologies provided by *Gennadius of Marseille (see *Maximus of Turin [I]), identified him with the Maximus of whom these chronologies speak and through whom the literary inheritance has reached us. Today there is wide recognition of the existence of a second Maximus bishop of Turin, to whom is attributed the speech given probably in 453, on the occasion of the dedication of the ecclesia maior of Milan, after the destruction caused by the invasion of the *Huns in 452. Such a work commemorates the tragic events in which nevertheless can be seen the *justice and *goodness of God toward his *children. Explaining that the church as the people of God has greater value than the church as a building, the speaker exhorts his audience to the commitment of the Christian life and to *hope. He does so while acknowledging the bishop *Eusebius of Milan, who, returning after fleeing in the face of the invaders, has been able to restore this church now being dedicated, and he prays to the Lord to save and bless his people. It is a vibrant discourse of *faith and of pastoral sensibility from a bishop who participates in the affairs of the sister-city church with a noble, clear and vigorous style.

F. Dell'Oro, Il discorso "in reparatione ecclesiae Mediolanensis" per la solenne dedicazione della "ecclesia maior" nell'anno 453: Archivio Ambrosiano 32 (1977) 267-301 (where the earlier bibl. is carefully examined); PCBE II/2, 1471-1472.

M. Pellegrino

MAXIMUS the Confessor (ca. 580–662).
I. Life - II. Works - III. Doctrine.

I. Life. According to the Vita published in the PG, written in Greek and the earliest and most traditional source of information about the Confessor—albeit in strongly celebratory tones—Maximus was born in *Constantinople around 580 to a noble family close to the emperor. He completed a detailed and thorough course of study from 610 to 614, the year in which he entered the monastery, and he served as secretary to Emperor *Heraclius. In 1973, however, there was published a *Syriac Vita of Maximus, attributed to George of Resh'aina, dating from the 7th or 8th c., and of *monothelite provenance. According to this text Maximus, whose real name was Moschion, was born in Hesfin, in *Palestine, from the illegitimate union of a Samaritan merchant and a Persian woman. He was afterward entrusted to the abbot *Pantaleon of the Palestinian monastery St. *Charito, who was involved in 6th-c. controversies over *Origenism. He received the name Maximus and was initiated into Origenism.

It has been demonstrated that the Syriac Vita is the more trustworthy of the two; however, one can also easily reconstruct events in Maximus's life from the point at which he can be found in the monastery of Philippicus, in Chrysopolis, near Constantinople. There, in about 618, Maximus was acquainted with the monk *Anastasius, who became his faithful disciple and followed him in confession of the faith. In about 624–625 he left the monastery of Chrysopolis in order to enter that of St. George of Cyzicus. This was perhaps the period of composition of his earliest important works: the letter on charity to John the Chamberlain (evidently known at court), the Libro ascetico, the Centuries on Charity and the Quaestiones et dubia. Around 626 the attack of the Persians and the Avars forced Maximus to travel to Crete, where he defended Chalcedonian orthodoxy against certain *monophysite bishops. He then established himself in the monastery Eucretas in *Africa, close to *Carthage, where he met, among other exiles, *Sophronius, the future patriarch of *Jerusalem and champion of orthodoxy in the earliest phase of the monothelite controversy.

The early years of Maximus's sojourn in Africa were probably quite peaceful, and he wrote during this period almost all of his better-known works: the Ambigua ad Iohannem, the Quaestiones ad Thalassium, the Commentary on Our Father, the Mystagogia, the Quaestiones ad Theopemptum, the Centuries on Theology and Economics, as well as some pamphlets and letters. He also established relations with certain governors in Africa, Peter the Illustrious and George, who stood against monophysitism. Beginning in 633, however, Maximus became involved in the controversy over monoenergism. *Sergius, the patriarch of Constantinople, instructed *Pyrrhus, *hegumen of the monastery of Philippicus, to exhibit to Maximus the Psephos, which was a declaration by Sergius—a partial correction to the Pact of Union of the same year in which he had confessed "one energy alone," i.e., the sole divine operation of Christ—calling on *Cyrus patriarch of *Alexandria not to permit anyone to speak about either one or two energies in Christ, while maintaining at the same time a preference for monoenergism. The controversy also had political motivations: the emperor sought a formula which would facilitate the reconciliation of all Christians and would permit the monophysites of *Syria and *Egypt to reunite with the church, thus consolidating the empire and improving defense against Persian threats. Maximus was not convinced, and invited Pyrrhus to explain the notion of "energy" in relation to the certainty of Christ's two natures in hypostatic union. Maximus found himself increasingly involved in the controversy, and from 638, the year in which Sophronius died and the emperor promulgated the Ekthesis, an exposition of the faith in monothelite terms, he found himself decidedly on the front lines. From this point forward his writings were entirely dedicated to polemics and deeper insight into these theological questions, always in defense of *Chalcedonian dogma. For Maximus, denial of Chalcedon constituted the root of the new heresy, because monoenergism and monothelitism were nothing but newer versions of monophysitism.

An important moment in the controversy was the public dispute held in Carthage in 645 between Maximus and Pyrrhus. We possess the full text of this dispute. In 646 Maximus traveled to *Rome, where already several popes, in particular *John IV, had condemned the Ekthesis. The emperor *Constans II, a supporter of monothelitism, in an attempt to end the controversy, promulgated in 647 the Typos, which forbade discussion on the question of the number of wills in Christ. But Pope *Martin I, recently elected, convened the Lateran Synod in Oct 649, without the consent of the emperor, at which the Typos was condemned. Maximus, though only a monk, participated actively in this labor, drafting some of the Acts, and even signing the decisions of the synod. Confronted with a refusal to compromise on the part of Pope *Martin and of Maximus, and after several failed attempts to gain their support, the emperor, in about 653, had them arrested and brought to Constantinople. Martin was tried, publicly exposed in the pillory, imprisoned in 654 and died in exile in Sept of 655. Maximus was tried in May of 655, and exiled to Bizya in *Thrace. Following further, and vain, attempts on the part of the emperor to induce Maximus to accept a compromise, he was first deported to Perberi, then in 662 he underwent a second trial and was condemned by a monothelite synod to flogging and amputation of his right hand and tongue, the organs with which he had defended his doctrine. He was finally deported to Lazica on the shores of the Black Sea, where he died on 13 Aug 662. The Third Council of Constantinople, the sixth ecumenical, rehabilitated and canonized his doctrine on the two wills and energies of Christ in 680.

II. Works. The following works probably date to the years 624–626: the *Capita de caritat*e, four centuries of opinions in which charity is presented as the synthesis of all the commandments as well as the very nature of God, and in which anthropological themes are intertwined with others of a theological-metaphysical nature; the Liber asceticus, a dialogue between a young brother and an older monk in which the theme of agape is developed; some Quaestiones et dubia.

Almost all of his major works most likely date to the time of his stay in Africa, before the monothelite controversy: the Mystagogia (a symbolic-mystical interpretation of the liturgy and architecture of the place of worship), the Quaestiones ad Thalassium (on various topics, like the quaestiones et responsiones), the Quaestiones ad Theopemptum, the Orationis dominicae brevis expositio (an explanation of the Our Father), the Ambigua ad Iohannem (perhaps the most important work written from a speculative point of view, in which he addresses issues of various kinds: the doctrine of the *Trinity, *Christology, *soteriology, apophatic and cataphatic theology, refutation of Origenism and other errors, exegetical questions and questions of a spiritual nature), collected and published along with the shorter Ambigua ad Thomam, in which he discusses problems concerning the Trinity and the *incarnation, and recovers, contra monophysitism, ps.-*Dionysius's expression "theandric energy." Also dating to these years are the Capita theologica et oeconomica (in which again fundamental issues are addressed: the transcendence of God, the temporality and spatiality of the creature, the ways of perfection, the mystical ascent, the metamorphosis of the Logos, *eschatology); the Epistula secunda ad Thomam that further clarifies the themes of the Ambigua, and many of the Letters.

Directly related to the fight against heresy are the majority of the Opuscula theologica et polemica and the Disputatio cum Pyrrho, consisting of the Acts of the public dispute that Maximus and Pyrrhus sustained at Carthage in 645 in the presence of ecclesiastical and civil authorities in North Africa. In this dispute Maximus demonstrates that he has already developed a mature and complete doctrine of the will. At the end of the dispute Pyrrhus recognized his error. He seems later to have followed Maximus to *Italy, where he publicly renounced his former beliefs, only to return to them once he was established at *Ravenna near the imperial exarch. Also attributed to Maximus is a Life of the Virgin existing in *Georgian translation, though he no longer receives consistent credit for a pamphlet titled De anima. Annotations on the Corpus areopagiticum, received under the name Maximus, are now generally attributed to *John of Scythopolis, though it is difficult to establish the authorship of them. It is generally denied today that the Confessor is the actual author of a series of Hymns collected under his name in the PG.

III. Doctrine. The Cappadocians, ps.-Dionysius and *Evagrius are the most direct sources of Maximus's thought, but he knew well the entire Greek patristic tradition, including Origen, and pagan philosophy, esp. *Aristotle and the *Neoplatonists. The hinges of Maximus's thought are undoubtedly the defense of the christological dogma of Chalcedon and the idea of the participation of all beings in the Logos. The economy of salvation is based on the incarnation of the divine Logos, the reality of which is continually affirmed in defense of the dogma of Chalcedon against the monophysites and monothelites through stringent logical and psychological analysis. He demonstrates that the monothelites, building on the error of monophysitism, confuse nature with the hypostasis, and so fail to distinguish between absolute opposition and relative contrariety with respect to the will. The will, a natural faculty, is not to be confused with its operation, with the direction impressed upon it by the hypostatic tropos. The nature (a concept coinciding in part with that of Logos) is dynamic, and is endowed with operation, and each nature has its own corresponding operation. But the hypostasis imparts to the natural operation the tropos, orientation and determines the unification. So in Christ, a complete man provided with an entire human nature, there must be recognized a human will, in perfect accord with the hypostatic divine tropos, but not a gnōmē, a term referring to a will in the condition of fallen nature, subject to uncertainty and oscillation. Maximus also incorporates the Dionysian notion of theandry, interpreting it precisely as the union completed by the hypostasis of the two natures and operations, not confused but inseparable. Maximus also develops the traditional theme of the deification of humanity in relation to the christological foundation of creation and redemption.

The historical incarnation of the Logos in Christ is preceded and prepared by the "incarnations" of the Logos in the logoi of beings created at the time of creation and in the logoi of Scripture. This threefold incarnation produces an economy of salvation which is not motivated solely by the fall of humanity but is capable of furnishing the key to comprehend the significance of the entire cosmos. Through the incarnation of Christ, and the mediation between various levels of nature, in which humans also participate, the work of recapitulation is completed, i.e., the return of the Logos to the natural logoi. In the divine Logos, the logoi of all creatures regain their principle of union with God. In this sense also the role of the church, which unites humans and returns them to God together with the entire universe, is understood. Maximus was a precursor and inspirer of the decisions of the Council of Constantinople in 680 and a champion in the fight against heresy in the last great christological controversy during which he decidedly took the side of the Church of Rome, which affirmed that Maximus "holds the keys of the orthodox faith and confession," and opposed the attempts of the empire to control the church. He was a teacher of spirituality, and a philosopher and theologian capable of elaborating a comprehensive vision of theology, cosmology and anthropology, and of formulating a vocabulary adequate to the defense of orthodoxy. Maximus has been transmitted to the West through the translations of John Scotus Eriugena and has remained a point of constant reference for the theology and spirituality of the East, from *John of Damascus to Gregory Palamas to the great Orthodox theologians of the 20th c.

CPG 7688-7721. Editions: almost all the works are collected in PG 90 and 91; also: Epistula secunda ad Thomam, ed. R. Canart: Byzantion 34 (1964) 427-445; Vita siriaca, ed. S. Brock: AB 91 (1973) 299-346; Life of the Virgin: CSCO 478-479, ed. M.J. van Esbroeck, Louvain 1986. Other editions: Critical text of the Ambiguum 47, ed. E. Jeuneau, in Jean Scot, Commentaire sur l'Évangile de Jean, SC 180, Paris 1972, 390-394; Expositio in psalmum LIX, ed. P. Van Deun, Maximi Confessoris opuscula exegetica duo, CCG 23, Turnhout 1991, 3-22; Expositio orationis dominicae, CCG 23, 27-73; Mystagogia. Text ed. G.C. Sotiropoulos, Ἡ μυσταγωγία τοῦ ἁγίου Μαξίμου τοῦ ὁμολογητοῦ, Athens 1978; Quaestiones ad Thalassium, ed. C. Laga and C. Steel, CCG 7, Turnhout 1980, and CCG 22, Turnhout 1990; Quaestiones ad Theopemptum, ed. M. Gitlbauer, Die Überreste griechischer Tachygraphie im Codex Vaticanus Graecus 1809, Vienna 1878; Quaestiones et dubia, ed. J.H. Declerck, CCG 10, Turnhout 1982; Liber Asceticus, ed. P. Van Deun, Turnhout 2000; Ambigua ad Thomam una cum epistula secunda ad eundem, ed. B. Jannsens, CCG 48, Turnhout 2002 (Eng. tr,).

Translations: It.: Capita de caritate, in A. Ceresa-Gastaldo (ed.), Capitoli sulla carità, Rome 1963; Disputatio cum Pyrrho, in Umanità e divinità di Cristo, ed. A. Ceresa Gastaldo, Rome 1979, 99-156; Mistagogia, tr. by R. Cantarella, in S. Massimo Confessore. La Mistagogia ed altri scritti, Florence 1931; Liber asceticus in ibid. and in Umanità e divinità di Cristo, ed. A. Ceresa Gastaldo, Rome 1979, 23-62; Ambigua, ed. C. Moreschini, Milan 2003; Fr.: Disputatio Byziae, tr. by J.-M. Garrigues, in Le martyre de saint Maxime le Confesseur: Revue thomiste 76 (1976) 427-447; Relatio motionis, ibid., 415-424; Epistula ad Anastasium monachum discipulum, ibid., 444-445; Quaestiones ad Thalassium, tr. by E. Ponsoye (ed. J.C. Larchet), Paris-Suresnes 1992; Ambigua, tr. by E. Ponsoye (ed. J.C. Larchet), Paris-Suresnes 1994; Expositio orationis dominicae, ibid., 63-93; Epistulae, tr. by E. Ponsoye (ed. J.C. Larchet), Paris 1998; Opuscula theologica et polemica, tr. by E. Ponsoye (ed. J.C. Larchet), Paris 1998; Quaestiones et dubia, tr. by E. Ponsoye (ed. J.C. Larchet), Paris 1999; Eng.: The Ascetic Life; The Four Centuries on Charity, ed. P. Sherwood, New York 1955; The Earlier Ambigua of S.M.C., tr. by P. Sherwood, Rome 1955; Ambigua to Thomas and Second Letter to Thomas, tr. by J. Lollar, Turnhout, 2009; Spanish: Centurias sobre la caridad, intr. by A. Costa, tr. by P. Sáenz, Victoria 1990.

Studies: The bibl. for Maximus has gradually expanded, esp. in recent times. Here mention is made only of classic studies or, among recent ones, those which are more broad: I. Hausherr, Philautie. De la tendresse pour soi à la charité selon M.C., Rome 1952; P. Sherwood, The Earlier Ambigua of Saint M.C. and His Refutation of Origenism (Studia Anselmiana 36), Rome 1955; H.U. von Balthasar, Kosmische Liturgie. Das Weltbild Maximus' des Bekenners, Einsiedeln 1961 (It. tr. Milan 1976); W. Völker, Maximus Confessor, als Meister des geistlichen Lebens, Wiesbaden 1965; L. Thunberg, Microcosm and Mediator: The Theological Anthropology of M.C., Lund 1965 (Chicago-La Salle [2]1995); L. Thunberg, Man and the Cosmos. The Vision of St. M.C., Crestwood, NY 1984. For bibl. prior to 1987 refer to: M.L. Gatti, Massimo il Confessore. Saggio di bibliografia generale ragionata e contributi per una ricostruzione scientifica del suo pensiero metafisico e religioso, Milan 1987. Dopo il 1987: D. Staniloae, Commento agli 'Ambigua,' Paris-Suresnes 1994, 373-540; J.-C. Larchet, La divinisation de l'homme chez Maxime le Confesseur, Paris 1996; B. De Angelis, Natura, persona, libertà. L'antropologia di M.C., Rome 2001; J.C. Larchet, S. Maxime le C., Paris 2003.

B. De Angelis

MAXIMUS the Cynic (d. after 382). Charlatan archbishop of *Constantinople (380–382). Of Alexandrian origin, he claimed to be a Cynic philosopher converted to Christianity and a *confessor who had been scourged for the faith. In reality he had been tried several times and ultimately exiled for shameful crimes.

In *Corinth he led an immoral life masked by false asceticism. Returning from exile and arriving in Constantinople toward the end of 379, he was welcomed with joy by *Gregory of Nazianzus, who was at that time bishop of the capital's Nicene minority and was unaware of Maximus's past. Gregory made the self-styled homologētēs with the "magnificent red hair" his intimate friend and confidant, even praising him in public, though without naming him (Orat. 25). Following this Maximus seems to have gone to *Alexandria in order to gain the confidence of Archbishop *Peter, succeeding to the point that Peter sustained, against Gregory, Maximus's candidacy as the legitimate bishop of Constantinople. He returned to the capital, where he gained the support of sailors and Egyptian bishops, and he was ordained secretly in the Anastasia one night in 380 when Gregory of Nazianzus was ill. Encountering hostile public opinion, he went to Emperor *Theodosius I, then in *Thessalonica (before 24 Nov), in order to obtain imperial support, but Theodosius was faithful to Gregory of Nazianzus and did not recognize his claim. Maximus then returned to Alexandria, where Peter, now convinced of Maximus's ambitious intentions, managed to get rid of him only with the help of the secular arm. The Council of Constantinople (381) examined his case and declared in its fourth canon that Maximus had never been a bishop. Expelled from the city, he presented himself to the Western bishops meeting at *Aquileia on 3 Sept 381, St. *Ambrose presiding, and succeeded in taking advantage of the good faith of the assembly, who supported him against *Nectarius, who had been elected by the Council of Constantinople as archbishop of that city. St. Ambrose even wrote on his behalf to the emperor. Later, however, being better informed, Ambrose abandoned Maximus, who was subsequently rejected by the Synod of *Rome in 382. The date of Maximus's death is not known. His book Against the Arians*, which St. Jerome praised (De viris illustribus, 127), has not survived.

P. Gallay, La vie de saint Grégoire de Nazianze, Lyon-Paris, 1943, 159-170; J. Mossay, Note sur Héron-Maxime, écrivain ecclésiastique: AB 100 (1982) 229-236; F. Trisoglio, Sant'Ambrogio e Massimo il Cinico, in Nec timeo mori, Atti del Conv. Intern. di studi ambrosiani, ed. by L.F. Pizzolato and M. Rizzi, Milan 1998, 787-793.

D. Stiernon

MEDICINE, Lecture on. In room I of the catacomb of Via Dino Compagni we find a fresco which is unique in paleo-Christian iconography (Ferrua, plate 111). At the center of a group of people there is an elderly figure with a short shaggy beard, wearing a pallium like a Cynic; he has a serious expression, and is looking to his left, his right hand apparently pointing toward the image extending beneath him. To the left and right, on two levels, are young men also wearing palliums, seated in various ways. One of these, seated in the middle of the right-hand group, is touching the left arm of a nude male figure with a thin virga, extended flat on the ground and with an opening in his stomach. According to Ferrua, who published the discovery initially, the scene represents a lecture on medicine, or more precisely on surgery, since the figure lying on the ground seems alive, so representing the profession of the dead man buried there. There was immediate opposition to this view, followed by other scholars (Picard, Klauser, Corner, Proskaner) who suggested instead the creation of the first man (Hemple) or the representation of resurrection (Carcopino, Marrou, Artelt, Fink). Others, finally, identified in the fresco a philosophical meeting with Aristotle (Boyancé) or Socrates (De Bruyne). This interpretation, independent of the identification of the central figure with the pallium, is today considered most likely, above all when we consider the maiestas Domini depicted on the back of the opposing niche: on one side historic philosophy, on the other the true philosophy (Bisconti).

A. Ferrua, Le pitture della nuova catacomba di via Latina, Vatican City 1960 = Id., Catacombe sconosciute. Una pinacoteca del IV secolo sotto via Latina, Florence 1990; F. Bisconti - B. Mazzei, Il cubicolo di Sansone nell'ipogeo di via Dino Compagni alla luce dei recenti interventi di restauro: Mittelungen zur christlichen Archäologie 1 (1995) 45-73 (updated bibl.).

D. Calcagnini Carletti

MEDITATION. In Antiquity, the term meditation did not refer to a kind of prayer which was purely mental, but to a personal assimilation brought about through the continual recitation in a low voice of the sacred words drawn from the liturgy and lectio divina. Scripture (e.g., Josh 1:8; Ps 1:2) invites us often to repeat its words; likewise the law, in order to have it always on our mouth and in our heart (Heb. hagah). Along with the recitation of the text as it is, there are obviously also elementary and spontaneous invocations which constitute the material which the prophets use. In Lk 2:19, 51 *Mary is said to have "treasured in her heart" words and events. The exegesis of *Origen explains meditation with ruminatio, characteristic of pure souls.

Meditation carried out during manual labor and during movement was a characteristic practice of the *Pachomian monk, who must have therefore memorized a large portion of Scripture. The tendency of the spiritual, of whom *Evagrius is the personification, was to go increasingly beyond attention to the words and concepts in order to concentrate on the simplicity of God. *John Cassian speaks in this way of meditatio spiritualis, action which belongs at the same time to the mouth and to the heart (Inst. II, 15,1). Even less than in the case of the lectio this is not so much a curious activity of the intelligence, but rather exercising vigilance over the intellect to a degree that goes beyond the complications of artificial technique. Even if the prayer of later orthodoxy is not entirely identical with this meditation, it is its authentic continuation. The luminous simplicity of this ruminatio on the divine word, far from inhibiting the cognitive faculties, has, in the course of the centuries, stimulated and guided them, in the same measure in which they sacrifice their own desires and ambitions so as to subject themselves to revealed models.

DSp 10, 906-914; E. von Severus, Das Wort Meditari im Sprachgebrauch der hl. Schrift: Geist und Leben 26 (1953) 365-375; H. Bacht, Meditatio in den ältesten Mönchsquellen: Geist und Leben 28 (1955) 360-373; F. Ruppert, Meditatio-Ruminatio: Erbe und Auftrag 53 (1977) 83-93 (= Coll. Cist. 39 [1977] 81-93); B. Stock, Augustine the Reader: Meditation, Self-Knowledge and the Ethics of Interpretation, London 1996.

J. Gribomont

MELANIA the Elder (ca. 340–before 408). A Roman matron, she became a widow at a young age, and then dedicated herself to an ascetical life. Around 372/373, leaving in *Rome her six-year-old son, Publicola, she traveled to Palestine passing through Egypt, where she met numerous ascetics and perhaps *Rufinus of Aquileia. She founded a monastery on the Mount of Olives. She lived an austere life, dedicated to the study of Greek Christian authors, among whom were *Origen, *Basil of Caesarea and *Gregory of Nazianzus. She was in contact with Rufinus, *Evagrius of Pontus and *Palladius. She returned to *Italy after about 30 years, in 399/400, in order to assist her granddaughter *Melania the Younger and *Pinianus, and then left again for *Sicily, and later for *Africa, where she stayed with *Augustine. Finally, she went to *Jerusalem, where she died, perhaps shortly before 408.

Jerome, Ep. 3,3; 4,2; 39,5; 45,4-5; 143,2; Rufinus, Apologia c. Hieronymum 2; Paulinus of Nola, Ep. 28; 29; 31; 45; Palladius, Hist. Laus. 38; 46; 54; 55 (ed. C. Butler); DCB 3, 888f.; F.X. Murphy, Melania the Elder: A Biographical Note: Traditio 5 (1947) 59-77; PCBE 2, 1480-1483.

A. Pollastri

MELANIA the Younger (380/383–439). Born in 380/383 to the son of *Melania the Elder and his wife *Albina. Due to the opposition of her parents she was unable to dedicate herself to the monastic life, as she would have desired. She was given as spouse to *Pinianus, whom, after the birth and early death of two sons, she convinced to live in continence, supported in this intention by her grandmother Melania (the Elder). In spite of the opposition of her parents and of the senatorial class, in accord with Pinianus she sold possessions and valuable objects several times in order to help the poor, free slaves, and support churches and monasteries. In 407, at Nola, she celebrated, together with Albina and Pinianus, the feast of St. *Felix with the bishop *Paulinus, who praises her in Carm. 21 (vs. 833-844: CSEL 30, 185). In 408–409, accompanied again by Pinianus and Albina, she left for *Sicily, where she was in contact with *Rufinus of Aquileia. Following the sack of *Rome in 410 and fearing the approach of the *Goths, the group went next to *Africa and stayed with Bishop *Alypius in *Thagaste, where they received a letter from *Augustine (Ep. 124). The next year they went to *Hippo. In 417, Melania the Younger embarked, again with Pinianus and Albina, for the Holy Land, and they established their home in *Jerusalem. There the three met *Pelagius, whom they had already known in Rome, and in 418 they sent a letter to Augustine in order to inform him of Pelagius's desire to return to the church, and to intercede for him. Augustine responded by dedicating to them De gratia Christi et de peccato originali, in order to put them on guard against the ambiguities of Pelagius. They also visited Bethlehem, where they met *Jerome and the Egyptian monks. Finally, Melania the Younger went to Jerusalem, to the Mount of Olives, where she lived an ascetical life for 14 years. When Albina died, she founded a feminine monastery with 90 virgins, and when Pinianus died, she founded a masculine monastery at the church of the Ascension. After a trip to *Constantinople, which she took in order to meet her maternal uncle and convince him to abandon the pagan religion and receive baptism, she died in Jerusalem 31 December 439, the day on which she is commemorated in the Mart. rom. When she was at the point of death, the monk and priest *Gerontius to whom Melania the Younger committed the responsibility of directing all the monasteries which she had founded, wrote her Life (SC 90). Another source for Melania the Younger is *Palladius (Hist. Laus. 61: ed. C. Butler).

DCB 3, 889; DACL 11, 209-230; L. Perrone, La chiesa di Palestina e le controversie cristologiche, Brescia 1980, passim; PCBE 2, 1483-1490.

A. Pollastri

MELCHIZEDEK. Though mentioned only twice in the OT (Gen 14:18-20; Ps 110:4), Melchizedek was already an object of speculation within the pre-Christian Jewish tradition (e.g., 1 QapGen 22, 13-17; 11 QMelch; *Phil. Alex., Leg. All. III, 79-82; De congr. 99; De Abr. 235; Joseph., Ant. Jud. I, 179-181; Bel. Jud. VI, 438-439). Due esp. to the letter to the Hebrews (ch. 7), which refers to Melchizedek in order to demonstrate the universality of the priesthood of Christ and his superiority in comparison with the Levitical priesthood, Melchizedek acquired great importance within Christian tradition. In the course of the 2nd c., he was at the center of an intense controversy between Jews and Christians, who used him to claim the primacy of the priesthood. As it was impossible for official rabbinism to claim Melchizedek in an exclusive manner, it ended up abandoning him to its adversaries, but not without depriving him of his priestly dignity, which was said to have passed over to Abraham (bNed 32b). The fathers of the church, following Heb, developed esp. the christological interpretation of Melchizedek (e.g., *Just., Dial. 33, 1-2; *Tertull., Adv. Marc. V, 9; *Orig., Com. Joh. I, 11; XIII, 146; XIX, 118; *Eus., Dem. ev. IV, 15,33-39; V, 3,7.13-20; *John Chrys., In ep. ad Haebr.). Independent of Heb, interpretation was developed in a eucharistic sense of the offering of the bread and wine by Melchizedek (e.g., *Clem. Alex. Strom. IV, 161,3; *Cypr., Ep. 63,4). At the same time there were heterodox speculations among the sects, considering him a heavenly "power" superior to Christ ("Melchizedekians": in *Epiph. Pan. LV, 1 = the group of *Theodotus the banker; in ps.-*Hippol., Elench. VII, 35-36; ps.-Tertull., Adv. Haer. 8; *Filast., Haer. 22.24), or even identifying him with the *Holy Spirit (Hieracas the Egyptian: in Epiph., Pan. LVII, 3,2-4). This tendency to consider Melchizedek a heavenly being, already present in Qumran (11QMelch) and, acc. to information given by *Jerome (Ep. 73,2), as well as in *Origen and *Didymus, reappears in *gnostic sources (NHC IX, 1: Melchisedek; II Jeu chs. 45-46; Pistis Sophia, chs. 25,27,112,128,131,139-140), where an important soteriological role is attributed to him. Traditional iconography developed the theme of the offering of the bread and wine as a symbol of the eucharistic sacrifice (S. Apollinare in Classe, Ravenna: mosaic, 4th c., where Melchizedek appears with Abel, Abraham, and Isaac; S. Vitale, Ravenna: mosaic, 6th c., where Melchizedek appears next to Abel) and the theme of the meeting with Abraham (in the Abraham cycles: S. Maria Maggiore, Rome: mosaic, 5th c.).

G. Bardy, Melchisédech dans la tradition patristique: RBi 35 (1926) 496-509; 36 (1927) 24-45; G. Wuttke, Melchisedech der Priesterkönig von Salem. Eine Studie zur Geschichte der Exegese, Giessen 1927; H. Stork, Die sogenannten Melchisedekianer mit Untersuchungen ihrer Quellen auf Gedankengehalt und dogmengeschichtliche Entwicklung, Leipzig 1928; M. Simon, Melchisédech dans la polémique entre juifs et chrétiens et dans la légende: RHPhR 17 (1937) 58-93; F.L. Horton, The Melchizedek Tradition: A Critical Examination of the Sources to the Fifth Century A.D. and in the Epistle to the Hebrews, London 1976; C. Gianotto, Melchisedek e la sua tipologia. Tradizioni giudaiche, cristiane e gnostiche (sec. II a.C.–sec. III d.C.), Brescia 1984; B.A. Pearson, Melchizedek in Early Judaism, Christianity and Gnosticism, in M.E. Stone - T.A. Bergen (eds.), Biblical Figures Outside the Bible, Harrisburg, PA 1998, 176-202.

C. Gianotto

MELETIUS of Antioch (d. 381). Of Armenian origin, friend of *Acacius of Caesarea, he was elected bishop of *Sebaste (Armenia) to take the place of the deposed *Eustathius (358 or 360). Due to the opposition of the people, who were faithful to Eustathius, however, he left his see and went to Beroea. He participated, either as bishop or as presbyter, at the Council of *Seleucia (359) in the ranks of the Acacians, and when, around the end of 360, the see of *Antioch was left vacant because of the transfer of *Eudoxius to *Constantinople, he was elected through the influence of Acacius. But a few months later, in a homily on Pr 8:22 delivered in the presence of *Constantius, he proposed an interpretation of the text which clearly tended in an anti-Arian direction, so that the *homoians dominating at the time had him deposed and exiled into Armenia. As the homily was formally in keeping with the formula of *Rimini (359), his exile must have been justified by adducing some pretext we do not know about, of an administrative or disciplinary nature. He returned to his see at the death of Constantius (362) and reorganized his community, which was more numerous than either the Arian community led by *Euzoius or that of the Nicene traditionalists led by *Paulinus (*schism of Antioch).

In 363 he presided at a small council at Antioch of homoian and *homoiousian proponents from *Syria, *Palestine and *Asia Minor, who accepted the Nicene *homoousios but gave it a homoiousian interpretation. When *Athanasius, shortly thereafter, went to Antioch to meet with him, Meletius avoided the meeting, since he was still influenced by the old enmity between Acacius and Athanasius.

The pro-*Arian politics of *Valens constrained him to go into exile twice, in 365 and 369. He returned definitively to his see upon the death of Valens (378). The exile added to his prestige as an anti-Arian leader and, even more, the fact that *Basil of Caesarea took his side (against Paulinus, Athanasius and the West) in the schism of Antioch and supported him with his influence.

A council of ca. 150 bishops, united at Antioch in 379, confirmed the role of Meletius as head of the Eastern episcopal see, in spite of the lack of the agreement of the West (and of *Egypt) concerning the Antiochene schism. On this occasion, he attempted to form an agreement with Paulinus, which we are not well informed of, and which had no result.

He presided over the Council of *Constantinople in 381, which sanctioned the triumph of his approach and that of Basil, who had recently died. He himself died while the work of the council was going on, after having solemnly installed *Gregory of Nazianzus as bishop of Constantinople.

CPG II, 3415-3425; F. Cavallera, Le schisme d'Antioche, Paris 1905; Simonetti 592-593; F. Dünzl, Die Absetzung des Bischofs Meletius von Antiochien 361 n.Chr.: JbAC 43 (2000) 71-93; L.L. Field, On the Communion of Damasus and Meletius: Fourth-Century Synodal Formulae in the Codex Veronensis LX, Toronto 2004.

M. Simonetti

MELETIUS of Mopsuestia. Anti-Cyrillian bishop of *Cilicia II (5th c.). He was next to *John of Antioch at the synod of *Ephesus (431) which excommunicated *Cyril of Alexandria. Returning from Ephesus, he took part in the Synod of *Tarsus, which renewed the excommunication and was opposed to every attempt at reconciliation which did not involve the condemnation of Cyril's anathemas and the insertion of the name of *Nestorius in the diptychs, which is clear from the correspondence which he had with *Alexander of Hierapolis (five letters) and with *Theodoret. John of Antioch, who had deposed him because of his obstinacy, asked the emperors *Theodosius II and *Valentinian to exile him from Cilicia. He was therefore sent into exile in Melitene in Armenia, where he suffered much from the bishop *Acacius and where he died on an unknown date.

PG 6455-6467; PG 84, 706-707, 739-740, 752, 756-760, 769, 771-773, 777, 784-789, 794-796; PWK 15, 503; Patrologia V, 184-185.

D. Stiernon

MELITENE, Council of. Melitene or Metilene (Μελιτήνη, Melitene; today near Malatya), a city of *Cappadocia, was promoted by *Trajan (98–117), who made it the capital of *Armenia Secunda. Probably in 358 a council was held there in which *Eustathius, the bishop of *Sebaste, was deposed. He promoted forms of *monasticism which included excesses and oddities, and supported *subordinationist doctrines concerning the *Holy Spirit. *Basil the Great first admired Eustathius but later became gradually colder toward him to the point of an open rupture over the question of the Holy Spirit. Basil informs us in his letter 79 (and later in 163) Ad Occidentales that Eustathius was deposed by that council. He was succeeded by *Meletius, the future bishop of *Antioch. Since, in 359, Meletius participated in the Council of *Seleucia, the Council of Melitene must be placed in 358 or the year after. The term Melitense or Metilense (concilium) has erroneously led some to believe that the council was held in *Malta (Melita), but this hypothesis has no foundation in tradition. In 557 Melitene was the scene of the Byzantine victory over the Persian emperor *Chosroes I.

N. Coleti, Sacrosancta concilia ad regiam editionem exacta, I-XXIII, Venice 1728–1733, 2, col. 879; Mansi 1, 191; Palazzini 3, 97-99; Simonetti 411; J.-R. Pouchet, Basile le grand et son univers d'amis après sa correspondence, Rome 1992.

C. Nardi

MELITIUS of Lycopolis – MELITIAN SCHISM (4th c.). The Melitian *schism was caused by the last persecution in Egypt, which lasted from 303 until 312 with alternate periods of repression and tolerance. It was provoked by conflicting opinions about the position to take toward Christians who, after having renounced their faith in weakness, immediately sought to be readmitted into the community of the faithful. We are informed about this schism mainly by *Epiphanius (Panarion 68), but his evidence does not appear to be fully reliable.

While persecution was still going on and *Peter I of Alexandria was imprisoned with the other bishops, Melitius acted as a spokesman for the rigorist tendencies toward the lapsi in opposition to Peter's moderation. They arrived at schism as soon as Melitius began to ordain bishops into sees that sat vacant because of the imprisonment or absence of the rightful holders. In this manner he was challenging and weakening the rights of the bishop of Alexandria over the other Egyptian churches. Peter, briefly at liberty before his final imprisonment and martyrdom, took strict measures against the fierce and numerous schismatics, who organized themselves into their own church. The schism continued under Peter's successors in the see of Alexandria, *Achillas and *Alexander; in at least some schismatic circles there emerged a developing opposition among indigenous *Copts against the Hellenizing element.

The *Council of *Nicaea (325) took moderate measures against the schismatics: Melitius retained his office on the condition that he would not perform any more ordinations, and other bishops, priests and deacons retained their respective offices after having newly received the *laying-on of hands by Alexander. At the death of Achillas and Alexander, however, the Melitians sought to block the election of *Athanasius and the violent struggle resumed. Athanasius acted with severity and also with violence to the injuries caused by the schismatics, among whom the bishop *Arsenius and the priest Ischyras were particularly culpable. Twice the Melitians, guided by *John Arkaph (Melitius having died), brought an accusation of violence to *Constantine (332–334) against Athanasius, but without result. Finally the Melitians formed a union with the *Eusebians. At the Council of *Tyre (335), Arsenius and Ischyras's case against Athanasius was vindicated by his sentence and deposition. But the succeeding events, in which Athanasius established himself as a champion of the Egyptian church and the Orthodox against the *Arians and the emperor, greatly increased his prestige. As Athanasius rose in prominence, the Melitian position weakened. Gradually, they lost their vitality and importance.

E. Schwartz, Die Quellen über den melitianischen Streit, in Gesammelte Schriften 3, Berlin 1959, 87-116; F.H. Kettler, Der melitianische Streit in Aegypten: ZNTW 35 (1936) 155-193; H.I. Bell, Jews and Christians in Egypt, 2 vols., London 1924; A. Camplani, In margine alla storia dei meliziani: Augustinianum 30 (1990) 313-351; A. Martin, Athanase d'Alexandrie et l'Église d'Égypte au IV^e^ siècle (328–373), Rome 1996, 219-389; BBKL 5, 1213-1219.

M. Simonetti

MELITO of Sardis (2nd c.)

I. Writings - II. Doctrine.

One of the most important people of the 2nd c. and exponent of "Asiatic" culture (which accentuates corporeity and the "monist" conception of the universe). He united in himself hierarchical and charismatic authority as bishop, ascetic (see Polycrates, cited by *Eus., HE 5,24,2-8; also 4,13,8 and 26,1) and prophet (see *Tertullian, cited by *Jerome, De Vir. Ill. 24). Around 170 he addressed an apology to *Marcus Aurelius. He visited the Holy Land in order to study the OT canon. He followed the *quartodeciman practice of Easter; he brought out the christological and soteriological aspect of this feast in his Paschal Homily. A productive theologian, renowned and read in later periods, he wrote many works (more than 20) on a variety of topics, but almost all have been lost.

I. Writings. *Eusebius compiled a list (HE 4, 26,1-14). Among those writings which have not come down to us are the Eclogues, a collection of scriptural testimonia concerning Christ; two books On Easter; On the Way of Life and the Prophets; On the Church; Treatise on Sunday; On Human Faith; On Creation; On the Obedience of Faith; On the Senses; On the Soul and Body; On Baptism; On Truth; On the Birth of Christ; On Prophecy; On Hospitality; The Key; On the Devil; On the Apocalypse of John (which is perhaps exegetical); and finally, On the Incorporeal God. Perhaps he also wrote a treatise On the Cross (see the frag. in *Syriac). The fragments coming from the catenae have been gathered by M.I. Routh, Otto (for the Syriac texts) and Goodspeed (for the Greek texts only): for their identification see O. Perler DSp 10, 980. Some fragments of the Apology have been passed down by Eusebius (HE 4, 26-27): Melito juxtaposes the coming of Christ and the beginning of the empire of *Augustus and sees a possible collaboration between the empire and the church. He presents Christianity as "our philosophy," thus as a speculative existential proposal, comparable to Hellenistic philosophies. A homily On the Soul and Body has come down to us almost complete (in Greek, in Coptic), which recent scholarship (see T. Orlandi) has again attributed to Melito. It narrates the creation of humanity, the effects of death after sin and the new creation brought to us by Christ's redemption, who, with his resurrection, reunited soul and body. The most important work which has come to us almost complete is the homily Peri Pascha (On the Pasch [Easter]), written between 160 and 170. It was found in 1936 and published by C. Bonner acc. to the papyrus in the collection of M.A. Chester-Beatty, with various Greek, *Coptic and Syriac fragments. There existed in part a *Latin translation (PL 54, 493). In 1960, M. Testuz published the nearly complete text of this treatise acc. to the papyrus Bodmer XIII. The homily unfolds as a full exegesis of Ex 12 (The institution of the Passover by *Moses), and presents the Paschal feast with a Judaizing and archaizing character: Its celebration is transferred to a Christian context; thus the Hebrew Pasch (Passover) was the prefiguration of the Christian Pasch: Christ is the true Paschal Lamb who, by his passion and death, has freed the true Israel, i.e., Christians, causing them to pass "from slavery to liberty, from darkness to light, from death to life, from tyranny to the eternal kingdom" (On the Pasch 68,489-493) and has led them into the true Promised Land. The Pasch of Christ, in which he suffered, has become "the Pasch of our salvation" (ibid., 69 and 103, 496 and 790). Melito emphasizes the ingratitude of the Jewish people who refused their Savior, who was received instead by the pagans. The homily ends with the resurrection of Christ, described as a final apotheosis. The text is composed in carefully written rhythmic prose, characterized by corresponding brief structured cola, connected with each other in various ways: anaphora, rhyme, alliteration, antithesis, etc., with the aim of emphasizing every nuance of meaning. This refined formal elaboration manifests the influence of rhetoric of the Asiatic type of the Second Sophistic. (The apocryphal writing De transitu Beatae Virginis Mariae, in Latin translation, was falsely attributed to him, and cannot be dated earlier than the 4th c.)

II. Doctrine. The theological importance of Melito, esp. in his homily On the Pasch, is at the same time biblical, homiletic and liturgical. The biblical theology is oriented toward the relation between the two testaments in vital and dynamic continuity, since the same story of salvation is prefigured and then actualized. Christ is the center of this salvific plan: As man and God, he becomes present in history and introduces the eternal in time. The Pasch of the Asiatic tradition, of Johannine derivation, places at its culmination the salvific event of the cross and considers the Pasch as the natural corollary to the triumph of Christ over death. The "suffering" of man involves the "suffering" of Christ. (Consider the questionable etymology of Pasch relating it to paschein = suffer.) In the homily, the preexistence of Christ is clearly affirmed, as is his *incarnation through *Mary, his *descent into hell, original *sin as a "mark," because of which the soul is in the power of death.

The homily is also an interesting example of that particular type of paschal homily common in the area of Asia in the 2nd c. (See also the anonymous In sanctum Pascha attributed to *Hippolytus.)

R.M. Mainka, Melito von Sardes. Eine bibliographische Übersicht: Claretianum 5 (1965) 22-255; H. Drobner, 15 Jahre Forschung zu Melito von Sardes (1965–1980): VChr 6 (1982) 313-333 (bibl.). see CPG I, 1092-1098; I.C.T. Otto, Corpus Apologetarum IX, Jena 1872, 374-378. 497-512; C. Bonner, The Homily on the Passion by Melito Bishop of Sardis, London-Philadelphia 1940; B. Lohse, Die Passa-Homilie des Bischofs Meliton von Sardes, Leiden 1958; M. Testuz, Papyrus Bodmer XIII. Méliton de Sardes. Homélie sur la Pâque, Cologny-Geneva 1960; O. Perler, Sur la Pâques et fragments (SC 123), Paris 1966; J. Ibáñez Ibáñez - F. Mendoza Ruiz, Melitón de Sardes, Homilía sobre la Pascua, Pamplona 1975; S.G. Hall, Melito of Sardis, On Pascha and Fragments (Oxford Early Christian Texts), Oxford 1979; see also R. Cantalamessa, I più antichi testi pasquali. Le omelie di Melitone di Sardi . . . , Rome 1972. [see also CPL 1658, sermo 7, for a Latin tr. in PL 54, 493-494 and PL 56, 1134-1136, critically ed. by H. Chadwick in JTS n.s. 11 (1960) 76-82].

Studies: DSp 10 (1980) 880-981; A. Grillmeier, "Das Erbe der Söhne Adams" in der Homilia de Passione Melitos: Scholastik 20 n. 4 (1949) 481-502; B. Lohse, Das Passafest der Quartadecimaner, Gütersloh 1953; Patrologia I, 213-219 (bibl.); F. Trisoglio, Dalla Pasqua ebraica a quella cristiana in Melitone di Sardi: Augustinianum 28 (1988) 151-185; BBKL 5 (1993) 1219-1223 (ample bibl.); B. Czyzewski, Le mystère de la Pâque selon Perì Pascha de Meliton de Sardes, in N. Widok (ed.), Veritatem desiderat anima, Studia . . . B. Altanera, Opole 1995, 53-116; T. Orlandi, La tradizione di Melitone in Egitto e l'omelia "De anima et corpore": Augustinianum 37 (1997) 37-50; L. Torraca, L'omelia sulla Pasqua di Melitone, in M. De Rosa (ed.), Dives in misericordia. Studi in onore di S.E. Mons. G. Pierro, Salerno 1997, 119-160; L. Cohick, Melito of Sardis's "Peri Pascha" and Its" Israel": HTR 91 (1998) 351-372; A. Stewart-Sikes, The Lamb's High Feast. Melito, Peri Pascha and the Quartodeciman Paschal Liturgy at Sardis (Suppl. to VChr 42), Leiden 1998; C. Dell'Osso, L'apologia di Melitone di Sardi: Rivista di scienze religiose 15 (2001) 239-257; J. Hainsworth, The Force of the Mystery: Anamnesis and Exegesis in Melito's "Perì Pascha": St. Vladimir's Theological Quarterly 46 (2002) 107-146.

M. Maritano

MELKITES (from Syriac mălkāyā ["imperial"]). Term used in the area of *Syria, by their N Syrian adversaries, to indicate those Christians who, having accepted the definition of *Chalcedon (451), remained in communion with the patriarch of *Antioch nominated by *Constantinople. Dependence on the imperial see led to the almost total abandonment of the Syro-Antiochene rite. The term now designates the communities of *Byzantine rite which united to Rome in the 17th c., residents of the area of the patriarchate or depending on it. The Melkites produced many Christian texts in Arabic.

DTC 10, 516-520; Cath 8, 1115-1116; EC 8, 647-648; H. Husmann, Die melkitische Liturgie als Quelle der syrischen Qanune iaonaie, Melitene und Edessa: OCP 41 (1975) 5-56; J. Nasrallah, Notes et documents pour servir à l'histoire du Patriarcat melchite d'Antioche. I-II, Jerusalem 1965–1986; J. Nasrallah - R. Haddad, Histoire du mouvement littéraire dans l'Église melchite du Ve au XX^e^ siècle: contribution à l'étude de la littérature arabe chrétienne. I–IV/2, Louvain 1979–1989.

S.J. Voicu

MELLITUS (d. 24 April 624). Monk and abbot in *Rome, probably at St. Andrew's Monastery on the Celian Hill. Mellitus was put forward by St. *Gregory the Great (d. 604) to lead a group of monks to evangelize *Britain in 596–597. In 604 Mellitus was ordained the first bishop of London by St. *Augustine of *Canterbury (d. 604/605). He came to Rome in 609 with a few monks (*Justus, *Paulinus, Rufinianus etc.) to report to Pope *Boniface IV on his progress in evangelizing Britain and to clarify the facts of the controversy in that country over the date of *Easter. He took part in the Roman Council of 27 Feb 610 regarding the monastic profession. Following disagreements with King Eadbald of Kent, Mellitus was compelled to take refuge in *Gaul in 616 with the three sons of the late King Sabert of the Eastern Saxons. He returned to his diocese in 619, and that year succeeded St. *Lawrence in the archiepiscopal see of Canterbury. He died 24 April 624 and became the object of a local cult.

Bede, Historia ecclesiastica gentis Anglorum, I, 29-30; II, 3-7 (ed. B. Colgrave - R.A.B. Mynors, Oxford 1969, 104-108, 144-158); William of Malmesbury, De gestis pontificum anglorum, I: PL 179, 1443 B; P.B. Gams, Series episcoporum ecclesiae catholicae, Regensburg 1873-1886 (facs. ed. Graz 1957) 182, 193; BHL 5896-5898; P. Grosjean, Recherches sur les débuts de la controverse pascale chez les Celtes, 6. Le Faux de 606 provient-il de Cantorbéry? Date de la lettre des SS. Laurent, Mellitus et Justus aux Irlandais: AB 54 (1946) 231-238; EC 8, 649; BS 9, 310-312; PCBI II/2, 1493; BBKL V, 1229-1230; L.E. von Padberg, Mission und Christianisierung: Formen und Folgen bei Angelsachsen und Franken im 7. und 8. Jahrhundert, Stuttgart 1995, 247f., 151-157.

R. Grégoire

MEMBERS of the CHRISTIAN COMMUNITY. Christianity, by its very nature, is universal in its calling and mission, open to every social class and culture. Jesus revealed himself in solidarity with everyone, particularly with marginalized social categories such as the *poor or "people of the land." From the beginning, members of the Christian community were from various social classes. The poor and the humble constituted the majority in the community, as they did in the society, but there were also members from the higher classes: Sergius, proconsul of Cyprus, converted by Paul (Acts 13:7-12); Dionysius, member of the Areopagus in Athens (Acts 17:34); the centurion Cornelius (Acts 10:1ff.); Aquila and Priscilla, well-to-do tent makers (Acts 18:2-3.); Erastus, treasurer of the city of Corinth (Rom 16:23); Lydia, seller of purple in the city of Thyatira (Acts 16:14). At the beginning of the 2nd c., *Pliny the Younger, governor of Bithynia, reported to the emperor that the community of his province comprised many faithful of every age and social origin, including both men and women, slaves and Roman citizens, and rural and urban dwellers (Ep. X,96). In *Rome, *Carthage, *Lyons and *Alexandria, there were groups of a similarly diverse makeup. In Rome, members of the imperial court turned to Christianity toward the end of the 1st c. In the middle of the 2nd c., important individuals like *Ptolemy and *Lucius (see Justin, 2 Apol) and the senator *Apollonius were condemned as Christians. *Irenaeus recounts that in the community of Lyons, the gnostic *Mark went to see rich matrons (Adv Haer. I, 13,7). In Alexandria, *Clement dedicated his works Quis dives salvetur and the Pedagogue to the wealthy classes.

In the middle of the 2nd c. *Celsus denigrated Christianity, speaking disdainfully about "the religion of artisans and women" (Orig. C. Cels. III,55); in reality, however, intellectuals and the wealthy thrived in the new religion. Their number and their energy posed diverse problems and profound crises in Alexandria, Rome and Lyons, particularly when they were drawn into heterodox groups or gnostic thought (against which *Tertullian, Irenaeus and *Origen argued).

The fact that a growing number of cultured and well-off people entered the church meant that it had to adapt its discourse to a public shaped by Greek and Roman culture (see *Christianity and classical culture), a public with an elevated way of life that was esp. responsive to rhetoric. The dialogue between faith and *philosophy became ever more urgent. In response to this high culture, Christianity was presented as the perfection of human culture, the ideal life (bios christianos), and a whole range of doctrines was revealed as completely harmonized in Christ the Truth (this in contrast to *pagan philosophies which contained partial, propaedeutic truths). The *conversion of jurists and philosophers esp. favored the formation of an articulate theological language.

The Acts of the Martyrs of the 2nd and 3rd c. presents a quite varied Christian community: *clergy and *laypeople, men and women of every age and condition, masters and *slaves. *Justin was a philosopher by profession, *Blandina was a slave who was arrested together with a doctor and an aristocrat of Lyons. Apollonius spoke as an equal with the prefect. The *Scillitan martyrs were farmers, *Felicity was from a modest origin (if not a slave background) and *Perpetua was a lady from the upper class.

It is necessary to emphasize the importance and zeal of laypeople in the spread of Christianity. The majority of Greek *apologists were laypeople (like Justin of Rome) who were in contact with cultured circles. The activity of *Pantaenus, Clement and Origen in Alexandria shows that different social groups found themselves in the school of faith. This spread of Christianity to the various levels of the population depended on the ideal and real union of everyone in a common brotherhood: whether slaves or masters, rich or poor, the faithful were all brothers and sisters in the same faith. Social barriers were overcome or simply became less important within the community. It is this fact that converted Tertullian in Carthage (Apol. 39) and that similarly impressed the pagans: "See how they love each other."

The change in social order came from the gospel: the new order was based on equality before God and equality within the community of the faithful, in which all could attain spiritual offices acc. to their capacities and the *charism they received from God.

The number of Christians increased at the close of the 4th c. after *Constantine granted liberty to the church (see *Edict of Milan). *Augustine's De catechizandis rudibus illustrates the social and cultural diversity of the candidates who prepared themselves for *baptism. Two social groups, however, resisted this movement: the aristocracy and the people in the countryside. The Roman nobility was one of the most active breeding grounds of resistance toward Christianity and of faithfulness to pagan traditions. Coins continued to represent the various divinities. Writings attest to the persistence of pagan feasts. *Symmachus, prefect of Rome, opposed the policies of the emperor and demanded the restoration of the *Altar of Victory in the curia. He had the support of the senate, the majority of whom had remained pagan. This occurred equally in the great cities of the empire such as *Athens and *Antioch. In *Africa the situation seemed somewhat better, but even so Augustine points out the resistance of the nobility (Enarr. in Ps. 54,13).

The countryside was another island of resistance, to the point that the term paganos seemed to signify both peasant and pagan. The *evangelization of the countryside received a decisive push from St. *John Chrysostom in the East, and from *Martin and *Victricius in Gaul, and it manifested itself fully at the close of the 5th c. The preaching of Augustine and *Maximus of Turin (Hom. 16, 100, 101, 102) referred to the persistence, even in the church, of popular and rural practices and superstitions.

The conversion of the masses created a degree of unity, joining the different Christian communities of the empire; and in its turn Christianity transformed the earthly city, imprinting itself on the rhythms of time and the prevailing sense of space, on human relations and literary forms. New models of life, like *monasticism, which formed in an effort to avoid the danger of accommodating to worldly values, spread even more. Thus, in institutions and in common practice, a new Christianity took shape, a shape that was united but not uniform.

J. Gaudemet, L'Église dans l'empire romain (IV–V s.), Paris 1958, [2]1989; P. Brezzi, La composizione sociale delle comunità cristiane nei primi secoli dalle persecuzioni alla pace costantiniana, Rome 1960, 132-179; E.A. Judge, The Social Pattern of Christian Groups in the First Century, London 1960; P.R.L. Brown, Aspects of the Christianization of the Roman Aristocracy: JRS 51 (1961) 1-11; A. Hamman, I cristiani del II secolo, Milan 1974; J. Vogt, Der Vorwurf des soziales Niedrigkeit des frühen Christentum: Gymnasium 82 (1975) 401-411; R. McMullen, Christianizing the Roman Empire (AD 100–400), New Haven-London 1984, G. Theissen, Sociology of Early Palestinian Christianity, Eng. tr., Philadelphia 1978; J.-M. Salamito, Cristianizzazione e vita sociale, in Ch. and L. Pietri (eds.), La nascita di una cristianità (250–430) (Storia del cristianesimo 2), Rome 2000, 633-672; A. Madgearu, A Note on the Christians' Presence in the "Sacer comitatus" Before 313 A.D.: Aevum 75/1 (2001) 111-117.

M. Maritano

MEMNON of Ephesus (ca. 428–440). Archbishop of *Ephesus, possibly in 428 when the *Nestorian controversy arose. Prompt to defend the autonomy of his province (*Asia) against the intrusiveness of *Constantinople, he formed an alliance with *Alexandria, embracing the cause of St. *Cyril with the support of 100 Asian bishops. The third ecumenical *council (431) gathered in his city and the second session (10 July) took place in his episcopal house. At the arrival of *John of Antioch and the other Eastern bishops, he provoked disorder and prevented them from taking refuge in churches. The great candlelit procession arranged by him for the streets of the city in honor of the victorious Theotokos seemed devised by Cyril of Alexandria. The deposition imposed on him by the synod of the Easterners and approved by *Theodosius II did not have practical effects. He remained in his diocese until 440 when the name of the successor appeared. In the Byzantine Synaxarion he is commemorated on 16 December together with St. *Modestus of Jerusalem. In the context of the Ephesian council, his letter sent to the clergy of Constantinople after the condemnation of *Nestorius was preserved. Together with St. Cyril he wrote to the council of Ephesus after having been deposed.

CPG 5790-5791; PG 77, 1463-1466; PWK 15, 654; Fliche-Martin IV, 205-206, 216, 218, 225, 232-233; BS 9, 315-316; J. Mateos, Le typicon de la Grande Église, I, Rome 1962, 133; Patrologia V, 34.

D. Stiernon

MEMORIA – MEMORIA APOSTOLORUM. The term memoria, in technical Christian language, could designate a *liturgical commemoration (Aug., Serm. 311,3: PLS 2, 821-822; Serm. 273, 2; C. Faust. 20,21), a *funerary monument (we have numerous examples of this in *Augustine and in *African archaeology), *relics (Aug., Civ. Dei 22,8,11-13), or also a reliquary. The most frequent meaning, however, is that of monument (RAC 12, 422-427): in particular, a monument as a funerary chapel, of varying levels of importance—a chapel that can be just as much for a common deceased person (and his or her family) as for a martyr. There are numerous African examples from this category.

At *Rome, however, the expression memoria apostolorum designates more particularly the worship site in the catacomb of St. *Sebastian dedicated in the middle of the 3rd c. to the memory of the apostles *Peter and *Paul. The numerous Greek and Latin graffiti traced on the walls, dating from the 2nd half of the 3rd c., indicate the type of cult that was present: the writings invoke the apostles, from whom *pilgrims hope for help (in mente habete, petite pro). They were commemorated by the refrigerium (refrigerium feci, refrigeravi). Indeed, on three sides of a square courtyard runs a porch with a bench along the wall; nearby is a well. The porch serves to shelter the pilgrims and not, as some still assert, the passersby, who would come to commemorate the funeral feast. In one corner of the courtyard rises a little stone table in honor of the apostles, on which offerings would be arranged for them. Did this table signify the place where the relics of apostles were deposited? Thümmel denies that the relics were transferred from the *Vatican and Via Ostiensis to the Via Appia, but doubts remain. Whatever the answer, the place appears in the Depositio martyrum as a place of annual commemoration of Peter (originally also of Paul), as of 29 June 259: Petri in catacumbas . . . Tusco et Basso cons. A cruciform basilica in honor of the apostles Peter and Paul (basilica apostolorum) was built at the time of *Constantine, with their names preceding that of St. Sebastian. Shortly after, Pope *Damasus (366–384) regarded the basilica as the place for their relics (not only for their memorial, as held by Delehaye OC 268): Hic habitásse priús sanctós cognóscere débes, nómina quísque Petrí paritér Paulíque requíris (A. Ferrua, Epigrammata Damasiana, Vatican City 1942, 139-144); here nomina means corpora (N. Corte, Ist der hl. Petrus im Vatikan?, Würzburg 1957, 77-78). Obviously the tombs inside the basilica are placed ad sanctos, i.e., in proximity to the apostles. When the Mart hier. (and only in cod. Bernensis) records the celebration of 29 June ad catacumbas, the mention is no more than a scholarly record, because in the meantime the cult of St. Sebastian replaced that of the apostles.

F. Tolotti, Memorie degli apostoli in Catacumbas, Vatican City 1953; V. Saxer, Morts, martyrs, reliques en Afrique chrétienne aux premiers siècles, Paris 1980; W.N. Schumacher, Die konstantinischen Exedra-Basiliken, in J.G. Deckers et al., La catacomba dei santi Marcellino e Pietro. Repertorio delle pitture. Testo, Vatican City 1987, 142-150; H.G. Thümmel, Die Memorien für Petrus und Paulus in Rom, Berlin-New York 1999.

V. Saxer - S. Heid

MEMORY

I. Rhetoric - II. Anthropology.

I. Rhetoric. Memory in *patristics has its own particular classification. According to ancient *rhetoric, after the inventio, the dispositio and the elocutio follows the memoria, after which comes the actio (the study of gesture and vocalization). For the *Fathers, memory takes root deeply in the *soul and is considered a part of wisdom. The monk *Anthony was illiterate, but memory took the place of *books in him, as Luke (2:19) says of *Mary. The understanding of memory as deep knowledge of the things that one possesses in the heart (note that to learn something "by heart" is the same as "by memory") is connected with Sacred *Scripture. For *Origen (Hom. 21 in Lc.), memory, which is the source of thought, is the same as the human heart, which is able to comprehend infinite things. *Leonides, Origen's father, wanted his son to memorize passages of Sacred Scripture daily so that, possessing it entirely, he could examine its deeper senses (Eus., HE 6,2,8-9). According to this view, one retains what one comprehends stored up within the memoria which, through inventio, adds to the richness of the thought and transmits it to elocutio. The passage from cogitatio to memory and from inventio to elocutio is continual. To the hermit Sisoes the Theban someone said: "Tell me a word." Sisoes responded: "What must I say! I read the NT and reflect on the OT" (Apophth. Sis. 35: PG 65, 404). For those like Sisoes, meditation on the Bible while striving to live each day as if Christ were present brings new life to the gospel. Since the OT is in the NT and the NT is in the OT, as *Augustine would say, all of Sacred Scripture passes through memory. Let us not forget that the *apostles transmitted the teachings of Jesus by memory; that by memory *Polycarp of Smyrna recalled the sayings and deeds that *John heard about the Lord (Eus., HE 5,20,5-6). And to ignore the meaning of memory acc. to the ancients—and, in particular, the fathers of the church—means to overlook the fact that the synoptic gospels convey the same material with a different elocutio. In the *catechetical schools, teaching on scripture was done through passages known to memory, which were connected to all the scriptural narratio. In the prose of the Fathers, one notes how certain patterns of expression, common to the writers of every time and place, are linked to memory. They serve to recall the continuity between their writings and biblical motifs. They are like the hinges that tighten the forces of the discourse, allowing it to take root in memory. Memory, finally, is a process that forms inside the person and develops in union with intelligence.

Psychology speaks today about efficient techniques for improving the memory: the technique of observation or selective perception; the technique of organizing the material to learn; the technique of distributing the effort of study. These are also the presuppositions of memory acc. to the school of classical-patristic rhetoric.

Kl. Dockhorn, "Memoria" in der Rhetorik: Archiv für Begriffsgeschichte 9 (1964) 27-35; G.B. Mathews, Augustine on Speaking from Memory: APQ 2 (1965) 157-160; T.H. Olbright, Delivery and Memory, in Handbook of Classical Rhetoric in the Hellenistic Period 330 B.C.–A.D. 400, ed. S.E. Porter, Leiden 1997, 159-167.

A. Quacquarelli

II. Anthropology (Memoria sui – memoria Dei). With Augustine of Hippo memoria / memoria sui assumes, in Christian tradition, a particular meaning for religious *anthropology. He deepened the understanding of memory, inherited from *Aristotle (De memoria et reminiscentia) and esp. *Plotinus (Enn. IV 3,25-32 and 4,1-17; V, 3—entirely dedicated to the self-awareness of the thinking subject), in an ample space of time (the Dialogues are dated 386; De Trinitate was finished in 417) in the following writings: De ordine II, 2,7; De musica VI, 8,21; De gen. ad litt. XII, 16,33; Confess. X-XI; Trin. X-XI (under the psychological perspective), XIV-XV (under the theological perspective of the trinitarian imago Dei present in human beings as "memory").

Aristotle and Plotinus connect memory with knowledge of sensible things. For them, memory is involved in the process of *time and directed toward the past. It was seen as a function of the soul that could not find a place in intellectual knowledge, which attends only to the contemplation of the nous. The soul, which in Plotinus occupies an intermediary place between the nous and the sensible world, insofar as it manages to address itself to the nous, knows itself also. Such knowledge moves nevertheless within a subject-object relationship and in a universe of essences in accord with the *Platonic tradition of the intelligible world.

Augustine also identified memory at the level of sensible knowledge, which consists in remembering and in imagining (De musica VI, 11,32; Confess. X, 8,12-14; Trin. XI, 6,10; XI, 5,8; 8,13-14; 10,17), namely, in the reproductive and restorative elaboration, which he indicates by the term cogitatio (putting together in order to contrast and compare intellectual and sensible information: Confess. X, 11,18; Trin. XI, 3,6). Nevertheless, departing from the common opinion that the treasure of memory is constituted by what is born in the recesses of the mind (the notitae absconditae in abdito mentis, Trin. XIV, 7,9), he formulated a new theory in the history of thought about memory: "memory of the present" and memoria sui.

Memory comes to be seen as a function that, in its essence, has a connection to the present and not to the past. In this perspective, time is valued not for its temporal succession but rather as an extension of the mind, namely like memory (Confess. XI, 25,33). This intuition brought Augustine to see memory as self-consciousness, as memoria sui pertaining to the sphere of intellectual preconceptual consciousness, i.e., at the transcendental level of human ontology, beyond the Aristotelian-Plotinian understanding of the sensible. Terms in Augustine synonymous with memoria sui are scire and nosse, namely, awareness of oneself that lies between memory and cogitatio (concepts as object of knowledge), where memory, seat of the soul (Confess. X, 25,36), identifies itself with its own spiritus (De gen. ad lit. XII, 16,33). The memoria sui is the original notitia sui, the intelligentia sui, the mind within the mind, the animus that senses itself: that knowing of oneself by the soul that is scire se esse, se vivere, se intelligere, velle, memini (Trin., X). The soul experiences in this way, insofar as it is present to one's entire and whole self, one's identity with memory (tanquam ipsa sit sibi memoria sui, Trin., XIV, 6,8). Augustine transforms the self-awareness of the soul into an anthropological category when he identifies it, referring to Gen 1:26, as humanity made in the "*image of God." At that point the memoria sui coincides with the memoria Dei, and memory reveals to humans something of their own unfathomable mystery. In the Confessions (bk. XI) Augustine develops the similarity between humans and God through his conception of time: extension of the soul and not the Aristotelian space-time succession. Through memory, humans, like God, who is not constrained within space-time limits, extend themselves into the past, the present and the future. In De Trinitate (in particular in book XIV, 8,11) one has in Augustine the transition of memory to mens which means that, in remembering, the image of the Trinity is revealed: not only as a potentiality but also as a participant in such an image, i.e., that in memory one knows and loves God and, through such knowledge and love, humanity recovers its true image. It is memoria Dei that becomes the source of understanding human life, namely, memoria sui as an image of the *Father (mens), of the Son (intelligentia) and of the *Holy Spirit (amor) (Trin. XV, 22,43).

DSp 10, 991-1002 (A. Solignac); G. Madec, Pour ou contre la "Memoria Dei": REAug 11 (1965) 89-92; B.L. Zekiyan, L'interiorismo agostiniano, Genoa 1981; N. Cipriano, Memory, in Augustine Through the Ages, ed. A.D. Fitzgerald, Grand Rapids, MI 1999, 553-555.

V. Grossi

MENANDER (1st c.). We have limited information about the *gnostic Menander. We learn from *Justin (1 Apol. 26,4) that Menander, born in Capparatea in Samaria, had become the disciple of *Simon Magus. Having arrived in *Antioch, he had used his *magic arts to gain numerous followers, to whom he was promising immortality. Also, *Irenaeus (Adv. haer. I, 23,5) affirms the Samaritan origin of Menander, providing further pieces of information on his teaching. Menander upheld the unknowability of the First Power; he claimed to be the Savior sent by the invisible powers for the salvation of men. The knowledge transmitted by him was to provide a way to conquer the angels who, sent by Thought, had created the world. Whoever was *baptized in the name of Menander would obtain resurrection and immortality.

W. Foerster, Die "ersten Gnostiker" Simon und Menander, in U. Bianchi (ed.), Le origini dello Gnosticismo, Leiden 1967, 190-196; S. Pétrement, Le Dieu separé. Les origines du gnosticisme, Paris 1984, 431-448; M. Simonetti (ed.), Testi gnostici in lingua greca e latina, Milan 1993, 6-19.

A. Monaci Castagno

MENAS. *Patriarch of *Constantinople (536–552). Native of *Alexandria and director of the St. Sampson hospice of Constantinople, he was elected patriarch 13 March 536 as a replacement for *Anthimus, whom Pope *Agapetus, present in the *Byzantine capital, had dismissed from his patriarchal see. A singular fact: he was the same pope to order the newly elect to send out on that occasion (13 March) a profession of faith that renewed that of *Hormisdas and was particularly supportive of the doctrinal primacy of the church in *Rome. Agapetus died in Constantinople (22 April) soon after convening, together with Menas, the Byzantine synod to govern the case of Anthimus and the *monophysites. With the participation of the Western bishops and the papal retinue, the synod was held under the presidency of Menas and anathematized Anthimus and his followers (20 May–4 June 536).

The *Origenist agitation of the *Palestinian monks provoked an imperial reaction with an anti-Origenist decree underwritten by the Constantinopolitan synod, presided over by Menas (June 543). In 547, the synod confirmed in writing *Justinian's doctrinal edict against the so-called *Three Chapters, provoking Pope *Vigilius to break communion. Conducted to Constantinople (25 June 547), the Roman pontiff reconciled with Menas in 552 (after Feb 5) in the church of St. *Euphemia of Chalcedon after Menas gave him a profession of faith that acknowledged the four ecumenical *councils and declared his full accord with the Roman Church, while also asking pardon for the injuries unjustly inflicted on Vigilius. As at the moment of his election, Menas's death took place while the bishop of Rome was staying in Constantinople, 24 Aug 552, the day in which he is commemorated in the Byzantine synaxarion and the Mart. rom. During his pontificate the greatest churches of Constantinople were dedicated: Hagia Sophia (22 Dec 538) and Holy Apostles (28 June 550).

CPG 6923-6932; Grumel, Regestes[2], 232-243; EC 8, 668; BS 9, 318-319; L. Magi, La Sede Romana nella corrispondenza degli imperatori e patriarchi bizantini, Rome-Louvain 1972, 124-148 and passim; Grillmeier 2/2, 183, 231, 350-351, 353-354, 388-389, 426, 474; Patrologia V, 45-46.

D. Stiernon

MENNAS, martyr (d. ca. 295). According to the Chronicon Paschale*, Mennas was martyred in 295 (in *Egypt or in *Phrygia). The oldest evidence for the *saint is from the martyrium of the *Constantinian era built on the tomb, and replaced, during the time of *Athanasius (328–373), with a basilica. The sanctuary was expanded by *Arcadius (395–408), and near to it *Zeno (474–491) built a city whose ruins carry the name of Karm Abu Mina (Egypt). The great sanctuary in the desert of Mareotis near to *Alexandria was one of the most famous places for pilgrimage after the Arab invasion, as the gathering of the saint's miracles attests (CPG 2527); unfortunately, it reports few details on his local cult, and is based on *hagiographic and folkloric clichés. *John III of Alexandria, *patriarch of the *Copts from 677, may have written a Coptic encomium on the saint in which he recommended the *pilgrimage (J. Drescher, ed., Apa Mena, Cairo 1946). The popular spread of the cult is attested to above all by the "casks of St. Mennas" (with dust, oil?), made in the vicinity of the *sanctuary, but found in all the Mediterranean world: often the saint appears depicted on them in an attitude of *prayer, with tunic and mantle, and in the company of two camels. The oldest passion is of Phrygian origin: developed at Cotyaes in the province Phrygia Salutaris, on the model of the *panegyric of St. Gordius (Gordian) written by *Basil the Great, it makes of Mennas an Egyptian soldier who came to Phrygia, lived the solitary life and endured martyrdom under *Diocletian. The monks of Karm Abu Mina were content with explaining how, in spite of everything, his *relics rested with them, making use of a *miraculous story that, in its turn, knew numerous developments. The feast of the saint is set as 11 Nov in Mart. hier., in the Calendar of Oxyrhynchus, in the marble Calendar of Naples, and in the Alexandrian and *Byzantine Synaxaria. The historical martyrologies echo the Phrygian legend of the martyr. At the time of *Gregory the Great there existed in *Rome, near Ostia, a church in Mennas's honor, where Gregory delivered the Hom. in Evang. 2,35. In the 14th c. the relics were transferred to the church of St. Mennas in Cairo.

BHG 1250-1269; BHL 5921-5924; BHO 745-752; BS 9, 324-343; BBKL 5,1247-1249; RBK 3,1116-1158; C. Huelsen, Le chiese di Roma nel medioevo, Florence 1926, rev. Rome 2000, 387; E. Donckel, Ausserrömische Heilige in Rom, Luxembourg 1938, 74-76; Y. Duval, Loca Sanctorum Africae 2, Rome 1982, 661-663; J. Christern, Die Pilgerheiligtümer von Abu Mina und Qal'at Sim'an, in H. Beck - P.C. Bol (eds.), Spätantike und frühes Christentum, Frankfurt 1983, 211-222; F. Jaritz, Die arabischen Quellen zum hl. Menas, Heidelberg 1993; E. Schurr, Die Ikonographie der Heiligen, Dettelbach 1997, 264-280; J. Witt, Werke der Alltagskultur 1. Menasampullen, Wiesbaden 2000; P. Grossmann, Christliche Architektur in Ägypten, Leiden-Boston-Cologne 2002.

V. Saxer - S. Heid

MENSA. Beyond the common meaning of "table," in the context of Antiquity the term mensa incorporated various cultic meanings.

1. Funerary mensa. The mensa is first of all a construction in brick, in the form of a table, erected above a tomb, that used to provide the full means for serving meals in honor of the *dead. The guests used to lie down on recliners placed around the table. This structure is particularly well known thanks to texts and *African monuments. Among the monuments of this type, one should point out the mensa Cypriani that used to mark *Carthage as the place of *Cyprian's martyrdom. Yet it was possible that similar mensae existed on the tomb of any deceased person, decorated with figures and *inscriptions referring to the meal. Often they used to contain a system for drawing and running water over the tomb or even within it, as it was thought that on the inside the dead person took part in the refrigerium of the living. This type of cult was common to both the faithful departed and to the martyrs. With time, the funerary feasts were excluded from the cult of the martyrs (*Ambrose, *Augustine, *Zeno of Verona).

2. The eucharistic mensa. Indeed, the *Eucharist had its origin in a meal. For a long time it was celebrated on top of a table, similar in all probability to the small round tripod table depicted in a painting of a room of the *sacraments in the catacomb of St. *Callistus (Wp, pl. 41, 1). For a long time the altars were in wood, as demonstrated by the literary witnesses (*Optatus of Milevis, Schism. donat. 6,1; *Athanasius, Hist. arian. ad mon. 56); none of them have been preserved, but on the floor the holes in which the legs were mounted can still be detected (DACL 1, 3160). Altars in stone appeared rather quickly. In Provence, a number of mensae in marble are preserved, each with a depressed surface and decorative edge, and with either one or four legs: *Marseille, Abbaye Saint Victor, 5th c.; Auriol (department of Bouches-du-Rhône), preserved at Marseille, Musée Borély, 5th c.; Vaison-la-Romaine (department of Vaucluse), Cathédrale Notre-Dame de *Nazareth, 6th c. A similar altar is found at *Jerusalem on the Mount of Olives, where it functions as a lid for a chamber of *relics, excavated beneath the floor. Other altars take the form of a blocco (with the leg in brick), either with a *sarcophagus or a casket. All of them presume that relics are enclosed within.

3. Other mensae. The biography of Pope Sylvester I in the Liber pontificalis indicates that the emperor *Constantine I *donated seven silver altars to the basilica of St. John Lateran. Since in an early Christian basilica there was one eucharistic altar, the hypothesis has been advanced that the seven altars did not constitute true and proper altars but rather tables designed to receive the offerings of the faithful. It is possible that some mensae in sigmate form (found in *Egypt, Africa and elsewhere) were designed for the same purpose.

DACL 1, 3155-3189; 11, 440-453; RAC 1, 342-343; AugL 1, 243-245; EAM 1, 436-444; LTK 7, 276-277; J. Braun, Der christliche Altar in seiner geschichtlichen Entwicklung 1, Munich 1924, 245-316; E. Bishop, Liturgica Historica, Oxford [2]1962, 20-38; V. Saxer, Morts, martyrs, reliques en Afrique chrétienne aux premiers siècles, Paris 1980, 191-197, 302-304; P. Testini, Archeologia cristiana, Bari [2]1980, 578-581; Y. Duval, Loca Sanctorum Africae 2, Rome 1982, 525-542 (mensae martyrum); ed. R. Temple, Early Christian and Byzantine Art, London 1990, 62-66; E. Chalkia, Le mense paleocristiane, Vatican City 1991; H.G. Thümmel, Die Memorien für Petrus und Paulus in Rom, Berlin and New York 1999, 89-90.

V. Saxer and S. Heid

MENSURIUS. The bishop of *Carthage from ca. 303 to 308/309. During the *Diocletian persecution, Mensurius had maintained a moderate stance, restraining the enthusiasm for martyrdom that was exploding into spontaneous denunciations, as well as the fanaticism for the imprisoned faithful, esp. if they were persons with an unproven Christian life. Accused of *traditio by hostile circles (see Pass. Saturnini 18.20) who were finding their support in the bishops of *Numidia who had little tolerance for the growing authority of the bishop of Carthage, Mensurius explained his conduct in a letter to *Secundus, bishop of Tigisis and primate of Numidia. He admittied to having hidden the sacred books and to having turned over the books of *heretics to the authorities (Aug., Coll. c.D. III, 13.25). At a date that is certainly earlier than the traditional reckoning of 311/312, and that acc. to scholars is placed at 305/306 or to 308/309, he was summoned to *Rome for the purpose of explaining why he did not consign to the authorities the deacon Felix, presumed to have been the author of an anti-imperial opuscule. Mensurius died during the return trip to Carthage. His successor was *Caecilian, whose *election provided a pretext for the *Donatist *schism.

Monceaux 4, 11-17; W.H.C. Frend, The Donatist Church: A Movement of Protest in Roman North Africa, Oxford 1952 ([2]1971), 6-16 passim; PCBE 1, 748f.; S. Lancel, Les débuts du Donatisme: la date du "protocole" de Cirta et de l'élection épiscopale de Sylvanus: REAug 25 (1979) 217-229; Id., in SC 373, 1553-1557; Augustinus-Lexicon 2, 607-609; B. Kriegbaum, Kirche der Traditoren oder Kirche der Märtyrer? Die Vorgeschichte des Donatismus (Innsbrucker Theologische Studien XVI), Innsbruck 1986, passim.

F. Scorza Barcellona

MÉRIDA

I. The city and Christianity - II. The Council of Mérida (666) - III. Archaeology.

I. The city and Christianity. Mérida inherited the Roman Augusta Emerita, capital of the province of *Lusitania ever since the emperor *Augustus founded it in 25 BC in order to reward his soldiers who had fought in the region of Asturias. According to *Ausonius, it was the ninth city of the empire. The city issued coins during the entire Roman period. In 360, the consul Vettius Agorius *Praetextatus was governor of Lusitania. During the era of the invasions, it was occupied first by the *Vandals in 429, then the Suevi (Suebi, Suevians) in 439 and finally the *Visigoths in 469. After a hard-fought resistance, the city surrendered to the Muslims in 713.

We have documentation of the Christian *faith at Mérida only from 254, although it definitely had arrived in an earlier era: in his letter 67, *Cyprian speaks of a flourishing and organized community, with a *libellatic bishop *Martial, who was deposed and replaced by Felix. During the *Diocletian *persecution, the famous *Eulalia was martyred here.

Bishop Liberius of Mérida attended the *Council of *Elvira (ca. 303). Accompanied by the deacon Florentius, he attended the *Council of *Arles (314), to which Mérida was the only city of Hispaniae to send its bishop as a representative. As bishop, the same Florentius would later attend the Council of *Serdica (343) with *Ossius of Cordoba. Shaped by the strident opposition of its bishop *Hydatius, Mérida takes center stage in the early history of *Priscillianism. Its bishop Patruinus presided at the First Council of *Toledo (397–400), convened to condemn the practices of the Priscillianists and perhaps even some of their sympathizers. When we consider that even Bishops Hydatius and *Turibius of Astorga (Asturica) appealed to Bishop Antoninus of Mérida, asking him to intervene against a *Manichean sect (445), it is possible that by the middle of the 5th c., Mérida had already become a *metropolitan see. In any case, Bishop *Masona of Mérida signed his name as metropolitan of Lusitania, at the Third Council of Toledo in 589.

During the 2nd half of the 6th c., the church of Mérida was illustrious and rich, renowned for performing charitable and relief work, regardless of religious differences. Its prestige was great, esp. during the episcopate of the celebrated Masona. It explains why the Visigoth king *Leovigild strove to win it over to the *Arian cause, believing that such prestige would promote the cause of unifying his kingdom under the Arian faith. As a consequence of the Suevian expansion to the S, the metropolis of Mérida had lost some of the N territories of Lusitania; it would later regain them during the rule of the metropolitan Orontius and the Visigoth king Recceswinth.

Bishops: Martial (ca. 252); Felix; Liberius (ca. 303); Florentius (d. 343 or likely 357); Hydatius (379–ca. 385); Patruinus (400); Gregorius (402 or 403); Antoninus (445); Zeno (during the reign of the Visigoth king *Euric: 466–486); *Paul (d. 554); Fidelis (ca. 571); Masona (573–606); Nepopis (he assumed the see during the exile of his predecessor); Innocent (610); Renovatus (his successor); Stephen (633–638); Orontius (638–653); Profitius (d. 666); Festus (ca. 673); Stephen (681–683); Zeno (ca. 687); Maximus (688–693).

PW V/2, 2493-2496; DHEE 3, 1476-1477; D. Mansilla, Orígenes de la organización metropolitana en la iglesia española: Hispania Sacra 12 (1959) 271-275; E. Florez, ES 13; R. Collins, Mérida and Toledo: 550–585, in Visigothic Spain, Oxford 1980, 189-219; P. Mateos Cruz, Augusta Emerita de capital de la diocesis Hispaniarum a sede temporal visigoda, in G. Ripoll and J.M. Gort (eds.), Sedes regiae (ann. 400–800), Barcelona 2000, 491-520; J.L. Ramírez Sádaba and P. Mateos Cruz, Catálogo de las inscripciones de Mérida, Mérida 2000; J. Arce, Mérida tardorromana (300–580 d.C.), Mérida 2002.

II. The Council of Mérida (666). This was a provincial council, with Bishop Proficius of Mérida presiding. Eleven other bishops were present. Its 23 canons were intended to regulate the life of the church. Among these are particular canons that treat the relationships between the various *orders of the *clergy. From canon 8, we deduce the existence of another council at Mérida (ca. 650), famous for reinstating the borders of the ecclesiastical province and of the other dioceses, as they stood prior to the Suevian conquest. The canon of the First Council of Toledo (400) tells us of yet another council, but we know nothing about it.

Mansi 11, 31-46; Synoden 224-231 and passim; J. Arce, Mérida tardorromana (300–580 d.C.), Mérida 2002.

P. de Luis

III. Archaeology. Christianization was slow and progressive, reaching back to the time of the first Christian *epigraph, dated to 381 (ICERV, n. 18). In the Visigothic era, the bishop of Mérida assumed secular *patronage (ICERV, n. 363), thanks to the enormous wealth of the see (Vitae patrum Emeretensium [hereafter VPE] 4,2) and to the episcopal monopoly over the cult of *Eulalia (VPE 5,8; see *Prudentius, Peristephanon, 3,4-5). The VPE indicates that Mérida was filled with churches and monasteries in the 5th–6th c., esp. under the leadership of Masona (VPE 5,3). In the intramuros zone, we clearly see the episcopal complex in proximity to the area of the present-day cathedral. Organized around an atrium, it was surrounded by the following: the cathedral of S. Jerusalén (VPE 4,9; 5,6; 5,11; 5,13), known as the cathedral of S. María de Jerusalén since the 2nd quarter of the 7th c. (VPE 4,9); the *baptistery, located in the annexed chapel of San Juan (VPE 4,9), in existence since the time of Bishop Fidelis; and a grand *episcopal palace (VPE 4,6), sumptuously rebuilt by Fidelis. We can probably add to the list the churches of San Andrés (now the Convento de Santo Domingo) and San Jacobo (an integral component of the Parador de Turismo connected to the Arch of *Trajan). Although in the same zone there are no Arian basilicas, the VPE (5,10-11) informs us that Sunna, the Arian bishop of Mérida, retained them in conjunction with a palace. In 587, the Visigothic king *Recared handed them over to Masona (VPE 5,11). In archaeological terms, we suppose the existence of three other basilicas.

Meanwhile in the extramuros zone were the basilicae martyrum (VPE 4,8 and 5,14) from the era of Fidelis: S. Lucrecia (VPE 4,7); S. Faustus (VPE 4,7); S. Lorenzo (VPE 4,10) and S. Cipriano (VPE 4,10). We may add the basilicae martyrum of S. María de Quintisina Quintilina (Quintilina), sometimes called S. María de Ureña, of the 7th c., five miles from Mérida (VPE 1); S. *Lucía (perhaps S. *Fabián and S. *Sebastián, united with S. Eulalia).

Yet the most important suburban basilica was the one that contained the *relics of the martyr Eulalia that were certainly first interred in the family mausoleum. At the beginning of the 4th c., a martyrium was built (Prud., Perist. 3,186) in the plan of a rectangular apse (13 x 9 meters [= 42.7 x 29.5 ft]); it was destroyed by the military leader Heremigarius in 429 (Hydatius of Aquae Flaviae, Chronicon at 429). Shortly thereafter, a new basilica was erected (30 m [98.4 ft] in width) that incorporated the earlier edifice into the central apse with a tripartite façade. Fidelis restored it and added two towers (VPE 4,6). The new basilica served as a mausoleum for the bishops of Mérida (VPE 4,10; 5,15). Joined to this basilica were two monasteries (one for men and one for women), a xenodochium* and various buildings. The men's monastery, in existence from the time of the bishop Paul (VPE 3,4), was an episcopal school (VPE 1); the women's monastery was documented in the year 661 (ICERV, n. 358). The xenodochium was built by Masona (VPE 5,3) between 571 and 605 (source confirmed by ICERV, n. 348); situated at a distance of 200 m (656.2 ft) from the basilica, it consisted of a patio flanked by corridors that connected with the monastery. Following the Muslim capture of Mérida (713), only four churches continued to be in use: the cathedral, the church of S. Andrés, and the basilicae martyrum of Sts. Eulalia (until the 9th c.) and Lucía.

Mérida constituted the leading *Iberian center for the production of decorative *sculpture in the late Roman and Visigothic eras.

In the 7th c. the see of Mérida held a territorial patrimony (VPE 5,13) constituted by many rural churches, some of which had a private foundation in imperial law (Concilium Emeritense [666], cans. 19 and 11). Casa Herrera (above a villa) and the church of S. Pedro de Mérida are particularly relevant. Casa Herrera (7 km [4.4 mi] N of Mérida) has a rectangular plan with three aisles, a choir, an antechoir, two lateral vestibules and facing apses. It was built in two phases. The first construction project dates to ca. 500 or early 6th c.; during the second project in the 2nd half of the 6th c., the baptistery was added that was originally only a rectangular pool. In the middle of the 7th c., the baptistery was flanked by two cruciform receptacles for holy water. The church of S. Pedro de Mérida (ca. 75 km [46.6 mi] E of Mérida) is dated to ca. 600. It has a square plan with three aisles, a baptistery in the lateral aisle, a protruding rectangular apse, a gate that separates the liturgical and baptismal space from the faithful, and what seem to be lateral galleries.

For Mérida's zone of influence, we have documentation of churches along the network of primary roads leading N, following the Vía de la Plata (Alconétar: S. Olalla and S. Lucía del Trampal); leading E toward Toledo, in the Sierra de Montánchez (Ibahernando: San Cruz de la Sierra and El Gatillo de Arriba), and at Las Villuercas (a church at Portera and one at Berzocana). Furthermore, the *place names that mention Olalla (a corruption of "Eulalia") and Herguijuela (a corruption of "Ecclesiola/Igrejuela") seem to correspond to small Visigothic churches.

In addition to the monasteries founded by Masona (VPE 5,3), the sources mention two others: the "meager hut" of the abbot Nanctus (VPE 3) and the wealthy monastery of S. María de Cauliliana (Coloniana), 12.9 km (8 mi) from the city (VPE 2). Perhaps there were others in the environs of Montánchez and Las Villuercas, maybe even at S. Lucía del Trampal, a Visigothic basilica in Alcuéscar.

P. de Palol, Arqueología cristiana de la España romana: siglos IV–VI: Madrid and Valladolid 1967; J. Vives, Inscripciones cristianas de la España romana y visigoda [=ICERV], Barcelona 1969; L. Caballero Zoreda and T. Ulbert, La basílica paleocristiana de Casa Herrera, en las cercanías de Mérida (Badajoz), Madrid 1976 [Excavaciones Arqueológicas en España 89]; R. Collins, Merida and Toledo: 550–585, in Visigothic Spain: New Approaches, Oxford 1980, 189-219; R. Étienne, Merida, capitale du vicariate des Espagnes, in Homenaje a Sáenz de Buruaga, Madrid 1982, 201-207; M. Cruz Villalón, Mérida visigoda. Escultura arquitectónica y liturgia, Badajoz 1985; S. Andrés Ordax, Huellas visigodas en la Baja Extremadura, in Historia de la Baja Extremadura, I, Badajoz 1986, 187-227; T. Ulbert, Nachuntersuchungen im Bereich der frühchristlichen Basilika von Casa Herrera bei Merida: Madrider Mitteilungen 32 (1991) 185-207; C. Godoy Fernández and F. Tuset Bertrán, El atrium en las "Vitas sanctorum patrum Emeretensium." Una fórmula de la llamada arquitectura de poder: Archivo Español de Arqueología 67 (1994) 209-221; J. Vilella, Aportaciones de la epigrafía cristiana hispana no incluida en IHC ni en ICERV a la prosopografía cristiana del Bajo Imperio, in "Historiam pictura refert." Miscellanea in onore di Padre Alejandro Recio Veganzones O.F.M., Vatican City 1994, 615-623; E. Cerrillo, Arqueología del cristianismo primitivo en la actual Extremadura, in Mérida y Santa Eulalia. Actas de las Jornadas de Estudios Eulalienses, Mérida 1995, 89-103; P.C. Díaz Martínez, Propiedad y poder: la Iglesia lusitana en el siglo VII, in Los últimos romanos en Lusitania, Mérida 1995, 49-72; A. Fuentes Domínguez, Extremadura en la Antigüedad Tardía: Extremadura Arqueológica 4 (1995) 217-237; C. Godoy Fernández, Arqueología y liturgia. Iglesias hispánicas (siglos IV al VIII), Barcelona 1995; P. Mateos Cruz, La cristianización de la Lusitania (ss. IV–VII): Extremadura en época visigoda: Extremadura Arqueológica 4 (1995) 239-263; E. Sánchez Salor, Mérida, centro de irradiación de formas de vida ascética en el siglo VII: Helmantica 48 (1997) 183-204; P. Mateos Cruz, La basílica de Santa Eulalia de Mérida: arqueología y urbanismo, Mérida 1999; Id., Augusta Emerita de capital de la diocesis Hispaniarum a sede temporal visigoda, in G. Ripoll and J.M. Gort (eds.), Sedes regiae (ann. 400–800), Barcelona 2000, 491-520; J.L. Ramírez Sádaba and P. Mateos Cruz, Catálogo de las inscripciones de Mérida, Mérida 2000; J. Arce, Mérida tardorromana (300–580 d.C.), Mérida 2002; M. Sotomayor, Sobre la arqueología cristiana en Hispania, in Santos, obispos y reliquias. Actas del III Encuentro internacional "Hispania en la Antigüedad Tardía," Alcalá de Henares 2003, 85-99.

C. Buenacasa

MERITA. A Roman woman, probably martyred during the *Diocletian *persecution, buried in the cemetery of Commodilla on the Via Ostiense. Concerning the place of burial, a lost *inscription of 426 (ICUR II, 6077) attests that a certain Januarius acquired from the gravediggers Burdo, Micinus and Muscorutio a sepulcher ante domna Emerita. The tomb of Januarius is precisely within the confines of Commodilla, since the name Muscorutio most likely appears in another inscription of the same *cemetery (ICUR II, 6106). It is noteworthy that even the legendary account (Passio SS. Virginum et martyrum Dignae et Meritae) affirms that the two martyrs were buried at Commodilla, and that in the 2nd half of the 8th c. their *relics were translated into the church of S. Marcello. Emerita or Merita appears in two frescoes of the catacomb of Commodilla: one in the small basilica, the other in a columbarium in a gallery near the sanctuary. In the first fresco from the middle of the 6th c., we see her represented as orans in the scene of the Traditio clavium*, together with the Roman martyrs Adauctus (whose figure is missing due to the loss of plaster), and *Felix, as well as the protomartyr *Stephen (WMM, pl. 148, 149). In the second fresco she appears between Felix and Adauctus; near the female figure the name of MERITA is preceded by the letter A, most likely the remnant of the abbreviation SCA (sancta) (WMM, plate 150, 1). To these witnesses we must add the few remaining sections of a fresco, still visible in the small basilica of the cemetery, representing Christ, who crowns Felix and Adauctus in the presence of Merita (WMM, plate 150, 3).

BS 4, 531ff.; LCI 6, 57; AASS, Septembris 6, 302ff.; H. Delehaye, Les Saints du cimitière de Commodilla: AB 16 (1897) 30ff.; B. Bagatti, Il cimitero di Commodilla o dei SS. Felice e Adautto presso la via Ostiense, Vatican City 1936; J.G. Deckers, G. Mietke and A. Weiland, La catacomba di Commodilla. Repertorio delle pitture, Vatican City 1994.

D. Calcagnini Carletti

MEROBAUDES, Flavius. Eloquentiae merito vel maxime in poematis studio veteribus comparandus

(*Hydatius, Chron. 128, Chron. Min. II, MGH AA XI, p. 124), Flavius Merobaudes was of aristocratic ancestry (natu nobilis: ibid.) and generated his particular literary activity in the 2nd quarter of the 5th c., during the reign of the emperor *Valentinian III (425–455). Originally from *Baetica, which he left for *Ravenna (see *Sidonius Apollinaris, Carm. IX, 277-301), in 435 he received the honor of a bronze *statue in the Forum of *Trajan, erected in recognition of his *military and cultural merits. The dedicatory *inscription testifies to these merits (CIL VI, 1724 = ILS 2950: aeque forti et docto viro), on the basis of which he became a vir spectabilis and a comes sacri consistorii. One of them must have been the composing of a now-lost *panegyric on the commander in chief Flavius *Aetius (see Pan. I, fragment II A, 1 and 2f.). In 443, in the capacity of magister utriusque militiae, Aetius successfully led a rapid campaign against the Bacaudae, in the province of *Tarragona (CIL VI, 31983b and Hydat., Chron. 128). This is all we know for certain about him. Concerning his political position, a plausible theory is offered by Mario Mazza, who notes that Merobaudes had married the daughter of the senator Flavius Astyrius, a magister utriusque militiae during the years 441–443 and a consul in 449 (see PLRE II, 174f.). He would have been a spokesperson for the ideals and tangible interests of the Hispano-Gallic possessores, the class that was most directly threatened by the revolt of the Bacaudae, an expression of the social unrest among farmers and shepherds.

Until the beginning of the 19th c., the only known work of Merobaudes was the De Christo, a set of carmina in thirty hexameters on the double nature of Christ, human and divine. It was transmitted under his name by the MS that is unknown to us, but that Fabricius used as the basis of his edition of 1564. On the authorship of the carmina, published in 1510 by Camers among the works of *Claudian, refer to Th. Birt (MGH AA X, CLXXI f.). The part that has come down to us from the remaining output is revealed by Codex Sangallensis 908, a *palimpsest of the 5th–6th c., discovered by Niebuhr, who in 1823 was its first editor. We are dealing with six texts in all, from the years 440 to ca. 446. There are the fragments of two panegyrics. The first is written in prose. Contrary to the opinion of Niebuhr, F. Vollmer (praef. IIf.) has demonstrated that in this first example a preface in prose was once appended to the panegyric in verse. There are also four carmina of an encomiastic sort, with some missing verses. Since the texts have reached us in fragile condition, various reconstructions and interpretations inevitably arise.

The first panegyric, the dating of which wavers between 439 (PLRE II, 758) to shortly after 443, is a gratiarum actio (see Clover, Merobaudes, 34-36), written in prose on the model of *Pliny the Younger and *Ausonius. Merobaudes gives thanks for the conferring of a highest honor (Pan. I, fragment II A, 3-4: evectus . . . ad honoris maximi nomen). This was most likely the patriciate (Vollmer, 9; Clover, Merobaudes, 35-36). Yet Barnes (Patricii under Valentinian III) thinks of an honorary consulship, thus reviving a hypothesis of Ensslin (Klio 24 [1931] 483-486). Meanwhile, the second panegyric is in dactylic hexameters; its four remaining fragments total 197 verses. It was recited on 1 June 446 to celebrate the third consulship of Aetius. Drawing inspiration from Claudian, both in the epic-like tones and in the recourse to a *mythological framework, the poet extols the victorious campaigns of Aetius. He represents the processus consularis of Aetius as a celebration of the peace that he achieved for the empire by repressing the revolt of the Baucadae in 445. Further in the vein of Claudian, Merobaudes does not limit himself to exalting the outstanding virtues of his *patron, whose *ethical qualities are modeled on the portrait of Caesar by Sallust in Cat. 54 (see Zecchini). By accentuating the positive results that Aetius obtained, the poet justifies his *political choices, esp. the plan of integrating the *barbarians into the imperial ranks. Carmen IV, a brief poem of 46 hendecasyllables inspired by the Genethliacon Lucani of Statius (Silv. 2,7), celebrates the birthday of the second son of Aetius. It was intended to promote the image of the general, exalting the noble birth of his wife, and recalling how the baby was carried in the womb and nursed by Rome, his city of birth (Carm. IV, 29-33). The three remaining carmina are in elegiac couplets, and they all employ the device of ekphrasis. Carmen III is the description of a park that most likely belonged to the vir illustris Anicius Acilius Glabrio Faustus. Carmina I and II both allude to the *baptism of *Galla Placidia, the second-born child of Valentinian III, hence they date to a little later than 442 (see Clover, Merobaudes, 27-28; Monti). They celebrate the imperial family through the ekphrasis of the *mosaics that portray them. Still unsolved is the riddle of the novus exul, who in Carmen I bewails the sudden loss of his material possessions (v. 8 amissas subito flet novus exul opes) in the presence of the sovereign (v. 7 pro praeside nostro). As detailed by Bruzzone (p. 14 and n. 8), the most credible solution is Valentinian III. Bury and Gillet think that the sovereign would have been the emperor *Theodosius II. Another solution is the *Vandal prince *Huneric, the son of *Genseric and the promised spouse of princess Eudoxia the first-born of Valentinian III (Oost, 4-7; Clover, Mero- baudes, 21), or even more likely the rebel Tibatto (Barnes 1974), the leader of the Bacaudae who was defeated and captured by Aetius in 437.

Editions: The editio princeps of Merobaudes, published at St. Gallen in 1823, rests on B.G. Niehbur: Merobaudis carminum orationisque reliquiae, followed in the next year by a revised edition (Fl. Merobaudis carminum panegyricique reliquiae, Bonn 1824). F. Vollmer then curated the edition of Merobaudes for the MGH (Fl. Merobaudis reliquiae . . . , Berlin 1905, MGH, AA XIV, 3-20). The text established by Vollmer (reproduced in the appendix, 60-69) is the basis for both F.M. Clover, Flavius Merobaudes: A Translation and Historical Commentary, Transactions of the American Philosophical Society, 1, Philadelphia 1971, and Flavio Merobaude, Panegirico in versi, ed. with intro. and comm. by A. Bruzzone, Rome 1999.

Studies: For general information on Merobaudes, in addition to the introductory pages of Clover and Bruzzone, see F. Lenz, “Merobaudes 3” in RE XV, I, 1039-1047; “Fl. Merobaudes” in PLRE II, 756-758; “Merobaudes” in S. Döpp and W. Geerlings (eds.), Dictionary of Early Christian Literature, 421; S. Bodelón, Merobaudes: un poeta de la Bética en la corte de Rávena: Helmantica 52 (2001) 51-73.

Other contributions: T.D. Barnes, Merobaudes on the Imperial Family: Phoenix 28 (1974) 314-319; Id., Patricii under Valentinian III: Phoenix 29 (1975) 155-170; J.B. Bury, Iusta Grata Honoria: JRS 9 (1919) 1-13; F.M. Clover, Toward an Understanding of Merobaudes’ Panegyric I: Historia 20 (1971) 354-367, currently reprinted in Clover, The Late Roman West and the Vandals, Aldershot (UK) and Brookfield (USA) 1993; F.E. Consolino, Poesia e propaganda da Valentiniano III ai regni romanobarbarici (secc. V–VI), in Consolino (ed.), Letteratura e propaganda nell’occidente latino da Augusto ai regni romanobarbarici, Rome 2000, 183-189; A. Gillet, The Date and Circumstances of Olympiodorus of Thebes: Traditio 48 (1993) 1-29, in particular the appendix (Imperial Relations in Merobaudes’s Carmen) I, 26-29; A. Loyen, L’œuvre de Flavius Merobaudes et l’histoire de l’Occident de 430 à 450: REA 74 (1972) 153-174; M. Mazza, Merobaude. Poesia e politica nella tarda antichità, in var. aus., La poesia tardoantica: tra retorica, teologia e politica, Messina 1984, 379-430 (reprinted as Il principe e il panegirista in M. Mazza, Le maschere del Potere. Cultura e politica nella tarda antichità, Naples 1986, 149-207); S. Monti, Per l’esegesi dei carmi I e II di Merobaude: RAAN 41 (1966) 3-20; S.I. Oost, Some Problems in the History of Galla Placidia: CPh 60 (1965) 1-10 (4-7 on Carmen I); G. Zecchini, L’imitatio Caesaris di Aezio: Latomus 44 (1985) 124-142 (later republished, with light revisions, in G. Zecchini, Ricerche di storiografia tardoantica, Rome 1993, 163-179). On Aetius and his age, the current standard is D. Coulon, Aetius, Lille 2004.

F.E. Consolino

MEROVINGIAN COUNCILS. The councils took place in the 6th and in the 1st half of the 7th c. in *Gaul. They were characterized by their moralizing, civilizing and above all national function: besides the local questions (*clergy, *parishes, *laypeople, ecclesiastical *property, *works of charity etc.), they discussed important doctrinal problems (e.g., the doctrine of *grace in the 2nd Council of *Orange); they were strictly linked with political power and worked for the unity of the Frankish *church (for the history of Gaul in this period, see *Gaul and *Franks). Here we refer to those *councils for which we have the most information.

Orléans (511). This council was convened four years after *Clovis I, king of the Franks, had conquered Aquitaine, having considered it necessary to find an accord with the episcopal *authority in order to consolidate the unity of his kingdom. It dealt with the first national council of the Frankish church; it put forward 31 *canons concerning whether to grant *asylum to refugees in the churches, the obligations of *clerics and monks, the treatment reserved for *heretical clerics, the *liturgical practices of the *ascension and of *Lent, the management of ecclesiastical property, *alms to give to the *poor and the sick. It seems that the first 10 canons must have been at the initiation of King Clovis.

Epaone (517). After the conversion of *Sigismund, king of the *Burgundians, to *Catholicism, this kingdom abandoned *Arianism; in 517 at Epaone (locality of uncertain identification, perhaps in Savoy) a council was held in order to improve ecclesiastical customs; 40 canons were established. *Avitus of *Vienne presided over the council; *Viventiolus of *Lyons and other bishops participated in it. It established, between them, that clerics could not acquire property, but only give it to the church; that heretics could be readmitted into the church community only after penitence; the *ordination of *deaconesses was abolished.

Lyons (518–523). Held after the death of Avitus of Vienne (5 Feb 518) and before 523, to judge Stephen, head of finances for the kingdom of Burgundy. After the death of his wife, he had married her sister Palladia. Presided over by Viventiolus, it was characterized by a strong conflict between the bishops and King Sigismund, impatient with ecclesiastical interferences. Four of the promulgated canons are about the sentence of Stephen and Palladia, who were readmitted into the church for *prayer only after the reading of the *gospel.

Arles (524). Convened on the occasion of the dedication of the church of St. Mary, presided over by the bishop *Caesarius of Arles, it published four canons on the questions about sacred ordinations.

Carpentras (527). Presided over by Caesarius of Arles, it addressed Agricius, bishop of Antibes, who, violating a decree of the council of Arles of 524, had ordained a certain Protadius without adhering to the year of withdrawal and preparation prescribed for the ordained. The accused did not present himself and was prohibited for a year from the celebration of *mass. The council also dealt with the income of rural parishes.

Orange (529). The second held in this city, this council gathered on the occasion of the dedication of a *basilica built by the prefect of the magistrate Liberius, who participated in the work with Caesarius of Arles and another 13 bishops. His purpose was to end the *semi-Pelagian controversy with the reaffirmation of the doctrine of *Augustine. The Acts consist of 25 canons, and a preface and profession of faith written by Caesarius. This last emphasized that all the *baptized could and must fulfill their duties, uniting their efforts with the grace of God. In the final Definitio fidei, forming part of canon 25, it affirms, Hoc etiam secundum fidem catholicam credimus, quod post acceptam per baptismum gratiam omnes baptizati Christo auxiliante et cooperante, quae ad salute(m) animae pertinent, possint et debeant, si fideliter laborare voluerint, adimplere (CCL 148A, p. 63, can. 25, 205-208). The Catholic theology of grace is based on the provisions established by this council, the decisions of which were approved by *Boniface II in 531.

Vaison (529). Under the presidency of Caesarius of Arles, Vaison was concerned with the disciplinary questions of the clergy, but of minor importance, set out in five canons (the fifth canon orders the addition of Sicut erat in principio after the Gloria).

Marseille (533). The first council held in this city. Presided over by Caesarius of Arles, it dealt with the bishop of Riez Contumelius, who was accused of carnal *sins and of misuse of ecclesiastical property. A confessed criminal, he was sent to a *monastery to do penance. Pope *John II, in a letter, ordered that he be deposed, not only shut up in a monastery. The matter was then entrusted to a tribunal by Pope *Agapetus.

Orléans (533). Gathered in the 22nd year of King Childebert and presided over by Honoratus of Bourges (chronological elements confuse this council with another held in 536), in 21 canons it dealt with problems connected to the *discipline of the clergy, declared unlawful marriage to a Jewish man or woman, and called for the expulsion from the church of any Catholics who had returned to *paganism or who had eaten food offered to *idols.

Clermont (535). This council was convened in Clermont in Auvergne, with the consent of King Theodebert I, to deliberate against moral laxity and abuses, esp. of the clergy. It confirmed the old canons and promulgated another 16. The bishops, among whom was Honoratus of Bourges, prohibited every conjugal relation for ecclesiastics and reaffirmed the absolute prohibition of marriage between Christians and Jews.

Orléans (538). Its 36 canons constitute an interesting legislative whole: they reconsider the clergy, the relations with Jews, the property of the church, the punishment of the heretical followers of *Bonosus bishop of Naissus. The council was presided over by Lupus, metropolitan of Lyons.

Orléans (541). Promulgated 38 canons on problems similar to the preceding council and fixed precise norms for Lent.

Orléans (549). Convened by King Childebert I. Bishops from all the ecclesiastical provinces participated: it was therefore the first council on a truly national scale. It promulgated 24 canons. In the first, in accordance with the apostolic see, was the condemnation of *Eutyches and *Nestorius; the others give prescriptions to the bishops, to the clergy and to monks, and the right of asylum in the church for indicted slaves is reaffirmed.

Eauze (551). Presided over by Metropolitan Aspasius (thus the council was titled Synodus Aspasii episcopi), it was held in the city of Eauze, and in seven canons it ruled on the ordination of deacons and priests, recommending that the people know the names in advance in order that they could formulate any objections.

Paris (552). Convened by King Childebert I, the council focused on Saffarac the bishop of *Paris, who was charged with grave sins, judged, condemned and banished to a monastery.

Arles (554). In seven canons, it addressed liturgical provisions and clerics who were despoiling church property.

Paris (556–573). The precise year of this council's convening is uncertain. Under the guidance of *Germanus bishop of Paris, it was concerned with the usurpation of ecclesiastical property and with incestuous marriages.

Saintes (561–567). Convened by Leontius of Bordeaux to depose Emerius, bishop of Saintes, whose election due to King *Chlothar I had not been approved by the metropolitan. But Charibert, successor to Chlothar, exiled Heraclius, elected to the post of Emerius, and condemned the bishops who had participated in the council to pay a fine. We have information about it in *Gregory of *Tours (Hist. Franc. IV, 26).

Tours (567). Gathered by the bishops of the kingdom of Charibert I, who in 28 canons fixed precise rules for provincial councils, for the removal of women from monasteries, and concerning "canonical clerics." Canon 20 alludes to the haeresis Nicolaitarum.

Lyons (567–570). Held in the sixth year of the reign of Guntram, it issued six canons for judging abuses and crimes committed by some bishops and established rules on disputes between bishops and on the validity of wills of clerics even if they differed from civil laws.

Paris (573). From Gregory of Tours (Hist. Franc. IV, 47) we know that this council intervened in the dispute between the sons of Chlothar I, King Guntram and King Sigebert. The latter, having founded a bishopric at Châteaudun, made it consecrate the first titular, Promotus, by Egidius of Reims, while the jurisdiction for such an appointment should have turned to the metropolitan of Sens, who was found in the kingdom of his brother Guntram. About the council there are two letters joined, one to Egidius of Reims, the other to King Sigebert: the first condemned the consecration of Promotus; the second was, however, more moderate.

Paris (577). Having lost the documents of this council, our source is Gregory of Tours, who in Hist. Franc. V, 18 informs us that the Fathers, gathered in Paris in 577, focused on Praetextatus, bishop of Rouen, accused by King *Chilperic I of many crimes. The king gave to the Fathers a "book of apostolic canons," which ratified the suspension of episcopal functions to whoever had been found guilty of homicide, adultery or perjury. According to some, there is an allusion to can. 25 of Canones apostolorum. The king obtained from the council the condemnation of Praetextatus.

Châlon-sur-Saône (579). Also for this council we have only the information provided by Gregory of Tours (Hist. Franc. V, 27): it renewed the sentence against two bishops, Salonius and Sagittarius, guilty of adultery and homicide.

Berny (580). Convened by King Chilperic in order to judge Gregory of Tours, accused of having defamed the queen Fredegund by attributing to her sexual relations with Bertram, bishop of Bordeaux. The Fathers recognized Gregory's innocence and excommunicated his slanderer, Leudast, Count of Tours.

Mâcon (581–583). The bishops of the kingdom of Guntram in 20 canons deliberated on disciplinary problems of clerics, on women's monasteries and on the immunity of the clergy facing the civil tribunal.

Mâcon (585). The second council held in this city in obedience to the will of King Guntram was not a national council, since the bishops of Childebert II's kingdom did not participate. Presided over by Metropolitan Priscus of Lyons, it promulgated 20 canons, concerning public ecclesiastical rights (reaffirming, among others, the privilegium fori for the clergy), morals (condemnation of incest), liturgical life of the priests and of the faithful. It is not known whether it was discussed in this council that *woman has a rational soul. Gregory of Tours (Hist. Franc. VIII, 20) reports that one bishop present maintained that the term homo could not be attributed to women.

Narbonne (589). Presided over by the bishop of Narbonne, Migetius, this council, convened by the *Visigoth king *Recared, disseminated 15 canons containing rules of conduct for clerics; liturgical prescriptions (abbreviations of long psalms, singing of the Gloria after every psalm); and precautions against fortunetellers, soothsayers and sorcerers.

Auxerre (561–605). This is the only diocesan synod of that period from which documents are preserved. Presided over by Bishop Aunacarius, it promulgated 45 canons with prescriptions to the clergy and the people (condemnation of adultery and incest, prohibition against working on *Sunday, prohibition against witchcraft etc.).

Paris (614). The most important of the Merovingian councils, convened by *Chlothar II and held in the church of St. Peter in Paris. Numerous bishops participated. The 15 canons promulgated were concerned with episcopal appointments (can. 2), the privileges and property of the church (declared inviolable), legal actions brought to the clergy, and the impediments to marriage between blood relations (can. 14).

Clichy (626–627). Ordered by Chlothar II, the council gathered in the basilica of St. Mary in Clichy. It disseminated 28 canons, the last of which is interesting for its novelty: no candidate could be elected as successor of a bishop who was not from the same place.

Châlon-sur-Saône (647–653). Convened by Clovis II, king of Neustria, this council disseminated 20 canons, many of which confirmed previous measures for the clergy. Notable was the agreement with *Nicaea and *Chalcedon in can. 1 and the prohibition against selling slaves outside the kingdom so that they would not end up under Jewish masters (can. 9).

Bordeaux (662–675). Held under Childeric II, one of the three sons of Clovis II. Three metropolitans of Aquitaine, 13 bishops, 2 abbots and some laymen gathered close to the city of Bordeaux, in the church of St. Peter in castrum Modogarnomum: they promulgated 4 canons condemning the worldly behavior found among the clergy.

Saint-Jean de Losne (673–675). Ordered by Childeric II, king of Neustria and Burgundy. The council promulgated 22 canons with rules of behavior for bishops and clerics. (Among others, it was clarified that the bishops could not elect their own successor and must preach to the people every Sunday.)

Concilia aevi merovingici, ed. F. Maassen: MGH I (Hannover 1893); Hfl-Lecl II, 2; Concilia Galliae A.511–A.695, ed. C. de Clercq: CCL 148A (Turnhout 1963); Palazzini, under the names of the individual cities; O. Pontal, Histoire des conciles merovingiens, Paris 1989; J. Gaudemet - B. Badesvant (eds.), Les canons des conciles merovingiens (VIe–VIIe siècle), Paris 1989; P. Mikat, Die Inzestgesetzgebung der merowingisch-frankischen Konzilien (511–626/ 627), Paderborn 1994; Y. Hen, Culture and Religion in Merovingian Gaul, A.D. 481–751, Leiden-New York-Cologne 1995; R. Mathisen (ed.), Society and Culture in Late Antique Gaul, Aldershot 2001.

L. Navarra

MESOPOTAMIA (Roman province). Greek term that refers to the territory between the two big rivers, the Euphrates and the Tigris; the term is also used for all the alluvial territory starting from the mountains of the N; many ancient authors, however, exclude Babylon (the central part). Today it corresponds to the territory of Iraq and a part of Turkey. In a larger sense Mesopotamia includes the territory between the mountains of Zagros (Iran), the Anti-Taurus Mountains, the Plateau of *Arabia and the Persian Gulf (Iraq, E *Syria and the SE part of Turkey). Since it was an important strategic point between Syria, *Cappadocia and the East, Mesopotamia was colonized by the *Seleucids; it was an area of continual conflict between *Romans and Parthians during the 1st c. and the *Sassanids from the 3rd c. on. It was conquered by *Trajan (prov. Mesopotamiae), abandoned by *Hadrian, reconquered by Lucius Verus (*Osroene). *Septimius Severus reorganized the Osroene, where Abgar IX, a vassal king, was on the throne and set up the province with the capital *Edessa (today Urfa, in Turkey) that extened to the Tigris in 195. He then created the province of Mesopotamia in 198, with the capital *Nisibis (today Nusaybin, in Turkey), with military garrisons at Rasaina and Singara, which became, with Nisibis, coloniae. Portions of the province were lost in the 2nd half of the 3rd c.; under *Diocletian and *Galerius the province of Osroene (capital Edessa) was recreated to the W as was the province of Mesopotamiae (capital Nisibis) to the E and beyond the Tigris with the annexation of the NW satrapy of the Sassanid Empire (E Turkey until the Lake of Van). It is not easy to determine the exact borders of this province, which often underwent variations, but the two provinces were organized in relation to the river Tigris and to the rivers Khabour (ancient Chaboras) and Gaghgagh (Roman fortress in Gaddala). Following the defeat and the death of *Julian the Apostate in 363, in E Mesopotamia, Nisibis, Singara (Tunaynir, Beled Singara) and Castrum Maurorum were ceded by *Jovian (*Ammianus Marc. 25,7-9; Lenski 161ff.); the capital of the redimensioned province became Amida, the current Diyarbakir. In 363 the abandoning of Nisibis was very painful (orientis firmissimum castrum, Ammianus Marc. 25,8,14; see the comment by J. Fontaine, Paris 1977, 257), and the city was evacuated of its inhabitants: among those transferred was *Ephrem the Syrian. The population was replaced with 12,000 *Persians, thus the city's ethnic composition changed. The frontier that was established, it would appear, was to the W of the river Mygdonis, over the Mons Masius (*Tur 'Abdin) and along the river Nymphius (Bohtan Su) extending into the Mountains of Taurus. This frontier endured until ca. 520. The limits of the frontier did not prevent the Christians from communicating among themselves, from moving, and from having a common spiritual and theological ethos. The Christians under the Sassanid Empire often suffered persecutions. The territory of high Mesopotamia was conquered by the Arabs in the course of the 7th c.: with the Battle of Yarmuk in 636 they occupied Syria and in 639 Edessa.

J.-M. Fiey, Jalons pour une histoire de l'Église en Iraq, CSCO 310, Subs. 36, Louvain 1970; F. De Maffei, Fortificazioni di Giustiniano sul limes orientale: monumenti e fonti, in The 17th Intern. Byzantine Congress, New Rochelle, New York 1986, 237-277; G. Bell, The Churches and Monasteries of the Tur 'Abdin, intr. and notes by M. Mango, London 1982 (regarding the provincial and diocesan divisions); R.C. Blockley, East Roman Foreign Policy: Formation and Conduct from Diocletian to Anastasius, Leeds 1992; F. Millar, The Roman Near East, 31 B.C.–A.D. 337, Cambridge, MA-London 1993; Handbuch der Orientalistik. 1, Nahe und Mittlere Osten, 42, Old Syriac Inscriptions of Edessa and Osrhoene, texts, transl. and comm. by H.J.W. Drijvers - J.F. Healy, Leiden 1999; G. del Olmo Lete - J.L. Montero Fenollós (eds.), Archaeology of the Upper Syrian Euphrates, Barcelona 1999; Mesopotamia and Iran in the Parthian and Sasanian Periods: Rejection and Revival, c. 238 BC–AD 642, Proceedings of a seminar in memory of Vladimir G. Lukonin, ed. J. Curtis, London 2000; S.K. Ross, Roman Edessa, London-New York 2001; C. Jullien - F. Jullien, Apôtres des confins. Processus missionnaires chrétiennes dans l'Empire perse, Bures-sur-Yvette 2002; The Roman Eastern Frontier and the Persian Wars: A Narrative History, Part 2, AD 363–628, ed. G. Greatrex - S.N.C. Lieu, London 2002; N. Lenski, Failure of Empire. Valens and the Roman State in the Fourth Century, Berkeley, CA 2002; Proceedings of the II Intern. Congress on the Archaeology of the Ancient Near East, ed. I. Thuesen, I-II, Winona Lake, IN 2004.

A. Di Berardino

MESOPOTAMIA, Christianity in. Tradition associates the names Thaddeus/*Addai, Mari, *Thomas and *Bartholomew with the origins of Christianity in Mesopotamia. Addai is said to have been the first to evangelize *Edessa. Having gone to that city shortly after the ascension of Jesus, he converted King *Abgar "the Black," his nobles and citizens, founded a church and established successors. The tradition concerning Addai is transmitted by *Eusebius (HE I, 13, and II, 1,6-7 in Greek), by *Moses of Khorene (II, 26-34 in Armenian), and in more extended form, by the Syriac Doctrina Addai, composed in the 4th–5th c. and based on traditions including ancient ones, as I explain in "Possible Historical Traces in the Doctrina Addai?" (paper presented at the International Meeting of the SBL, Groningen, 25-28 July 2004: Hugoye 9 [2006] §§1-24). Because the conversion of Abgar "the Black" around the mid-1st c. cannot be historically proven, the conversion of Abgar "the Great" around 200 seems more probable (for other possibilities, see C. and F. Jullien, Apôtres des confines, Bures-sur-Yvette 2002, 124-125). It is attested by his contemporaries *Bardesanes of Edessa and Julius Africanus, who lived at his court, and suggested by other sources. The Chronicle of Edessa, as well as other historical documents, provide evidence for the existence of a church and a Christian community at Edessa during his reign (see my Edessa e i Romani tra Augusto e i Severi: Aevum 73 [1999] 107-143 and Traces).

According to tradition, the apostolate of Addai was continued by Mari, who spread his preaching from Edessa to all of Mesopotamia acc. to the *Acts of (Mar) Mari, a *Syriac apocryphal writing of the 5th–6th c., rich in historical information drawn from traditions of the first two centuries and later sources. Mari, a disciple of Addai at Edessa, at the behest of his teacher and predecessor and thanks as well to the help of his disciples, is said to have preached, made converts and founded churches and schools from *Nisibis in *Osroene and Arbela in Assyria, through S Mesopotamia, Babylon, Susiana, all the way to Persia, evangelizing *Seleucia as well. His itinerary followed the course of the Tigris and took place between the missionary field of Addai, in the region of Osroene (Edessa and N Mesopotamia), and that of Thomas at the border of the Eastern empire, in the furthest area of Persia and in India. In ch. 31 of the Acts of Mari a description is found of how Addai had already evangelized merchants, who contributed to the spread of Christianity in Persia even before Mari arrived there. This seems to have some historical foundation, given the role carried out by merchants and by merchant roads in the evangelization of the East (see, e.g., Jullien, Apôtres, 215ff.). In fact, Christianity arrived in Persia early, probably from *Adiabene (*Persia). The so-called anaphora of Addai and Mari is one of the most ancient monuments of the Syro-Mesopotamian liturgy.

Finally, the origins of the church in Mesopotamia, India and Parthia are ascribed to Thomas and Bartholomew: To the first is attributed only Parthia in the tradition received by *Origen in *Eusebius (HE 3, 1); then in the sources there is a missionary journey which goes all the way to India, sometimes passing through the Iranian regions and the Bactrian region. The Indian tradition had great influence thanks to the Acts of Thomas, redacted at Edessa in the 1st decades of the 3rd c.The origins of the church in India, Mesopotamia, Parthia and Armenia are variously attributed to Bartholomew, acc. to Eusebius, already in the 2nd c. *Pantaenus, in his mission to India, found inhabitants in possession of the gospel of *Matthew in Hebrew or Aramaic, taken there by Bartholomew in the preceding century (see ch. 3-4 in my Gli Apostoli in India, with C. Dognini, Milan, 2001; Jullien, Apôtres, 43-52; 79-108).

The Doctrine also attests to the use of the Diatessaron* of *Tatian, the Syrian disciple of *Justin, in Mesopotamia. This harmony of the gospels, composed in the 2nd half of the 2nd c., spread quickly in the Syro-Mesopotamian areas (see, e.g., T. Baarda, Essays on the Diatessaron, Kampen 1994; W.L. Petersen, Tatian's Diatessaron*: Its Creation, Dissemination, Significance and History in Scholarship*, Leiden 1994; N. Perrin, Thomas and Tatian, Leiden 2003). The Diatessaron was later replaced by the *Peshitta (for the vast bibl. concerning this, see esp. I. Philips, The Importance of the Peshitta in Syriac Tradition: Harp 5 [1992] 67-91). In Edessa, *Rabbula in particular imposed the replacement. He was bishop from 411/412–435/436. Tatian is also one of the first supporters of *encratism, which spread widely in Syria-Mesopotamia, and can be considered as the form which Christianity assumed in those areas, acc. to S.R. Lloyd-Moffett ("The 'Heresy' of Encratism and the History of Christianity in Eastern Syria," paper presented at the Annual Meeting of the SBL, Atlanta, GA, 22-25 Nov 2003).

Turning from apocryphal Acts to historical documents, the epitaph of *Abercius attests to the presence of Christian communities in the 2nd half of the 2nd c. in Syria, at Nisibis and in general in the area of Mesopotamia beyond the Euphrates. The Christian Abercius writes that he took a trip to those regions in addition to Rome, and that he found people of the same religion "everywhere" (see, e.g., my L'epitafio di Abercio: Aevum 74 [2000] 191-206). At this time, the presence of Christianity in Mesopotamia is now certain. At Edessa not only was there a Christian community at the time of Abgar the Great, but also the school of *Bardesanes, which had tendencies that, though not entirely orthodox, were certainly Christian. The principal document passed down to us from this school, in Syriac, apart from fragments in Greek translation, is the Book of Laws of Countries. There we find in the words of Bardesanes a witness to the wide dissemination of Christianity in the East at the end of the 2nd c., in Edessa, Hatra, Gilan and among the Galatians, in Parthia, Media and Persia, as far as among the Qushan (see H.J.W. Drijvers, Bardaiṣan of Edessa, Assen 1966; J. Teixidor, Bardesane d'Édesse, Paris 1992; my own Linee generali per una presentazione e per un commento del "Liber legum regionum": RIL 133 [1999] 311-355, with bibl.).

A noteworthy document for the centures between the end of the 1st and beginning of the 2nd to the 5th c. is the *Chronicle of Arbela. Its historicity has recently been reevaluated (see my Il Chronicon di Arbela, Madrid 2002, intr. and n. 5, as well as C. and F. Jullien, La Chronique d'Arbèles: OC 85 [2001] 41-83 and Apôtres, 132-136; my Il Chronicon di Arbela: una messa a punto storiografica: Aevum 80 [2006] 145-164). It was composed in the 6th c. and based on ancient sources—among these "Abel the Teacher," from which it drew information on the first bishops of Arbela and on oral sources. The Chronicon follows, bishop by bishop, the history of the church of Assyria, and between events of religious and political history, provides important information regarding the first spread of Christianity in Mesopotamia and the difficulties it encountered. The foundation of the church of Arbela is said to go back to Addai: The first bishop of Adiabene, Peqida, was ordained by Addai, who had converted him to Christianity, despite the opposition of his parents, who were pagan magi (ch. 1). At that time, the majority of Mesopotamia was pagan, as is evident also from the preaching of Peqida to the pagan crowds. If he became bishop after having listened to Addai for 5 years, this means that after having come to Osroene around the mid-1st c., Addai was still alive around the end of the 1st c. According to his Acts, Mari, the evangelist of Mesopotamia, was also in Arbela and in Adiabene, as well as in Nisibis, where he converted the local sovereign.

The successor of Peqida, Shemshon, was ordained at the beginning of the 2nd c. by Mazra, the bishop of Beth Zabdai, N of Adiabene, where there was already a Christian community. Abel also attests to the preaching of Mazra in the villages near Arbela, among the pagans. Mazra went to Arbela with merchants. Their role in the spread of Christianity in Mesopotamia is confirmed by other sources as well. In the Chronicle we also find information on the anti-Christian persecutions in Mesopotamia. Those of the Roman Empire did not reach the area E of the Euphrates, and the Parthian kings did not promote them, but the magi, the priestly cast of Zoroaster, attacked the Christians out of religious hostility, as is reflected in the Acts of Mari (concerning the magi, see at least M. Bussagli - M.G. Chiappori, I Re Magi, Milan 1985; G. Gnoli, s.v. Magi, in The Encyclopedia of Religion, ed. M. Eliade, IX, New York-London 1987, 80-81; A.F. De Jong, Traditions of the Magi, Leiden 1997; J. Duchesne-Guillemin, I tre saggi e la stella, Rimini 1999; W. Burkert, L'avvento dei Magi, in Da Omero ai Magi, ed. C. Antonetti, Venice 1999, 87-111). They brought about the imprisonment and death of Bishop Shemshon in 123 because he preached among the pagans (ch. 2).

Among the converts to Christianity in Mesopotamia, already in the 2nd c. there were also nobles, such as Raqbakt (ch.3), a rich noble entrusted by the Parthian Vologases II with the governance of Adiabene. For fear of the king, he had his baptism carried out in secret, but supported the spread of Christianity in the neighboring regions. In this case as well it was not the political authorities who acted against him but the "pagan priests," the magi, who, in the period of *Antoninus Pius, in order to kill him, sent men to him pretending to be diplomats from Rome. Only because of the arrival of one true legate, on behalf of King Vologases, was he not killed. As a Parthian noble, he was required to go to Ctesiphon with his personal army, in order to help the king against the rebellious mountain dwellers. At that point, the magi, intent upon "striking at the heart" of the local Christian community, directed their efforts against the bishop of Arbela, Isaac, imprisoning him. But Raqbakt, as governor of Adiabene, ordered them from Ctesiphon to free the bishop, threatening with death whoever disobeyed. In ch. 4, the magi persecute the Christians of Adiabene, confiscating their possessions and bringing upon them other difficulties. The bishop of Adiabene, Abraham I, went to Vologases III in Ctesiphon, confident that he would obtain from the Parthian king a rescript in favor of the Christians, that the magi not oppress them unjustly.

Another noble who converted to Christianity was Razshah, prefect of a large village of Adiabene (ch. 5). The bishop Noah, fearing that he had been poisoned by the magi, hid in this village, in the house of this Christian noble. Then he went to the region of Nineveh and, having opposed their belief in a sacred tree (a pagan cult widely practiced in Mesopotamia and also attested to in the Acts of Mari), he was imprisoned by the pagans. Only in hiding did Noah return to Arbela, and upon his death it was not possible to elect a successor immediately, because of the hostility of the magi and the pagans. The pagans arrived to seize the children of Christians and to pillage and oppress the Christians (ch. 5). It was due to the magi that the anti-Christian persecutions under the *Sassanids were brought about as well from 224 on. Already before the imperial edicts, there was a persecution looming from the pagans. E.g., in ca. 280 the bishop of Beth Zabdai—preaching against the passing nature of earthly kingdoms in *Seleucia-Ctesiphon, seat of the Persian kings with a strong concentration of pagans—was denounced by a pagan before the nobles of the king and had to flee. But the Christians of Ctesiphon had assistance within the royal household and succeeded, by means of gifts, in convincing a noble to rehabilitate the Christians in the eyes of the king.

However, while persecutions in the Roman Empire had ceased from *Constantine on, in 340, through the instigation of the magi, *Shapur II decided to "uproot from the earth the religion of the Romans," i.e., Christianity (ch. 12). He ordered the destruction of churches and the killing of Christians. The magi sought to strike esp. at clerical leaders, and led the patriarch of the East and 102 priests and deacons to the king after they refused to adore the sun (the Zoroastrian sun cult is recorded as competing with Christianity also in the Acts of Mari, 23-25), who were then decapitated. The persecution, in which many Christians, clerics and laypeople, were killed, lasted until 351, and its virulence depended on the severity of the local governors: e.g., in Adiabene the Mauhpata Pagrasp was very mild in the application of the edict, while his two successors were more intransigent. Under *Yazdegerd (399–420) and Bahram (420–438) there were still persecutions and a new war "between the pagan Persians and the Christian Romans," while Peroz (459–484), although pagan, helped the Christians and had as his counselor the learned theologian Barsauma of Nisibis.

The areas of Mesopotamia which were not under the control of the Persian Empire were not subject to persecutions. In the Osroene area, after Constantine there was a process of Romanization and Christianization, esp. of the Syro-Mesopotamian aristocracy, of which we see a reflection in the Doctrina Addai, acc. to A. Mirkovic (Prelude to Constantine, Berlin 2004). This (acc. to S.H. Griffith, The Doctrina) and many other documents, esp. synodal Acts and theological writings, also attest to the extensive dogmatic debate taking place in the church in Syria-Mesopotamia during that period, above all with respect to christological questions, in which *monophysites and *Nestorians were in opposition. We must keep in mind the profound influence exercised on the Christianity of Mesopotamia by *Ephrem (2nd half of the 4th c.), from the doctrinal and also ascetical point of view (see K. den Biesen, Bibliography of St. Ephrem the Syrian, Giove, Umbria 2002); Ephrem was also an exegete in Nisibis. An increase in the first spread of Christianity in the Persian Empire was checked due to the deportations of thousands of prisoners from the cities of Syria to Persia in the times of the military campaigns of *Shapur I against the Roman Empire, in 253–260. We learn from the synodal Acts of the E Syrian church that these Aramean and Greek Christians integrated well in Persia and established the ecclesiastical structure there.

The spread of Christianity in Mesopotamia is also shown in the construction of churches and monasteries. Around 140 "a grand church, excellently laid out" was erected at Arbela (Chronicle of Arbela, 3) and around 190 another (ch. 6 and 9). Both were standing at the time of the redaction of the chronicle. In the period of the Severi there was peace and prosperity for the Christians; in Adiabene, churches were built and monasteries flourished (ch.7). In the 5th c. the local bishop had 25 churches built in Adiabene and the church of Arbela renovated and decorated (ch. 18). Between the end of the period of the Severi and the beginning of the Persian domination, while persecutions were resumed in the Roman Empire with *Maximinus Thrax, in Mesopotamia there was peace and there were "many Christians"; not even Artaxerxes's order to construct temples of the sun led to persecutions (ch. 8-9). The church of Adiabene had "more than 20 bishoprics," accurately enumerated and corresponding to identifiable localities; nearby Nisibis, however, where Mari had preached and where Abercius attests to having seen a Christian community in the 2nd half of the 2nd c., and Seleucia-Ctesiphon, where Mari had also preached, did not have a bishop under the Parthians for fear of the pagans. But with the coming of the Persians, the Christians in these places had a pastor as well. In fact, Ganzeqan, a rich Christian general in the army of Shapur I, having come to know of the presence of "many Christians" everywhere in Adiabene, around 240 asked the bishop of Arbela to visit the Christians of Ctesiphon. The bishop went there and ordained a priest, remaining in the city for two years (ch. 9).

In the 5th decade of the 3rd c., the bishop of Beth Zabdai in Mesopotamia went to Adiabene and was amazed at the prosperity of the local church, at the "great number of Christians" and at the "greatness of the eparchy of Adiabene and its ecclesiastical and apostolic canons," which indicate organization and a presence of written texts. In fact, at that time, the episcopal throne of Adiabene began to be called "the high see" and Adiabene the "eparchy." Already in the 4th decade of the 2nd c. a synod had declared Arbela a metropolitan see, having six suffragans (ch. 16), easily identifiable. In the Chronicle, the first patriarch of Seleucia-Ctesiphon is named Papa bar Aggai, "the Aramean." (In the Acts of Mari, in an anachronism aimed at conferring prestige on the patriarchal see, he becomes the first successor of Mari in the see of Kuke.) He is said to have been nominated in 291 by the Mesopotamian bishops of Arbela and Susa upon the request of the inhabitants of Ctesiphon who still did not have a patriarch, although the city at that point already numbered many Christians. He died before 329. Ch. 11 narrates the attempt of the bishop to obtain primacy over the other Eastern bishoprics, giving as reason the political preeminence of his see. The priests of Seleucia disagreed, and the archdeacon Simeon, son of intimates of the king, united with two bishops, of Susa and of Karka de-Beth Selok, and wrote to the bishop of Edessa, a point of reference because of its antiquity and prestige. But other bishops wrote to Constantine, arguing that in the Roman Empire there were the patriarchates of *Antioch, *Rome, *Alexandria and *Constantinople, and it was just that there be at least that of Seleucia in the East.

The patriarchate of Papa is the first historically attested from the E Syrian patriarchal lists. The first known recension of these is that of Elijah of Damascus (on the see, see M. Moberg, The Patriarchal See of Antiochia and Seleucia/Ktesiphon: Harp 5 [1992] 99-109). His name is found in the most ancient E Syrian synodal Acts. The Acts of the synod of 424 indicate that the see of Seleucia already existed before Papa, as did the see of other episcopal cities such as Kashkar and *Beth Lapat. In fact, various lists mention 5 bishops before the patriarch. The sources associate the patriarchate of Seleucia either with Antioch or with *Jerusalem (see Assemani, BO, II, 387-397; Chabot, Synodicon, 47; Scher, Histoire, 236 [26]; Jullien, Actes 2001, 48-53; 227-236, Ramelli, Atti di Mâri, intr.).

The Chronicle also attests to the presence of Jews among the Christians of Mesopotamia. Abraham I, the third bishop of Arbela, was the son of a Christian of Arbela, but one who came from a family from Herda near the Hesna 'Ebraja ("fortress of the Hebrews") (ch. 4). Noah (or Noh), his successor, came from a Jewish family which had moved to Jerusalem in the 1st half of the 2nd c., where Noah came to know the Christians in the local community. Later he and his family came to Adiabene "because many Jews were there." Even around 300, the bishop John converted "many Jews" in Arbela (ch. 12). Other bishops were of pagan origins (chs. 1; 6), or Christian (chs. 8-9; 11-12; 15; 17-19), or came from mixed families of pagans and Christians (chs. 10; 16). Also in ch. 30 of the Acts of Mari, e.g., the apostle is said to have evangelized "many Jews" on the banks of the Tigris. In fact, already around the 2nd half of the 1st c., Josephus (JW, pref.) witnesses to the presence of Jews among "Parthians, Babylonians, Arabs [such were the people of Osroene], Jews from beyond the Euphrates and Adiabene," and JW II, 16, expressly mentions the Jews of Adiabene. The Jewish presence is all the more interesting, as the first missionaries in Mesopotamia, who often followed the merchant roads in their travels, were certainly *Jewish Christians and often addressed the Jews, just as Paul, who had first preached in synagogues wherever he went. (Concerning the category of Jewish Christianity, see R.A. Taylor, The Phenomenon of Jewish Christianity: Vchr 44 [1990] 313-334; D. Marguerat [ed.] Le déchirement, Geneva 1996; S.C. Minouni, Le judéo-christianisme syriaque, in VI Symposium Syriacum, ed. R. Lavenant, Rome 1994, OCA 247, 269-279; Id., Le judéo-christianisme ancien, Paris 1998; G. Filoramo - C. Gianotto [ed.], Verus Israel, Brescia 2001; G. Jossa, Giudei o Cristiani?, Brescia 2004.) Edessa played an important role as a center from which preaching spread and was later also a center of Christian culture.

Starting at the end of the 3rd c., Christianity in Mesopotamia had to deal with *Manichean preaching. (Concerning this topic, see at least H. Waldmann, Mâni, das Christentum, und der Iran, in Lebendige Überlieferung. Festschrift H.J. Vogt, eds. N. El-Khoury - H. Crouzel - R. Reinhardt, Beirut 1992, 356-364; C. Roemer, Manis frühe Missionsreisen, Opladen 1994; Manicheismo e Oriente cristiano antico, eds. L. Cirillo - A. van Tongerloo, Louvain-Naples 1997; Studia Manichaica. IV, ed. R. Emmerich - W. Sundermann - P. Zieme, Berlin 2000; cf. M. Tardieu, Il Manicheismo, It. tr., ed. G. Sfameni Gasparro, Cosenza 1988.) It seems that some apocryphal writings, such as the Doctrina Addai and above all the Acts of Mari, were redacted based on ancient traditions which long preceded them, in a context of anti-Manichean polemics. The itinerary of Mari in Mesopotamia coincides with that of Mani, even if in the opposite direction, and many centers in Mesopotamia are connected with both of them. The names of the disciples of Mari are similar to or identical with the names of the disciples of Mani: Adda, Papos/Papa, Tumis. The Mesopotamian baptist context which Mani came out of is reflected with precision in the Acts of Mari. (Groups of baptist Jewish Christians settled there at the beginning of the 3rd c., in S Mesopotamia, esp. in Mesene.) The relation between the traditions of Mani and of Mari is studied by Jullien and Jullien (e.g., Origines, 27-40 and 72ff.; Actes 2001, 41-46). The anti-Manichean character of the Doctrina Addai was upheld by Drijvers (Addai und Mari). Manicheism spread rapidly in Mesopotamia and in Persia, due esp. to the support of Shapur I and of some local sovereigns such as Bat, the governor of Mesene, and quickly reached India and Egypt, where the first disciples of Mani, Pattiq and Adda, preached (see G. Gnoli, L'esperienza manichea, in Potere e religione nel mondo indo-mediterraneo tra Ellenismo e tarda antichità, Incontro di studio della SISR, Roma, 28-29 ottobre 2004, Rome 2009, 151-160).

In the Chronicle of Arbela, the Manicheans of Mesopotamia appear as instigators of the anti-Christian persecutions in the Sassanid period. Under Shapur II, there came the first edict of anti-Christian persecution in the East in 340 (concerning this, see W. Schwaigert, Aspects of the Persecution of Christians in the Sasanian Empire During the Reign of Shapur II: Harp 1,2-3 [1988] 72-82; A.V. Williams, Zoroastrians and Christians in Sasanian Iran: BJRL 78,3 [1996] 37-53). The chronicler records that those who convinced the king to promulgate the edict, and then not to revoke it, as he desired, and instead to force Christians to pay a double tax pro capite, were "the Jews and the Manicheans, who induced the magi." These were the supporters of anti-Christian persecutions, declaring that "Christians were all spies of the Romans and that they never came to know of anything connected to the Persian kingdom. They did not immediately write to their brothers there. . . . The Manicheans ridiculed us even more than the Jews and considered us the refuse of the people" (ch. 12, pp. 53-54 Kawerau). The same religious groups that supported this anti-Christian persecution attest once again to the high social status of many Christians in Mesopotamia, accusing them of being "rich" and of "glorying in a leisurely life" (ibid.). Still, as is stated by A. Panaino (Regalità sacra e conflittualità politico-religiosa nell'Iran tardo-antico, in Religione e potere, cit.), the persecutions were also fomented by intrigues in the court with Christian factions that furnished the Zoroastrians with denunciations of other Christians.

Christianity in Mesopotamia also had to deal with the *Marcionite heresy, which, after having been confined to Upper Mesopotamia between the 2nd and 3rd c., spread widely in Persia, as is spoken of by *Epiphanius (Pan. XLII, 1,1). This was probably due to the Syrians who were deported (see J.M. Fiey, Les marcionites dans les textes historiques de l'Eglise de Perse: LM 8 [1970] 183-188). It was combated by Ephrem and his disciples Zenobius and Paulonas (Assemani, BO, III, I, 63; 118-128). In the mid-4th c. *Aphraates (Dem. de ieiun. III, 9) presents Marcionism as a danger for the Christian communities, and the Chronicle of Seert sees it as one of the principal problems of the end of the 3rd c., in the period of the catholicos Papa (Scher, Histoire, 237 [27]).

The Chronicle of Arbela also speaks of the two most important cultural centers of ancient Christian Mesopotamia, about which we have many sources: in ch. 18 an ample excursus is dedicated to the school of Edessa, which in the mid-5th c. was directed by *Ibas. At his death, some of his disciples broke off and founded the school of Nisibis. The Nestorian Barsauma, metropolitan bishop of *Nisibis, brought *Narsai there, who had fled from Edessa, and he founded the school, a center for the promotion of Nestorianism. Many of the people of Adiabene studied in Nisibis; among these were three bishops of Arbela (chs. 18-20): Abbushta; Joseph, who was a disciple of Narsai and studied the exegetical texts of *Theodore of Mopsuestia; and *Henana, also a disciple of Narsai and author of exegetical works inspired by his teacher. During his episcopacy he went to Nisibis to settle some controversies. In 363 Jovian had ceded Nisibis to Shapur II—who had it recolonized by Persians—with the five trans-Tigritan provinces, which had become dioceses dependent on Nisibis.

Another important source is the Cause of the Foundation of the Schools, composed between 581 and 604 as an inaugural discourse at the opening of the courses of the school of Nisibis by *Barhadbeshabba, bishop of Halwan and scholar at Nisibis when Henana of Adiabene (d. 612) was active there, who was very much admired by him. According to Becker (Fear, 273-315), we cannot speak of a school of Edessa as an institution before the so-called school of the Persians. After the closure of this school by order of the emperor *Zeno in 489, the followers of the theology of Theodore of Mopsuestia (392–428) went to Nisibis. Theodore was of the school of Antioch, and was venerated by the Syro-Nestorians, who considered him "the Exegete" par excellence. His writings were condemned posthumously in the 2nd Council of *Constantinople in 553, together with those of his teacher *Diodore of Tarsus (see Becker, Fear, and Ramelli Barhadbəšabbā). Nestorius of Constantinople became a supporter of Theodore's teaching, which did not admit of a *hypostatic union of the divine nature and the human nature in Christ. In the school of Edessa, on the initiative of the bishop Ibas (d. 457) and of his disciples, the works of Theodore were translated from Greek into Syriac in the 1st half of the 5th c. In the 6th c., some bishops of Edessa, e.g., Jacob Baradeus, in order to combat Nestorian ideas, adopted theses influenced by monophysitism and the idea of the prevalence in Christ of the divine nature over the human nature. In 482, the Henoticon of Zeno, inspired by *Acacius of Constantinople and immediately condemned by Pope *Felix III, sought to bring about unity once again around the Nicene Creed, but it was opposed by monophysites and *Chalcedonians, who reaffirmed the dual nature of Christ. At Edessa, already a center for the study of the theology of Theodore and of the Nestorian line of thought, monophysitism entered in.

*Monasticism in the Syro-Mesopotamian area seems to have ancient roots. The Chronicle of Arbela, ch. 7, speaks of monasteries in the period of the Severi. The Life and Letters of St. Anthony, soon translated into Syriac, had a notable influence there, as did the lives and sayings of the other fathers of the desert, the Historia Monachorum and the Historia Lausiaca, which explains the strong Egyptian influence on Syro-Eastern monasticism, and the insertion in the Life of Ephrem of a visit which he made to the holy men of Egypt. *Evagrius of Pontus (d. 399) was very important. His Kephalaia Gnostica were commented on by *Babai the Great. Also important was the corpus of ps.-*Dionysius, composed in Syria in the late 5th c., translated by *Sergius of Resh'ayna, and immediately spread with success among the monophysites (see J.M. Hornus, Le corpus dionysien en syriaque: Parole de l'Orient 1 [1970] 69-93; C. Moreschini, Storia della filosofia patristica, Brescia 2004, 687-704). Also important was *Stephen Bar Sudhaile, the Origenist author of the Book of Saint Ierotheus (the presumed teacher of the Areopagite: see A. Louth, Denys the Areopagite, Wilon, CT 1989).

Monasticism in Mesopotamia had not only an ascetical role—in conformity with the line of Ephrem or *Aphraates and reflected also in the Doctrina Addai and in the Acts of Mari—but also a cultural role, and was soon connected with schools and centers of learning. The school of Nisibis itself, directed acc. to the Statutes (see A. Vööbus, ed., The Statutes of the School of Nisibis, Stockholm 1962, and analyzed by Becker, Fear, 77-97, 169-203), was regulated after the manner of a monastery (Gero, Barsauma, 67). Its statutes are comparable with those of a monastery founded in 571 on Mount *Izla by Abraham and Kashkar, who studied at Nisibis. The monastery was later directed by *Dadisho and *Babai the Great, a Nestorian of the 6th–7th c., supervisor of monasteries and author of ascetical precepts (G. Chediath, Mar Babai the Great: Some Useful Counsels on the Ascetical Life, Kottayam 2001). Both the monastery and the school were directed by a head and an assistant. In both institutions the members, monks or students, focused their lives on work and prayer. No student in the school was allowed to remain alone in his cell to study, eat, etc. The monastic orientation, however, was less intellectual. There the prayer of the heart was developed (see S.P. Brock, The Prayer of the Heart in the Syriac Tradition: Alliance for Internat. Monasticism, Bulletin 72 [2001] 49-57), and sometimes in the monastic circles there was a criticism of "philosophy" (the study of the logical works of Aristotle) and of the eskolaye, e.g., in Dadisho or in Shem'on d-Taybutheh, a monastic author of the late 7th c. who considered philosophical education and logic (both of which these monks had studied) as a stage of the spiritual life anterior to the contemplative life. But *Thomas of Marga compared the monks of his day to the ancient philosophers, projecting onto the latter the way of life of the monks.

From the late 6th to the late 8th c. the monasteries were also centers of production of literary works. An example is *Isaac of Nineveh, whose thought appears Evagrian. There were many monastic schools in the Syro-Mesopotamian area. These offered an elementary education required by the elites of the church of the East. There was, e.g., the school of the monastery of Babai the Great, or that of Daniel the Penitent around 570–580, or that of Mar Abda, mentioned in the Chronicle of Seert. This last existed from the late 4th c., and its founder sent his students to study in Edessa. It was destroyed around 460–480 by order of the Persian Peroz. The school of Hirta was founded by Qiyore, a disciple of Mar Aba, and Barsauma studied there, the metropolitan of Nisibis in the 7th c. Other schools, founded at the end of the 6th–beginning of the 7th c., were not dependent on one local church or monastery. Independent in this way was the school of *Seleucia-Ctesiphon, founded, acc. to the Chronicon of Seert, by the catholicos Mar Aba (540–553), and the school of Arbela, said to have been founded by the bishop Abraham in Henana with Paul the Lector (see Ramelli, Chronicon di Arbela, and D. Gutas, Paul the Persian on the Classification of the Parts of Aristotle's Philosophy: Der Islam 60 [1983] 231-267), and, perhaps, the schools of Kashkar and of Balad.

One place of learning and asceticism was the school founded near a martyrion at the entrance of the city of Nisibis, where professors and students of the school of Nisibis came to teach. The schools of the country were not associated with large ecclesiastical or monastic centers. They introduced the students to Scripture, basic literature and exegesis; from there the students went on to the monastic schools. An important figure in these small schools was *Babai of Gbilta at the beginning of the 8th c. His student Abraham became in turn a celebrated master. (See, e.g., S. Beggiani, Intr. to Eastern Christian Spirituality: The Syriac Tradition, London 1991; S. Elm, "Virgins of God," New York 1994; F.H. Griffith, Asceticism in the Church of Syria, in Asceticism, eds. V.L. Wimbush - R. Valantasis, New York 1995, 220-245; A. de Vogüé, Histoire littéraire du monachisme, IV-V, Paris 1997–1998; var. aus., Le monachisme syriaque, I, Patrimoine Syriaque, Actes du Colloque V, Antelias 1998; G. Blum, "In der Wolke des Lichtes"... Spiritualität und Mystik des Christlichen Ostens, Erlangen 2001; Becker, Fear, 316-359, esp. for the relation with the schools, and 126-154 for the important reception of the logic of Aristotle in the Syro-Mesopotamian schools and the use of Aristotle, esp. his logic, "Neoplatonized," received both by Edessa and by Nisibis, thanks also to Sergius of Resh'ayna [d. ca. 536], who translated into Syriac the Greek Neoplatonic commentators on Aristotle.) Both centers spread Greek philosophy in Mesopotamia. (See S. Brock, From Antagonism to Assimilation: Syriac Attitudes to Greek Learning, in East of Byzantium, eds. N.G. Garsoian - T.F. Mathews - R.W. Thomson, Washington, D.C. 1982, 19-34; H. Hugonnard-Roche, L'Organon, Tradition syriaque et arabe, in Dictionnaire des philosophes antiques, I, ed. R. Goulet, Paris 1989, 502-528; E. Hunter, The Transmission of Greek Philosophy via the "School of Edessa," in Literacy, Education and Manuscript Transmission in Byzantium and Beyond, eds. C. Holmes - J. Waring, Boston 2002, 225-239.) When the school of Athens was closed, various professors came to live in Harran, near Nisibis, and were able to influence the culture of Nisibis. At the beginning of the 6th c., W Syrian scholars, including translators and commentators of Aristotle, began to move to Persia.

Some basic sources: J. Assemani, Bibliotheca Orientalis Clementino-Vaticana, Rome: I, 1719; II, 1721; III, I, 1725; III, II, 1728; repr. Piscataway, NJ 2002 ; Id., De Catholicis seu Patriarchis Chaldaeorum et Nestorianorum commentarius, Rome 1740; 1775; repr. Piscataway, NJ 2004; Synodicon Orientale, ed. J.B. Chabot, Paris 1902; Histoire nestorienne inédite (Chronique de Séert) I/1, ed. A. Scher, in PO, IV, Paris 1907, 215 [5]–311 [101]; I/2, in PO, V,2, Paris 1907, repr. Turnhout 1981, 219 [107]-344 [242]; II/2, in PO, VII,2, Paris 1950, 97 [5]-203 [111]; II/2, in PO, XIII,4, Turnhout 1983, 427 [16]-639 [319]; Mar Barhadbšabba 'Arbaya. Cause de la fondation des écoles, ed. Id., in PO, IV, 1908, 316-404 (repr. 1981); W. Witakowski, Chronicles of Edessa, OS 33-35 (1984–1986), 497-498; Les Actes de Mâr Mâri, eds. C. and F. Jullien, CSCO 602, Syri 234-235, Louvain 2003; Chronica Minora, I-II, eds. J.B. Chabot - I. Guidi, CSCO 1-4, Syri, 1-4, Louvain 1904; repr. 1955; Die Chronik von Arbela, ed. P. Kawerau, CSCO 468, Syri, 200, Louvain 1985; A. Gelston, The Eucharistic Prayer of Addai and Mâri, Oxford 1991; Clavis Apocryphorum Novi Testamenti (CC), ed. M. Geerard, Turnhout 1992, 65-70 (Legenda Abgari Regis Edessae); 147-152 (Acta Thomae); Histoire du roi Abgar et de Jésus, tr. of the Syriac of the Doctrine d'Addaï par A. Desreumaux; tr. of a Gk tr. by A. Palmer; tr. of an Ethiopian tr. by R. Beylot, Turnhout 1993; I. Ramelli, Atti di Mâri, intr., tr. and comm., Brescia 2007, with ample documentation. Recent studies on archaeology in the ancient Near East, e.g., Proceedings of the II Intern. Congress on the Archaeology of the Ancient Near East, ed. I. Thuesen, I-II, Winona Lake, IN 2004; Near Eastern Archaeology, ed. S. Richard, Winona Lake, IN 2005.

Some important studies other than those cited in the text: A. Vööbus, History of the School of Nisibis, CSCO 266 Subs. 26, Louvain 1955; J.M. Fiey, Assyrie chrétienne, I-III, Beirut 1965–1968; Id., Jalons pour une histoire de l'église en Iraq, CSCO 310 Subs. 36, Louvain 1970; Id., Nisibe, CSCO 388, Louvain 1977; Id., Pour un Oriens Christianus Novus: Répertoires des dioceses syriaques, Beirut 1993; B. Segal, Edessa, the Blessed City, Oxford 1970; Piscataway, NJ ²2001; K. Schippmann, Grundzüge der parthischen Geschichte, Darmstadt 1980; A. de Halleux, Die Genealogie des Nestorianismus nach der früh monophysitischen Theologie: OC 66 (1982) 1-14; R. Macina, L'homme à l'école de Dieu: d'Antioche à Nisibe: POC 32 (1982) 87-124; 263-301; 33 (1983) 39-103; H.J.W. Drijvers, Addai und Mâni, in III Symposium Syriacum, ed. R. Lavenant, Rome 1983, OCA 221, 171-185; M. van Esbroeck, L'Apôtre Thaddée et le roi Sanatrouk, in II Simposio Int. Armenia-Assiria, eds. M. Nordio - B.L. Zekiyan, Venice 1984, 84-106; M.L. Chaumont, La Christianisation de l'Empire iranien, CSCO 499 Subs. 80, Louvain 1988; A. Desreumaux, La Doctrina Addai: Apocrypha 1 (1990) 249-267; J. Teixidor, La filosofía traducida. Crónica parcial de Edesa en los primeros siglos, Barcelona 1991; V. Desprez, L'ascétisme mésopotamien au IVe siècle. I: Saint Éphrem: Lettre de Ligugé 258 (1991) 3-19; II: Aphraate: Lettre de Ligugé 259 (1992) 5-15; S. Gero, Barsauma, CSCO 426, Louvain 1991; M. Sartre, L'Orient romain, Paris 1991; G. Troupeau, Le rôle des syriaques dans la trasmission et l'exploitation du patrimoine philosophique et scientifique grec: Arabica 39 (1991) 1-10; F. Millar, The Roman Near East, 31 B.C.–A.D. 337, Cambridge, MA - London 1993; M. Esbroeck, Neuf listes d'apôtres orientales: Augustinianum 34 (1994) 109-199; S.P. Brock, L'Église de l'Orient dans l'Empire sassanide: Istina 40 (1995) 25-43; H.J.W. Drijvers, East of Antioch, London 1984; Id., Nisibis: TRE 24, Berlin 1994, 573-576; J.W. Drijvers - A.A. MacDonald, Centres of Learning: Learning and Location in Pre-Modern Europe and the Near East, Leiden 1995 (here esp.: H.J.W. Drijvers, The School of Edessa, 49-59 and G.J. Reinink, Edessa Grew Dim and Nisibis Shone Forth, 77-89); J. Yacoub, Babylone chrétienne: géopolitique de l'église de Mesopotamie, Paris 1996; J.C. Reeves, Heralds of That Good Realm. Syro-Mesopotamian. Gnosis and Jewish Traditions, Leiden - New York - Cologne 1996; P. Bruns, Bischof Rabbula von Edessa, in VII Symposium Syriacum, ed. R. Lavenant, Rome 1998, OCA 256; A. González Blanco - G. Matilla Séiquer, Romanización y Cristianismo en la Siria-Mesopotamia, Murcia 1998; I. Ramelli, Alcune osservazioni sulle origini del Cristianesimo nelle regioni ad Est dell'Eufrate, in La diffusione dell'eredità classica nell'età tardoantica e medievale, eds. R.B. Finazzi - A. Valvo, Alessandria 1998, 209-225; Id., Abgar Ukkâmâ e Abgar il Grande alla luce di recenti apporti storiografici: Aevum 78 (2004) 103-108; G.J. Reinink - A.C. Klugkist (eds.), After Bardaisan: Studies on Continuity and Change in Syriac Christianity, Louvain 1999 (here esp.: J.F. Coakley, The Patriarchal List of the Church of the East, 65-83); J. Duchesne-Guillemin, I tre saggi e la stella. Mito e realtà dei Re Magi, Rimini 1999; G. del Olmo Lete - J.L. Montero Fenollós (eds.), Archaeology of the Upper Syrian Euphrates, Barcelona 1999; U. Possekel, Evidence of Greek Philosophical Concepts in the Writings of Ephrem the Syrian, CSCO 580, Louvain 1999; Id., Formative Christianity in Edessa: The Communal Structure of the Early Bardaisanites, paper presented at Annual Meetings of the AAR and SBL, Atlanta, 22-25 November 2003; W. Baum - D. Winkler, Die apostolische Kirche des Ostens. Geschichte der sogenannten Nestorianer, Klagenfurt 2000 (Eng., tr., The Church of the East. A Concise History, London 2003); M. Illert, Johannes Chrysostomos und das antiochenisch-syrische Mönchtum, Zürich-Freiburg i.B. 2000; R.F. Schedinger, Tatian and the Jewish Scriptures, CSCO 591 Subs. 108, Louvain 2001; J.N. Bremmer (ed.), The Apocryphal Acts of Thomas, Louvain 2001; C. and F. Jullien, Les Actes de Mâr-Mâri, l'Apôtre de la M., Turnhout 2001, Apocryphes 11; Id., Mâr Mâri, l'Apôtre de Babylone, Turnhout 2001; Id., Aux Origines de l'Église de Perse: les Actes de Mâr Mâri, CSCO 604 Subs. 114, Louvain 2003; S.K. Ross, Roman Edessa, London - New York 2001; M. Tamcke (ed.), Orientalische Christen zwischen Repression und Migration, Münster 2001; D. Caner, Wandering, Begging Monks: Spiritual Authority and the Promotion of Monasticism in Late Antiquity, Berkeley, CA 2002; J. Madey, The Hierarchy of the Churches of East and West Syriac Traditions, Kottayam 2002; D. Taylor, Bilingualism and Diglossia in Antique Syria and M., in Bilingualism in Ancient Society, eds. J.N. Adams - M. Janse - S. Swain, Oxford 2002, 298-331; S.H. Griffith, The Doctrina Addai as a Paradigm of Christian Thought in Edessa in the Fifth Century: Hugoye 6,2 (2003) 1-46; M. Paikatt, Virginity: The Celestial Life. A Study on Virginity in the Genuine Works of Mar Aprem of Nisibis: Christian Orient 13 (1992) 164-185; E.I. Yousif, Les philosophes et traducteurs syriaques. D'Athènes à Bagdad, Paris 1997; Id., Les chroniqueurs syriaques, Paris 2002; La floraison des philosophes syriaques, Paris 2003; Riches Hidden in Secret Places, ed. T. Abush, Winona Lake, IN 2004, for the history and religion of ancient Mesopotamia; K. Butcher, Roman Syria and the Near East, Los Angeles 2004; A.H. Becker, Fear of God and Beginning of Wisdom: The School of Nisibis and Christian Scholastic Culture in Late Antique Mesopotamia, Philadelphia 2006; I. Ramelli, The First Evangelization of the Mesopotamian Regions in the Syriac Tradition: Antiguo Oriente 3 (2005) 179-202; Id., La première évangélisation de la Mésopotamie, in Int. Conference of the EASR, Bucharest 20-23 September 2006.

I. Ramelli

MESROB (Mesrop) (ca. 361–439/440). Mesrob Maštoc' (Mashtots) was the originator of the *Armenian alphabet. The Life written by his disciple *Koriun records that, after some years of military service, he received *baptism in adulthood and embraced the *monastic life, dedicating himself to the *apostolate among the *pagans. Convinced of the necessity to possess the *Scripture and *liturgical books in Armenian, Mesrob adopted the alphabet (probably derived from Aramaic) of a certain Daniel for awhile; noting the insufficiency, he devised a new alphabet, which he rendered with great precision with a classical phonetic system. Under his guidance his followers provided the first "classical" Armenian translations of the Scriptures and of liturgical and *patristic texts. Mesrob himself translated only the book of Proverbs.

According to an unreliable tradition, Mesrob composed also the *Georgian and *Albanian (Albanian Caucasus) alphabets.

His works (*homilies and *letters) were handed down, with some problem of authenticity, under the name of *Gregory the Illuminator.

BS 9, 374-379; PLRE 2, 759; DSp 10, 1070-1074; G. Winkler, Koriwns Biographie des Mesrop Maštoc', tr. and comm., OCA 245, Rome 1994; S. Weber, Ausgewählte Schriften der armenischen Kirchenväter, I, Munich 1927, 233-318; N. Akinian, S. Maštoc' vardapet. Keank'n ew gorcowněowt'iwně . . ., Vienna 1949 (pp. 431-473: Ger. summ.) G. Sevak, Mesrop Maštoc'. Sozdanie armjanskikh pis'men i slovesnosti, Yerevan 1962. On the alphabet: R.H. Hewsen, On the Alphabet of the Caucasian Albanians: REArm 1 (1964) 427-432; S.N. Mouraviev, Les caracteres danieliens: REArm 14 (1980) 55-85; Id., Les caracteres mesropiens: REArm 14 (1980) 87-111; Bardenhewer 5, 197-202; S.N. Mouraviev, La forme interne de l'alphabet albanais caucasien et la phonologie de l'oudien: Muséon 93 (1980) 345-376; F. Feydit, Considérations sur l'alphabet de saint Mesrop et recherches sur la phonétique de l'arménien, Vienna [2]1982.

S.J. Voicu

MESSALIANS (Euchites). The premonastic manifestations of poverty (see *poor – poverty), of contempt for the world and of purifying *prayer did not always fit harmoniously into society and into the hierarchical *church. Around 360 and 374, *Ephrem and *Epiphanius denounced the dangers of the Messalians ("men of prayer": the term is *Syriac) or Euchites (the same in Greek), who refuted work and *discipline. The synods of *Side and of *Antioch (ca. 390) used these names to stigmatize a group that seems to have been formed by *Eustathius of Sebaste and that had been in cordial relations, if tense at times, with *Basil and *Gregory of Nyssa. The most noted exponent was *Macarius (Simeon), whose Asceticon was condemned at *Constantinople (426) and at the Council of *Ephesus (431). Later the Messalians, who were not aiming to constitute a rebellious sect, were condemned again several times in Syria and in *Armenia. The extreme wing was manifested in the ascendency of the Bogomils and of the Cathari; the *monastic wing influenced *hesychasm and all of Greek, Russian and Eastern *monasticism.

DSp 10 (1980) 1074-1083; I. Hausherr, L'erreur fondamentale et la logique du messalianisme: OCP 1 (1935) 328-360 (= Études de Spiritualité orientale: OCA 183, Rome 1969, 64-96); J. Gribomont, Le dossier des origines du messalianisme: Epektasis, (Mélanges J. Daniélou), Paris 1972, 611-625; A. Louth, Messalianism and Pelagianism: SP 17, Oxford 1982, 127-135; C. Stewart, "Working the Earth of the Heart": The Messalian Controversy in History, Texts, and Language to AD 431, Oxford Theological Monographs, Oxford 1992.

J. Gribomont

METEMPSYCHOSIS

I. In the first three c. - II. In the East from the 4th to the 8th c. - III. In the West from the 4th to the 7th c.

The passage of a single *soul into successive and different *bodies, both human and animal or plant, for punishment, for purification, for liberation from the chains of the material realm (metempsychōsis/metensōmatōsis) was a quaestio discussed in the philosophical writings on the soul and was accepted by the Orphics; by Empedocles, Pythagoras and Plato; and by the *Middle Platonists and *Neoplatonists (see Steenter, Dörrie). Already Aristotle had rejected as senseless the "fantastic constructs of the Pythagoreans" on the basis of which "a soul at random enters into a body at random," affirming that, as every art must employ the right instruments, so then "the soul must possess its own body" (De an. 1,3, 407b21). The satirist *Lucian of Samosata mocks the multiple reincarnations of Pythagoras (Gallus 20). Metempsychosis was also accepted by some heterodox Christians, who erroneously reinterpreted biblical passages, such as Mt 11:14 and 17:12 on *Elijah/*John the Baptist, Mt 15:21-28 on the Canaanite woman ("It is not fair to take the children's bread and throw it to the dogs") and Rom 7:9 ("I was once alive apart from the law"). It was also accepted by others who misinterpreted the resurrection, by followers of esoteric Jewish teachings, by *gnostics (*Carpocratians, *Basilidians) and by *Manicheans. The church fathers always disputed the possibility of metempsychosis, drawing on arguments based on reason and on the Bible.

I. In the first three c. *Justin Martyr (d. ca. 165), who had passed through various philosophical schools, is the first church father who directly addresses metempsychosis, showing its presuppositions to be faulty (the natural immortality and affinity of the soul with the divinity and vision of God through connaturality), and arguing that in animal bodies the human soul would neither have an awareness of being punished nor could it live with a dynamic inclination toward God (Dial. 4,4-7 and 5,5). An underlying reason for this repudiation is based on the idea of the intrinsic unity among the constitutive elements of the human being (see 1 Apol. 8,4; see also De Res. 8), acc. to which the soul cannot change its own body without distinction.

*Theophilus of Antioch (d. 185) recalls that Plato (see Phaedr. 248d) contradicts himself when he claims the immortality of the soul and then the transmigration of souls into other human and even animal bodies. To those who are intelligent, such a teaching appears to be terrible and vain (Autol. III, 7). *Hermias (ca. 200), in a sarcastic style, reveals his dismay over an indefinite and changing essence: Is it a man? Is it a beast? Is it a shrub? (see Irrisio, 4: SC 388, 101).

*Irenaeus of Lyons (d. 202) engages in polemic against the gnostic Carpocrates, who interprets the words of Christ in Mt 5:20 (the debtor does not leave the prison until he has paid the last cent) in a sense that is favorable to metempsychosis. The sacred text is twisted to a "preconceived" theory: "Everyone passes incessantly from one body to another" in order to wipe out his or her debt and is liberated from the necessity of entering into a body (Adv. haer. I, 25,4). Irenaeus objects that the gnostics use sacred texts as if they were mosaic tiles that come from a common image, yet are fabricated into another image. However, the true Christian recognizes the mosaic tiles and does not confuse the silhouette of the crafty fox with the portrait of the king (Adv. haer. I, 9,4). Furthermore, he rejects the passage of the soul into successive bodies "on the basis of the fact that souls do not have any memory of previous events" (Adv. haer. II, 33,1), nor have they drunk the water of oblivion for forgetting the past life (see Plato, Rep. X, 621a). Therefore, to claim that it is the body that causes forgetfulness is nonsense, because the soul would be unable to remember anything whatsoever. When in fact the eye is diverted from an object, the object would be completely forgotten. In fact, it is the soul that rules over the body, just as the artist masters his instrument (Adv. haer. II, 33,3-4). Irenaeus therefore proves the anthropological inconsistency of the theory of reincarnation (Adv. haer. II, 33,2-3). Even the Lord, in the story of Lazarus and the rich man (Lk 16:19-31), teaches us that "souls do not pass from body to body, but keep the same mold to which they are joined and remember the works that they have performed here [on earth]" (Adv. haer. II, 34,1). The profound reason for the rejection of metempsychosis lies in human nature, created by God in its essential identity and unity of soul and body: "As each of us receives his own body from God's making, so also do we each have our own soul" (Adv. haer. II, 33,5). Therefore he pits the Christian vision of the resurrection against reincarnation: human beings, written into the book of life, "will rise from the dead, having their own bodies, their own souls and their own spirits, into which they shall be willed by God" (Adv. haer. II, 33,5). Therefore the inalienable oneness of the human person, created by God with a specific soul (that has a beginning and receives an indestructible life, enduring as long as God so wills: Adv. haer. III, 34,2-4), harmonized with a specific body (destined for resurrection and then for eternal life), opposes with its integral identity the belief in reincarnation.

*Clement of Alexandria attributes the theory of metempsychosis to the Egyptians (Strom. VI, 4,35,1: see Herodotus II, 123,2) and mentions the theory of "those who believe that souls are introduced into bodies and are bound to them and poured into them [passing from one body to another]," immediately adding a striking indication of his clear opposition: "Against them we will have another occasion to speak, when we will consider the soul" (Strom. III, 13,3; however, we have no evidence that such a work was ever written). Clement also alludes to the Platonic myth (see Phaedon 81c and Phaedr. 248c) of the soul that loses its wings and plunges down here into the world (Strom. III, 13,2 and 19,93,3), yet he counters, "The soul is not sent from heaven down here in a negative sense, since God directs everything to a better end (Strom. IV, 26,167,4). He then cites the theory of *Basilides, who supposes that "the soul, which sinned in another life, stands under castigation in this life" (Strom. IV, 12,83,2; see also 12,88,1) and in consequence interprets the biblical text "God punishes the disobedient even unto the third and fourth generations" (see Dt 5:9; Num 14:18) as referring to reincarnations: ensōmatōseis (Exc. Theod. 28). In a polemic against the preexistence of souls (held by Basilides and others), he proposes a creationism of souls (Ecl. Proph. 17; Strom. V, 13,87,4) and objects that the retribution of prior *sins to this life would be a negation of the didactic role of divine *providence and a negation of free will, and would annihilate faith and love (Strom. IV, 12,84,1-88,5).

*Tertullian (d. after 220) is radically opposed to metempsychosis, from an anthropological and moral perspective. After having tended toward this theory proposed by Plato (in connection to memory: An. 23,5-6), he roundly rejects it (An. 28-35). The first attack is directed against the person of its inventor, Pythagoras, who recalls various reincarnations: Aethalides, Euphorbus (Pythagoras remembers his shield; Tertullian inquires, but in what way? with a trick or through magic?), Pyrrhus and Hermotimus (An. 28). Then he refutes the affirmation of Plato (see Phaedr. 72a) that the living proceed from the dead: in fact, the creation proves the contrary, and the original law is not changed (An. 29). Furthermore, if metempsychosis were plausible, the total number of human beings would always be the same, because the number of the souls of the living and of the dead would be constantly equal. Yet in the course of history the human population is always increasing (An. 30). If the living proceed from the dead as individuals from individuals, how would the birth of twins be possible, assuming that two or more souls proceed from a single soul? Furthermore, if human beings die at different ages, why do they not return to the same ages at which they had left the earth, but instead are always born as infants? Why do they not also resume the former temperaments and the old inclinations? Yet the example of Pythagoras proves the contrary of this proposition: He like Euphorbus was a fighting spirit; like Pyrrhus he used to eat fish; like Aethalides and Hermotimus he used to eat beans; while like a philosopher of Samos he used to prefer peace, was vegetarian and had even been prohibited from crossing a field of beans. Why then have other philosophers not remembered their previous incarnations? (An. 31).

Moreover, Tertullian refutes the most radical form of metempsychosis, the one found in animal bodies, by referring to Empedocles, who used to affirm that he had been a sapling and a fish (see fr. B 117 Diels-Kranz). In fact, it is impossible that a human soul could take the place of an animal soul without undergoing changes, because the characteristics and qualities of a human being and of an animal are not only diverse but often even contrasting. When the Holy Scriptures liken human beings to the beasts of the earth, the intent is the similarity of natural qualities (Ps 48:21) rather than of substance, which is absolutely different (An. 32). Furthermore for Tertullian, the repudiation of metempsychosis is also necessary from the perspective of morality and retributive justice. If the souls do not remain the same, the sense of justice vanishes; if a human being finds himself to be an animal, he is diminished in his merits. Thus if the souls of murderers were reincarnated in bodies of animals (such as sacrificial animals), they would receive a punishment more lenient than the punishment provided in human law (torture and *death), not to speak of the divine law (An. 33). Finally, Tertullian recalls some proponents of metempsychosis: *Simon Magus (who would have ransomed his companion Elena) and Carpocrates (An. 34,1-35,4). The identification of Elijah with John the Baptist (Mt 17:12) is due to the fact that the latter figure possesses the spirit and the strength of the former (see Lk 1:17), each of which can be transferred by the will of God, but not the soul and the *flesh that are the substances proper to each human being (An. 35,5-6). Tertullian counters reincarnation with resurrection: following the example of Christ, raised from the dead with his own earthly body (Carn. Chr. 24), every human being will rise again as his own body that will be reunited to his own soul (Ad nat. 1,19,3-4). Every human being will return to live in a body, the same body possessed during the earthly life, not in other human or animal bodies (Res. 1), always preserving the same identity (Apol. 48). The human being recovers the original nature and faculty of memory, because "there cannot exist any true judgment if there is no presentation of the very individual who has merited the undergoing of the sentence," without undergoing reincarnations in animal bodies (Test. An. 4,1-2). In order to be judged by God, the human being must be in the integral state of the person who has acted in this world. The union of the soul and of the body in the process of history necessitates the same union in order to receive the recompense (or punishment) at the resurrection.

*Minucius Felix (beginning of the 3rd c.) recounts that the philosophers who simultaneously uphold the immortality of the soul and the soul's reincarnation into different bodies are twisting the truth. If they then also propose metempsychosis into animal bodies, they present a theory "not worthy of the seriousness of philosophy" (Oct. 34,6-7).

According to *Hippolytus (2nd–3rd c.) the Carpocratians teach that souls pass from body to body, until they have exhausted all their sins (Ref. VII, 32: see Iren., Adv. haer. I, 25,4); meanwhile, the teachers say that "since the coming of the Savior, the transmigration of souls has ceased" (Ref. VIII, 10,1-2). In one textual fragment the author affirms that Christians do not wait for the reincarnation (ensōmatōsis) but rather the resurrection of their bodies with their own souls (Contra Gentes, frag. 2,47).

*Origen (d. 254) has sometimes been presented as a "Christian" proponent of reincarnation. The opposite is true: he repeatedly refuted it, and he has been falsely accused of professing it. He expressly recounts among the supporters of metempsychosis Empedocles (C. Cels. 5,49; 8,53; see 3,75), Pythagoras (C. Cels. 5,49; 6,8; 8,30) and above all Plato (C. Cels. 1,20; 4,17); groups of Christians who interpreted biblical passages in this sense (Fr. Pr: PG 13, 17f.; Princ. 1,8,4; Res. 2: PG 11, 94; Fr. Lc 1,17; Hom. Ier 16,1; Co. Mt 7); gnostics such as Basilides (Co. Rm 5,1; 6,8; Ser. Mt 38); and Jews who adhered to secret teachings (Co. Io 6,10,64; Co. Mt 10,20).

For Origen, such a theory is not philosophically defensible: the body, determined specifically by the soul of which it is an instrument (Princ. 3,6,6; see C. Cels. 4,58), is always related to this soul and is not able to be changed. Also from the perspective of logic and ethics, it would be absurd and unjust that souls "sinned in one body and are punished in another" (Strom. Fr.[?], in *Jerome, C. Io. Hier. 26; see Princ. 2,10,8; Res. 1: PG 11, 91f.). Most of all, it is impossible for a human soul to transmigrate into animal and plant bodies, because the human being has been made ontologically as a principal and primary creature (Princ. 2,9,3; C. Cels. 4,74; Fr. Ps 1,3: PG 12, 1089) of the first order in the creative work of God, while the animals are supplementary, secondary creatures who came into being in a different, ancillary way (Princ. 1,2,1), for the benefit of humanity (Co. Ps 1,3; C. Cels. 4,99). Therefore, human beings are neither determined by nor dependent on creatures that are molded in a complementary fashion. Even at the end of the world, God will be all in all (1 Cor 15:28) only in the rational creatures, not in the animals (Princ. 3,6,2). Human souls and those of the animals are not of the same species: the soul has been created "in the image" of God (Gen 1:27), and therefore "it is impossible that a nature made 'in the image of God' completely loses its own characteristics and assumes others, shaped in the image of who knows what, in the irrational animals" (C. Cels. 4,83). Animals do not participate in the rationality belonging to human beings, but act on the basis of natural instinct (Princ. 3,1,3; C. Cels. 4,81.83.88).

A human soul cannot suffer the loss of sensibility or rationality as a punishment, transmigrating into plant or animal bodies (C. Cels. 3,75): in such a case, the same punishment would lack sense, and the conversion would be unattainable (because it lacks reason, an essential instrument for becoming aware of faults and for changing behavior). The human being must serve the sentence in its own human body (Co. Mt 13,17). Furthermore, the behavior of animals is instinctive; therefore, it has neither ethical relevance, nor moral imputability, nor the possibility of ascent or of spiritual improvement. Instead, the human being suffers judgment when transgressing the natural tendencies (C. Cels. 4,99); he or she is able to progress or regress in virtue (Co. Mt 10,11). Finally, only the human body is destined to rise again: therefore, having been the seat of the rational soul, at death it receives the due honors (C. Cels. 8,30), while the body of the animals is thrown away (C. Cels. 4,24); at the resurrection the qualities of the body are replaced: from corruptible and mortal to incorruptible and immortal (C. Cels. 4,19; 5,24; 7,32).

Only in an *allegorical sense are human beings, through the vices and the *virtues, comparable to the animals (Dial. 14; Co. Mt 11,17): it is about moral assimilation, not physical transmutation. The divine image in the human being is able to be obscured by *sin and superimposed by demonic or bestial images, but it can never be obliterated (Hom. Gn 13,4; C. Cels. 2,11; 4,25.83). Neither does a particular human soul pass into another human body. Every soul is harmonized with its own body (Princ. 2,10,1; C. Cels. 1,33); the sould cannot animate simultaneously two different bodies (Fr. Lc 1,17; Co. Mt 10,20). To every individual body there must correspond a different name (Co. Io 6,11,71; Co. Mt 10,20; 13,2).

Origen opposed the theory of metempsychosis also on the basis of biblical arguments. The angel Gabriel (Lk 1:17) does not speak of the "soul" of Elijah, but of his "spirit" and of his "power" (Co. Io 6,11,66; Co. Mt 13,2): in these are the identity of mission and of prophetic charisma, not a transmigration of the soul of Elijah into the Baptist (Co. Io 6,11,71; 6,13,78; Co. Mt 13,2; Hom. Lc 4 [Greek]). If acc. to the theories of the proponents of metensomatosis, it is due to sin that a soul must undergo transmigration, for what sin did the soul of Elijah need to pass into John? Therefore it is "a most obvious lie" that Elijah, so perfect for not experiencing the death common to all persons (because he was lifted up to heaven), was required to satisfy the penalty of metensomatosis (Co. Mt 7, in Pamphilus, Ap. Or. 10).

Origen interprets the saying of Jesus to the Canaanite woman, "It is not fair to take the children's bread and throw it to the dogs" (Mt 15:26) and the reply of the woman, "even the dogs eat the crumbs that fall from their masters' tables" (Mt 15:26-27) in an *allegorical mode: the bread is a *symbol of the nourishment of those who, spiritually evolved, are the children, and the crumbs represent the nourishment of those who, hardly evolved like the Canaanite woman, are similar to the dogs, and then declares, "Others, strangers to the doctrine of the church, even imagine that the souls pass from bodies of human beings to bodies of beasts, acc. to their various wrongdoings. We do not find this concept at all in the Holy Scriptures, and we declare that there is a passage from a more spiritual state to a less spiritual state, and that one undergoes this passage due to so much carelessness and negligence" (Co. Mt 11,17).

He rejects the idea of *Basilides, based on Rom 7:9 ("I was once alive apart from the law"), in order to affirm that this phrase referred to the time in which the human being was living in an animal body that was not falling anew under the law (Co. Rm 5,1), taking notice that the apostle Paul refers to one and the same life. At the same time, he does not accept the idea that here there is no other castigation if not the transmigration of the soul after death, because in this way the salutary fear of future penalties is eliminated from human beings and *impiety flourishes (Ser. Mt 38). Furthermore, he affirms that Christians practice abstinence not on account of the myth of metempsychosis, but in order to mortify the body (C. Cels. 5,49; 8,30). Children are baptized not for wrongs that the soul committed in a different body but because this soul has been brought forth in a body subject to sin (Co. Rm 5,9). Christians speak of resurrection, certainly not because they have "misinterpreted the teaching on metempsychosis," as the pagan Celsus reasons (C. Cels. 7,32). In fact, the body does not change in substance, but in attributes (C. Cels. 7,32; cf. Princ. 3,6,6). Here there is an identity between an earthly body and a glorious body (Str. Fr.[?], in Jerome, C. Io. Hier. 26; Co. Mt 17,30).

Against the gnostics, Origen proposed the idea of the preexistence of souls in order to explain the variety of human situations (Princ. 1,7,4). However, he always clearly distinguished ensomatosis—i.e., the descent of the soul into the human body—from metensomatosis (Co. Io 6,14,86; C. Cels. 5,29; see also 4,17). Ensomatosis has been fulfilled through the first sin (Princ. 1,6,3) or in order to aid human beings (Princ. 2,6,3; 4,3,12; Hom. Ez 1,1; Co. Io 2,31,186-190): the body is assumed on the basis of merits and demerits that are antecedent to the earthly birth. Metensomatosis—the passage of a single human soul into successive and several bodies: human, animal, astral (Princ. 1,8,4; Co. Io 6,10,64; Co. Rm 5,1; 6,8; Co. Mt 11,17; C. Cels. 1,20)—is entirely refuted by Origen and is considered "foolishness" (C. Cels. 3,75), "a false teaching" (Co. Mt 10,20) and "alien to the church of God, not handed down from the *apostles, nor made known by the Scriptures" (Co. Mt 13,1). In fact, for Origen, the body—a sign of creatureliness and a sort of "genetic code"—always accompanies the soul in the various ages from the creation to the apokatastasis*; presenting itself anew in successive worlds, the body always remains the same body, though from time to time it assumes qualities (spiritual, ethereal, physical) adapted to the worlds in which it lives, on the basis of the progress or regress of the soul. In the resurrection, the identity between an earthly body and a spiritual body is assured by the permanence of the corporeal substance (Princ. 2,1,4; 3,6,6), by a "form" (eidos) (Fr. Ps 1,5: PG 12, 1093), by a "seminal principle" (logos spermatikos) (Res. 2: PG 11, 93; C. Cels. 5,23). Also the theory of the "vehicle of the soul" (compare in Methodius, Res. 13,17-18), a corporeal wrapping that acts as a bridge between the soul and the body after the death of the human being, reinforces this identity.

During the Origenist controversies (from the 4th to 6th c.), some writers accused Origen of having upheld metensomatosis, or of selectively employing or wrongly interpreting or twisting biblical texts. They misrepresented the moral comparison of sinners to beasts or the idea of successive worlds, and they presented Origen as a supporter of pagan teachings in order to denigrate him.

*Pamphilus (Ap. Or. 5.9) and an anonymous author cited by *Photius had already cleared Origen of such accusations. Yet for polemical reasons, they were taken up again by Jerome in the 4th c. (Ap. c.

Ruf. 2,12; 3,39-40; Ep. 124, 3.4.7.14) and by *Justinian in the 6th c. (Ep. ad Menan.).

II. In the East from the 4th to the 8th c. *Basil of Caesarea (d. 379), employing an *exegesis of Gen 1:24 (in the Septuagint: "the earth produces a living soul"), confirms the difference between the soul of beasts and the soul of human beings. The first is "none other than the earth: one should not believe that it existed prior to the substance of the body of the beasts, nor that it subsisted after the dissolution of their flesh" (Hexam. Hom. VIII, 2), while the second is made in the image of God. Therefore, he bitterly criticizes the philosophers who put their souls and the souls of the dogs on the same level, and claim to have lived previously as animals. Writing such nonsense, they show themselves to have less sense than fish (Hexam. Hom. VIII, 2).

*Gregory of Nazianzus (d. ca. 390), after affirming that the human soul is "the breath of God, celestial by nature" (Poem. Dogm. I,1;VIII,1), demonstrates the difference between the nature of the flesh and the immortal form. He denies that the soul is shared by all, and finally labels it a "vain joke of the unwise to claim that the soul, *good or *evil, emigrates, as a reward of virtue or punishment of sins, into other bodies suited to the preceding life" (Poem. Dogm. I,1;VIII,32-35). In fact, moral reasonings of a wise wild beast or of a talking tree have never been observed; the human soul would not be able either to expiate sins, or to figure out which body it had first or which it had later. Another grave error is to assume that oblivion of the preceding life covers the memory of the human being (Poem. Dogm. I,1;VIII,41-53)

*Gregory of Nyssa (d. 392) refutes the proponents of the preexistence of souls or of the body. He affirms that such persons have not yet been liberated from the fables of metempsychosis in animal bodies. If the soul falls into a bestial nature, it cannot advance in virtue—not present in the irrational beings—and so it will sink always lower. It will be transformed into nonbeing, and it will be impossible to return to that which is better. If the soul were to proceed from a shrub, one would have to say that the life of a tree is more worthy than the first state of the soul (Opif. 28). According to Gregory of Nyssa, the supporters of metempsychosis offend the human species, claiming that the soul of the human being is identical to that of the irrational being, changes bodies, transmigrates through animals or even through plants, and then arises anew all the way to human nature (An. et res.: PG 46, 108). Gregory asserts instead that in the resurrection, "along with the soul, the same body grows again, put in order again by the same elements" (An. et res.: PG 46, 110), and it does not proceed to fall into other bodies. Those who "make out the soul to transmigrate in different natures confound the peculiarity of the nature and mix everything together: rationality and irrationality, sensory faculties and the absence of sensations" (ibid.). If it were so, one would have to conclude that "all things are but one thing, and that in the beings there exists but one sole nature, mixed up in a confused and indistinct way, without any peculiarity distinguishing a thing (ibid.; see also *Nemesius of Emesa, De nat. hom. 2: PG 40, 582A). The soul cannot either preexist or transmigrate through other bodies, because it is formed at the same time that its own body is formed (see An. et res.: PG 46, 125). If then the pagan philosophers declare that "the soul passes from one body to another, even transforming itself into an irrational nature," they do not offer sound teaching (Vita Mos. II, 39-40).

*Epiphanius of Salamis (d. 403) identifies as proponents of the transmigration of souls certain Greek philosophers (*Stoics, Platonists and Pythagoreans: Pan. haer. 5-7), and various heretics (Carpocratians: Pan. haer. 27,4-5; *Valentinus the Gnostic, Colorbasus, all the gnostics and the Manicheans: Pan. haer. 42,11,15, ref. 24d). He also recognizes that every person endowed with good sense rejects transmigration as absurd. Against the Manicheans, who claim metempsychosis for castigation and *purification (Pan. 66,28: see also *Hegemonius, Acta Arch. 10), he objects that it is not plausible that the soul can flow into a tiny seed and that it awaits contact with the body of the parents through their desire. He also rejects the idea that individuals are born from a different species (a human being cannot proceed from a dog, nor vice versa: every species reproduces the elements of the same species!), or that souls transmigrated into inferior bodies acquire consciousness (Pan. 66,55).

*John Chrysostom (d. 407) refutes a teaching "absurd and an offense to human dignity, to insist that the souls of the human beings are transformed into flies, mosquitoes, shrubs" (In Io. hom. II, 2: PG 59, 31); and he argues that the soul is demeaned by insisting that it can transmigrate into animals (In Io. hom. II, 3: PG 59, 33). He ridicules this theory (In Act. hom. 4,4: PG 60, 48), and considers it a gain that in his time such theories have waned (In Io. hom. II, 2: PG 59, 32).

Centuries later, *John of Damascus (d. ca. 750) no longer mentions the hypothesis of a return to earthly life. Instead, he simply says that for human beings there is no possibility of repentance after death (Fide orth. II, 4; C. Manich. 75). When it departs the body, the soul can no longer mutate from the condition in which it was found (C. Manich. 37).

III. In the West from the 4th to the 7th c. *Lactantius (d. 325) deems it wrong to affirm the teaching of reincarnation (Div. Inst. 3,18). Through ignorance some affirm that "we have entered into the light to serve the sentence for wrongdoings committed" (ibid.). He asks, "What wrongs could we commit and where could we commit them, if we did not even exist?" (ibid.), and he refutes anecdotes and imaginary tales of earlier lives as concocted by Pythagoras (ibid.). Thus the passage into other animal bodies is useless, because it is not necessary to introduce old souls into new bodies (in fact, the Creator can always create new souls after the first souls) and it is impossible, since the soul endowed with intellect is not able to change the nature of its condition, just as fire is not able to leap down (Div. Inst. 3,19). The opinions of Pythagoras on the reincarnation, even in animal bodies, are surely ridiculous and unworthy of being seriously refuted (Div. Inst. 7,12). Would it not be preferable for human souls to be extinguished with the body, rather than being condemned to other bodies of animals (Epit. 31,8: SC 335,138)? The poets then invented the river of oblivion, because the souls, mindful of earlier tribulations, would never want to return to the earth (Div. Inst. 7,22).

*Ambrose of Milan (d. 397) insists that the transformations of human beings into animals must be interpreted in a symbolic or ironic sense (Exc. Fratr. 2,127-129). Such stories are "unworthy of faith and are incongruous" (Exc. Fratr. 2,130) and are inconceivable in a real sense. In fact, a creature made in the image of God cannot be changed into a bestial figure, since the faculty of reason, not the appearance of the body, is in the likeness of God, and "nature does not permit such a thing, and if it did permit it, *grace would certainly not permit it" (ibid.).

*Jerome (d. 419) alludes many times in his writings to metempsychosis (often even employing the corresponding Greek word: see, e.g., In Mt. 2,11,14-15 and 2,14,1-2; Ep. 124,4.7.14; C. Iovin. 2,6; Ap. c. Ruf. 1,20), acc. to which the souls fallen from heaven, on the basis of differences in merits, suffer in the bodies the penalties of past sins (Ep. 120,10), clothed in previous bodies (Ap. c. Ruf. 2,12, e 3,39 [= Ep. adv. Ruf.]), even animal bodies (Ep. 124,3-4; see also 98,7). He cites the various reincarnations of Pythagoras (Ap. c. Ruf. 3,40 [= Ep. adv. Ruf.]; C. Vigil. 1; C. Iovin. 2,37). He defines as "vain and scandalous" the teaching that the souls, for certain past sins, have been buried in human bodies for the purpose of *expiation (Ep. 130,16). He demonstrates its contradictions: the souls of human beings and of beasts cannot be of the same substance and proceed from the same creator. In what way for the salvation of a single human body would two thousand swine perish? (In Mt 2,8,31); the souls of human beings are much more precious than those of the beasts (Tr. Mc. 1,1,31: CCL 78,467). He explains that John the Baptist is called Elijah, not because he was his reincarnation, but because he had his grace and power, and he lived in the same austere way and carried out an analogous mission: the Baptist prepared the first coming of Christ, as Elijah will prepare the *second coming (In Mt. 2,11). Unfortunately, not precisely comprehending the ideas of Origen, Jerome accused him of having professed metempsychosis (Ap. c. Ruf. 2,12; 3,39f.; Ep. 124,3.4.7.14).

*Augustine of Hippo (d. 430) rejects every form of metempsychosis defended by either the Manicheans or the philosophers (above all of Pythagorean and Platonic inspiration). Regarding the first group, he severely criticizes such a theory, because it is based on a false concept of God and of the soul, that acc. to the Manicheans "is none other than the same substance of God, indeed is identical to that which is God" and is entangled with all sorts of weeds and little worms, and into these it is able to transmigrate (Gen. litt. 7,11,17; see En. Ps. 140,11; C. Adim. 12,1-2). Yet Augustine objects, "God is absolutely immutable and *incorruptible" (Gen. litt. 7,11,17; see also Mor. Man. 2,12,25), and the soul is not a particle of God, because it is subject to change (Ep. 166,2,3). Therefore such a theory is shown to be irrational and detestable, due to the incompatibility between the supposition of the soul's divine nature (a supposition that would require immutability) and the various changes to which the soul is subjected through continuous transmigrations into different bodies (Gen. litt. 7,11,17). Furthermore, the action of Christ, who treated human beings differently from animals and trees, controverts similar ideas (Mor. Man. 2,17,54).

Augustine demonstrates the absurdity and contradictions of the Manicheans, if metempsychosis in animal and plant bodies were to be accepted: killing an animal, one would be committing a homicide, if the human soul were incarnated therein (C. Adim. 12,2). In animals, human souls can neither acquire *truth or wisdom, nor progress morally, nor even perceive the divine precepts (Mor. Man. 2,16,39 and 2,17,53-57). Great importance would be given to things rather than to persons (one is more merciful to a piece of bread than to the poor person left to die of hunger: En. Ps. 140,12; see also C. Faust. 5,10). As a result, if certain principles have consequences that provoke behaviors contrary to both the natural and divine law, they are false. Yet Augustine hopes that the Manicheans can repent of their nefarious errors (Nat. bon. 42; Ep. fund. 1 and 27).

Regarding the second group, Augustine rejects the teachings of various philosophers who claim metempsychosis in various bodies, whether human or animal; among these he features Pythagoras, Plato, Plotinus and *Porphyry of Tyre, who accepts only the transmigration into different human bodies. For Augustine, such ideas proceed from wanting to explain the problem of human suffering (Sermo 165,5,6; 240,4,4) and from theorizing cycles that repeat without end (Civ. Dei 12,13,1). A fundamental presupposition for every theory of metempsychosis is the preexistence of souls and their fall into bodies for sins committed in a preceding life. Augustine categorically affirms, "I do not believe at all, I do not allow, I completely disagree that souls sin in a preceding life from where they would come to be cast into the prison of the bodies" (Ep. 166,9,27; cf. Gen. litt. 10,7,12). He declares that a Catholic Christian cannot accept this sort of hypothesis (An. et eius orig. 3,8,11) on the basis of the authority of Scripture (Pecc. merit. 1,22,33). As St. Paul says (Rom 9:11), those who are not yet born here have not performed anything good or anything evil (Pecc. orig. 2,31,26; Sermo 165,5,6; Ep. 190,1,4), even though they have the contagion of the sin of *Adam, transmitted to his descendants (Ep. 217,5,6; Sermo 217,5). Besides, it is quite different to have sinned in Adam and "to have sinned who-knows-where, but without a relation to Adam" and to become cast into a body as in a prison (Ep. 166,9,27). He is surprised that Origen espoused the idea that souls, having distanced themselves from God, are fallen from heaven and confined in bodies as in a prison. As a result, the world would have been created to repress evil and not to produce good (Civ. Dei 11,23). Against the theory of the preexistence of souls, Augustine responds that "there is innate in the soul a sort of natural longing to govern the body (Gen. litt. 12,35,68; see also 7,25,36) and that "the complete nature of a human being certainly consists in the spirit, the soul and the body: so whoever wants to treat the body as extraneous to human nature is out of his mind" (An. et eius orig. 4,2,3). In fact, God gives a new spirit to every human body, so that this same body might be transformed into a better state at the moment of the resurrection (Gen. litt. 10,14,24). Furthermore, the same human experience contradicts the opinion of the person who thinks that souls must be placed within bodies that weigh them down in proportion to the merits or demerits of a previous life (Gen. litt. 1,22,31-32, where he also cites the example of someone that was zealous in *faith, even though he had a miserable body).

Augustine rejects metempsychosis in bodies of different species, from human beings into animals and vice versa. The substance of the rational soul cannot change itself into the substance of an irrational beast (Gen. litt. 10,4,7; see also 7,10,15). The rationality and the essence of the human soul are also inalienable, inasmuch as there is a substantive and nonaccidental relationship between mind and rational knowledge (Sol. 2,12,22 and 2,13,24 and Imm. an. 8-9). The similarity of habits and of behaviors among human beings and animals must be interpreted in a metaphorical, not a literal sense: human being remains always human, even if one behaves like a beast (Gen. litt. 7,9,13). Animals act on instinct, not because in them there are degraded human souls (Gest. Pelag. 6,18). Thus "beasts always keep the habits of the beasts" (Gen. litt. 7,10,15): animal behaviors come closer to the animal model than to the human model; the similarity of character and behavior among human beings and animals is only by way of analogy. Therefore, if human behavior and animal behavior have peculiar and distinct characteristics, it follows that human nature and animal nature preserve in substance their peculiarities: neither are they interchangeable, nor can one be transformed into the other. If some philosophers have set forth the theory of the transmigration of human souls into bodies of beasts, they were probably intending to affirm that, through their wrongdoing, some human beings were becoming similar to the beasts in this earthly life. Thus they were attempting to turn evil persons away from their insane passions (Gen. litt. 7,10,15). If the Scriptures compare human beings to beasts (see Ps 48:13), they are referring to the present life of persons who conduct themselves in an unreasonable way (Gen. litt. 7,10,14). If the psalmist asks God not to abandon a human being to the beasts (see Ps 74 [73]:19), he desires that his soul not be abandoned into the power of scandalous persons who are similar to the beasts (see Mt 7:15), or even into the power of the *demon, defined as a lion and a dragon (Ps 91 [90]:13) (Gen. litt. 7,10,14). One must therefore conclude that the transmigration of a soul from a beast into a human being "is an opinion absolutely contrary to the Catholic faith" (Gen. litt. 7,9,13). The fact that someone recalls having lived in a body of a beast is due either to a lie or to a diabolical illusion (Gen. litt. 7,11,16). These are deceptive reminiscences similar to hallucinatory images (Trin. 12,15,24). Furthermore, on the basis of good sense, Augustine adds that, if we have passed through various reincarnations, the memory of them would be an experience common to many or to just about all, as are *dreams—but this is not so (ibid.).

Furthermore, the same transmigration into different human bodies is not credible: if some persons, even those who have not been instructed, know how to give precise answers, the reason is not due to the fact that in an earlier life they had known the answers and then forgotten them, but because in these persons there shines the light of eternal reason in which they contemplate the immutable truths (Retr. 1,4,4; see also Trin. 12,15,24; Ep. 7,2). Against some heretics who lean on the Scriptures for endorsement of metempsychosis, affirming that John the Baptist was the reincarnation of Elijah, Augustine objects that the Forerunner is called Elijah because he possesses the same spirit and pursues an identical mission (In Io. tr. 4,5); and as the spirit of Elijah has been passed to Elisha (see 2 Kgs 2:15), who clearly already possessed his own spirit, so also the same spirit of Elijah has come upon the Baptist, without his spirit having transmigrated into the Forerunner (Quaest. Hept. 4,18).

Augustine likewise shows the contradictions and the absurdities of the theory of metempsychosis and of continuous cycles (even for those who like Porphyry of Tyre limit the incarnations to human bodies and do not include beastly bodies: Civ. Dei 10,30). The saints would live in a state of real unhappiness and of fictitious happiness; therefore, the happiness of the souls in paradise would not be inalienable: in fact a life cannot "be exceedingly happy if it does not live in the absolute certainty of its own eternity" (Civ. Dei 10,30). If instead the soul must return to the terrestrial world, "it moves incessantly through a false happiness and incessantly returns to a true unhappiness. It cannot in fact be true happiness because it does not have assurance of its own eternity" (Civ. Dei 12,13; see also 12,20). Therefore the philosophers (Platonists) are wrong in affirming that the souls at the height of the heavens, having forgotten the past evils, desire to return in order to assume a body and suffer the miseries of the present age (Sermo 240,4 e 241,4): it would be an "insane desire" (Sermo 241,5, citing Virgil, Aen. 6,721). Furthermore, Augustine criticizes the concept of reincarnation as a form of punishment, through which the body would be the prison of the soul (Serm. 240,4). In this case, such a theory contradicts Platonic teaching (see Tim. 29b), where it is affirmed that the mortal and immortal beings are a necessary condition for the goodness and the beauty of the world (Civ. Dei 12,26). Therefore, if the creation cannot be anything but good and have existence, even as mortal persons do, it is a "divine *gift" (Civ. Dei 12,26); also the body in itself is good and cannot assume the function of an instrument for punishing the soul. Even the gods, who acc. to Plato are the architects of the human body (Tim. 41 a-d), would not be benevolent creators, but "makers of shackles and builders of prisons" (Civ. Dei 12,26). One cannot therefore admit that reincarnation is a punishment for sins.

The church cannot accept the endless alternation between states of blessedness and of punishment (Haer. 43). Christ is risen from the dead, and death no longer has any power (Rom 6:9), and "we after the resurrection will always be with the Lord" (1 Th 4:17), recalls Augustine (Civ. Dei 12,13,2). We should adhere to the "sublime truths taught to us by the saints" and not to the "enormous insanities invented by learned persons," when they affirm that the souls, purified and having become wise, "return in the body through love of the body" (Sermo 241,6). Therefore, concludes Augustine, it is much more reasonable to believe that "souls return a single time to their own bodies, rather than returning many times to other bodies" (Civ. Dei 10,30). Otherwise, once the earthly life has ended, one can neither search for what he has neglected to obtain nor claim to have earned before God what he has neglected to complete in this world (Civ. Dei 21,24,5; Ench. 29,110). After the last day, when a person dies, one does not mend the evil done: all is finished (Sermo 19,6 e 170,10). One receives only the recompense of one's actions (In Io. tr. 44,6). It is the time of judgment and no longer of mercy (Ep. 140,35,81). Therefore, the souls will be "tormented or glorified in the same flesh with which they lived here" (An. et eius orig. 2,4,8), in the same bodies in which they had committed the actions (Cat. rud. 25,46). The Lord assures us that "the blessed souls will live in eternity with the same flesh for ever" (Civ. Dei 22,27). Christ in the resurrection, as head of humankind, has shown us what the just must await (Sermo 241,1). In fact "in order for the souls to be happy, one must not abandon every body, but receive a body immune from the process of becoming" (Civ. Dei 22,26).

*Peter Chrysologus (d. after 450), after citing the words of Lk 1:17 (John the Baptist will precede the Christ with "the spirit of the power of Elijah"), hastens to point out, "Nobody, when hearing these words, thinks of metempsychosis" (Serm. 88,6), and he explains that the Baptist lives with the spirit of Elijah and walks with his power, because in his way of living and in his virtues, he is a perfect representation of these realities (ibid.)

*Gregory the Great (d. 604), although without directly pointing to metempsychosis, clearly explains that the contradiction between the texts concerning Elijah (Mt 17:12-13: Jesus affirms that Elijah has come, referring to John the Baptist; Jn 1:21: the Baptist claims that he is not Elijah) is only apparent, not real. This is explained in the light of Lk 1:17: the Baptist "was Elijah in spirit, he was not Elijah in person. That which Jesus says of the Spirit, John denies of the person" (Hom Ev. VII, 1).

Conclusion. For the fathers of the church, metempsychosis is a theory to reject, because it safeguards neither the specificity of the human being as a rational creature (quite different indeed from the irrational creature), nor his unique position as bearing the "image of God." Furthermore, this manner of presupposing that the material world and the body have negative value, treating the body as an instrument of punishment, does not offer a precise concept of retributive justice (in one body a person flourishes, and in another one is punished). Finally, in a precise interpretation of the Holy Scriptures, one does not find texts for backing up such ideas. The Christians pitted the resurrection, of which Christ is the firstfruits, against metempsychosis: the body remains always the same, but puts on new and superior qualities and rises from the earth as a spiritual body.

Bibliography: J. Bjorling, Reincarnation: A Bibliography, New York and London 1996.

Studies: L. Bukowski, La réincarnation selon les Pères de l'Église: Gregorianum 9 (1928) 65-91; DTC 10 (1929) 1574-1595; L. Bukowski, L'opinion de Saint Augustin sur la reincarnation des âmes: Gregorianum 12 (1931) 57-85; W. Stettner, Die Seelenwanderung bei den Griechen und Römern, Stuttgart 1934; H. Dörrie, Kontroversen um die Seelenwanderung im kaiserzeitlichen Platonismus: Hermes 85 (1957) 414-435; A. Orbe, Textos y pasajes de la Escritura interesados en la teoria de la Reincorporación: Estudios eclesiásticos 33 (1959) 77-91; H. Diels and W. Kranz, Die Fragmente der Vorsokratiker, Berlin [12]1966; J. Daniélou, Metempsychosis in Gregory of Nyssa, in D. Neiman and M. Schatkin (eds.), The Heritage of the Early Church, Essays in honor of G.V. Florovsky, Rome 1973, 227-243; Cath 9 (1980) 36-45; K. Hoeheisel, Das frühe Christentum und die Seelenwanderung: JbAC 27/28 (1984/85) 24-46; L. Scheffczyk, Die Reinkarnationsgedanke in der altchristlichen Literatur, SBA 1985, Heft 4, Munich 1985, 1-39; C. Schönborn, Quelques notes sur l'attitude de la théologie paléochrétienne face à la réincarnation, in C.-A. Keller (ed.), La réincarnation. Théories, raisonnements et appréciations. Un symposium, Bern 1986, 159-180; H. Frohnhofen, Reinkarnation und frühe Kirche: Stimmen der Zeit 207 (1989) 236-244; C. Schönborn, Risurrezione e reincarnazione, Casale Monf. 1990; M. Maritano, Giustino Martire di fronte al problema della metempsicosi (Dial., 4,4-7 e 5,5): Salesianum 53 (1992) 231-281; M. Introvigne (ed.), La sfida della reincarnazione, Milan 1993, 159-234; M. Krüger, Ichgeburt. Origenes und die Entstehung der christlichen Idee der Wiederverkörperung in der Denkbewegung von Pythagoras bis Lessing, Hildesheim-Zürich-New York 1996; P. Cantoni, Cristianesimo e reincarnazione, Leumann (To) 1997; TRE 31 (1999) 1-6; L. Lies, Origenes und die Reinkarnation: ZKTh 121 (1999) 129-158, 249-268; M. Maritano, Argomenti "filosofici" di Origene contro la metensomatosi, in L. Perrone (ed.), Origeniana Octava, Leuven 2003, 503-535.

M. Maritano

METHODIUS of Olympus (d. 311). Thought to have been bishop of Olympus in Lycia, Methodius is known to have died a martyr in Euboea in 311. Nevertheless, we know little more about his life. He studied at *Origen's exegetical school but did not accept Origen's theories on the indefinite succession of worlds, the preexistence of souls and the *resurrection of the flesh. He adopted an *ascetic and mystical typology, interpreting sacred history as progressive revelation. This teaching was set forth in his exegetical works that have survived in small fragments (e.g., on Leviticus and Proverbs) and in his commentaries on *Genesis and the *Song of Songs that are now lost. In his surviving writings we find a totalizing anthropology: the righteous person will be resurrected in the image of Christ with a glorified body identical to the mortal body. Freedom has been bestowed on humanity, because their actions were meritorious. These themes appear in the surviving Slavic versions of his works: Aglaophon or On the Resurrection, On Free Will, and On Life and Rational Action. The only work surviving in the original Greek is the Symposium or On Virginity, a dialogue that deals extensively with this issue and contains various prophetic images of a biblical tone. The term hagneia ("virginity") is intended in the original sense of the unity of the soul reaching out for the embrace of the divine Bridegroom: virginity of spirit more than of body. The first act in three scenes focuses on the theme of humanity. The second develops the teleological mystery. In the third, Tisiana projects into the eschatological period of truth the symbolic prophecies of the OT, thus arguing against Asian millenarianism. In the epilogue, Domnina sings that now the age of the Spirit has arrived. At the end, Thecla returns to the scene to sing about the eschatological exodus, recalling the stages of divine teaching.

PG 18, 9-408; CGS 27 (1927); PO 22, 5, 631-889; SC 95; A. Zeoli, S. Metodio. Il banchetto delle dieci vergini, Florence 1952; J. Farges, Les idées morales et religieuses de Méthode d'Olympe, Paris 1929; R. Devreesse, Anciens commentateurs grecs de l'Octateuque: Méthode d'Olympe: Biblica (1935) 166-191; M. Margheritis, L'influenza di Platone sul pensiero e sull'arte di Metodio d'Olimpo, in Studi dedicati alla memoria di Paolo Ubaldi, Milan 1937, 401-412; G. Lazzati, La tecnica dialogica nel Simposio di Metodio d'Olimpo: in ibid., 117-124; F. Baduina, Doctrina S. Methodii Ol. de peccato originali, Rome 1942; V. Buchheit, Studien zu Methodios von Olympos, TU 69, Berlin 1958; M. Pellegrino, L'inno del Simposio di S. Metodio Martire, Cuneo 1958; H. Crouzel, Les critiques adressées par Méthode et ses contemporains à la doctrine origénienne du corps ressuscité: Gregorianum (1972) 679-716; C. Riggi, Vita cristiana e dialogo liturgico nel Simposio di Metodio (6,5): Salesianum 37 (1975) 503-545; C. Riggi, Teologia della storia nel Simposio di Metodio di Olimpo: Augustinianum 16 (1976) 61-84; F. van de Paverd, Confession (exagoreusis) and Penance (exomologesis) in De Lepra of Methodius of Olympus: OCP 44 (1978) 309-341; Id., Paenitentia secunda in Methodius of Olympus: Augustinianum 18 (1978) 459-485; C. Tibiletti, L'ambiente culturale cristiano riflesso nel Simposio di Metodio, in Id., Verginità e matrimonio in antichi scrittori cristiani, Rome 1983, 99-133; C. Tibiletti, Metodio d'Olimpo, in Id., Verginità e matrimonio in antichi scrittori cristiani, Rome 1983, 134-195; E. Prinzivalli, L'esegesi biblica di Metodio di Olimpo, Rome 1985; C. Riggi, La forma del corpo risorto secondo Metodio in Epifanio (Haer. 64), in S. Felici (ed.), Morte e immortalità nella catechesi dei Padri del III–IV secolo, Rome 1985, 75-92; L.G. Patterson, Methodius of Olympus: Divine Sovereignty, Human Freedom, and Life in Christ, Washington, DC 1997; E. Prinzivalli, Desiderio di generazione e generazione del desiderio: Metodio di Olimpo e le polemiche sull'eros fra III e IV secolo, in S. Pricoco (ed.), L'eros difficile: amore e sessualità nell'antico cristianesimo, Soveria Mannelli 1998, 39-66; K. Bracht, Vollkommenheit und Vollendung: zur Anthropologie des Methodius von Olympus, Tübingen 1999.

C. Riggi

METHODIUS of Olympus (pseudo). To Methodius, the bishop of Olympus in *Lycia who probably lived between the end of the 3rd and the beginning of the 4th c., is attributed a Dialogue on the Orthodox Faith in five books, passed down to us in *Greek and in the *Latin version of *Rufinus of *Aquileia. In this work, *Adamantius defends the orthodox doctrines of the church against the *gnostic and *Marcionite doctrines presented by various spokespersons. Since Adamantius was the nickname of *Origen and these five books broadly refuted gnostics and Marcionites, the work was attributed to Origen and hence it was translated by Rufinus. In reality the author is not Origen, but rather a thinker who polemicizes against the ideas of Origen and who for this purpose avails himself of the works of *Methodius of Olympus, who in the Aglaophon e peri tes anastaseos ("On the resurrection") and in the Symposium e peri hagneias ("On virginity") had refuted Origen's tendencies toward an overly spiritualist opinion (ed. with intro. and comm. by H. Musurillo and V.-H. Debidour, Methode d'Olympe. Le banquet, Paris 1963, SC 95). The historical references contained in the Greek version allude to a time after the end of the *persecutions, and in the Greek they depart from the corresponding passages in the version of Rufinus. At one time, this was thought to demonstrate that the passages in question in the Greek version were *interpolations. Later on it was supposed that the Greek was original, and that it was actually Rufinus who changed the passages containing references to an age following the end of the persecutions.

Finally, around 690–692 an anonymous author wrote (in *Syriac, as Reinink has demonstrated) an Apocalypse under the name of Methodius, relating therein the events of his own age, esp. the spread of Islam, in the form of *predictions that were posited to have been made by the bishop of Olympus three centuries earlier. Ps.-Methodius, in reaction to the Islamic conquest initiated from the Near East, offers a panorama of the situation in the Mediterranean in the 2nd half of the 7th c.; he greatly influenced medieval Christian *eschatology. He describes the coming of the *Antichrist and his rule, along with the invasions of Gog and Magog, here presented as the descendants of Japheth imprisoned by Alexander the Great, but destined to escape and to position themselves as the leaders of their peoples and to invade the land of Israel, preparing the end of the world. Furthermore, he describes the final tribulations, even introducing new elements such as the last Roman emperor, who is a messianic figure destined to return at the apocalyptic era up to the end of the medieval period (see P. Alexander, The Medieval Legend of the Last Roman Emperor and Its Messianic Origin: JWI 41 [1978] 1-15). In the Syriac preface, which is not present in the Greek and Latin versions of the Apocalypse, it is said that the contents of this work were supposed to have been revealed to Methodius on the mountain of Senagar (Singara). By way of analogy, around the year 700, and in reaction to the beginning of the Islamic invasion, another apocalyptic work was written by a Christian of the Near East and attributed by the MS tradition to an earlier author: the De consumatione mundi of ps.-*Hippolytus (PG 10, 904-952), a work that greatly depends on the De Antichristo by *Hippolytus (see Alice Whealey, De consummatione mundi of Pseudo-Hippolytus: Byzantion 66 [1996] 461-469).

A.C. Lolos, Die Apokalypse des Ps.-Methodius, Meisenheim am Glan 1976, 46-140 (redactio 1) and 47-141 (red. 2); Id., Die dritte und vierte Redaktion des Ps.-Methodius, Meisenheim am Glan 1978, 22, 25-38, 40-75 (red. 3) and 23, 39-69, 76-78 (red. 4); G.J. Reinink, Ismael, der Wildesel in der Wüste. Zur Typologie der Apokalypse des Pseudo-Methodius: ByzZ 75 (1982) 336-344; Id., Pseudo-Methodius: A Concept of History in Response to the Rise of Islam, in The Byzantine and Early Islamic Near East, I, ed. A. Cameron and L.I. Conrad, Princeton 1992, 149-187; R.G. Hoyland, Seeing Islam as Others Saw It: A Survey and Evaluation of Christian, Jewish, and Zoroastrian Writings on Early Islam, Princeton 1997; Die Apokalypse des Pseudo-Methodius: die ältesten griechischen und lateinischen Übersetzungen, ed. W.J. Aerts and G.A.A. Kortekaas, Leuven and Paris 1998, CSCO 569-570 Subs. 97-98; W.E. Kaegi, Gigthis and Olbia in the Pseudo-Methodius Apocalypse and Their Significance: ByzF 26 (2000) 161-167; A. Külzer, Konstantinopel in der apokalyptischen Literatur der Byzantiner: JÖByz 50 (2000) 51-76; J.V. Tolan, Saracens: Islam in the Medieval European Imagination, New York 2002; Dizionario di letteratura cristiana antica, Rome 2006, 608.

I. Ramelli

METRODORUS. In connection with two anonymous writers against the *quartodecimans, *Photius (Bibl., cod. 115 and 116 [PG 103, 389ff.]) mentions a certain Metrodorus, author of a paschal *computation based on the lunar cycle of nineteen years, i.e., the metonic cycle (cycle of golden numbers), multiplied by the annual cycle of the days of the *week, namely, the cycle of twenty-eight (7 years x 4 leap years; after twenty-eight years the same annual cycle of the days of the week begins anew), such that the computation results in a paschal cycle of 532 years, beyond which with the year 533 the paschal new *moon and the *Sunday of *Easter fall on the same days of the first year of the cycle, and thus following. Metrodorus caused the cycle to begin with the inauguration of *Diocletian's reign in 284, which was commonly used in *Egypt for calculations, esp. in astronomy, and which had commenced with the beginning of a metonic cycle. According to Syncellus, this cycle was discovered by *Annianus, a *monk and *chronologist of *Alexandria who lived between the 4th and 5th c. (CPG III, 5537; see DHGE 3, 282). In fact, after 235 lunations, a metonic cycle, the paschal new moon results in about one and a half hours of difference with respect to the beginning of the preceding cycle, and therefore after 28 metonic cycles this difference surpasses 40 hours. Since this cycle was not entirely precise, one can make the conjecture that Metrodorus, probably also a man of Alexandria, lived at a time when the stated difference between the actual new moon and the one given by the computation was already detectable. Thus he would have attempted to correct the error of the church *calendar by using his own calculations; Photius claims that this computation of his had never previously been used. According to this hypothesis, Metrodorus would thus have lived between the 6th and 7th c. In the West, the paschal cycle of 532 years was introduced in 462 by *Victorius of Aquitaine (*Gennadius of Marseille, De vir. ill. 87 [122]: PL 58, 118, n. 88).

Th. Mommsen, MGH, Auct. ant. 9, Berlin 1892, 677ff.; Bardenhewer 4, 541 and 624; DCB 3, 911.

A. De Nicola

METROPOLITAN. Although not always, usually the territorial organization of the church is modeled on the civil Roman organization that was subdivided into prefectures, dioceses and provinces. These three multiplied in number during the reign of the emperor *Diocletian. The metropolis was the capital of the provincia (eparchia), where the governor (praeses or iudex) resided. In the course of the 3rd c., the bishop of the capital city likewise gained importance in the system of ecclesiastical organization. The *preaching of the first Christian missionaries was concentrated in the major cities that in turn were becoming centers of expansion into the surrounding territories. The apostle *Paul preached at *Ephesus; it is from Ephesus, the coastal capital of the provincia Asiae, that the gospel reached the inland cities. The Pauline Letters, the Revelation to St. John and the letter of *Pliny the Younger to the emperor *Trajan (Ep. 10,96) help us to discern the means by which Christianity spread into the surrounding territories. Canon 58 of the *Council of *Elvira already speaks of the prima cathedra episcopatus as an instrument of communion. This cathedra could have been the metropolitan see, and in the *Spain of the time it also could have been the see of the most elderly bishop of the province. Canon 4 of the First *Council of *Nicaea signals the first instance of the term "metropolitan bishop" (mētropolitēs episkopos) (see ACO I,i, 3, 3; Pope *Leo I, Ep. 106: PL 54, 1003-1004). This constituted a rare expression, because the other expression was preferred: "the bishop of the metropolis." However, the substantive term "metropolitan" (metropolita) of canon 6 was becoming increasingly common. The Latin versions of the canons imitate the Greek term: metropolitanus episcopus (EOMIA I, 116 and 258); alternatively, they employ a paraphrase or even the substantive term metropolitanus. In both canons 4 and 6 of Nicaea, the figure of the metropolitan bishop emerges: in every region, the confirmation of the election of a bishop falls upon the metropolitan bishop (can. 4); "In *Egypt, in *Libya and in the *Pentapolis [Cyrenaica and *Libya] let the ancient practice be maintained by which authority over all these provinces is due to the bishop of *Alexandria," while *Rome prevailed for *Italy and the city of *Antioch prevailed for *Syria; canon 6 stipulates that the nomination of a bishop requires the consent of the metropolitan.

Canon 9 of the Council of Antioch in 341 describes the responsibilities of the metropolitan in detail: "The bishop of each province must recognize that the bishop who presides at the metropolis is charged with the care and oversight of the entire province, since all who have business to conduct converge in the metropolis. As such it has been established that this man has the precedence of honor, and acc. to the ancient rule decreed by our fathers, the other bishops cannot do anything without him, except for what pertains to the particular district and to the surrounding countryside. . . . However, beyond all of this, one cannot do anything without the consensus of the metropolitan bishop, nor can one of the other bishops decide anything without the consensus of all the other bishops (compare cans. 11, 15, 19 and 29; see also Council of *Laodicea [363–364], can. 12). The Canons of the Apostles affirms that "it is necessary that the bishops of each region know who among them is prōtos, that they consider him as the head, and that they not do anything of importance without his consent" (can. 51). There was affirmed the principle of "territorial accommodation," namely, of the system of ecclesiastical organization modeled on its civil counterpart, by which if the juridical status of a city was changing, the change would occur to the same degree in an ecclesiastical setting (Council of *Chalcedon, can. 17; see F. Dvornik, passim). The consequence was that such a principle could extend as well to the system of metropolitan organization: if the imperial authority was dividing a region into multiple provinces, this could happen to the same degree in the system of ecclesiastical organization, even if there was an attempt on the ecclesiastical side to preserve the form of precedent.

Thus did *Basil attempt to do on the occasion of the division of *Cappadocia (*Greg. Naz., Oratio 22). Pope *Innocent I was exhorting the bishop of Antioch to preserve the ancient pattern of organization (Ep. 18). Moreover, some were plotting, through recourse to the imperial authorities, to divide a civil province in order to obtain two corresponding ecclesiastical provinces. Canon 12 of the Council of Chalcedon expressly condemns this practice, affirming that he who succeeds in doing so should be content only with the title of honor, while "it is evident that the privileges apply to the true metropolis." The council accepted that the city of Chalcedon honored herself with the title of metropolis, but without change to the metropolitan prerogatives of *Nicomedia (ACO II,i, 2, 157 [353]); yet on the other hand it rejected the creation of an ecclesiastical province of Berytus at the expense of *Tyre, acc. to the principle that there should be a single metropolitan within the boundaries of the civil province of Phoenicia Prima (Mansi 7,94). Otherwise, the fathers of the councils affirmed that the imperial regulations that ran counter to the canons lacked validity (Mansi 7,90); such a principle was immediately accepted by the emperor, who affirmed that "all the customary sanctions that run counter to the ecclesiastical canons" were invalid (CI 1,2,12).

Nevertheless, in some areas there were varying standards. Such was the case in Roman *Africa. The see of *Carthage was also the see of the metropolitan. Meanwhile the primate of *Numidia was the most senior in years since ordination, regardless of the episcopal see; this arrangement engendered disputes over seniority. Taking the place of moral and intellectual capacities, seniority diminished the influence and prestige of the primatial office. The Council of *Turin in 398 was compelled to settle some disputes among the bishops of *Gaul: one involving the bishop *Proculus of Marseille, who was interfering in the province of *Narbonensis, and another between the sees of *Arles and *Vienne (cans. 1 and 2). The disputes point to the fact that the organizing system was not well defined.

DACL 11, 786-790; Coptic Encyclopedia 5, 1611-1612; EC 8, 914-915; Niermeyer 882; H.J. Schmitz, Die Rechte der Metropoliten und Bischöfe in Gallien vom vierten bis sechsten Jahrhundert: Archiv für katholisches Kirchenrecht 72 (1894) 3-49; K. Lübeck, Reichseinteilung und kirchliche Hierarchie des Orients bis zum Ausgange des vierten Jahrhundert: ein Beitrag zur Rechts und Verfassungsgeschichte der Kirche, Münster 1901; C.H. Turner, Metropolitans and Their Jurisdiction in Primitive Canon Law, in Studies in Early Church History, Oxford 1912, 71-96; P. Batiffol, La prima cathedra episcopatus du concile d'Elvire: JTS 26 (1924) 45-48; E. Herman, Appunti sul diritto metropolitico nella Chiesa bizantina: OCP 13 (1947) 522-550; H. Grotz, Die Hauptkirchen des Ostens von den Anfängen bis zum Konzil von Nikaia (325), OCA 169, Rome 1964; F. Dvornik, Byzantium and the Roman Primacy, New York 1966; C. Vogel, Circonscriptions ecclésiastiques et ressorts administratifs civils durant la première moitié du IV[e] siècle [du concile de Nicée (325), au concile d'Antioch (341)], in La géographie administrative et politique d'Alexandre à Mahomet, Strasbourg 1979, 273-291; G. Orioli, Gli arcivescovi maggiori: origine ed evoluzione storica fino al secolo settimo: Apollinaris 58 (1985) 615-627; L. Örsy, The Development of the Concept of "Protos" in the Ancient Church: Kanon 9 (1989) 83-97; P. L'Huillier, The Church of the Ancient Councils, Crestwood 1996.

A. Di Berardino

METRUM IN GENESIN (440–461). The Metrum in Genesin is a *rhetorical and didactic *paraphrase of the first six chapters of the biblical Genesis. The MSS transmit it under the name of Hilarius, a *Gallic *poet who is not to be confused with either *Hilary of Poitiers or *Hilary of Arles. The short carmen, probably unfinished in 198 hexameters, is preceded by a proem in three elegiac couplets, containing the *dedication to the antistes Christi (probably Pope *Leo I), the statement of the theme (the opus Dei), and the decisive declaration of the poet's incapability and of the subject's importance. The carmen opens with words that echo the *eucharistic preface (v. 7 dignum opus et iustum semper tibi dicere grates), sound a tone of justification for having rendered a Christian theme in poetical verse, and actually describe the poet as a *priest. Hilarius takes a cue from *Scripture alone, and then develops a non-literal and spiritual *exegesis that culminates in the suggestive *typological allusion to Christ and baptism. In describing the *creation, the poet deftly employs the poetic lexis of Virgil as well as rhetorical devices, esp. the device of apostrophe, and he incorporates the influence of concepts in ancient cosmology, esp. those in the first book of Ovid's Metamorphoses. In the final analysis, acc. to Smolak, the poet of the carmen follows the model of Lucretius. This would represent a sort of counterpoint to the invocation of Venus Genitrix in the first book of De rerum natura: the God of the OT, the father of humanity, replaces Venus, queen of the natural world and mother of the Romans.

CPL³ 1427. Editions: PL 50, 1287ff.; R. Peiper, CSEL 23, 1891, 231-239. Studies: M. Manitius, Geschichte der christlich-lateinischen Poesie bis zur Mitte des 8. Jahrhunderts, Stuttgart 1891, 188-192 (under "Hilarius von Arles"); S. Gamber, Le livre de la Genèse dans la poésie latine au Vᵉ siècle, Paris 1899, 17-19 (and passim); K. Smolak, Unentdeckte Lukrezspuren: WS 86, n.s. 7, (1973) 216-239; D. Kartschoke, Bibeldichtung, Munich 1975, 39; K. Smolak, La poesia cristiana latina tra il quarto e il quinto secolo: Salesianum 62 (2000) 19-39; M. Roberts, Creation in Ovid's "Metamorphoses" and the Latin Poets of Late Antiquity: Arethusa 35 (2002) 403-415.

A.V. Nazzaro

MICHAEL the ARCHANGEL. The archangel Michael, the name meaning "he who is like *God," mentioned for the first time in the book of Daniel (10:13-21; 12:1) as the defender of the people of Israel, is along with *Gabriel and Raphael one of the only *angels mentioned in the Bible. He fights against Satan for the body of *Moses (Jdt 5:9); in heaven Michael and his angels fight against the dragon (Rev 12:7). In some apocryphal texts, including the Ascension of Isaiah, Assumption of Moses (see *Origen, De princ. 3,2,2) and Enoch, he appears as the "commander in chief." The ancient church considered him to be a defender of Christians against the *pagans and a protector against Satan, esp. at the time of death. Michael, once protector of Israel, becomes protector of the church, the head of the celestial armies, healer, a guide in the afterlife, etc. (see Saxer).

The cult of *Saint Michael surged in *Phrygia (*Asia Minor), as he was venerated as a healer. Some *sanctuaries were constructed near wells, whose waters came to be considered *miraculous. A renowned Michaelion was at Chairotopa near Colossae, and there were various oratories dedicated to him in Phrygia, Pisidia (*Theodoret of Cyrrhus, Ad Col. 2,18: PG 82, 613) and *Bithynia (*Procopius , De aedif. 5,3). Canon 35 of the so-called Council of *Laodicea (ca. 363–364) condemns the cult of angels. At *Constantinople in the 6th c., some ten churches dedicated to St. Michael existed (Janin 28-50). To the emperor *Constantine I was attributed the foundation of one of these churches, the Michaelion to the N of the city at Hestiae where the angel had appeared. It was a place of miracles and of the practice of incubatio*. *Sozomen, who speaks on this matter, was familiar with this Michaelion (HE 2,3). In *Egypt, the veneration of St. Michael resurged during the 4th c. with numerous cultic sites (*Didymus, Trin. 2,8: PG 39, 592) and subsequently various festivals were celebrated.

The cult of Michael also spread in the West; prior to the 9th c., he was the only angel in whose honor a feast was celebrated. The Leonine, Gregorian and Gelasian *Sacramentaries assign the feast of St. Michael to 29 September. Pope *Boniface IV (608–615) dedicated the chapel of St. Michaelis inter nubes on the sepulchral mound of the emperor *Hadrian; the site would later be called Castel Sant'Angelo. His cult developed esp. after the "apparitions" at the time of Pope *Gelasius I (492–496) on the Monte Sant'Angelo of the Gargano Peninsula in Puglia, if not earlier, as Otranto argues. At the end of the 5th c., churches dedicated to the archangel arose at Larino and Potenza. As early as the 6th c., a sanctuary was constructed on the spot of a pagan cult. With the victory of the *Longobards (Lombards) over the *Byzantines at Siponto in 650, his cult spread further, and Monte Sant'Angelo became one of the most famous of all *pilgrimage sites, esp. for the two important feasts of 8 May (the apparition and the victory of the Longobards) and of 29 September (*dedication of the church). The basilica of S. Michele Arcangelo was constructed at *Rome on the Via Salaria. In the early years of the 6th c., sanctuaries were built in *Gaul: in 506 at *Lyons, in 512 at *Arles, around 550 at Limoges, among others. In the 8th c., the cult developed at Mont-Saint-Michel in Normandy and exhibited a dependency on the cult in Puglia.

AASS, Sept. 8, 1972, 4-123; BS 9, 410-446; LTK³ 7, 227-232; R. Janin, Les sanctuaires byzantins de saint Michel: Echos d'Orient (1954) 28-50; J.P. Rohland, Der Erzengel Michael, Artz und Feldherr: zwei Aspekte des vor- und frühbyzantinischen Michaelskultes, Leiden 1977; J. Lemarié, Textes liturgiques concernat le culte de Saint Michel: SE 14 (1963) 277-283; ed. C. Carletti and G. Otranto, Il santuario di S. Michele sul Gargano dal VI al IX secolo: contributo alla storia della Langobardia meridionale, Bari 1980; A. Troiano, L'arcangelo guerriero: San Michele e il

"culto speciale" del papa e della Chiesa, Foggia Edizioni "Michael," n.p.. 1989; C. Carletti - G. Otranto, eds., Culto e insediamenti micaelici nell'Italia meridionale fra tarda antichità e medioevo, Bari 1994; V. Saxer, Jalons pour servir à l'histoire du culte de l'archange saint Michel en Orient jusqu'à l'iconoclasme, in Noscere sancta: miscellanea in memoria di Agostino Amore OFM, Rome 1995, 357-426; P. Bouet - G. Otranto - A. Vauchez, eds., Culte et pèlerinages à Saint Michel en Occident: les trois monts dédiés à l'archange, Rome 2003.

A. Di Berardino

MICHAEL the ARCHANGEL (iconography). Together with *Gabriel and Raphael, Michael is one of the *angels specifically mentioned in Holy *Scripture. In *Daniel he is remembered as "one of the chief princes" (10:13) and in *Revelation as the archangel that struggles against the *demon and as he who plays a preeminent role in the angelic hierarchy (12:7-8).

Going back to the earliest examples of visual representation, Michael reflects the individual traits that were attributed to him by Holy Scripture. In the *mosaic of the presbytery in the basilica of S. Apollinare Nuovo at *Ravenna (6th c.), he is represented as the guardian of the church, together with Gabriel. With a young and winged appearance, he wears the military costume of high rank, the chlamys, and with his right hand holds the spear of the thrice-written ΑΓΙΟϹ. Contemporaneous with the mosaic of Ravenna is a *diptych in the British Museum (W.F. Volbach, Elfenbeinarbeiten der Spätantike und des frühen Mittelalters, Mainz [3]1976, n. 109, pl. 159), in which Michael is represented with a *cross-bearing orb and a long baculus, attributes that identify him as a divine messenger and a guide for the *souls of the departed. According to G. de Jerphanion, the type of Michael trampling the dragon would have been distinguished by the *Coptic artistic production, yet it did not appear before the 9th c., at least in the West. One of the most ancient witnesses seems to be provided by a small ivory table in the Kunstgewerbemuseum of Leipzig (Volbach, no. 222, pl. 103), in which Michael, wearing military costume and standing, is in the act of crushing the dragon. Yet the most famous witness of this *iconographic type is the bronze door of the *sanctuary of Monte Sant'Angelo in Gargano (1076). In one of the panels decorated in niello, the archangel clothed in imperial vestments crushes the demon prostrated at his feet. Throughout the medieval era, this iconography was widely disseminated, joined to the iconography that represents Michael as the weigher of souls.

DACL 11/1, 903-907; LCI 3, 255-265; M. de Fraipont, Les origines occidentales du type de Saint Michel debout sur le dragon: Revue belge d'Histoire de l'Art et d'Archéologie 7 (1937) 289-301; G. de Jerphanion, L'origine copte du type saint Michel debout sur le dragon: CRAI (1938) 367-381; P.E. Schramm, Sphaira – Globus – Reichsapfel, in Mélanges en honneur de Monseigneur Michel Andrieu, Strasbourg 1956, 429 (attributes of St. Michael); C. Lamy-Lassalle, Les archanges en costume impérial dans la peinture murale italienne, in Synthronon, Paris 1968, 189-198; O.F.A. Meinardus, Der Erzengel Michael als Psychopompos: OC 62 (1978) 166-168; G. Bertelli, La porta del Santuario di S. Michele a Monte Sant'Angelo: aspetti e problemi, in S. Salomi (ed.), Le porte di bronzo dall'antichità al secolo XIII, Rome 1990, I, 293-305; P. Belli D'Elia, L'iconografia di san Michele o dell'arcangelo Michele, in M. Bussagli and M. D'Onofrio (ed.), Le ali di Dio. Messaggeri e Guerrieri alati fra Oriente e Occidente, Cinisello Balsamo 2000, 123-125; R. Giuliani, under "Angelo," in F. Bisconti (ed.), Temi di iconografia paleocristiana, Vatican City 2000, 106-109.

C. Carletti

MICHAEL BADOQA, the researcher (6th c.). An *exegete and teacher in the Church of the East, Michael Badoqa (or Michael Malpana) studied at the school of *Nisibis; he probably departed in 596, when 300 professors and students abandoned the school in protest against the teaching of its headmaster, *Henana of Adiabene. He was an esteemed exegete and the author of Questions Regarding the Text of the Bible, a work that filled three volumes and that would come to be cited by the later hermeneutical tradition, including the great *Syriac-Arabic dictionary of Bar Bahlul (10th c.), the Book of the Bee by Solomon of Basra (13th c.) and the Garden of Delights (Gannat Bussame; 13th c.). Four christological tractati* of Michael have been preserved, published in the critical edition of L. Abramowski and A.E. Goodman: one titled On Mary the Theotokos (IIIa), one against *Cyril of Alexandria (IIIb), one against the Severians (*Severus of Antioch—IIIc) and one against the Julianists (*Julian of Halicarnassus—IIId). The MS tradition further attributes to him a writing on *dreams, a tractatus on humanity as a microcosm and a polemical work against Western Syriac theology.

Baumstark, 129; BBKL 16, 1066; BO III/1, 147; A. Baumstark, De causis festorum: OC 1 (1901) 333-334; A. Vööbus, History of the School of Nisibis (CSCO 226), Louvain 1965, esp. 104, 278-279 and 309; L. Abramowski - A.E. Goodman, A Nestorian Collection of Christological Texts, Cambridge University Library Ms. Oriental 1319, 2 vols., Cambridge 1972.

K. den Biesen

MIDDLE PLATONISM. This term designates the current of Platonic thought dominant in the first two centuries of the imperial age and destined to bear fruit in the 3rd c. in *Neoplatonism. It has two chief characteristics: a strong religious aspect, perfectly in harmony with its age, and cultural *syncretism. Plato—often associated with Pythagoras—is considered its greatest theologian, he who more than any other managed to penetrate into the esoteric knowledge of an absolutely transcendent divinity, far from the sensible world, most difficult to know and ineffable; he knew how to create a type of absolute philosophy. Middle Platonism is an exposition and interpretation of this "absolute philosophy," thus anticipating the primary intention of Neoplatonism. Notwithstanding the often vehement polemics with regard to *Aristotle and the *Stoics, not to mention Epicurus (e.g., Plutarch and *Atticus), such a type of "expository exegesis" did not systematically rule out Pythagorean, peripatetic and *Stoic teachings; rather, it closely combined them with more genuinely Platonic teachings of the ancient Academy. Thus, in Middle Platonism as well, there continued the eclectic tendency, which was already present in the Stoic Posidonius (2nd c. BC) and "in the academic" Antiochus of Ascalon (1st c. BC) and characteristic of Neoplatonism as well. In the case of Plutarch of Chaeronea, his syncretism is not only philosophical but also religious: in its theological-metaphysical conceptions one can observe Platonic, Aristotelian and Stoic elements, as well as elements taken from Egyptian religion, the religion of Zoroaster and from Greek mythology. Thus the highest god is identical with the Good in Rep. VI 509b; with the One of the second hypostasis in Parmenides; with the absolute immutable being formed from the ideas; with the beautiful, the intelligence, the demiurge, the good anima mundi* ("world soul") in the tenth book of the Laws, and is influenced by Platonic-Aristotelian conceptions: its identification with the intelligible par excellence and the attributes "principle," "free of mixture," "first," "ungenerated," "incorrupt," "pure," "simple," "free of passions." At the same time, however, this god is identical with the Egyptian god Osiris and the good principle of Zoroaster. The logos, as this term is used by the Stoics, is the sum of the logoi, the rational and spermatic principles which, combining with matter, generate sensible objects. The logos is the law and harmony of the universe. The doctrine of primordial matter—identified with the "receptacle" of Plato's Timaeus and with the Egyptian goddess Isis, and defined as privation of forms and qualities—is identical with that found in Aristotle, in Stoicism and in Antiochus of Ascalon. The conception of the sensible universe, identified with Horus, the son of Isis and Osiris, and dominated by the rational soul or logos, reproduces that of the Timaeus and of the Stoics. Finally, the principle of evil is identified on the one hand with the evil principle of Zoroaster, with Set and with Typhon, and on the other hand with the "indeterminate dyad" of the Pythagoreans and the evil anima mundi of the tenth book of Plato's Laws.

Apart from Plutarch of Chaeronea, one of its most significant exponents, Middle Platonism includes figures such as the orator Maximus of Tyre, *Celsus, the great antagonist of Christianity against whom *Origen thought it necessary to write one of his major works, Eudorus of Alexandria, Nicostratus, Atticus, Calvisius Taurus, Apuleius and Alcinous (J. Whittaker demonstrated, in Phoenix 28 [1974] 450-456 = Studies in Platonism and Patristic Thought, London 1984, XXI, that Alcinous, and not Albinus, is the correct name of the author of the Didaskalikos—an exposition of Platonic philosophy—edited by C.F. Hermann in the 6th volume of the Teubner edition of Plato, Leipzig 1884, 152-189, and more recently by J. Whittaker, Alcinoos, Paris 1990). Connected with this is the source for the 3rd book of Diogenes Laertius, which also contains an exposition of Platonic philosophy, and the source used by *Hippolytus in his exposition of Platonic teachings (Refutatio I, 19: GCS pp.19-23). *Philo of Alexandria, too, can be said to belong to this type of philosophy (see *Hellenistic Judaism).

It is not possible here to give a detailed exposition of the thought of the individual exponents of Middle Platonism. (The most complete introductory bibl. for all the "Middle Platonic" philosophers and their teachings is still that of K. Praechter, in F. Überweg, Grundriss der Geschichte der Philosophie, Berlin 1926, 524-556.) Nevertheless, a comparative study of the various authors permits a general account of the basic positions of this eclectic Platonism. The first principle, generally presented as intelligence (νοῦς/*nous), is described in concepts and terms taken both from Platonic dialogues (esp. the Symposium, the Phaedrus and the Timaeus) and from Aristotle. The transcendence of this principle is emphasized with respect to other beings; the absence in it of form, color and size, as well as its ineffability; attributes are applied to it such as "ungenerated," "incorruptible," "immutable," "pure," "first," "principle," "exempt from mixture," "exempt from passion" (see above, regarding Plutarch). These philosophers consider a negative procedure, which consists in taking away any possible name, the most appropriate in approaching this principle. Conceived as a νοῦς in conformity with what is stated in the Timaeus, in the Philebus and in book (Λ) of the Metaphysics of Aristotle, this "first god" (on the "Middle Platonic" origin of this expression, see *Platonism and the Fathers, with regard to Origen) contains in itself the Platonic ideas, which are presented as its thoughts, just as they were presented by the exponents of the ancient Academy and Antiochus of Ascalon.

There are, however, some cases—Celsus is typical—in which, under the influence of Rep. VI 509b and of Aristotle, Περί εὐχῆς (fr. 46 Rose) he is placed above ουσία and intelligence, a teaching which will become foundational for *Neoplatonism, from Plotinus on (see Whittaker, Ἐπέκεινα νοῦ και οὐσίας: VChr 23 [1969] 91-104). Under the "first god" and the "ideas" are the anima mundi—which Plato speaks of in the Timaeus, in the Philebus and in the 10th book of the Laws—governor of the sensible universe and endowed with intelligence; the Stoic logos, conceived as a divine power emanating from the first principle and containing in itself the Platonic ideas, by now identified with the Stoic logoi and destined to be united to matter. Since this is the supreme law of the universe, the force that holds it together and makes of it a harmonious whole is practically identical with the anima mundi, as is the case for Plutarch and Atticus. Moreover, the ungenerated primordial matter—this is the true meaning of the receptacle (ὑποδοχή) of Plato's Timaeus—is considered to be deprived originally of all forms and qualities and destined to receive in itself the marks impressed upon it by the ideas or logoi, which function as a seal. (This is how the various elements and qualities, and the sensible universe itself, take their origin.) The two following observations arise spontaneously with regard to this metaphysical system: (1) The Platonic ideas, while retaining their transcendence and immutability and their function as "models," are no longer static archetypes. They are identified on the one hand with the thoughts of God; and on the other—as in the case of Plutarch, Philo and Atticus—together with the divine δύναμις and the Stoic λόγοι, they assume a preeminently dynamic function in the production of the universe, analogously to what had already occurred in Antiochus of Ascalon. (2) With the one exception of Eudorus, the idea of creatio ex nihilo is absolutely foreign to this type of philosophy. It appears in only a few neo-Pythagorean circles (see *Platonism and the Fathers with regard to Epiphanius), in *Ammonius Saccas, and in the patristic authors from *Clement of Alexandria and Origen on. Unformed and ungenerated matter is one of the three fundamental principles (ἀρχαί), the others being God and the ideas. According to the interpretation of the Timaeus given by Plutarch and Atticus, only the sensible world can be said to be "generated," as a result of the imposition of the forms and of order on primordial matter (but other authors such as Taurus, Celsus, Alcinous and Apuleius, just as Aristotle and the ancient Academy, consider even the universe to be "eternal").

Humans must on the one hand moderate with reason—the charioteer of the Phaedrus—the passions which arise in the irrational parts of the soul, and which are often, as *Posidonius and *Galen taught, strictly dependent on the dispositions of the body (here again the ideal of μετριοπάθεια, formulated by the middle Stoicism of Panaetius and Posidonius, and combined, as for Plutarch, Alcinous and Philo, with the Aristotelian doctrine of virtue as μεσότης). Virtue itself is considered, acc. to Platonic teaching, "the harmony of the soul," and, in accordance with Plato and the Stoics, it is self-sufficient in the possession of happiness. On the other hand, humans must attain to θεωρία, or contemplation, which consists in the possession of wisdom or σοφία, defined in Stoic terms as "knowledge of things divine and human." Only in this way can they reach the supreme ideal indicated by Plato (Theaetetus 176b) as ὁμοίωσις θεῷ κατὰ τὸ δυνατόν—"likeness to God as much as possible," which is often combined with the Pythagorean ἕπου θεῷ—"follow God" (see C. Andresen: ZNTW 44 [1952–1953] 163). It was this type of philosophy which exercised a decisive influence on the apologists of the 2nd c. AD (*Athenagoras, *Justin Martyr, the author of the Cohortatio ad Graecos), on *Clement and on Origen himself. The judgments on the various philosophical schools, the admiration for Plato and Pythagoras, the characteristic elements of the teaching concerning the transcendence of God, the teaching concerning the ideas as thoughts of God contained in his intelligence and in his logos, the view of the origin of the universe as coming from the imposition of the forms and of order upon ungenerated matter, unformed and deprived of all qualities and unordered by the logos, the teaching on the origin of the passions and of the control of them as well as the teaching on virtue, can be found in all these patristic authors (even if Clement refuses to see in matter a true and proper "principle," and Origen rejects the classical Middle Platonic conception of uncreated matter). Concerning all these points, see *Platonism and the Fathers.

On the influence of Middle Platonism on patristic authors of the 2nd–3rd c.: H. Koch, Pronoia und Paideusis Studien über Origenes und sein Verhältnis zum Platonismus, Berlin-Leipzig 1932; C. Andresen, Justin und der mittlere Platonismus: ZNTW 44 (1952–1953) 157-195; J. Daniélou, Méssage évangelique et culture hellénistique, Tournai 1961 (It. tr. Bologna 1976); A. Wlosok, Laktanz und die philosophische Gnosis, Heidelberg 1960; J. Whittaker, Ἐπέκεινα νοῦ καὶ οὐσίας: VChr 23 (1969) 91-104 =

Studies in Platonism and Patristic Thought, London 1984, XXI; S. Lilla, Clement of Alexandria, Oxford 1971. On Middle Platonism in general see K. Praechter, in F. Überweg, Grundriss der Geschichte der Philosophie, I, Die Philosophie des Altertums, Berlin 1926, 524-556; A.M.J. Festugière, La révélation d'Hermès Trismégiste, IV, Paris 1954, 92-140; Ph. Merlan, The Cambridge History of Later Greek and Early Medieval Philosophy, Cambridge 1967, 53-83; J. Dillon, The Middle Platonists: A Study of Platonism 80 B.C. to A.D. 220, London 1977, ²1996; M.O. Young, Justin, Socrates, and the Middle-Platonists: SP 18 (1989) 2, 161-166; Alcinoos, Enseignement des doctrines de Platon, intr., text established and comm. by J. Whittaker, et traduit par P. Louis, Paris 1990; S. Lilla, Introduzione al medio platonismo, Rome 1992 (with ample bibl.); F. Romano, Il neoplatonismo, Rome 1998; J.P. Kenney, Ancient Apophatic Theology, in Gnosticism and Later Platonism, ed. J.D. Turner - R. Majercik, Atlanta 2000, 259-276; var. aus., Arrhetos Theos. L'ineffabilità del primo principio nel Medioplatonismo, ed. F. Calabi, Pisa 2002; G. Reale, Storia della filosofia greca e romana, 7: Rinascita del platonismo e del pitagorismo, Corpus Hermeticum e Oracoli Caldaici, Milan 2004.

S. Lilla

MID-PENTECOST. From the 5th to the 7th c. there existed a feast on the Wednesday of the fourth week of *Easter, thus marking the middle of the fifty days after Easter. It was celebrated in *Milan and in *Aquileia, where it most probably had its origin. It was also celebrated in *Constantinople, *Jerusalem, *Antioch, *Cyprus, *Crete and perhaps also in *Spain, attested by the *homilies of *Peter Chrysologus, *Leontius of Constantinople, *Severus of Antioch, *Leontius of Neapolis (Cyprus), ps.-*Amphilochius of Iconium and ps.-*John Chrysostom, as well as from various *sacramentaries, lectionaries, *homiliaries, missals, pentecostaries and *itineraries. The *gospel of the day was Jn 7:14-31, which begins, "About the middle of the feast Jesus went up into the temple and taught," chosen perhaps precisely because of the beginning words iam autem die festo mediante. The feast therefore presents *Christ as the Messiah (mediator), teaching to the Jews the gospel as the new law. Apart from this text the homilies often concerned the healings of the paralytic (Jn 5:1-18) and of the man born blind (Jn 9:1-41) on the *sabbath and polemicized against the incredulity of the Jews. Mid-Pentecost survived only in the *Eastern *Greek, Slavic, Romanian and *Arab churches. The limited spread of the feast, topographically as much as chronologically, is probably explained by the fact that it could not form part of the general line of development of the paschal cycle—i.e., to explain the various steps of the historical *mystery of salvation acc. to their historic order—and did not have theological content specifically adapted to the paschal season.

G. Morin, L'antique solennité du Mediante die festo au XXV^e jour après Pâques: RBen 6 (1889) 199-202; N. Nilles, Mitte-Pfingsten: ZKTh 19 (1895) 169-177; C.L. Feltoe, Adversaria liturgica: B. In mediante die festo: JTS 2 (1901) 130-137; H. Leclercq, Mediante die festo: DACL 11/1 (1933) 188-193; P. Borella, La solennità "In mediante die festo": Ambrosius 19 (1943) 61-66; H.R. Drobner, Die Festpredigten der Mesopentecoste in der Alten Kirche: Augustinianum 33 (1993) 137-170; Id., Wurzeln und Verbreitung des Mesopentecoste-Festes in der Alten Kirche: RivAC 70 (1994) 203-245.

H.R. Drobner

MILAN

I. Christian and archaeological origins - II. Councils.

I. Christian and archaeological origins. The medieval tradition recounts that St. Barnabas the *apostle preached the *gospel in Milan (it specifies his *baptismal font in a fountain near the church of St. *Eustorgius) and consecrated the first bishop, St. Anathalon. It also recounts that a Valerius Philippus donated to the second bishop *Caius a hortus to build a cemetery and a house near the Via di Vercelli, where the third bishop, Castricianus, built the first domus ecclesiae in the time of *Gallienus or of *Aurelian. This information is not without historical value, esp. if the first martyrs whom St. *Ambrose praised date back to *Diocletian's persecutions (303–304): Victor, *Nabor and Felix, Mauretanian soldiers killed at Lodi whose bodies Maternus (seventh bishop) buried in Milan right along the road to Vercelli. And here St. Ambrose built his first basilica, consecrating it in 386 with the bodies of two other martyrs, *Gervasius and Protasius. Meanwhile on the road to Rome the basilica of the Apostles was also built, where the relics of St. *Nazarius were laid around ten years later. After the battle of *Constantine and *Licinius, the celebrated imperial rescript was issued in Milan, which is called the Edict of Constantine or the *Edict of Milan. This extended freedom of religion to Christians. In the *council that gathered in *Rome in the same year, and in that of *Arles in 314, Mirocles the seventh bishop of Milan was present. He must have been responsible for the first cathedral (S. Maria, which St. Ambrose called basilica vetus) and the first baptistery, built near the ancient walls and now under the Duomo. They were followed in the middle of the 4th c. by the great basilica of five aisles (basilica nova), dedicated to the Savior and then to St. *Thecla, built perhaps by the bishops *Eustorgius and *Dionysius.

St. Ambrose, the bishop who followed *Auxentius's twenty-year *Arian episcopate, added the baptistery to this basilica, building it octagonally like the full-immersion baptismal font. He himself had to fill in the history of the Milanese church (as well as that of other churches) with his apostolic, political and diplomatic action. Also he was responsible for much construction: four suburban basilicas must be attributed to the energetic episcopal action of the saintly bishop, in addition to the baptistery. The first is the kind we see in the *cemetery ad martyres (later called St. Ambrose), tripartite with 26 columns (the oldest nearby chapel of St. Victor preserves mosaics from the 5th c., where the only sure picture of St. Ambrose resides). Contemporary with that is the basilica of the Apostles (later St. Nazarius), in an open cross plan on the Via di Roma (first of its type in the Po Valley; it preserved in relics a famous capsella decorated in silver with scenes from the OT and NT, now in the treasury of the Duomo). Next followed that of St. Dionysius on the Via di Bergamo, a hall with two sepulchral niches on the sides; and finally that of the Virgins (later St. Simplicianus) in the plan of a cross, ample and with encircling portico, on the Via di Como and the Via di *Rhaetia. Around these basilicas, ample cemetery spaces have provided many sepulchral inscriptions (while those monuments are noted by the Silloge of Lorsch). Other tombs and inscriptions (and the *sarcophagus of Cervia Abundantia) came from the cemetery near the tomb of St. Victor in the enclosure of *Maximian. The basilica of St. *Lawrence on the Via di Ticinum (Pavia) exhibits a central plan and must have been considered a palatine basilica, erected perhaps by the will of *Theodosius along with his family mausoleum (it includes distinguished wall mosaics attributed to the end of the 4th c. and beginning of the 5th c.): it is the most sumptuous and symmetrical basilica in the Christian West. There is one large *sarcophagus of high quality in Milan—that with *Christ between the ranks of the apostles on a background at the doors of the city in the basilica of St. Ambrose (end of the 4th c.). There are important Christians ivories: one depicts the risen Christ. The memorable painted tombs are traceable to the 5th c.

*Augustine, the greatest spiritual conquest of Ambrose, resided in Milan, and in 400 *Rufinus of Aquileia, the translator of *Origen, was also present for a debate on *Origenism with *Eusebius of Cremona: Milan was the capital of the Western empire and was a center of culture. But the invasion of *Alaric, defeated at Pollentia by *Stilicho, persuaded *Honorius to move the capital to *Ravenna, while the successive invasions (*Attila) pushed the bishop of Milan to take shelter in Liguria. Thus Milan lost that prestige that it enjoyed for more than a century and that the active Martinianus, elected in 423, and Eusebius, who gathered the council there in which the condemnation of *Eutyches was confirmed, had nobly sought to preserve.

DACL 2, 983-1102; EC 8, 987-995; EAA 5, 1-6; F. Reggiori, La basilica ambrosiana. Ricerche e restauri 1929–1940, Milan 1941; A. Calderini, Le basiliche dell'eta ambrosiana in Milano: Ambrosiana (1942) 137-164; A. Frova, Pitture di tomba paleocristiana a Milano: Boll. d'Arte 36 (1951); A. Levi, L'architettura paleocristiana a Milano. Actes VIe Congres Et. Byzantines, Paris 1951, 67ff.; A. De Capitani d'Arzago, La chiesa maggiore di Milano, Santa Tecla, Milan 1952; E. Villa, La basilica ambrosiana degli apostoli: Ambrosius 39 (1963) suppl. n. 2; M. Cagiano de Azevedo, Sant'Ambrogio committente d'arte: Arte Lombarda 8 (1963) 55-76; G. Traversi, Architettura paleocristiana milanese, Milan 1964; M. Mirabella Roberti, La basilica di San Simpliciano: Arte Lombarda 12 (1967) 155-158; Id., Topografia e architettura anteriori al Duomo di Milano. Atti Congr. intern. sul Duomo di Milano, I, Milan 1969, 31-41; A. Palestra, I cimiteri paleocristiani milanesi: Archivio Ambrosiano 28 (1975) 23-47; M. Mirabella Roberti, Milano romana, Milan 1984; var. aus., Milano capitale dell'impero romano 286–402 d.C., Milan 1990; G. Fedalto, Rufino di Concordia tra Oriente e Occidente, Rome 1990, 140-143; var. aus., Felix temporum reparatio. Atti del Conv. archeol. int. "Milano capitale dell'impero romano," ed. G. Sena Chiesa - E. Arslan, Milan 1992; G. Cuscito, L'area cemeteriale di S. Lorenzo Maggiore. Per il corpus delle iscrizioni paleocristiane di Milano: Epigraphica LV (1993) 75-102; Id., Il recinto di S. Vittore al Corpo fuori Porta Vercellina. Per il corpus delle iscrizioni paleocristiane di Milano: Archivio Storico Lombardo 119 (1993) 407-441; Id., Il cimitero presso S. Celso. Per il corpus delle iscrizioni paleocristiane di Milano, in Historiam pictura refert, Vatican City 1994, 175-195; Id., Il cimitero milanese a S. Eustorgio: revisione del materiale epigrafico paleocristiano. Per il corpus delle I.C.I. su Mediolanum: Rivista Archeologica dell'Antica Provincia e Diocesi di Como 176 (1995) 123-169; Id., Materiali epigrafici paleocristiani dal cimitero a S. Simpliciano. Prolegomena ad ICI—Mediolanum, in XLII Corso di cultura sull'arte ravennate e bizantina, Ravenna 1995, 255-274; var. aus., La citta e la sua memoria. Milano e la tradizione di sant'Ambrogio, Milan 1997; PCBE 2, 1925-1940.

M. Mirabella Roberti

II. *Councils. 345. Four Eastern bishops (*Demophilus, *Eudoxius, Macedonius and Martyrius) gathered in Milan to present a formula of faith (the Ekthesis makrostichos) to the emperor *Constantine and to other bishops gathered there. It was a formula accompanied by eight articles, which offered explanations and in which *Marcellus of *Ancyra, *Paul of Samosata and *Photinus bishop of *Sirmium were condemned. The synod met in the basilica Vetus in the presence of the emperor. The Western bishops accepted Photinus's condemnation. Nevertheless, the Eastern bishops, not wanting to accede to the request of their Western counterparts to condemn *Arianism, abandoned the meeting.

347 (or 349). Another council, perhaps gathered in Milan, renewed the condemnation of Photinus and received a note from *Ursacius of Singidunum and of *Valens of Mursa, who requested the communio; thus they wrote a letter to Pope *Julius.

355. Council ordered by Pope *Liberius, after that of *Arles in 353, favorable to Arianism; many Western and a few Eastern bishops were present, as well as the pro-Arian emperor *Constantius; for this reason *Eusebius of Vercelli did not want to participate, not having faith that there would be a good outcome against Arianism. In fact, the council requested the condemnation of *Athanasius. Popular uprisings having broken out, however, the meetings were moved from the church to the imperial palace: the condemnation of Athanasius was signed by all, except Eusebius of Vercelli, *Lucifer of Cagliari and Dionysius of Milan, who were exiled, while the Arian *Auxentius was elected to the position of the latter.

380. Council celebrated under the presidency of *Ambrose to examine the charges aimed at the *virgin Indicia for having violated her commitment to *chastity. They recognized her innocence in the end.

386. In this year *Valentinian II issued a law to favor the followers of the Council of *Rimini, but in reality to oppose Ambrose. These gathered a small assembly of bishops to be sure of their support base as a moral force to oppose the emperor.

390. In *Gaul there was strong dissent between those in favor of *Felix the new bishop of Trier and the anti-Felicians (*Martin of Tours, *Proculus of Marseille and, it seems, *Simplicius of Vienne). These requested the peaceful intervention of Ambrose, who convened a council in Milan. The council failed miserably. From then on Ambrose did not want to become involved in Gallic councils (see De obitu Valentiniani 25).

393. Council gathered to condemn *Jovinian—already condemned in Rome in 390—who refuted the value of *ascesis and virginity, to which he was opposed. The council sent a letter to Pope *Siricius: Ambrose may have been the author. Furthermore, the question of *Bonosus was also addressed on which no returning judgment was issued, referring to what was established at the Council of *Capua in 392, where Ambrose had been present and where he had deferred the case to the bishops of *Macedonia and *Thessalonica. The Council of Capua was another unfortunate attempt to resolve the thorny question of the *schism of *Antioch after the deaths of *Meletius (d. 381) and of *Paulinus (d. 388), even though numerous Western bishops had participated.

451. Provincial assembly of 16 bishops from N Italy to gain knowledge of the results of the ecumenical Council of *Chalcedon of 451: a letter from Pope Leo was read along with his Tomus ad Flavianum; the condemnation of the Eutychian doctrines was renewed. In the synodal letter to Pope Leo there were no names of the bishops of *Aquileia and Ravenna.

679. *Mansuetus, archbishop of Milan, who had the position until the exile in Genoa of the Milanese church, gathered a council of his clergy and their suffragans, to respond to the invitation of the emperor of the East, Constantine IV, in preparation for the 3rd ecumenical Council of *Constantinople (681–682), to examine the *monothelite doctrine. On the occasion, *Damian, not yet bishop of Pavia, drafted a letter in Greek directed to Emperor Constantine IV. Now for the first time since the schism of the *Three Chapters, the suffragan bishops met again around the metropolitan.

345: Palazzini 3, 102; Fliche-Martin III, 166-168; Simonetti 189ff. 347: Palazzini 3, 103; Hfl-Lecl 1, 348-350; Simonetti 201, 202 note 108 (for the problem between Milan and Sirmium). 355: Palazzini 3, 103-104.; CPL 109; Hfl-Lecl 1, 872-877; Simonetti 218-221, 381; G. Corti, Lucifero di Cagliari, Milan 2004, 63-85. 380: Ambrose, Ep. 5: PL 16, 930-937; F. Martroye, L'affaire Indicia. Une sentence de saint Ambroise, in Mélanges P. Fournier, Paris 1929, 503-510; V. Busek, Der Prozess der Indicia: ZRG (Kan. Abt.) 29 (1940) 447-461. 386: Ambrose, Ep. 21; J.R. Palanque, Saint Ambroise et l'empire romain, Paris 1929, 148; F.H. Dudden, The Life and Times of St. Ambrose, Oxford 1955, 283. 390: Ambrose, Ep. 51; Fliche-Martin III, 495; Palanque, op. cit., 231. 393: Palanque, op. cit., 261-262, 545-546; Dudden, op. cit., 393-402. 451: Mansi 6, 527-528; Leo the Great, Ep. 97; Palazzini 3, 105-106: Hfl-Lecl 2, 628. 679: CPL 1170-1171. PL 87, 1261-1265 (Mansi 11, 203-208); Expositio fidei: PL 87, 1265-1267 (PL 13, 651-655); G.P. Bognetti, Storia di Milano, II, Milan 1954, 190-193; DBI 32, 343-345.

A. Di Berardino

MILITIA. Military terms and comparisons find their Sitz im Leben not in the Judeo-biblical literature but in the Greco-Roman world. St. *Paul loved military images: the panoply (Eph 6:11,13), the sense of service, mobilization. He defines the Christian as a soldier of Christ (2 Tim 2:3). It follows that Christianity is a militia. If the term itself is not used, on the other hand, the comparison is found already in the 1st and 2nd c. (1 Clem. 37; Ign., Ad Polyc. 6,2; Ad Smyrn. 1; Mart. Pol. 2,4).

Son of a centurion, *Tertullian not only used military images but also availed himself of military terms and miles to characterize the Christian condition. Thus also sacramentum and statio. He spoke at times of militia, of militia Christiana, of militia Christe and Dei. The image expresses the conflict for the faith against the adverse forces of the *flesh and *demons (De orat. 29,3), with the help of spiritual arms. The image of militia reached its highest point in the 3rd c. (Mohrmann). In the *funerary scenes on *sarcophagi the soldiers that took their oath on the book that held the apostolic corpus symbolized the faithful of the celestial emperor (Pietri), suggesting the image of the militia Christi.

After the Constantinian peace the term militia was used in *monastic and *ascetic environments. The ascetic struggles using the arms of *prayer and penitence (Orig., Iud. Hom. 7,2). The image became a cliché in monastic literature of the struggle of the monk against Satan, against the *world and against his own personal tendencies (Vita Antonii; Serap., Ad monach. 11; Aug., De op. monachorum, 22, 26; Cass., Instr. 5,18,2). In Vita Hilarii, militia is a technical term for the monastic life (3,11; 4,14; 26,6). In the Rule* of St. *Benedict the word designates service in obedience to Christ the King (prol.).

The Greek term στρατεία occurs less frequently and indicates *baptism in *Cyril of Jerusalem (Procatech. 1) and the service of the martyr in *Chrysippus of Jerusalem (Enc. In Theod.: AASS, nov. 4,56). The noun recurs often to characterize the Christian who serves in the army of God, above all starting with the 4th c. (Act. Pauli 4; 6; Isid. Pel., Ep. 3), or in the army of Christ (Clem. Alex., Prot. 11; Eus., HE 8, 4,3; John Chrys., In 2 Tim. Hom. 4,1,11). It is moreover synonymous with being a monk (John Chrys., In Matth. Hom. 59,3).

TWNT 7,701-703 (cf. TDNT 7, 701-713, esp. 710-713); Lampe 1263; DSp 10,1210-1223 (bibl.); A. Harnack, Militia Christi, Berlin 1905 (fundamental study) (Eng. tr.: Militia Christi*: The Christian Religion and the Military in the First Three Centuries*, tr. and introd. G.D. McInnes, Philadelphia 1981); C. Pietri, Le serment du soldat chrétien. Les épisodes de la militia Christi sur les sarcophages: MEFRA 74 (1962) 649-664; Ch. Mohrmann, Études sur le latin des chrétiens, III, Rome 1965, 279-289; A. Zumkeller, Biblische und altchristliche Leitbilder des klösterlichen Lebens im Schrifttum des heiligen Augustinus: Augustiniana 17 (1968) 5-21; G. Luongo, Desertor Christi miles: Koinonia 2 (1978) 71-91; C. Corbellino, Il problema della "militia" in Sant'Ambrogio: Historia 27 (1978) 630-636; V. Buchheit, "Militia Christi" und Triumph des Märtyrers (Ambr. hymn. 10 Bulst-Prud. per. II 1-20), in Kontinuität und Wandel. Franco Munari zum 65. Geburtstag, Hildesheim 1986, 273-289; A. Benoît, "Militia Christi": remarques sur les images militaires utilisées dans le christianisme ancient: Ktema 19 (1994) 299-307; S. Pricoco, Militia Christi nelle regole monastiche latine, in Paideia cristiana: studi in onore di Mario Naldini, Rome 1994, 547-558; J. Fernández Ubiña, Cristianos y militares. La Iglesia antigua ante el ejército y la guerra, Granada 2000.

A. Hamman

MILK and HONEY. The expression "land flowing with milk and honey" in the OT indicates the Promised Land (e.g., Ex 3:8, 17; 13:5; 33:3; Lev 20:24). Honey was used in the rituals of the Egyptian temples of the Greco-Roman era, as can be inferred from the scenes and texts inscribed on the walls of the temples of Edfu and Dendera. Some mystery cults used a mixture of milk and honey as a drink. For the sect of the Naassenes (see *Ophites - Naassenes), milk and honey indicate the mysteries tasted by those who are perfect (Philosophumena 5,8). The symbolism of drinking milk and honey takes on different meanings: first of all, that of the fulfillment of the messianic promises, which are approached via *baptism; this is an eschatological interpretation (the entry into the promised land takes place sacramentally). From this derives the meaning of new birth in baptism, a christological interpretation, acc. to various authors and contexts, or it may simply indicate the Eucharist, in the sense that this is expressed with the symbol of milk.

The oldest Christian writers likened the intake of the body and blood of Christ in the Eucharist to the nursing of a baby at the mother's breast. The Epistle of Barnabas (6,8-19) explains allegorically the milk and honey and the newly baptized drink from a cup containing honey and milk, the food of the newborn, which indicates faith in the promise and the Word. The Odes of Solomon (4,9-10) imply a liturgical use of the mixture. In various sources the cup of milk and honey is associated with baptism and the *Eucharist, since it happens after baptism, as described in the Traditio Apostolica, which records that the newly baptized participate in the bread and wine and also drink from a cup of mixed milk and honey "in order to indicate the fulfillment of the promise, made to the fathers, which it called 'a land flowing with milk and honey,' which Christ has given as his flesh, from which the believers are nourished, like children" (ch. 21). The texts depending on this document continue to affirm that the newly baptized drink the cup of milk and honey, because "they are reborn as newborns, since newborns take milk and honey" (Canons of Hipp. 19,15); but the Canons add that later the Christians will consume milk and honey as a memorial of the coming age.

For *Clement of Alexandria milk indicates the Logos (Pedag. 1,51,1; 3,98,3, vv. 42-47), which is the food of the newly baptized, to whom one gives milk (which is either the first instruction or solid food): "If in fact we have been regenerated in Christ, he who has regenerated us nourishes us with his own milk, i.e., with the Word" (Pedag. 1,49,3); "With milk, therefore, i.e., with the food of the Lord, we are nourished immediately upon being born; and immediately upon being regenerated, we receive the hope of final rest, the announcement of the heavenly Jerusalem, where, it is written, milk and honey flow and under the material symbol we receive the promise that the holy one is also there" (Pedag. 1,45,3). Milk has a purifying value together with water (Pedag. 1,50,3-4); mixed with honey it has an effect of purification (Pedag. 1,51,1). *Tertullian attests to the antiquity and the widespread use of the drink in relationship with baptism at the beginning of the 3rd c. (Adv. Marc. 1,14,3; De corona 3,3). The use, in connection with the paschal baptism, is confirmed also in the conciliar canons of the African church (Brev. Hipp. 23b; Reg. ecc. carth. n. 37 [Munier CCL 149, 1854]), carrying with it the meaning of new birth. The collectio Hispana, which repeats the African conciliar texts, leaves out the reference to the cup, because at the end of the 6th c. in *Spain it was not used.

*Jerome attests to its use at *Rome (Altercatio Lucif. 8: PL 23, 164) to symbolize spiritual infancy. According to the testimony of *John the Deacon, most likely the future pope (523–526), the rite of drinking milk and honey was still in use in the 6th c. at Rome. The cup was given to the newly baptized, since, communicating with the body and blood of the Lord, they had received the "land of resurrection" (Ep. ad Senarium 12: ST 59, 177; PL 59, 405-406); but this also symbolizes the sweetness of the new birth and the consecration to an incorruptible life. For the paschal vigil the Sacramentarium Veronese gives the blessings of the milk and honey (ed. Mohlberg, Rome 1956, 26). We know the rite of this drink was not widespread because the *Syriac tradition offers no testimonies to it (Kilmartin p. 260); the third canon of the Canons of the Apostles prohibits anybody "to bring to the altar other things, such as honey or milk or else in place of wine any other beverage." The Ethiopian church has preserved the rite of drinking milk and honey to this day.

Righetti IV, 78; A. Sallinger, Honig: RAC 16, 433-473; W. Wilmart, La bénédiction romaine du lait et du miel dans l'euchologe Barberini: RBen 45 (1933) 10-19; S. Agrelo, Leche y miel. Notas de teología bautismal: Antonianum 55 (1980) 352-367 (above all in the Traditio Apostolica); A. van den Bunt, Milk and Honey in the Theology of Clement of Alexandria, in Fides Sacramenti. Sacramentum Fidei. Fest. Smulders, Assen 1981, 27-39; J. Betz, Die Eucharistie als Milch in frühchristlicher Zeit: ZKT 106 (1984) 1-25, 169-185; J.D.M. Derrett, Whatever Happened to the Land Flowing with Milk and Honey?: VChr 38 (1984) 178-184; V. Saxer, Les rites de l'initiation chrétienne du IIe au VIe siècle, Spoleto 1988; R. Triomphe, Le lion, la vierge et le miel, Paris 1989; A. Goulon, Quelques aspects du symbolisme de l'abeille et du miel à l'époque patristique: héritage antique et interprétations nouvelles, in De Tertullien aux Mozarabes: mélanges offerts à J. Fontaine, Paris 1992, 525-535; E.J. Kilmartin, The Baptismal Cups Revisited, in Eulogema: Studies in Honor of Robert Taft, Rome 1993, 249-267; M. Zecchi, On the Offering of Honey in the Graeco-Roman Temples: Aegyptus 77 (1997) 71-83; E. Engelbrecht, God's Milk: An Orthodox Confession of the Eucharist: JECS 7 (1999) 509-526; M.-J. Pierre, Lait et miel, ou la douceur du verbe: Apocrypha 10 (1999) 139-176; M.A. Haller, La carta di Juan Díacono a Senario: Cuadernos Monasticos 137 (2001) 189-206.

A. Di Berardino

MILLENARISM. This belief (in Greek, chiliasm), widespread in the first centuries of Christianity, maintained that before the final judgment and the end of the *world there would be a first *resurrection of only the righteous. In the heavenly *Jerusalem descended to earth they would enjoy a millennium of happiness and great abundance of every good thing together with Christ. Often this term was connected to another belief, originally independent, which fixed the duration of the earth at 7,000 years.

At the roots of millenarism was the Jewish belief in the future messianic reign intended as a political and material dominion. In fact, millenarism spread initially in an *Asian environment, where Christianity was strongly influenced by Judaism and assumed distinctly materialistic hues. In addition to various prophetic passages that described the future messianic reign, the document at the root of millenarism was put together from Rev 20–21. There it speaks of the first resurrection, that of the righteous, of their thousand-year reign with Christ and of the descent to earth of the celestial Jerusalem, all resplendent with gold and gems. At the beginning of the 2nd c., millenarian beliefs were attested by *Papias of Hierapolis and by the Judaizing gnostic *Cerinthus: great abundance of earthly goods and fecundity of men and of the earth; the second insisted also on the lawfulness of carnal pleasures and on the continuation of Jewish practices. *Justin Martyr (Dial. 80) affirms the millenarian idea as that of Christians who are completely *orthodox, but does not hide that many disputed it. We know that *Melito was also a millenarian, while *Irenaeus connected millenarism with the 7,000 years of the duration of the world, and in the sense that the seventh millennium would be exactly that of the earthly reign of Christ with the righteous (Adv. haer. V, 33-35). *Tertullian (Adv. Marc. III, 24), following, Irenaeus, insisted above all on the abundance of spiritual goods. In the Johannine *Apocalypse the millenarian idea entered a strongly anti-Roman context, which does not appear in the authors recorded above. For them, the theme of the millennium is an element of faith and culture, which in Justin and Irenaeus has evident polemic implications against the eschatological spiritualism of the gnostics, and enters an organic and totalized vision of the history of the world, devoid of eschatological expectations and enthusiasms.

Such enthusiasms were instead typical of the *Montanists: their movement was founded on the conviction that the millenarian age had already begun and that the heavenly Jerusalem had descended into the *Phrygian village of Pepuza. Millenarism spread in the Asian environment far beyond the Montanist area, but the connection between them made it so that the anti-Montanist reaction began to distance itself from millenarism as well: *Hippolytus and *Cyprian presented a cultural facies of a millenarian type, but not actually the theme of the millennium. All the same, the decisive reaction against millenarism came from the *Alexandrians, who proposed a much more spiritual conception of Christian eschatology: *Origen (Princ. II 11,2-3) refutes the literal interpretation of Rev 20–21 and gives it an *allegorical interpretation, thus eliminating the scriptural foundation of millenarism. In the 2nd half of the 3rd c. the spread of Alexandrian culture signaled the end of millenarian ideas in the East: *Dionysius of Alexandria had argued strongly against millenarian convictions within the *Egyptian community (in Eus., HE 7, 24-25); but at the end of the century such convictions were still defended by *Methodius (Symp. 9,1.5), who revised them in a spiritualistic sense. The millenarism of *Apollinaris of Laodicea (2nd half of the 4th c.), of which we know almost nothing, appears to be nothing but a relic.

Millenarism also took root in Western areas influenced by Asian materialism. In the middle of the 3rd c., *Commodian reclaimed the theme of 7,000 years, of which the last 1,000 is the millennium (Instr. II, 35,8ff.), and saw in it the sign of the failures caused by the invasion of the *Goths (Carm. Apol. 805ff.), where the king of the Goths is identified with Apollyon of Rev 9:11. At the end of the 3rd c., *Victorinus of Petovium also presents the theme of 7,000 years in a millenarian sense (PL 5, 309) and gives us the earliest commentary on the *Apocalypse. *Lactantius describes the millennium with colors of the age of gold from pagan poetry (Inst. VII, 24). But in the West the spread of *Platonic spiritualism also signaled the end of millenarism: *Ambrose no longer presented the distribution of the history of the world in seven millennia; *Jerome argued against millenarism (PL 24, 627ff.) and revised the literal interpretation that Victorinus had furnished of Rev 20–21, in an allegorical and antimillenarian sense; *Augustine recaptured the theme of the seven ages of the world, but redeemed it from the duration of 1,000 years per age and from every millenarian influence. Yet the *hope, the vision of a future earthly age of peace and prosperity, did not die entirely from the minds of the people of *Late Antiquity and of the Early Middle Ages, preparing underground abrupt chiliastic awakenings in the Low Middle Ages and the modern era.

L. Gry, Le millénarisme dans son origine et ses développements, Paris 1904; A. Luneau, L'histoire da salut chez les Pères de l'Eglise, Paris 1964 (bibl.); M. Simonetti, Il millenarismo in Oriente da Origene a Metodio in Corona gratiarum (Festschrift Dekkers), Bruges 1975, 37-58; var. aus., Il millenarismo cristiano e i suoi fondamenti scritturistici: AnSE 15 (1998).

M. Simonetti

MILTIADES, apologist. His activity was in the 2nd half of the 2nd c. and, acc. to the anonymous adversary of the heresy of *Artemon, before the episcopate of *Victor in *Rome (ca. 189–198) (see Eus., HE 5, 28,4). All of his rich production in defense of Christianity and of *orthodoxy has been lost. The anonymous anti-*Montanist said he was author of a work summarized by him, which would have deserved a reply on the part of the Montanists and in which Miltiades would have explained the argument acc. to which "a prophet must not speak in ecstasy" (see Eus., HE 5, 17,1). Eusebius (HE 5, 17,5) records two books by him To the Greeks and two To the Jews, as well as an apologia in favor of "the philosophy" of which Miltiades was a follower, i.e., the Christian religion; he would have directed it against the "lords of this world," in whom the emperors *Marcus Aurelius and Lucius Verus may have been recognized. Tertullian (Ad. Val. 5,1) included him among the refuters of the *Valentinian heresy similar to the *heresiarchs, inserting him after *Justin and before *Irenaeus. He also considered him against the Montanist Proculus and defined him, with the intent of praise, as a "Sophist of the churches." However, the anonymous adversary of the heresy of *Artemon mentioned Miltiades after Justin and before *Tatian and *Clement of Alexandria among those writers who, engaged against pagans and heretics, would have professed the divinity of Christ.

I.C.Th. Otto, Corpus Apologetarum Christianorum saeculi secundi, IX, Jena 1872 (repr.: Wiesbaden 1969), 364-373; A. Harnack, Die Überlieferung der griechischen Apologeten (TU, I, 1-2), Leipzig 1882, 278-282; Id., Geschichte der altchristlichen Literatur bis Eusebius, I, Leipzig 1893, 255-256; II,1, Leipzig 1897, 361-362; P. de Labriolle, La crise montaniste, Paris 1913, 162-175; R.M. Grant, Greek Apologists of the Second Century, London 1988, 90-91; E. Norelli, Parole di profeti, parole sui profeti. La costruzione del montanismo nei frammenti dell'Anonimo antimontanista, in G. Filoramo (ed.), Carisma profetico. Fattore di innovazione religiosa, Brescia 2003, 107-130 (esp. 113).

V. Zangara

MILITIADES, pope (310–314). Probably of Roman origin. In a synod gathered at Lateran (313) in the name of the emperor, he made a decision together with other bishops against the *Donatists in favor of *Caecilian. *Constantine had certainly established him iudex datus in view of the traditional prestige of the Roman Church. However, when the Donatists did not accept the sentence of Miltiades, the emperor convened a synod himself without concern for the collaboration of the pope.

W.H.C. Frend, The Donatist Church, Oxford 1952; Ch. Pietri, Roma Christiana, Rome 1976 (esp. 160-167); LTK³ 7, 262; EPapi 1, 317-321.

B. Studer

MINISTRIES (ordained ministers)

I. Problems and aspects - II. The earliest evidence - III. From the beginning of the 3rd c. to the Council of Nicaea - IV. The Eastern Fathers after the Council of Nicaea - V. The Latin Fathers from the 4th c.

I. Problems and aspects. Every reconstruction of the origin of Christian ministries faces the scarce and scattered sources of the first two centuries. For this reason, the sources themselves and the proposed hypotheses about the origins of ministries are differentiated (theological and sociological theories; worship ministries among pagans and Jews; the οἰκοδεσπότης as model; the concept of the ordo and representatio). The development of ministries is complex, but not arbitrary. From the 2nd c., the homogeneity and strength of the tripartite-hierarchical ministries are already evident in the East and West. (In a city there are deacons, presbyters and only one bishop.) Indeed, the theology of ministries is complex: the will of Christ as servant of all—the OT priesthood—the christological theology that sees in Christ, human and divine, the true priest of the new covenant (R.A. Greer, The Captain of Our Salvation: A Study in the Patristic Exegesis of Hebrews, Tübingen 1973; RAC 16, 4-58). The theses of some Protestants about the illegitimate Hellenization of Christianity where the ministries of the first centuries are rendered sacred are incoherent and tend to detach Christianity from its Jewish roots. The existence of ministries expresses the self-awareness of early Christianity as the one church founded by Christ. Without ministries, which are themselves in communion, there is no church; yet the *gnostics instead negate the constitutive meaning of ministries for the church (RAC, Suppl. 1, 373). "Ministries" refers to the diaconal, presbyterial and episcopal "office" with a proper commitment to be faithful to the tradition (παραθήκη) of the apostolic witness and to exercising proper disciplinary authority; whereas, the services of "prophets" and "teachers" cannot possess a specific leadership power (RAC, Suppl. 1, 365). A purely cultural ministry without authority is effectively unthinkable ("prelate," "hegumen," "pastor," ἄρχοντες-priests and ἀρχόμενοι-faithful). Reflection on the sources of ministerial authority is central for Christianity (God, Christ, successio apostolica, which were all against the doctrinal tradition of the gnostics). From the beginning, there are many criticisms among the Fathers regarding titles, but it is not clear what they practically do to guarantee the quality of the candidates. Recently, the sociology of ministries has been thoroughly investigated on the basis of quantifiable sources (inscriptions, etc.).

II. The earliest evidence. On the basis of the NT and the Didache* (15,1-2), mention of bishops and deacons (see *diakonia - diaconate), selected by the community, perform a ministry (leitourgia) that is probably distinct from "prophets and teachers." This obscure and controversial text should be compared with Acts 13:1-3, where a group of "prophets and teachers" performs a leitourgia, laying hands on *Paul and *Barnabas and sending them out as missionaries by the *Holy Spirit. For the institution of bishops and deacons, the author uses the verb cheirotonein, which will later be habitually used for *ordination by *laying-on of hands. But it is not certain that it means this here. Although *Clement's Letter to the Corinthians does not explicitly speak of ordination (cheirotonia, *order – ordination) but describes the ministry (leitourgia) of bishops and *presbyters (the two words seem to designate the same ministers) that succeed and follow the rules established by the apostles (44) and conform to the prefigurations of the OT (40-41 and 43); these same ministers are called deacons (42,4-5); the other ministries (41,1) must be performed only in obedience to those who are successors of the apostles (see A. Jaubert in SC 167, intr., pp. 78-86). The Shepherd of *Hermas considers helping the needy (Mand. 2,6; Sim. 2,7 and 10) and obeying the commandments (Mand. 12,3,3) as a diakonia conferred to everyone; nevertheless, deacons and bishops have a special responsibility (Sim. 9,26-27) in the ministry of charity.

For the 2nd c., we must cite the Letters of *Ignatius of Antioch and *Polycarp. A special rite of ordination is not explicitly mentioned, but their church is structured as a hierarchy in three distinct degrees: bishops, presbyters, deacons. It is the first time that the word diakonos clearly designates an official minister that is inferior to the bishop and presbyters. This hierarchy is presented as essential; without it one cannot speak of the church (Tral. 3,1). Around mid-century, *Hegesippus, in fragments preserved by *Eusebius, certainly considers *James the brother of the Lord as the first bishop of *Jerusalem, but also as high priest (Eus., HE II, 23,4 and 6; III, 5,2; IV, 22,4). A passage from the *Acts of Peter (ca. 190) gives credence to a rite of the laying-on of hands that Jesus himself had performed for the institution of the twelve apostles (Acta Petr. X, ed. Vouaux, 296-297). In the works of *Irenaeus, the two titles of bishop and presbyter seem to be applied to the same ministers, while deacons are the successors of those seven whom the Twelve had instituted through prayer and the laying-on of hands, acc. to Acts 6:1-6 (Adv. haer. I, 26,3; III, 12,10; IV, 15,1). Bishops are the successors of the apostles (IV, 26,2); they have a "certain *charism of truth" that is connected with the *grace of the "perfect knowledge" received by the apostles on the day of *Pentecost (III, 1,1; IV, 26,2); they must be the "faithful servants of Christ" (IV, 26,3-5); they have a role of presiding over the liturgical *assembly, and esp. in the celebration of the *Eucharist (Letter to Victor, in Eus., HE V, 16-17).

III. From the beginning of the 3rd c. to the Council of Nicaea. Great weight is given to the evidence of the Apostolic Tradition*, the most ancient ritual preserved for ordinations, a ritual that has inspired almost all *liturgies up until our times, and that has even had a large influence on later canonical legislation. By now the triad bishop-presbyters-deacons makes up the *clergy, and to them the *ordination by the *laying-on of hands is reserved. However, it is evident that the rite is considered as effecting a grace (spirit, pneuma) specially destined for the performance of the corresponding ministry. Other ministries are recognized and instituted (*widows, *virgins, readers, *subdeacons), but without formal ordination (cheirotonia). The role of the bishop is central: it is he who ordains, he is at once head and high priest, he is the successor of the *apostles and participates in the Spirit which they received from Christ. Presbyters also participate with the priesthood and act as advisors and assistants in governing the people. Deacons do not have the priesthood: they are at the service of the bishop for their duties (see J. Lécuyer: RSPh 41 [1953] 30-41).

The Syriac Didascalia of the Apostles is often placed in the 1st half of the 3rd c. The work is important because of a description of the rights and duties of the bishop, esp. in the pastoral attitude that he must have toward sinners. He is assisted by presbyters and deacons, whose functions are described in terms that recall *Ignatius of Antioch (see A. Faivre, Naissance d'une hiérarchie, Paris 1977, 118ff.).

The great Alexandrian writers of the 3rd c., *Clement and *Origen, have numerous references to ordained ministries, but these indications are scattered throughout their works (see G. Bardy, La théologie de l'Église de saint Irénée au concile de Nicée, Paris 1947, 118ff.; J. Lécuyer: VetChr 7 [1970] 253-264). In Latin-speaking *Africa, *Tertullian has a few references to ordained ministries; for the *Catholic period of his writings, see De praescr. haer. 41,5-8 (see G. Bardy: Vie Sp. Supplém. 58 [1939] 109-124). One can gather many texts by *Cyprian regarding the episcopate, but here again they are only occasional: see esp. Ep. 38, 39, 40, 41, 42, 43 etc. (Hartel). Christ is the origin of the episcopate, while the diaconate was instituted by the apostles: Ep. 3,3,1. Cyprian does not explicitly mention the rite of laying-on of hands except for the ordination of the episcopate (see V. Saxer, Vie liturgique et quotidienne à Carthage vers le milieu du 3e siècle, Vatican City 1969, 98). Among the writings that were attributed to Cyprian, we must mention the De aleatoribus, which is probably by an African bishop at the end of the century (CPL 60). The author has a very high view of the episcopate: through the laying-on of hands, the bishop has received the *Holy Spirit, and the rite is compared to that *charism or spiritual gift which was conferred upon *Timothy recorded by St. Paul (1 Tim 4:14; 2 Tim 1:6). The continuity of the episcopate with the mission of the apostles is affirmed by Clarus, bishop of Mascula, at the council convened by Cyprian in the autumn of 256 (Sent. Episc. 79).

IV. The Eastern Fathers after the Council of Nicaea. It is evidently impossible to consider every patristic reference which increases in number from the 4th c. onward; so we must limit ourselves to the most important ones; we will omit the texts of the *councils, although these are quite numerous. St. *Athanasius applies to his own ministry as bishop the charge of Paul to Timothy (Apol. ad Const. 26). His teaching on the episcopal ministry is particularly clear and vigorous in the Letter to Dracontius (PG 25, 525ff.). For the powers of the presbyter regarding the *Eucharist and *ordination, see the texts regarding the famous incident of Ischyras, esp. the Second Apologia Against the Arians 11-12. In the following century, in *Egypt, *Cyril of Alexandria considers the ministry of bishops, presbyters and deacons in relation to the celebration of the Eucharist, where the priest represents Christ (De ador. in sp. et ver. X and XIII; In Malach.: PG 71, 853-854 etc.).

In *Cappadocia, *Basil of Caesarea, in his Canonical Letters (188, 199 and 217) to *Amphilochius, explains the *canonical rules of the church, the majority of which regard the ordained clergy. More important for us is the testimony of *Gregory of Nazianzus: we have his famous Apologetic Discourse, which explains his escape after being ordained to the priesthood on Christmas in 361 (Orat. 2); there are many reflections on the priesthood in it, on the qualities that it demands, on pastoral duties, on the difficulty and demand of preaching, etc. (see the Introduction by J. Bernardi: SC 247, Paris 1978, 7-10). One could add a certain number of poems, esp. On His Life (Carm. lib. II, sect. 1, XI), some Letters* (182,5 and 183,6), Discourses 6, 9, 12: in the latter, Gregory compares the ordination of the bishop and presbyters to the consecration of *Aaron and his sons. Discourse 40,26, On Baptism, contains an important text on the "character" of the minister who baptizes (PG 36, 396bc). On this last point, cf. Gregory of Nyssa, Orat. in diem luminum (PG 46, 581-584). There are many teachings about ordained ministries in the collection known as the Apostolic Constitutions which was probably compiled in the *Arian context of *Syria toward the end of the 4th c. These are *charisms given by *God for the service of the community (VIII, 1). The rules of *ordination are attributed to the *apostles (VIII, 4-7 for the bishop; VIII, 16 for the presbyters; VIII, 17-18 for the deacons); but *James of Jerusalem was ordained bishop by the Lord and by the apostles (VIII, 35). The three ordained ministries correspond to the OT distinction between high priest, ordinary priests and Levites (VIII, 46, 1-6). At the beginning of these ministries, Christ himself instituted the apostles as high priests, and they instituted the other *orders; only the bishops, who succeed the apostles, can ordain (VIII, 46, 13-15). In the ordination of the bishop, beyond the *laying-on of hands, there is a placing of the gospels upon the head of the ordinand (VIII, 4,6). This new rite, also mentioned by Palladius in his Life of Chrysostom (XVI), is explained by *Severian bishop of Gabala: it is a sign of the coming of the *Holy Spirit, which descends on the head of the bishop as it did on the day of *Pentecost upon the apostles (PG 125, 533; cf. J. Lécuyer: EphLit 66 [1952] 369-372).

In the patriarchate of *Antioch, *Theodore of Mopsuestia describes the liturgical functions of bishops, priests and deacons in his Catechetical Homilies. Moreover, in his Commentary on the Epistles of St. Paul, preserved in Latin, he compares the grace of ordination with that which Timothy received by the laying-on of hands (ed. Swete II, 149-150; 196); deacons also receive an ordination before the altar (ibid., 128 and 132). These ordinations confer a charism or pneuma destined for the service of others (ibid., 98); it is to this pneuma that the faithful make allusions when they respond to the celebrant: "and with your spirit" (Hom. Cat. XV, 37-38) (see J. Lécuyer: RecSR 26 [1949] 494-498; OnSyr 6 [1961] 390). This last point is made by *Chrysostom in a Homily on Pentecost (PG 50, 458-459). The pneuma of pastors, acc. to him, is given through the laying-on of hands, and this rite goes back to the apostles (In Act. Hom. 14,3; 15,1; 27,1-2; 28,1); it is this same charism that is given also to Timothy (In 1 Tim. Hom. 5,1; 13,1; In 2 Tim. Hom. 2,2). Also deacons receive a charism through their ordination (on their place and role in the church, see Mélanges liturgiques Dom Botte, Louvain 1972, 295-310). But the more important work for our purposes is De sacerdotio by Chrysostom, of which there are numerous editions and translations, and is considered one of the most valuable treasures of patristic literature. The author is probably inspired by Orat. 2 by Gregory of Nazianzus; like him, he justifies himself for shirking the responsibilities of the priesthood, and he insists on the greatness and the difficulties of this ministry, on the *virtue and holiness that it requires, esp. the demand and dangers of preaching; he concludes with being unworthy of this dignity and justifies his escape in this way (see the Introd. and the edition by A.M. Malingrey: SC 272, Paris 1980. See also, the Homily 1, preached by Chrysostom when he was ordained a priest [ed. Malingrey, ibid.] and the Homily on the Martyrdom of St. Ignatius: PG 49-50, 588-589). The teaching of *Theodoret of Cyrrhus is very close to that of *Chrysostom: see esp. his Commentaries on the Pastoral Epistles (PG 82, 816c and 832d), and numerous passages of the History of the Monks of Syria (3,11; 13,4; 15,4), where the idea appears that these monks perform ministries and ordination. Finally, we must mention the many passages from the Cathedral Homilies of *Severus of Antioch; see Hom. 55, 80, 99, 116: PO 4, 20, 22, 26.

The *Syriac-speaking *Fathers can be linked to the writers of the patriarchate of Antioch. Around the year 340, *Aphraates expresses an idea that will have great success: Jesus, who laid hands on the apostles to give them the Holy Spirit, has himself received the inheritance of the OT priesthood through the laying-on of hands by *John the Baptist, at his baptism (De persec. 10 and 13; De acino 20; De monachis 13). St. *Ephrem fruitfully takes up these ideas: cheirotonia goes back to God's laying hands on *Moses at *Sinai (Ex 33:32); through *Aaron's line the charism was transmitted to John the Baptist, who laid his hands on Jesus, who at that time ordained the apostles, instituting the *sacrament of *Orders (Hymn. contr. haer. XXII, 18-19: CSCO 170, 81-82; Com. in Diatessaron: SC 121, 94-95). This teaching on the continuity with the OT, which constituted the perspective of the Syriac church of *Antioch, direct heir of the early *Jewish-Christian church, would have an important echo in the Syriac *liturgies of ordination. We also must add the short Greek work On the Priesthood sometimes presented as the final book of Chrysostom's De sacerdotio, but it is probably by St. Ephrem. The laying-on of hands for ordination, acc. to this work, gives the priest an unction of the Spirit just like the apostles on the day of Pentecost; the author evokes, after *Peter and *Paul, the great priestly figures of the OT; we need to venerate the priests, even if their virtue does not measure up as high as their dignity (PG 48, 1067-1070). The Syriac poet *Narsai also has a teaching on the priesthood that ties in with that of Theodore of Mopsuestia and Ephrem (see Connolly, The Liturgical Homilies of Narsai: TSt VIII, 4, 8, 21, 31, 63-65 etc.).

In *Palestine, *Eusebius of Caesarea teaches that the *Eucharist is a spiritual *sacrifice that Christ continues to offer through his ministers (Dem. Ev. V, 3,18-19); they represent Christ, who is in them, each acc. to his role (HE X, 4,68-69). *Cyril and *John of Jerusalem, in their Catecheses, describe the role of priests, servants of Christ, who are ministers of *baptism with bishops and deacons (Cat. 17,25); with the bishop they perform the eucharistic *liturgy (Cat. myst. 5,2). There is little in *Epiphanius: he clearly distinguishes the three degrees of the ministry: the bishop that only ordains, priests and deacons, to which he adds subdeacons (Ep. 51, in the letters of Jerome); he is one of the first testimonies of an ecclesiastical law in favor of the *celibacy of ordained ministers (Haer. 59,4). For *Hesychius of Jerusalem, priests are the representatives of Christ, and it is he who acts in them (In Levit. 9,22 and 21,6); so they must imitate his holiness (In Levit. 22,1-3 and 22-25).

The author known as ps-*Dionysius had a huge influence on the *theology and *spirituality of ministries: see esp. De ecclesiastica hierarchia and the Letter to Demophilus. The hierarchy of the church (bishop-priest-deacon) imitates the hierarchy of the heavenly spirits, and Jesus is its origin (Eccl. hier. I, 2-3; V, 1ff.). At the apex is the bishop, on whom the priests and deacons totally depend (V, 1,5-6). Three ministries are conferred by a special consecration (V, 2) that he connects with the descent of the Spirit upon the apostles at Pentecost (V, 3,5).

V. The Latin Fathers from the 4th c. *Hilary of Poitiers occasionally refers to ministry (In Ps. 134,27; 138,34; Fragm. Hist. II, 16. Cf. J. Lécuyer: Année Théol. 10 [1949] 322-323). *Ambrose of Milan advocates a very rich teaching in De officiis ministrorum, but also in numerous passages throughout his writings (see R. Gryson, Le prêtre selon saint Ambroise, Louvain 1968; on the episcopate, DSp IV, 894; on deacons, see De off. II, 28 [on the deacon St. Lawrence]; on the liturgical functions of ministers, many details are in De sacramentis and in De mysteriis). There is a new development at the end of the 4th c.: St. Jerome and the anonymous author known as *Ambrosiaster, almost with the same terms, refuse to see the episcopate in an order superior to that of the presbyterate, except for the powers that are reserved to it: its *ordination is merely a ceremony, without sacramental value. Behind this position, the authors want to reappraise the role of Roman deacons who considered themselve superior to presbyters. Their common response is simple: in this case, deacons would be superior to bishops, since between priest and bishop there is no difference in jurisdiction. Consequently, the very *spirituality of the bishop tends to be reduced to a "duty of status." Also, presbyterial ordination occupies a discrete place in St. Jerome; his *Letter 52 to Nepotianus could have been a substantial tract on presbyterial perfection, but limits itself, through childish literary games, to some prudent pastoral advice and to commonplaces on the study of *Scripture and preaching. In St. *Augustine, there are wonderful texts on the episcopate, but which, in due proportion, are also valid for all priests, deacons and religious superiors: the bishop is the "servant of the servants of God" (Ep. 217). There are also numerous *letters (Ep. 21, 22, 29, 142, 208, 288) and *sermons (Serm. 339 and 340) for the consecration of new bishops (Serm. Guelferb. 32: PLS 2, 637ff.). Sermon 355 reveals the lives of the clergy of *Hippo living in community with their bishop: one can see the care of Augustine for the good reputation, the life of *poverty and *prayer of his clergy. The *ordination of bishops, priests and deacons is performed through the *laying-on of hands like that of *Timothy (Contr. Lit. Petil. II, 106); this rite produces a lasting effect, which is often described as sacramentum* (ordinationis) and lasts even when the minister is a sinner or distances himself from his functions (De bon. coniug. 34,32); ordination is never repeatable, hence, it is a sacramentum given through consecration (Contr. Ep. Parm., II, 13,28); thus the demand for holiness on the part of ministers (Contr. Lit. Petil. II, 30) (see J. Pintard, Le sacerdote selon saint Augustin, Paris 1960).

Despite his insistence on the miraculous and wonderful, the *Life of St. Martin by *Sulpicius Severus offers information on the idea of ministers and esp. a bishop who was living at the start of the 5th c.; we should add the three Letters by the same author. In the same way, there were also Lives of St. *Honoratus of Arles written by his successor Hilary, of St. *Hilary of Arles written by Reverentius, and of other bishops written by *Venantius Fortunatus. In *Leo the Great, the Sermons for his episcopal ordination or his anniversaries (Serm. 1-5, in CCL 138) took care to join the priesthood of ministers together with the common *priesthood of the whole church. According to Letter 9,1, the ordination of bishops occur only on *Sunday, the day in which the Holy Spirit descended upon the *apostles. St. *Gregory the Great also happens to give a very particular place to ordination in his Regula Pastoralis, whose value remains intact, not only for bishops, but for all ministers who participate in their pastoral role. The advice that is given could have been adapted, as J.C. Hedley claims, to the pastoral formation of all clergy (Lex Levitarum, London 1905). In the six books of Expositiones in Librum Primum Regum, Gregory begins from the real *anointing of Saul and David, commenting extensively on the spiritual unction conferred upon pastors by ordination, the *grace they receive and their responsibility (IV, 114ff.; ed. Verbraken CCL 144); in them it is Christ who speaks (IV, 122 and passim). The author interprets the prescriptions by Paul in 1 Tim 5:22 as ordination (IV, 139). Through ordination, ministers receive an interior strength by the Holy Spirit like the apostles on Pentecost (IV, 189). At the most supreme degree of the priesthood, the bishop receives a fullness of grace, so he must give of his fullness, like *Moses to the seventy elders (VI, 65). Although the exterior rite is performed by one man, it is the Holy Spirit who transforms and fortifies the one who receives the *Order (VI, 96).

RAC Suppl. 1, 350-401; J. Colson, Ministre de Jésus-Christ ou le sacerdoce de l'évangile, Paris 1966; A. Vilela, La condition collégiale des prêtres au III^e^ siècle, Paris 1971; J. Lécuyer, Le sacrement de l'ordination, Paris 1983; J. Zmijewski, Paulus—Knecht und Apostel Christi. Amt und Amtsträger in paulinischer Sicht, Stuttgart 1986; J.-C. Picard, Le souvenir des évêques. Sépultures, listes épiscopales et culte des évêques en Italie du Nord des origines au X^e^ siècle, Paris-Padua 1988; L. Padovese, I sacerdoti dei primi secoli. Testimonianze dei Padri sui ministeri ordinati, Casale Monf. 1992; S. Felici (ed), Sacerdozio battesimale e formazione teologica, Rome 1992; R.R. Noll, Christian Ministerial Priesthood: A Search for Its Beginnings in the Primary Documents of the Apostolic Fathers, San Francisco-London 1993; M. Lochbrunner, Über das Priestertum. Historische und systematische Untersuchung zum Priesterbild des Johannes Chrysostomus, Bonn 1993; E. Dassmann, Ämter und Dienste in den frühchristlichen Gemeinden, Bonn 1994; J. Ysebaert, Die Amtsterminologie im Neuen Testament und in der Alten Kirche, Breda 1994; E. Wipszycka, Études sur le christianisme dans l'Égypte de l'antiquité tardive, Rome 1996; Id., Le istituzioni ecclesiastiche in Egitto dalla fine del III all'inizio dell'VIII secolo, in A. Camplani (ed), L'Egitto cristiano. Aspetti e problemi in età tardo-antica, Rome 1997, 219-271; E. Cattaneo, I ministeri nella chiesa antica. Testi patristici dei primi tre secoli, Milan 1997; C. Dauphin, La Palestine Byzantine. Peuplement et populations 2, Oxford 1998; P. Terbuyken, Priesteramt und Opferkult bei Juden und Christen in der Spätantike, in E. Dassmann (ed.), Chartulae, Münster 1998, 271-284; G. Kretschmar, Das bischöfliche Amt, Göttingen 1999; G.L. Müller, Der Empfänger des Weihesakraments. Quellen zur Lehre und Praxis der Kirche, nur Männern das Weihesakrament zu spenden, Würzburg 1999; S. Heid, Celibacy in the Early Church, San Francisco 2000; A. Hoffmann, Kirchliche Strukturen und Römisches Recht bei Cyprian von Karthago, Paderborn 2000; R. Godding, Prêtres en Gaule mérovingien, Brussels 2001; T. di Carpegna Falconieri, Il clero di Roma nel medioevo, Rome 2002; G. Schmelz, Kirchliche Amtsträger im spätantiken Ägypten nach den Aussagen der griechischen und koptischen Papyri und Ostraka, Leipzig 2002; T.C.G. Thornton, High-Priestly Succession in Jewish Apologetics and Episcopal Succession in Hegesippus: Journal of Theological Studies 54 (2003) 160-163.

J. Lécuyer - S. Heid

MINUCIUS FELIX. An *apologist, active during the final decades of the 2nd c., or in the 3rd c. Quite a few clues lead to the conclusion that Minucius was of African origin. From a *pagan family, he converted to Christianity, and it is evident that in *Rome he took up the profession of a lawyer (*Lactantius [Div. Inst. V, 1, 21f.] and *Jerome [De vir. Ill. 58; Ep. 70, 5] refer to him as causidicus), rather than that of a magistrate (see Octavius [2,3], a passage that would not exclude this 2nd hypothesis). A single apologetic work, the Octavius, has survived to this day, as the 8th book of the Adversus nationes of *Arnobius the Elder (through the copyist's mix-up between the original title and the ordinal number). As is the case for the Arnobian text, the sole exemplar is the codex of the 9th c. (Paris. lat. 1661) in which it has been passed down through the ages (although the cod. Bruxellensis 10847 is a copy of the previous MS, it presents some noteworthy emendation). The Parisinus latinus 1661, written in minuscule, is so full of errors that it is frequently unintelligible. Notwithstanding the dire poverty of the MS tradition, the critical editors of the Octavius have undertaken the difficult task. Since the publication at Rome in 1542 by Fausto Sabeo of the Editio princeps, once again at the end of the 7 books of the Arnobian works, many corrections have been made. Adding to these corrections, through the numerous critical editions that have recently appeared, is a long list of conjectures.

The text contains a dialogue among three friends who head out to Ostia, thanks to the autumn recess: Cecilius, a pagan, and Octavius and Minucius, both Christians. Minucius himself recalls in detail how Octavius, by means of this conversation, had won over Cecilius to the Christian faith. As the dialogue opens, Octavius has died and Minucius sketches in chap. 2 an affectionate and moving portrait of Octavius. Overall, 40 chaps. long, the dialogue first sets forth the declamation of the pagan character in defense of his own religion (chaps. 5-15), and then the response of Octavius, who demonstrates the existence and the providence of God, defends the beliefs of the Christians (particularly beliefs concerning eschatology) and refutes polytheism. Thus the polemical strain follows on the heels of the apologetic strain, in occasionally novel ways in the context of analogous works by 2nd- and 3rd-c. writers. Minucius turns his attention to moral rather than doctrinal arguments; scriptural citations are not given, and even Christ is not mentioned in an explicit fashion. Ciceronian and Senecan influences are noteworthy. Such an apologetic method seems to be a conscious choice on the part of the author, who intends to address a cultured pagan audience (of which Cecilius is a representative) and to be convincing with arguments that are familiar and well known to this group. This is also confirmed by the literary aspect, by beginning with the *genre of *dialogue that offers "to the writer valuable formal resources, in the structuring of the scene, guided by Minucius with exquisite artfulness, in the presentation of the characters, in the capability of these resources to illustrate and sustain the essential thesis, with all the benefits of eloquence" (M. Pellegrino, Intr. A M. Minucii Felicis Octavius, 39). The work has an important significance for historical documentation: it is a vivid example of the clash between two different worlds, destined in the end to meet each other and come together as one. In a remarkable way, the defense of paganism and the attack against Christianity, both carried out by Cecilius, function as valuable testimonies. Indeed, it is remarkable to consider that these words faithfully reflect the arguments that pagans used in their confrontations with the new movement that was being inspired by Jesus.

It is an arduous and controversial problem to identify the dating of the Octavius. The vast majority of critics agree in locating its composition between the 2nd half of the 2nd c. and the 1st half of the 3rd c., between the reign of *Marcus Aurelius and that of *Alexander Severus. (A few scholars contend that the work is subsequent to the Quod idola dii non sint, situating it alongside the works of *Cyprian.)

To the degree that some of the previously discussed questions are more relevant for resolving the matter, emphasis is due on the connections between Minucius and Tertullian, and more specifically on the connections between the Octavius, on the one hand, and the Apologeticum and the Ad nationes, on the other. The numerous affinities of argument and of form (the shared features have excluded various hypotheses of a common source) have been variously deemed to support the dependence of Tertullian on Minucius, or vice versa. Even today, the dispute is unresolved. In the 19th c., quite a few scholars maintained the priority of Minucius; in the 20th c., perhaps the supporters of the priority of Tertullian have prevailed, although there has not been a lack of scholarly voices for the opposing argument. There is a great number of considerations to be taken into account. Since none of them have proved to be decisive, it is difficult to make a judgment. Nonetheless, amid the many factors of uncertainty or of varying interpretations, it is necessary to highlight one in favor of the priority of Tertullian: the Christian literary tradition. *Jerome, in particular, clearly affirms in De viris illustribus (53) that Tertullian is the first of the Latin writers, after Victor and Apollonius, while in a number of other passages he makes mention of Tertullian before Minucius (see De vir. ill., 58; Ep. 48,13,4; 60,10; 70,5; Comm. In Isaiam, praef. 8).

*Lactantius (Div. inst. V, 1,21ff.) first cites Minucius, then Tertullian and Cyprian. His discourse, inserted in a sort of lineup of the Latin apologists, does not seem to carry any intention of delineating a chronological order, since it formulates judgments of merit and seems to position them in an ascending scale. It certainly does not affirm a chronological precedent of one author over another.

From a passage of the Octavius (36,2) we know that Minucius was planning to write a work on the theme of destiny. Jerome (De vir. ill. 58) effectively tells us of a book, titled De fato vel contra mathematicos, that was circulating under the name of Minucius, yet he places its authenticity in doubt on the basis of its style being judged inferior to that of the known works. Concerning the bibl., it is significant that in recent decades the level of interest in Minucius Felix has notably increased, as is evident in the following references.

Editions: CPL 37; PL 3, 231; CSEL 2, 3; Corpus Script. Latin. Paravianum (ed. M. Pellegrino), Turin 1950; Les Belles Lettres (ed. J. Beaujeu), Paris 1964 (²1974); E. Paratore, Bari 1971; B. Kytzler, Leipzig 1982, Bibliotheca Teubneriana, Leipzig ²1992; M. Pellegrino, P. Siniscalco, M. Rizzi, Turin 2000 (with It. tr. and full comm.).

Translations: Fr.: J.P. Waltzing, Louvain ³1914; J. Beaujeu, Paris 1964; It.: D. Basai, Milan 1929; U. Moricca, Rome 1933; E. Para-tore 1971; Eng.: J.H. Freese, London 1919; G.H. Rendall, Cambridge 1960; Dutch: H.U. Meyboom, Leiden 1929; P.H. Damsté, Amsterdam 1936; Sp.: S. de Domingo, Madrid 1946; Ger.: A. Müller, 2BKV, Kempten 1913; B. Kytzler, Stuttgart 1977.

Studies: J.P. Waltzing, Lexicon Minucianum, Liège 1909; E. Behr, Der "Octavius" des Minucius Felix in seinem Verhältnis zu Ciceros Büchern "De natura deorum," (diss.) Jena 1870; F. Kotek, Anklänge an Ciceros "De natura deorum" bei Minucius Felix und Tertullian, Progr. Vienna 1901; F.X. Burger, Über das Verhältnis des Minucius Felix zu dem Philosophen Seneca, (diss.) Munich 1904; S. Colombo, Osservazioni sulla composizione letteraria e sulle fonti dell'Octavius: Didaskaleion 3 (1914) 79-121; H.J. Baylis, Minucius Felix and His Place Among the Early Fathers of the Latin Church, London 1928; R. Beutler, Philosophie und Apologie bei Minucius Felix, (diss.) Königsberg 1936; M. Pellegrino, Intr. a M. Minucii Felicis Octavius, Turin 1947; E. Paratore, La questione Tertulliano-Minucio: Ricerche Religiose 18 (1947) 132-159; G. Quispel, A Jewish Source of Minucius Felix: VChr 3 (1949) 113-122; P. Frassinetti, Minucio Felice e le redazioni dell'Apologeticum tertullianeo, In memoriam A. Beltrami: Miscellanea Philologica, Genoa 1954, 83-96; A. Kurfess, Neues zur Prioritätsfrage Tertullian-Minucius Felix: Orpheus 1 (1954) 125-132; G.W. Clarke, The Historical Setting of the Octavius of Minucius Felix: JRH 4 (1967) 267-286; C. Becker, Der "Octavius" des Minucius Felix, Munich 1967; Altaner 148-149 and 611; A.J. Cappelletti, Minucius Felix y su filosofía de la religión: Revista Venezolana de filosofia 19 (1985) 7-62; C. Tibiletti, Il problema della priorità Tertulliano-Minucio Felice, in Hommages à René Braun, II: Autour de Tertullien, eds. J. Granarolo - M. Biraud, Nice 1990, 23-34; K. Müller, Rytmische Bemerkungen zu Minucius Felix: Museum Helveticum 49 (1992) 57-73; S. Bodelón, El discorso anticristiano de Cecilio en el Octavio de Minucius Felix: Memorias de Historia Antigua 13/14 (1992/1993) 247-294; M. Rizzi, Ideologia e retorica negli "exordia" apologetici. Il problema dell'"altro," Milan 1993, 151-170; H.A. Gärtner, Die Rolle und die Bewertung der skeptischen Methode im Dialog Octavius des Minucius Felix, in Panchaia. Festschrift f. K. Thraede, Münster 1995, 141-147; F. Chapot, Les grands orientations des travaux sur l'Octavius de Minucius Felix: Vita Latina 150 (June 1998) 18-28; S. Deléani, Minucius Felix, Octavius 32: Vita Latina 150, 44-53; A. Fürst, Der philosophiegeschichtliche Ort von Minucius Felix' Dialog 'Octavius': JbAC 42 (1999) 42-49; E. Heck, Minucius Felix, der erste christliche Ciceronianer: Hyperboreus. Studia classica V (1999) 306-325; C. Ingremeau, Minucius Felix et ses "sources": le travail de l'écrivain: REAug 45 (1999) 3-20; V. Sanz Santacruz, Filosofia y teología en el "Octavius" de Minucio: Scripta teologica 31 (1999) 345-365; A. Fürst, Die Selbsterkenntnis des Skeptikers im Octavius des Minucius Felix: ZAC 4 (2000) 270-281; E. Heck, Frustula minuciana. Textkritisches zum "Octavius": Wiener Studien 114 (2001) 483-499. For additional references, see the volume (in which Minucius Felix is also considered) Chronica Tertullianea et Cyprianea 1975–1994. Bibliographie critique de la première littérature latine chrétienne, ed. R. Braun, F. Chapot, S. Deléani, F. Dolbeau, J.-C. Fredouille, P. Petitmengin, Paris 1999, and for successive years to the index Chronica Tertullianea et Cyprianea that appears every year REAug.

P. Siniscalco

MIRACLE. In the Christian writings of the 1st c., miracles (dynameis, sēmeia, terata, thaumasia, paradoxa), including those performed by Jesus in his role as faith healer and exorcist and those constituted by his extraordinary birth and by his resurrection, assume a role of the highest significance in the definition of his identity as Messiah and Son of God. Such writings share with the OT faith in God—Lord of nature and of history who continuously intervenes in both realms acc. to his providential design—and with marginal apocalyptic Judaism the idea that the actions of Jesus, inasmuch as they are manifestations of divine power in victory over the evil powers that are active in the earthly order, are signs of the nearness of the divine reign.

These same writings guard the actions of Jesus against a different and hostile interpretation: he had performed his healings and exorcisms not by the "finger of God" (Lk 11:20) or acc. to the "Spirit of God" (Mt 12:28), but "in the name of Beelzebub, prince of the demons" (Lk 11:15). The gospels preserve the record of a conflict of interpretations that was still an internal Jewish matter. With the spread of Christianity beyond this religious and cultural setting, and with the conversion to Christianity of persons educated in the Hellenistic paideia, the debate over miracles concerning the decisive question of the demonstration of the divinity of Jesus took on new elements.

This is a debate in which the terms change, whether with changing historical and cultural circumstances or on the basis of literary criteria. As for the 2nd and 3rd c., the topic of miracles prevails in the apologetic writings. At a time when Christians struggled to avoid being the target of persecutions, the apologetic strategy primarily consisted in making the Christian faith plausible with respect to the virgin birth, the resurrection of Jesus and the miracles that he performed, by drawing attention to analogous stories that were at the foundations of traditional cults around divinized men (heroes). Thus *Justin Martyr (1 Apol. 21) mentions the "sons of Zeus," in order to support the plausibility of the divinity of Jesus on the basis of these traditions. The True Doctrine of *Celsus, written during the same turning point in history, places in doubt or ridicules not only those aspects of the life of Jesus (virginal conception, reality of the resurrection, appearances to the disciples after his death) on which the Christians relied for the demonstration of his divine nature, but also criticizes the miracles performed by Jesus for either not having occurred or for being indebted to the magical arts that he acquired during his stay in Egypt. In order to emphasize the high tone of contradiction between the faith of Christians in Jesus and their rejection of the cult of heroes, the biographies and the outstanding accomplishments of these men are compared with the much more modest and minor accomplishments of Jesus (C. Cel. III, 22-41). Celsus's criticism also contains arguments of a philosophical nature. On the basis of the *Middle Platonic concept of God, he maintains that the incarnation is contradictory and impossible, and he negates the concept of God's omnipotence that upholds Christian faith in miracles. Celsus acts here as a spokesperson for a hotly debated problem in the peripatetic and *Platonic schools of philosophy: the concept of nature, and the necessary and immutable laws that govern it. Galen, e.g., was critical of the Jewish idea of God's omnipotence. He observes that for Moses it seems sufficient to say that God has created everything in order to uphold that which for him is completely possible, even to make a horse or a bull out of ashes. Meanwhile, continues Galen, some things are by nature impossible and God cannot act against nature (Gal., Us. Part. XI, 14; see Grant, 130). Celsus similarly affirms that God cannot perform evil or irrational acts, since he is the rational principle of everything that exists (C. Cel. 5,14).

*Origen, for his part, agrees in criticizing a concept of divine omnipotence that has no restrictions: the power of God cannot be without limits, since that which does not have limits cannot be known. Moreover, God cannot do things against nature, neither against justice, because otherwise God would not be God; nonetheless, he can do things "beyond nature" (C. Cel. 5,23). With this affirmation, Origen defends the philosophical possibility of the gospel miracles. That these are really miracles, namely, manifestations of the intervention of a divine Power and not the result of magical arts, is proved by the moral integrity of him who performs them and by the beneficial impact, brought to completion in salvation, that such acts have on the beneficiary (C. Cel. 3,22.25.42).

In writings that are less directly devoted to the apologetic task, Origen shows his skepticism for the true efficacy of the argument for miracles. The lavish works of the Lord were able to instill faith in his contemporaries, but not in successive generations that were inclined to treat them as "myths" (Comm. Jn. II, 34,204). For this reason he emphasized above all the *allegorical significance of these stories: the stories of healings allude to the healing of those who have been freed from every illness through a work of the Logos (Comm. Jn. I, 33,206). The idea that the miracles were limited to the apostolic era was rather common. *Victorinus of Petovium (Comm. Ap. 10,2) affirms that these miracles had the purpose of overcoming unbelief, but that now, with the growth of the churches, the same function is performed by the interpretation of Scripture. *Eusebius (Hist. Eccl. 5,23) is astonished to read in *Irenaeus (Adv. Haer. 2,21,2) that miracles continued to be performed up until the author's own day.

It is also noteworthy that in the 2nd and 3rd c. as well, in a *pagan setting, the philosophical treatises coexisted with other literary *genres in which much space was granted to the "miraculous." Consider the biographical profile of Plato that opens the treatise De Platone et eius dogmate by Apuleius, or the Life of Apollonius of Tyana by Philostratus, or even the Life of Pythagoras by *Porphyry. These are texts in which the philosopher revives the theme of the "divine man" whose distinctive features include the miraculous birth, the healings, the prophecies, the ascension into heaven etc. This is a literature in which the miraculous is a function of propaganda and a defense of a philosophical school or of a protagonist who is caught in a contest of rivalry between schools or in polemic.

In a similar way but in a Christian context, along with Origen's attentiveness to the philosophical debate and concentration on the interior transformation of individual persons, there were texts circulating (even those of a propagandistic character) with great success, texts in which the thaumaturgical and the miraculous take on a central role. I am referring in particular to the apocryphal Acts of the Apostles in which the apostles perform extraordinary miracles that demonstrate the superiority of the God of the Christians over other gods and thus lead to conversion.

Beginning in the 4th c., important changes occurred, particularly in connection with the enormous growth of the cult of saints and with the spread of mysticism. It would seem that in preceding years, miracles, either as the object of debate over the figure of Jesus or in the legendary stories about the apostles, generally looked back on Christian origins from a distance. (There are exceptions; consider the citation from Irenaeus.) In the new century, contemporary miracles that arise from the works of living saints or through the bodies of saints (see *relics) take on prime consideration. It is also interesting to note yet another area of change: the role played by the leaders of the churches and by the prominent members of elite society in promoting not only the practice of the cult of saints but also the lives of saints and their miracles through writings of a lofty and sometimes extremely refined tone. One thinks of *Athanasius of Alexandria, *Gregory of Nyssa, *Sulpicius Severus, *Paulinus of Nola and *Jerome. The Life of Anthony (between 355 and 361) serves as a point of reference for much of the subsequent hagiographic literature. Although it closely connects *ascesis and thaumaturgy, the work reveals an awareness of the main terms of the debate over miracles, and of the possible dangers which the accentuation of this element in constructing the life of a saint can engender. In ch. 38 it upholds the prevalence of ascesis over miracles, in the sense that one is the result of human striving and the other is a divine gift. Beginning with the 4th c., the "contemporary" miracles gain the attention of ecclesiastical writers who write of and publicize them. This is true even for a writer who at least up to a certain point in his life had shown little interest in this topic. The case of *Augustine is illuminating. In De vera religione (387–391) and in De utilitate credenda (391–392), he argues that the miracles of the apostles, necessary for affirming faith in Christ, are finished in the sense that their repetition would make them banal and ordinary. The affirmation is all the more significant in that he does not seem to assign any value to the miracles that *Ambrose reports to have occurred at Milan in 386 during the transference of the relics of *Gervasius and Protasius, a transference with which Augustine had otherwise assisted. Five years later, Augustine (Serm. 320-324, Civ. Dei XXII, and in the Retractationes) accepts the contemporary miracles, the stories of which he gathers together in libelli* that he intended to be read out to the faithful. In parallel fashion, drawing attention to the miracula quotidiana of the natural world (Serm. 126,3,4) and affirming the supremacy of the interior miracles of spiritual conversion, he continues to act as a spokesperson for the concept of miracles that tends to relativize the importance of contemporary miracles.

The case of Jerome illustrates another interesting feature: his three Vitae of *Malchus, *Paul and *Hilarion abound with miracles. In the eyes of scholars, some of the miracles are so extravagant that they cancel out any historical value in the narrative accounts. There is an exception to this pattern in the text of In Memory of Paul. Like the preceding works, it consists of a description of a "monastic" saint, but the miraculous component is absent. The difference in strategy reveals a shifting literary purpose that recognizes in the miraculous element the most appropriate means for a literature of edification, intended for a popular audience that is different from the literary audience around Paul. To judge from texts such as the History of the Monks of Egypt by *Rufinus of Aquileia (early 5th c.), the Lausiac History of *Palladius (419–420) and the Religious History of *Theodoret of Cyrrhus (beginning of 5th c.?) that assemble biographies of Egyptian and Syrian monks and in which the miraculous is overflowing, it would seem that this very element remained important in efforts to promote the monastic movement, as well as in the penetration of its ideals among an audience whose members were not directly involved in its way of life.

We should not conclude that all the ecclesiastical writers took the same position regarding contemporary miracles. In the *Life of Macrina, written by Gregory of Nyssa, the miraculous component is reduced to a minimum, while the whole context is concerned with ascesis. In the next century, *Hilary of Arles recounts the life of *Honoratus (430–431) without the miraculous, explicitly arguing that the virtues that he practiced constitute his miracles.

Beginning in the 6th c., ecclesiastical writers appear to abandon any reservations over miracles, and it is in this era that the literary genre of miracle stories gains ground. An example is the eight Libri miraculorum by *Gregory of Tours. Yet even this age is not monolithic. An interesting case study is *Gregory the Great, who at the end of the century and in certain passages even restates the spiritual convictions of the early church. According to Hom. Ev. 1,4,3 and In Iob 27,18,36, the miracula visibilia were indispensable in apostolic times, but now they have become rare, with the merita operum being more essential than the signa virtutum, even if these continue to take place. Yet in other writings, such as his Dialogues that recount the miraculous deeds of Italian viri Dei, he seems instead to embrace without reservation the favorable trend toward the miraculous, even if in points of emphasis he differs from Gregory of Tours. While Gregory of Tours recounts miracles by placing the emphasis on the actual event and on its immediate effects, the writer of the Dialogues seems to treat the actual event as incidental to and indicative of the underlying moral (see Uytfanghe). It is also noteworthy that in the era that we are considering, the miraculous is not at all limited to the usual literary genres of hagiography (biographies, collections of miracles, stories of translations of relics), but is "pervasive" in the sense that even other genres could not resist its allure. Let it suffice to contrast the Ecclesiastical History of Eusebius with the subsequent histories under the same title by *Socrates Scholasticus, *Sozomen and Theodoret of Cyrrhus in the East, and with the Libri historiarum by Gregory of Tours in the West. It is in this genre of writing that the political function of thaumaturgy becomes clearer. Over the course of time, the miraculous legitimizes the emperor's rule, the orthodox faith, ecclesiastical and monastic claims of all sorts, etc. In the narrative of history, the miraculous displaces the exposition of an argument either in favor of or against a certain reality, or it displaces the realistic explanation of events.

H. Delehaye, Les recueils antiques des miracles des saints: AB 43 (1925) 5-85; 305-325; R.M. Grant, Miracle and Natural Law in Graeco-Roman and Early Christian Thought, Amsterdam 1952; ed. C.F.D. Moule, Miracles: Cambridge Studies in Their Philosophy and History, London 1965; C.H. Talbert, Biographies of Philosophers and Rulers as Instruments of Religious Propaganda in Mediterranean Antiquity: ANRW 18,2 (1978) 1619-1651; Hagiographies, cultures et sociétés (IV–XII siècles), Paris 1981: in particular the contributions of L. Cracco Ruggini, Il miracolo nella cultura del tardo Impero, 161-204, and of M. van Uytfanghe, La controverse biblique et patristique autour du miracle et ses répercussions sur l'hagiographie dans l'Antiquité tardive et le haut Moyen Âge latin, 205-233; H.C. Kee, Miracle in the Early Christian World: A Study in Sociohistorical Method, New Haven-London 1982; H. Remus, Pagan-Christian Conflict over Miracle in the Second Century, Cambridge, MA 1983; F. Mosetto, I miracoli evangelici nel dibattito fra Celso e Origene, Rome 1986; W.D. McCready, Signs of Sanctity: Miracles in the Thought of Gregory the Great, Toronto 1989; R. Van Dam, Saints and Their Miracles in Late Antique Gaul, Princeton, NJ 1993; S. Boesch Gajano - M. Modica (ed.), Miracoli, Rome 1999.

A. Monaci Castagno

MIRACLES of JESUS (in Ethiopic, Ta'amra Iyasus). An Ethiopian *apocryphon. This is a vast Ethiopian collection of stories concerning the life of Jesus, and it represents a tradition that is reasonably faithful to the Arabic Gospel of John (8th c.?); it is even possible that both works proceed from a common source. The Miracles of Jesus has been amplified with the insertion of other texts and by additions to the text itself (e.g., stories of the infancy or the history of *Abgar). The translation probably appeared during the 14th c. The work has enjoyed great popularity in *Ethiopia, and it has even been employed in the liturgy, from which derive numerous codices with variations in the sequence of texts and with differing numerations. The number of "miracles" varies between 40 and 88. The Miracles of Jesus employs a text of the gospel that is akin to the Vetus Syra.

CANT 45 (bibl.). Editions: S. Grébaut: PO 12 (1919) 550-662; 14 (1920) 767-844; 17 (1923) 783-857; ROC 21 (1918–1919) 100-103; 203-213; 33 (1920–1924) 57-61 (up to miracle 30, the baptism and the temptation of Christ, i.e., up to the [33rd] 44th miracle of the Arabic Gospel of John, which has 45 miracles); Id., ROC 16 (1911) 225-265; 356-367; 21 (1918–1919) 94-99; A. Vööbus, Ta'amera Iyasus. Zeuge eines älteren äthiopischen Evangelientypus: OCP 17 (1951) 462-467; V. Arras - L. van Rompay, Les manuscrits éthiopiens des "Miracles de Jésus": AB 93 (1975) 133-146; W. Witakowski, The Miracles of Jesus: An Ethiopian Apocryphal Gospel: Apocrypha 6 (1995) 279-298.

M. Starowieyski

MIRACULIS S. STEPHANI, De. The discovery of the *relics of St. Stephen (at Kefar Gamala in 415) and their proliferation in *Africa after 418 precipitated miracles in various localities. Possidius compiled the libelli miraculorum for Calama, and *Augustine compiled them for Hippo; these writings tell of the healings carried out through the intercession of Stephen. Augustine tells of some seventy being compiled at Hippo around 427 (Civ. Dei 22,8,21), and many more at Calama. Only one of the accounts has been preserved; it was redacted by a Paul of Cappadocia who was cured at Hippo (Sermo 322,2). The libelli of Uzala in Africa Proconsularis were first ignored. Once the local bishop Evodius had given his approval and Augustine had intervened (PL 41, 833-854), they were officially sanctioned. These "Miracles of St. Stephen" constitute excellent written testimony not only of the African cult of protomartyrs but also of the cult of relics that was very rapidly developing in Africa.

CPL 391; BHL 7860-7861; H. Delehaye, Les premiers libelli miraculorum: AB 29 (1910) 427-434; Id., Les recueils antiques des miracles des saints: AB 43 (1925) 74-85; V. Saxer, Morts martyrs reliques en Afrique chrétienne aux premiers siècles, Paris 1980, 246-254; Y. Duval, Loca sanctorum Africae, II, Rome 1982, 626-627; AugL 2, 1158ff.

V. Saxer

MISAEL (Misahel) (d. after 537). A 6th-c. monophysite. Around 518 he became a cubicularius in the Eastern imperial court (*Jordanes, Romana 360: MGH, Auct. ant. 5,47; *Marcellinus Comes, s.a. 519; Sev. Ant., Ep. sel. 1,17; 11,1; CSCO 7, 10). He was a friend and correspondent of *Severus of Antioch, who even helped to restore the finances of his church (Sev. Ant., Ep. sel. 11,1). *Zacharias Scholasticus dedicated a number of biographies to him, including one on *Peter the Iberian (Vita Isaiae: CSCO 7, 10). Together with Amantius he was an opponent of the emperor Justin in 518, thus he was exiled to *Serdica (Jordanes, Romana; John Mal. fr. 23). He then became a deacon and lived at *Constantinople, as one can deduce from the letters of Severus of Antioch (Ep. Sel. 1,63; 3,3; 3,4). He died after 537, the date of a letter of Severus (Ep. sel. 1,63).

PLRE 2, 763f.; E.W. Brooks, The Sixth Book of the Select Letters of Severus Patriarch of Antioch, London 1902–1904; B. Croke, The Chronicles of Marcellinus, Sydney 1995.

A. Di Berardino

MITHRAS – MITHRAISM. A part of the common Indo-Iranian religious heritage (see Vedic Mitra, commonly connected with Varuna), the god Mithras continued to occupy an important place in Iranian religion after its monotheistic reformation by Zoroaster, in the form of a Yazata, one of the beneficent beings in the sphere of Ahura Mazda. Celebrated in the 10th Hymn (Yasht) of the Avesta as the protector of justice and of contracts, Mithras, whose name means "covenant," appears therein as a celestial and luminous divinity connected with the sun; a protector of livestock, who guarantees good pasture, and of just humans; an enemy of the wicked and an avenger of their offenses. The cult of Mithras spread throughout many of the regions subject to the Achaemenid Empire, esp. Asia Minor, due to the work of the Magi, or Magusei, priests of the Zoroastrian religion deeply immersed in Babylonian astrology. This setting, penetrated also by Hellenism, is likely the locus of an important phase in the development which led from the ancient Iranian cult of Mithras to the formation of W Mithraism as a mystery religion. In fact, beginning in the late 1st to early 2nd c., we witness in the Roman Empire the spread of a cult, initiatory and esoteric in character, and centering on Mithras, which preserves certain aspects of its original form (connections to the heavens and the sun, an association with the notion of justice), but which assumes new functions, both cosmogonic and soteriological. The documents that reveal Roman Mithraism and its mysteries are mostly archaeological, epigraphic and artistic-monumental in nature, whereas the few literary sources consist mostly of short and allusive notices in works by Christian authors, to whom the cult of Mithras appears a diabolical "counterfeit" of Christian rites and concepts. The basic task of the god, illustrated by numerous figurative monuments (statues, bas-reliefs, paintings) which adorned the back walls of the cult's location (the Mithraeum, commonly underground, or at least imitating a grotto by the use of various devices and therefore also called a spelaeum), consists in the slaying of a bull (tauroctony), which takes on a cosmogonic character or at any rate serves to promote life and the fecundity of the cosmos. Indeed, often from the tail of the slain animal emerge ears of wheat, while a number of animals (dogs, scorpions, snakes) attend the scene and appear to delight in the beneficial effects of the bull's blood. The tauroctony is portrayed as a positive act, commonly situated in a large cosmic setting (the sun, the moon, the seven planets and the twelve signs of the zodiac are present at the event), which recognizes other divine realities, related in various ways to Mithras himself (the Sun, Heaven and the Ocean, Tellus, Saturn). One very important figure on the religious horizon of Mithras is the so-called Leontocephalus, a human figure with the head of a lion, wrapped in (seven) serpentine coils, whose attributes (scepter, keys, celestial orb) characterize him as a cosmic force, not hostile but formidable, and at any rate needing to be surpassed in view of an ascensus to a superior celestial sphere. In this sense the interpretation of the Mithraic ideology seems to point to the scheme of a "ladder" to seven doors attested by Celsus-Origen (C. Cels. 6,22). These doors in fact correspond to the seven planetary heavens, evoked in many figurative monuments and implied by the very system of the seven initiatory levels.

The Mithraic community, which was restricted to men, in fact envisaged seven progressive orders (corax "raven," nymphus "bridegroom," miles "soldier," leo "lion," perses "Persian," heliodromus "courier of the sun"), culminating in the highest level, Pater, with priestly functions and in close relationship with Mithras. Each initiatory level related to a planetary heaven and a respective tutelary divinity. Furthermore, the passage from one level to another was in some measure configured as corresponding to the movement in the celestial ascensus. The initiatory ritual envisioned numerous purifications and tests, even cruel ones, of endurance, while the communal liturgy consisted of a banquet wherein the Pater and the Heliodromus played the part of the guests, representing Mithras and the Sun, while the other initiates played the part of the servants. Justin (1 Apol. 66) tells of bread and water offered to the initiates, while *Tertullian describes the coronation rite which takes places during the initiation of the miles (De cor. 15; De praescr. haer. 40). The religious ethos of Mithraism consists of a strong ethical obligation during one's earthly life through the affirmation of truth and justice, following the god, who has known how to fulfill the mission entrusted to him by a higher power in order to guarantee life and cosmic order. This results, above all, in the inscriptions that accompany the paintings of the Roman Mithraeum of St. Prisca, wherein a soteriological perspective appears to be expressed in relation to the shedding of blood.

The mystery cult of Mithras achieved notable growth in the Roman Empire, being esp. well-received by soldiers and functionaries of state administration, and without ever becoming the official religion of the state enjoyed the favor of the public authorities. It offered to its followers well-being in this life and, in all likelihood, specific guarantees even for the life to come.

F. Cumont, Textes et monuments figurés relatifs aux mystères de Mithra, I–II, Brussels 1896–1899; M.J. Vermaseren, Corpus In- scriptionum et monumentorum religionis mithriacae, I–II, The Hague 1956–1960; U. Bianchi (ed.), Mysteria Mithrae, Rome-Leiden 1979; R. Merkelbach, Mithras, Königstein/Ts. 1984; W. Burkert, Ancient Mystery Cults, Cambridge, MA-London 1987; J.R. Hinnells (ed.), Studies in Mithraism: Papers Associated with the Mithraic Panel Organized on the Occasion of the XVIth Congress of the International Association for the History of Religions, Rome 1990, Rome 1994; R.L. Gordon, Image and Value in the Graeco-Roman World: Studies in Mithraism and Religious Art, Norfolk 1996; A. Mastrocinque, Studi sul mitraismo (il mitraismo e la magia), Rome 1998; P. Scarpi (ed.), Le religioni dei misteri, II, Samotracia, Andania, Iside, Cibele e Attis, Mitraismo, Milan 2002; E. Sanzi, I culti orientali nell'Impero romano. Un'antologia di fonti, Cosenza 2003; G. Sfameni Gasparro, Misteri e teologie. Per la storia dei culti mistici e misterici nel mondo antico, Cosenza 2003.

G. Sfameni Gasparro

MODESTUS (2nd c.). Anti-*Marcionite writer of the era of *Marcus Aurelius (161–180). In the estimation of *Eusebius of Caesarea, "He knew, better than anyone, how to reveal for the world the errors of the heresiarch," namely, Marcion (HE 4,25). His works have been lost. *Jerome informs us that his popularity was such that many pseudegrapha circulated under the name of Modestus (Vir. Ill. 32).

A. Harnack, Marcion. Das Evangelium vom fremden Gott. Eine Monographie zur Geschichte der Grundlegung der katholischen Kirche, Leipzig [2]1924 = Darmstadt 1996, 317-318 (Fr. tr. Paris 2003).

G. Ladocsi - S. Samulowitz

MODESTUS of Jerusalem (d. ca. 630). Patriarch of Jerusalem. Modestus was *hegumen of the famous Palestinian monastery founded in the previous century by St. *Theodosius (d. 529) at the time of the conquest of *Syria and *Palestine by *Chosroes II and his general Romizanes (or Shahrbaraz). It was *Zacharias the orthodox patriarch who selected Modestus for a mission to Jericho with the aim of sending *Byzantine military reinforcement and thus attempting a last defense of the Holy City. The Persian army entered Jerusalem nevertheless (May 614), burning churches and massacring a portion of the population. They sold the survivors as slaves or carried them off to Persia. Among this latter group was Patriarch Zacharias. Up until 622 the Christians of Palestine were subject to both the tyranny of Persian occupation and the vengeance of the Jews.

Yet the situation changed with the first military victory of *Heraclius. Together with freedom of worship, the Christians recovered their churches and monasteries. They even obtained permission from Chosroes to rebuild, as much as they could, the buildings which lay in ruin. Even though he had expelled the Jews from Jerusalem, Chosroes was nevertheless more favorable to the *monophysites than to the *orthodox. It was therefore absolutely necessary that a trustworthy personality take the reins of this community, whose spiritual head remained in exile. It was at this moment that Modestus assumed the responsibility. He proved perfectly suited to the task both spiritually and materially. Specifically, he was a very wise rebuilder, focused on preserving structures in their original form whenever possible. Modestus was assisted considerably in his activities by aid sent from the patriarch of Alexandria, *John the Almsgiver.

The decisive victory of Heraclius was concluded with the treaty of Arabissus (July 629). In addition to the evacuation of all conquered lands, Heraclius demanded the return of the relics of the Holy Cross, which a Christian in the retinue of Chosroes was able to save from destruction and which Heraclius transferred personally to Jerusalem, which he entered on 21 March 630.

In the meantime, Zacharias had died in exile. In light of the work accomplished by Modestus, the emperor saw in him the chosen successor to the deceased patriarch. The reign of Modestus was of extremely short duration, since he died, it seems in the same year, on a return voyage from Syria, or at least on one of his many travels in Palestine. His body was transported to Jerusalem.

Even if the Greek biography of Modestus, published by Loparev in 1892 (BHG 1299 and 1299a), is pure fiction, more can be believed concerning the details of his activity furnished by Antiochus, a contemporary monk of the *laura of St. *Sabas; by Eustachius of Ancyra (PG 89, 1421-1427); or by Eutychius, the Melkite patriarch of Alexandria (933–940), in his Annals, preserved in Arabic (CSCO, Script. arab. ser. 3, 6 and 7).

According to *Photius, in his Bibliotheca (PG 104, 244-245), Modestus is the author of three homilies. Their authenticity has been placed in serious doubt, and the only one published in full is on the dormition of *Mary (PG 86, 3277-3312). Here echoes of the claims by the church of Jerusalem to possess the tomb of the Virgin can already be heard. The homily, however, is reminiscent rather of an author of the late 7th if not early 8th c., according to the conclusions of M. Jugie (The Death and Assumption of the Blessed Virgin, Rome 1944, 139-150).

DTC 10, 2047-2048; Vies des Saints 12, 532-536; BS 9, 525-526 (the typographical error which has replaced "Theodosius" with "Theodore" in the name of the monastery wherein Modestus was hegumen requires correction); Beck 454-455; R. Henry (ed.), Photius, Bibliothèque, VIII, Paris 1977, 118-120; F. Macler, Histoire d'Héraclius par l'évêque Sebêos, Paris 1904, 70-73 (with Fr. tr.); G. Garitte, La sépulture de Modeste de Jérusalem: Muséon 73 (1960) 127-133; D. Bertetto, S. Modesto di Gerusalemme dottore dell'Assunzione: Mater Ecclesiae 8 (1972) 154-162; Testi mariani del primo millennio, ed. G. Gharib, Rome 1989, II, 121-137; Marienlexikon 4, 495-496.

J.-M. Sauget

MOESIA (Mysia). A region of the Balkan Peninsula, bordered on the S by *Thrace and the Haemus Mons (now Stara Planina in Bulgaria and Serbia, i.e., the Balkan Mountains), on the SW by *Macedonia, on the W by Illyria and *Pannonia, on the N by the Danube, and on the E by the Black Sea (Pontus Euxine). Thus in general terms, ancient Moesia coincided with the modern-day territories of NE Serbia and N Bulgaria. In etymological terms, the name derives from the designation of the Thracian ethnic tribe of Moesi (Mysoi). When Moesia was organized as a province during the era of Roman domination, the name designated the population in general terms, without regard to its original meaning along ethnic lines, as we find in Pliny the Elder (Nat. hist. III, 149): provincia quae Moesia appellatur . . . in ea Dardani, Celegeri, Triballi, Timachi, Moesi, Thraces . . . , such that the designation Moesicae gentes lost its strictly ethnic meaning. Moreover, the spelling of the ethnic name itself varies: Moesi, Mysoi, in a rather political and territorial sense.

Having conquered Macedonia around the middle of the 2nd c. BC, in 148 the Romans organized the territory as a province. Meanwhile, the various Thracian tribes that were living to the N of the Haemus Mons remained beyond Roman domination. Rome was compelled to fight them for a long time, finally in 29 BC overcoming their resistance and subjugating them under its rule. Subsequently the territory between the Danbue and the Haemus Mons became subject to the power of Rome, and in the year AD 15 the region was organized as the province of Moesia. The new province assumed an exceptional significance for Rome and its defense of the Danubian limes against the invasions of the various "barbarian" tribes. Roxolani, Bastarnae, Scythians and others were advancing from the N and NE, crossing over the great river to rape and pillage the local communities. In order to bolster this defense, around AD 85 the province was split into Moesia Superior (E Serbia) with the city of Naissus (Niš) as its administrative and military center, and Moesia Inferior (comprising N Bulgaria, as well as *Scythia Minor, today's region of Dobruja) with the capital at *Tomis (today's Constanța/Kjustendza). The line of demarcation between the two new provinces was formed by the river Ciabrus (today Tsibritsa), and in a broader sense by the region between Ratiaria (Archar on the Danube in Bulgaria) and Almus (Lom on the Danube). The region along the lower Danube remained particularly vulnerable. A great vallum, intended to impede the invasions, was constructed between *Axiopolis (Cernavodă near the river in Romania) and Tomis.

The province of Moesia Inferior assumed prime importance at the beginning of the 2nd c., during the reign of *Trajan (98–117). The emperor embarked on a long war against the Dacians (101–106), beyond the Danube. Episodes from this war are memorialized in the sculptural reliefs of Trajan's column at Rome, and on the Tropaeum Traiani in Adamclissi, Romania). Upon the death of the Dacian king Decebalus in 106, Trajan organized the conquered territory as a Roman province, building fortifications and setting up Roman colonies that would come to play a considerable role in the Romanization of the nation. In order to better assure the physical link with this new province of *Dacia, the emperor pursued a fervid building campaign in Moesia, including fortifications, streets with mansiones and mutationes, and bridges with defensive ramparts. Up to the present day, these construction projects have often been commemorated under the name of the emperor Trajan; it turns out that in some cases they were not of his making. The emperor Trajan pursued considerable activity in the territories placed under Roman power. First to be built were the various roads that were necessary to facilitate military links, commerce and the *travel of government agents. The principal roadway artery was the so-called Via Diagonalis. It ran from *Singidunum (Belgrade), crossing through Naissus (Niš), *Serdica (Sofia), Philippopolis (Plovdiv) and Adrianopolis (Edirne of Turkey, known as Odrin in Bulgarian) before arriving at *Constantinople. It traversed only a part of the province of Moesia but most of the province of Thrace. Another Roman road followed the Danubian limes: from Singidunum, crossing through Bononia (Vidin in NW Bulgaria), proceeding to the E, reaching the region of the Danube delta and running along the shore of the Black Sea, it arrived at the Bosporus. Streets of minor importance were constructed in the interior of Moesia. One road departed from the colony of Novae (near the Bulgarian city of Svishtov on the Danube), extended S, crossed over the Haemus Mons, arrived at Philippopolis and met up with the Via Diagonalis. Even today, the pass in Bulgaria through the Haemus Mons bears the name Trayanov Prokhod, in perpetual memory of Trajan. Inasmuch as these roadway arteries were constructed and organized in a solid manner and a rational way, we find that there are still considerable remains of these arteries visible in quite a few localities, and that a good number of modern roadways follow the general layout of Roman times.

No less important than the network of roads was the process of urbanization begun by Trajan. The local population was sparse in areas through which roads did not pass, and typically the form and organization of small villages were rather poorly designed. Nonetheless, some villages were established as municipia, and therefore had open squares, paved roads, aqueducts, and imposing public and religious edifices. With the exception of a few urban centers that have arisen in recent times, most of the cities in contemporary Bulgaria have preserved their original centers from the era of Roman domination. We can precisely date the foundation and growth of some of these urban centers to the time of Trajan, including Nicopolis ad Istrum (ruins at 20 km [12.4 mi] N of the city of Veliko Tarnovo, next to the village of Nikyup, a Serbian corruption of the classical name) and Marcianopolis (ruins W of Varna near Reka Devnya; acc. to ancient witnesses, named after Trajan's sister Marcia). The city of Nicopolis flourished right up until its destruction at the hands of *Attila. In honor of the emperor, some of these urban centers even received the gentilitial honors of the imperial family, as in Colonia Ulpia Traiana Ratiaria and Colonia Ulpia Oescensium. In fact, none of the Roman emperors of the following centuries matched the fame of Trajan. Judging from the testimonies of written medieval sources, we conclude that the name of the emperor was one of the divinities venerated by the *pagan Slavs in the Middle Ages. After coming under Roman domination, the region of Moesia unfortunately did not enjoy perpetual tranquility. The Thracian people badly endured the rule of foreigners, and more than once their rebellion led to a bloody outcome.

However, the defense of the Danubian limes was not always well organized. More than once, the local population endured suffering in the invasions of the "barbarian" tribes and peoples, who came from the N of the Danube and penetrated the region to the S. Some of these invasions arrived peacefully or established rather "friendly" relations with the local people, who sometimes treated the invaders as allies against Roman rule. The situation undoubtedly led to a decrease in the local population and at the same time to a certain change in its ethnic composition. Therefore, it seems impossible to claim that already in the first centuries of the Christian era the territory of Moesia represented a "deserted region" as a consequence of the invasions or even epidemics. (In fact, the pestilence raged more than once.) The place names and the names of bodies of water that remained intact until the end of the Middle Ages are eloquent testimony against such a claim. A great ethnic and administrative change occurred in 271. Facing the advance of the *Goths and other tribes, the emperor *Aurelius decided to evacuate the province of Dacia, and he transferred the civilian Roman population to the S of the Danube. In the process, Moesia was reorganized into two new provinces that bore the translocated name of Dacia: Dacia Ripensis (capital at Ratiaria) and Dacia Mediterranea (capital at Serdica). In only approximate terms were they demarcated by the existing territories of Moesia Superior and Moesia Inferior. Yet the most disastrous ethnic change occurred in the 1st half of the 5th c., as a result of the repeated and ruthless invasions of the *Huns. A part of the local population either was massacred, deported as *slaves of war or forced to abandon their homes, taking refuge in the mountains and remote locales.

The great "Germanic crisis" provoked by the penetration of a conspicuous number of *Ostrogoths and *Visigoths (installed in the Balkan territories as federated and mercenary populations, or simply as unwanted conquerors) did not benefit Moesia at all. At the time of the emperor *Valens (364–378), numerous divisions of Visigoth soldiers, crossing over the Danube and passing through Moesia, penetrated Thrace, where in alliance with the Ostrogoths and Huns they mercilessly devastated the country. The attempt of the emperor to oppose their formidable resistance failed miserably: in a battle occurring on 9 August 378, the emperor himself perished. During the 5th c., the Germanic menace reached its height, esp. due to the presence of two military leaders of the Goths, Theodoric Strabo and *Theoderic Amaling, and their divisions. Initially received into the imperial service, they rather quickly demonstrated a clearly hostile attitude. However, the government of Constantinople enjoyed a respite from their menace, with the death of Theodoric Strabo in 481. For his part, the Eastern emperor *Zeno (474–475, 476–491) succeeded in persuading Theoderic to abandon Moesia, where he was sojourning with his military divisions, and to leave in 488 for *Italy in order to combat *Odoacer. With Odoacer conquered in 493, Theoderic became known as "the Great," establishing the kingdom of the Ostrogoths that spanned a golden age until his death in 526.

After its liberation from the Goths, however, the relief of the Eastern Roman Empire did not endure for long. Right at the end of the 5th c. and at the beginning of the 6th c., during the reign of the Eastern emperor *Anastasius (491–518), new invaders appeared on the Danubian frontier—the Slavs—this time more numerous and more tenacious. The situation on the Danubian frontier took a particularly tragic turn during the reign of *Justinian I (527–565). As the Slavs prosecuted the emperor's campaign in the E against the *Persians and in the W against the Goths of Italy, they were obliged to leave the Balkan Peninsula without an adequate defense. The line of fortifications, built by imperial order around the middle of the 6th c., remained without garrisons and thus incapable of stopping the mass of Slavs who were descending from the N and from the NE.

In the 2nd half of the 6th c., the invaders no longer contented themselves with penetrating and then departing with extraordinarily lavish booty and slaves, and remained for longer periods of time. In this way, the second phase of their invasions and occupation of the Balkan regions began. The internal political and military crisis that *Byzantium experienced at the beginning of the 7th c., with the assassination of the emperor Maurice and the coup d'état of the usurper, Emperor Phocas, even further facilitated the process of penetration and settlement of the Slavs. Around the middle of the 7th c., the ethnic composition of the greater part of the Balkan Peninsula was already radically changed. Some decades later, the Bulgarian nation arose in 681. The true center of the new state was precisely in Moesia Inferior and Scythia Minor.

In the new country, the Slavs and the early Bulgarians embraced the rich heritage of the past. Even after the long "barbarian" invasions, the remains of the material civilization were always imposing. The heritage of the spiritual civilization, received from the remnants of the traditional population that stayed on during the invasions, took on prime importance. First of all, this spiritual heritage comprised elements of the ancient place names and names of bodies of water; then it constituted a Christian tradition that developed over the centuries. Thus the idiosyncrasies of the Slavic language transformed the name of the city of Serdica (Sofia, the Bulgarian capital) into Sredets. A great number of rivers conceal the classical name in the modern name: Margus-Morava, Ciabrus-Tsibritsa, Timacus-Timok, Oescus-Iskŭr (Iskar), Assamus (Asemus)-Osam, Augusta-Ogosta, Utus-Vit (Vid), Ieterus (Iatrus)-Yantra (Jantra), Tondzus-Tundzha etc.

When it comes to the propagation of Christianity, numerous indications further testify to the continuity between *Late Antiquity and the High Medieval period. Not being geographically distant from Constantinople, *Thessalonica and *Philippi—the three great centers of ancient Christianity—Moesia inevitably felt their influence, even in the early Christian era. Thanks to multiple sources of evidence from *epigraphic and other written sources, we know of the existence of various Christian centers and their *ecclesiastical organization around bishops, priests and deacons. For the presence of Christians in Moesia, it is significant that the Council of Serdica was held in 343/344. We find various buildings of Christian worship, including basilicas and cruciform churches, in numerous localities of Moesia, though often as ruins. Melettina experienced martyrdom at Marcianopolis. We count the remains of more than 80 churches in today's Bulgaria, which incorporates Moesia Inferior as well as Thrace. In Thrace, the *Greek language was predominant, together with the language of the Thracians. In Moesia, *Latin prevailed as the *liturgical language of the Christians. The information provided by some *Byzantine authors leads us to conclude that certain Christian communities and their clergy must have persisted until the era of the "barbarian" invasions (6th–8th c.).

We should not treat the official *conversion of the Bulgarian people to Christianity in 865 as an accidental occurrence, but rather as the result of a long evolution over centuries, the roots of which we find in Greco-Roman Late Antiquity. In writing the history of Christianity in Bulgaria, we should not overlook the tenacity of the *Arian bishop *Wulfila (ca. 311–383). For a number of years during the 1st half of the 4th c., he lived at Nicopolis ad Istrum among the "lesser Goths."

J. Zeiller, Les origines chrétiennes dans les provinces danubiennes de l'Empire romain, Paris 1918; B. Gerov, La romanisation entre le Danube et les Balkans (in Bulg. with a Fr. summary): Godišnik (or Annual) of the University of Sofia, Faculty of History and Philology, 45/4 (1948/49) 1-92, part I; 47 (1950/52) 17-122; 48 (1952/53) 307-415, part II; V. Velkov, Die Stadt im spätantiken Thrakien und Dakien des IV. bis VI. Jahrhunderts (in Bulg. with a Ger. summary), Sofia 1959; B. Gerov, L'aspect éthnique et linguistique dans la région entre le Danube et les Balkans à l'époque romaine: Studi Urbinati new series 1-2 (1959) 173-191; V. Beševliev, Spätantike und spätlateinische Inschriften aus Bulgarien, Berlin 1964; M. Fluss, Moesi, Moesia: PWK 15, 2347-2411 (with sources and bibl.); R.F. Hoddinott, Bulgaria in Antiquity: An Archaeological Introduction, London 1975; Id., The Thracians, London 1981; I. Dujčev, Testimonianze epigrafiche archeologiche sul paleocristianesimo in Bulgaria: Atti dell'Accademia pontificia di archeologia 53/54 (1980–1982) 181-205; J. Fitz, L'administration des provinces danubiennes sous le Bas-Empire romain, Brussels 1983; C. Poulter, ed., Ancient Bulgaria, Nottingham 1983; R. Pillinger, Monumenti paleocristiani in Bulgaria: RivAC 61 (1985) 275-310; Spätantike und frühbyzantinische Kultur Bulgariens zwischen Orient und Okzident, ed. R. Pillinger, Vienna 1986; V. Velkov, Wulfila und die Gothi minores in Moesien: Klio 71 (1989) 525-527; R.L. Dise, Cultural Change and Imperial Administration: The Middle Danube Provinces of the Roman Empire, New York 1991; K. Ilski, Bischofslisten der Kirchenprovinz Moesia, in Prosopographica, ed. L. Mrozewicz and K. Ilski, Poznan 1993, 237-245; Moesia christiana: Anfänge und Entwicklung: Eos 82 (1994) 67-84; Id., Moesia christiana: die Epoche der christologischen Auseinandersetzungen: Eos 82 (1994) 291-310; Limes, ed. G. Susini, Bologna 1994; B. Gerov, Beiträge zur Geschichte der römischen Provinzen Moesien und Thrakien, Amsterdam 1997; A. Poulter, L'avenir du passé: recherches sur la transition entre la période romaine et le monde protobyzantin dans la région du Bas-Danube: Antiquité Tard 6 (1998) 329-343.

I. Dujčev

MONACHIS PERFECTIS, De. Anonymous homily composed in the Iberian Peninsula at the end of the 6th c. It comes to us with the writings of *Valerius of Bierzo and for a certain amount of time was considered as the work of Valerius of Bierzo (Fernández Pousa).

Concerning monasticism, which not everyone agrees was morally and physically insulated from the world, this homily was probably written by a well-informed bishop on the matter, and shows that the monks fully reach their virtuous ideals by living in the city, in contact with other people and esp. exposed to temptations.

Díaz 59; R. Fernández Pousa, San Valerio. Obras, Madrid 1944, 122-129; M.C. Díaz y Díaz, Anecdota wisigothica, I, Salamanca 1958, 80-87; Ibid., Un tratado monástico interesante: Revista Española de Teología 17 (1957) 26-30; U. Domínguez del Val, La homilía "de monachis perfectis," un tratado de teología sobre la vida monástica, in Bivium, Homenaje a M.C. Díaz y Díaz, Madrid 1983, 55-56; U. Domínguez del Val, Historia de la antigua literatura latina hispano-lusitana, IV, Madrid 1998, 383.

P. Marone

MONARCHIANS – MONARCHIANISM. *Tertullian uses these terms to refer to *Praxeas and the *patripassians (Adv. Prax. 10,1) as proponents of the *heresy of divine monarchy (*monotheism). Modern scholars prefer to use the term to also refer to another branch of heretics called the *adoptionists. But it is important to be clear that for Christians, faith in God alone was inherited from Judaism as a distinctive character of their religion from the beginning in contrast to *pagan polytheism. However, they had to reconcile that monotheistic faith with their faith in the divinity of Christ, the Son of God; and the theological reflection on this point came about in the 2nd c., in order to elaborate the doctrine of the divine Logos, which conceived Christ as divine Logos, united with the *Father but still distinct from and subordinated to him, interpreter of his will to the created *world. This conception seems to many to be effectively ditheism, conceding too much to Greek *philosophy: against this view, and against *gnostic speculation about the Logos, a monarchian reaction developed that was rigidly monotheistic but radicalized in two directions: first, what is referred to in modern terms as "adoptionism," which considers Christ as simply a charismatically gifted human, who was "adopted" as the Son of God by virtue of his merits; and *patripassianism (modalism, in modern terminology), which considered "the Son" merely a name and the mode in which the Father manifests himself.

Of the two movements, both of them being considered heretical for different reasons, adoptionism was not initially strong: it began at the end of the 2nd c., in *Rome with the work of *Theodotus of Byzantium (called the Tanner), and continued from there by *Artemon (ca. 230–250). But it vigorously took hold in *Arabia (*Beryllus of Bostra) and in *Antioch with *Paul of Samosata (ca. 260–270). In the middle of the 4th c., it was represented by *Photinus of *Sirmium. Patripassianism encountered a better reception: begun at the end of the 2nd c., by *Noetus in *Smyrna, exported to Rome, it thrived in the 1st decades of the 3rd c. (*Epigonus, *Cleomenes, *Praxeas, *Sabellius). Under the name of Sabellianism, it spread throughout *Egypt in the middle of the 3rd c., and from there to various places in the *East.

Alongside these radical forms of monarchianism, but not to be confused with them, a more generic monarchianism existed. It intensely affirmed monotheism and was characterized by the suspicion and aversion to the theology of the Logos, which in polemics with radical monarchianism always continued to develop. In that sense, if radical monarchianism was condemned at Rome, a generically oriented monarchianism remained as the faith of the community. And in the East, this monarchian sensibility strongly opposed *Origen's theology: the monarchian believers accused Dionysius of Alexandria at Rome (ca. 257), but they were not heretics (i.e., not Sabellians). Probably in this context it was affirmed that the Son is homoousios with the Father, in opposition to the theologies of the Logos, which affirmed two ousai* ("substances") of Father and Son. It is difficult to know the precise character of this monarchianism, because it only rarely found a way to express itself at a literary level—e.g., at the start of the 4th c., with *Eustathius of Antioch (while the contemporary *Marcellus of Ancyra was a much more radical monarchian), and because the Logos theologians found it easy to silence their monarchian adversaries with the heresy of Sabellianism, without distinguishing between moderates and radicals. However, this need for divine monarchy notably influenced, against the radicalization of the Logos theology represented by *Arius, the decisions of the Council of *Nicaea, and consequently the final formulation of trinitarian theology, emphasizing the unitary component.

J.N.D. Kelly, Early Christian Doctrines, London 1958, 115-126; M. Simonetti, Sabellio e il sabellianismo: SSR 4 (1980) 7-28; G. Uribarri Bilbao, Monarquía y Trinidad: el concepto teológico "monarchia" en la controversia "monarquiana," Madrid 1996; Id., La emergencia de la Trinidad inmanente: Hipólito y Tertuliano, Madrid 1999; M. Simonetti, Monarchia e Trinità. Alcune osservazioni su un libro recente: RSLR 33 (1997) 623-642.

M. Simonetti

MONASTERIES, DOUBLE. In a strict sense, this refers to communities composed of both monks and nuns, under the same authority. In a wider sense, it refers to communities distinctly composed of men and *women, but united by proximity and common tasks. Often they began with the conversion of a whole *family to *asceticism (including *children, servants and *slaves, unless they deliberately refused) that offered to *God their house and inherited property. This was the case with the family of *Basil and his friends. Double monasteries were opposed by *Justinian in 529 and 543, by the Second Council of *Nicaea in 787, and again in subsequent instances. Often they prohibited new ones from starting up, but tolerated the already existent ones. The reiterated condemnation shows their limited efficacy. In the West, the more prominent cases belong to medieval times. Not infrequently the authority was in the hands of the *abbess, while the monks preferred to dedicate themselves to religious service.

DIP 6, 51-52; S. Hilpisch, Die Doppelklöster, Münster 1928; G. Barone Adesi, Monachesimo ortodosso e diritto romano nel Tardoantico, Milan 1990.

J. Gribomont

MONASTERY. The Greek word monasterion, already used by *Philo in reference to Jewish *ascetics, is first referred to as the isolated *cell of a solitary monk in the 4th c., but then later to a community dwelling. Monasteries obtained financial privileges early on due to their *poverty, social utility, holy character and, after the Council of *Chalcedon, the recognition by bishops of their rights and duties that can vary (imperial, patriarchal monasteries; in the West, exemption etc.). The authority of the superior is recognized to a certain extent over goods and persons, and early on they become first-rate economic, cultural, artistic and esp. spiritual centers.

DIP 6, 48-51; A. De Meester, De monarchico statu iuxta disciplinam byzantinam, Vatican City 1942, index 456-457; G. Barone Adesi, Monachesimo ortodosso e diritto romano nel Tardoantico, Milan 1990.

J. Gribomont

MONASTIC HABIT. A religious habit proper to the regular clergy did not exist in early Christianity. Only modesty in dress was recommended to clergy, and they were forbidden to wear long hair. The tonsure, practiced in the East from the 4th c., arrived much later in the West. The late medieval councils were the first to prescribe style and colors in clergy dress, until the Council of Trent peremptorily prescribed the wearing of an appropriate habit. The monastic habit, however, was used from the beginning of the movement, as both an instrument of humility and a distinctive sign of the monastic state. It was also given a mystical interpretation, at the root of which was the concept that the change in clothes signified the change in mentality and conduct. *John Cassian (early 5th c.) develops this theme in the first book of the Institutes. Some years earlier *Sulpicius Severus portrayed *Martin of Tours dressed in a bland outfit and a black pallium (Dial. II, 3,2), calling the crowd of monks that followed his funeral train the agmina palliata (Ep. 3, 19). The hairshirt, camelorum saetis, was common (see Paul. Nola, Ep. 29, 1), the use of which seems to have led in some circles to a kind of Eastern arrogance, and it was thus rejected by Cassian (Inst. 1,3). Monastic dress also spread beyond the asceteri, so much so that in 428 Celestine prohibited its use by bishops and clergy (Ep. 4,1, PL 50, 429ff.). The great early legislators referred to the monk's dress. The Rule of Pachomius (16, PG 40, 949) alludes to a style proper to monks (σχῆμα ἀποτακτικόν); *Basil recommends for them poverty and modesty in dress (Reg. fus. tract. 22 and 23); the Reguli magistri and *Benedict, who each have a chapter de vestiario (RM 81; RB 55), ascribe to the monk the use of tunic and hood (cuculla). After Benedict this type of dress became established, whereas the dress of laypersons changed radically.

P. Oppenheim, Das Mönchskleid im christlichen Altertum, Freiburg 1931; L. Cristiani, Essai sur les origines du costume ecclésiastique: OCP 13 (1947) 69-80; M. Augè, L'abito religioso, Rome 1977; M. Boulding, Background to a Theology of the Monastic Habit: DR 98 (1980) 110-123.

S. Pricoco

MONASTICISM

I. Origins - II. The East - III. The West.

I. Origins. At the beginning of the 4th c., the moment in which the church reconciled itself with the *world, there arose a resistance movement to return to the ancient opposition that renounced the world. The protagonists were the so-called apotaktitai, apotaktitoi, apostolikoi (apostolici*). This phenomenon manifested itself esp. in places where Hellenism, which was by now on the wane, had long suppressed a venerated indigenous wisdom, in *Syria and *Egypt. Instead, N Asia Minor, still poorly acculturated to Hellenism, underwent Mesopotamian influences. The effect of these social factors cannot be overlooked, esp. the impact as well of Eastern religions or gnosis. To the extent that some saints gave a precise direction to the movement, this set free its gospel inspiration and made it one of the strongest forces in the church, even if it often deviated and tended toward sectarianism. It followed an extremely strict *ascetic conception of *baptism, centered on continence, *poverty, a life of *prayer and a *Jewish-Christian "prophetic" tradition, which in Syria became the institution of the "sons of the covenant." With the Greek term monachos, documented in Egypt (*papyri) starting from 324 and indicative of those belonging to the class (tagma) of celibates which abandoned their own homes and (in part) their own assets, sharing to a certain extent the dignity of *clergy, the movement assumed a well-defined form. Two important figures, *Anthony and *Pachomius, guaranteed its success and established the model for all the churches in two preeminent types: the solitary monk (*anchorite) and the *cenobite monk who lives in the community (koinonia) of an organized group. Dependent, if not always upon local clergy, at least upon the forward-looking *authority of *Athanasius, they came under the *discipline of the church and they found countless valuable disciples. By means of *Macarius the Egyptian, among others, Anthony (d. 356) imposed his ideal on the semianchorism (eremitic colonies) of Nitria and *Scete. His *biography, composed by Athanasius, was soon translated into various languages and had a normative influence. The struggle that Athanasius himself had against the state church and the elite classes notably facilitated his alliance with monasticism and the formation in the church of a voluntary and popular army, poor and enthusiastic, charismatic, held in great esteem in the eyes of the masses.

The ancient history of the term monachos sheds light upon the origins of its establishment in the *desert. From the Jewish versions of Aquila and *Symmachus (see esp. Ps 67:7 in the commentary of *Eusebius: PG 23, 689B) and the apocryphal *Gospel of Thomas, it would seem that, moving from the Aramaic and *Syriac equivalent, we must recognize that from the 2nd c., it had a great semantic impact: "unique, loved by God in a unique way, likened to the unique Son." It cannot be claimed that in the 4th c. the vocabulary still preserved such a theological meaning.

Even in Egypt not all monks were reducible to eremitic and cenobitic models. The evidence speaks continually of "deteriorating" types, which are most likely the persistence or recurrence of primitive, anarchist formulas, rather unstable, tending toward begging, and not without the pretence of imposing themselves upon bishops and the public. This spiritual liberty, when it resolved into a refusal to follow in the footsteps of more prestigious saints, evidently risked deviation, and at worst, becoming bandits (see *Circumcellions).

II. The East. In the 4th c., Asia Minor and *Constantinople witnessed an evolution that did not depend upon Egypt. Already by 340, *Eustathius of Sebaste led a movement that entered into conflict with *Eusebius of Nicomedia and the official church (Council of *Gangra). This occurred in *Pontus and, through the deacon *Marathonius, even in the capital at the time of *Macedonius. *Basil the Great's adherence to this group provided a profoundly evangelical and ecclesial development, under a strict cenobitic form focused on service to the *poor, disciplined *labor, regular adoption of priestly *ministry and even of the episcopate. The activity of the Cappadocians went beyond this movement to Nicene *orthodoxy and philosophical humanism. Naturally, there was no small number of extremists, which was difficult to monitor. Through *Macarius/Simeon these would constitute the group denounced as *Messalians by the Council of *Side (ca. 390) and then by the Antiochene hierarchy. However, Macarius remained vigilant to do as much as possible to keep this group in the church and to combat abuse.

Basilian norms spread throughout Syria and *Palestine; however, they encountered—as we see from the Religious History of *Theodoret—a much more rigid *ascesis, which seems not to have tolerated anything of the conventional way of life (housing, cooking food, use of clothing) and tended toward a primitive life. Some Syriac writings attributed to *Ephrem portray this extremist ideal.

Egypt in the 2nd part of the 4th c. became the "classic place" of monasticism and attracted visitors, esp. from the East (*Rufinus, *Melania, *Jerome, *Evagrius of Pontus, *Palladius, *John Cassian), due to the fame of holy monks, of their spiritual teaching and well-conducted literary propaganda. Although the Life of Anthony (Athanasius) and certain apophthegmata* are used to portray a typical monastery that would have been rough, uncultivated, if not directly anti-intellectual, other indications suggest a very different reality, a rich spiritual tradition created by the fusion of Greek philosophical currents with the interpretation of Scripture, which one finds in different ways and degrees in every monastic context in Egypt.

Basic elements of this tradition, founded on the interpretation of Scripture by the great Alexandrian authors (*Philo, *Origen, *Didymus), would be the prerequisite for the possibility of making spiritual progress, the struggle against the passions and thoughts (logismoi) which blocked the way to contemplation and union with God, the idea of askēsis (spiritual exercises) and esp. the study and interpretation of Scripture. The Letters of Anthony and of *Ammonius, the Coptic fragments of *Paul of Tamma (4th c.) and later *Rufus of Shotep (end of 6th c.) show that they were not merely a tradition of Greek elites (Didymus, Evagrius). There is no shortage of indications of the same tradition in the Pachomian literature. Norms belonging to Pachomius indicate that it was obligatory to learn to read.

The literature of visitors (Historia monachorum in Aegypto* and the Historia Lausiaca) shows the same tradition as well as an interest in the amazing wonders that occurred among the monks. Although a major part of the Coptic literature was lost over the centuries, the fragments belonging to the monastic libraries bear witness to the intellectual and spiritual life of the monks. Toward the end of the 4th c., Evagrius of Pontus brings to Scete a Cappadocian and philosophical formation, and rediscovers the Alexandrian tradition. But right away after his death (399), the patriarch Theophilus struggled against *Origenism, the weapon of his own authority and ambition that would end with the deposition of *John Chrysostom some years later. The *Origenist controversy would cast a large shadow on Egyptian monasticism.

Already in Palestine in the 1st half of the 4th c. (*Hilarion, Chariton), monasticism obtained an inheritance of the different monastic spiritual currents. Not to mention, for the moment, the Latin settlements in *Jerusalem or *Bethlehem, *Gaza saw *Isaiah succeeded by *Barsanuphius and *John, then *Dorotheus, while the desert of *Judea, whose monks ended up resolutely adhering to Chalcedon, also had its own center of prestigious holiness, around *Sabas and *Euthymius (biographies written by *Cyril of Scythopolis). In turn, Mount *Sinai took over with *John Climacus and others. From *Armenia, *Georgia, *Persia, *Arabia and *Ethiopia, monastic elites came here to be formed and brought back with them to their own lands some spiritual, liturgical and cultural traditions. In the meantime the imperial laws and then the hierarchy (Council of Chalcedon) attempted to put the monastic world in order and subject it to the bishops. The whole discipline (novitiate, profession, poverty vows, restricted travel, separation from *women, obedience) would also be consolidated even if the internal crisis of *monophysitism did not contribute to such consolidation. In the 6th c., the Origenist crisis also came to disturb Palestinian monasticism and to indirectly cause a cultural regression. To compensate, numerous monks entered the episcopate and expanded their own interior lives thanks to their pastoral functions.

III. The West. One of the distinct aspects of Western monasticism, with its cultural dependence on the East, is its ecclesiastical character, its link with the basilicas and worship. The regular canons would be its newest manifestation, but nearly all of monasticism was influenced by it. The first contacts with Egyptian monasticism took place with the exile of Athanasius, with the exile of *Eusebius of Vercelli and *Hilary in Asia Minor, then with *Jerome's and *Rufinus's choice of the East, their ascetic *letters, their translations (Life of Anthony, Rules of Basil): all document its Eastern origins. The first decisive moment of adaptation, which developed spontaneously but uninterruptedly, was the Life of *Martin, then the experience and *rule of *Augustine, then *Lérins and John Cassian, who transmitted, among other things, the theory of Evagrius on *contemplation. S *Gaul of the 5th c. was the lively center whose influence radiated as far as *Ireland and produced a good number of rules. In the 6th c., the primacy belonged to central and S *Italy, with the Reguli magistri, then with the Rule of St. *Benedict, while that of *Eugippius was almost verbatim that of the already-existing documents. Of the Roman *monasteries, Benedict preserved a well-structured *liturgy and efficient community organization, in which the *abbot directed both the law of the household and *spirituality. The role that the Rule of Benedict plays in *Gregory the Great's Dialogues, together with the strengths internal to the Rule itself, subsequently contribute to its adoption in Gaul, *Britain and *Germany, before returning to dominate in Italy. In this progression there is no need to see a propagation imposed from on high. In general the foundations, having arisen autonomously, became Benedictine because they saw in Benedict and in his work the requisites of a model: and each one was Benedictine in its own way. They assumed first-rate importance in the church and in society, gaining the favor of the authorities because, in the chaos caused by the invasions, they constituted the active regenerative cells that prepared the culture of the Middle Ages.

DSp 10, 1524-1617; DIP 5, 1672-1742; K. Heussi, Der Ursprung des Mönchtums, Tübingen 1936; H.G. Evelyn White, The Monasteries of the Wadi 'n Natrûn. Part II: The History of the Monasteries of Nitria and of Scetis, New York 1932; G.M. Colombás, El monacato primitivo, 2 vol., Madrid 1974–1975 (It. tr., Monacato primitivo, Milan 1990); S. Pricoco, L'isola dei Santi: il cenobio di Lerino e l'inizio del monachesimo in Gallia, Rome 1978; K.S. Frank, Askese und Mönchtum in der alten Kirche, Darmstadt 1975; F. Prinz, Askese und Kultur, Munich 1980; G.M. Colombás, Il monachesimo delle origini, Milan 1994; A. de Vogüé, Histoire littéraire du mouvement monastique dans l'Antiquité I–VII. (Patrimoines du christianisme), Paris 1991–2003; J. Binns, Ascetics and Ambassadors of Christ: The Monasteries of Palestine 314–631, Oxford 1994; E. Wipszycka, Études sur le christianisme dans l'Égypte de l'antiquité tardive (SEA 52), Rome 1996; M. Sheridan, Il mondo spirituale e intellettuale del primo monachesimo egiziano, in L'Egitto cristiano: aspetti e problemi in età tardo-antica (SEA 56), Rome 1997, 177-216; Regole monastiche d'Occidente, ed. E. Bianchi, Turin 2004.

J. Gribomont - M. Sheridan

MONAZONTES. From the Greek verb μονάζω, indicates those who live solitary lives, or monks. According to Dom Toutée (PG 33, 36.485.486), monazontes was used by *Cyril of Jerusalem to refer to monks that lived in the city, and monachi referred to monks who withdrew to the *desert, but perhaps the distinction was not so clear. *Egeria uses both terms monazontes and monachi indifferently (Peregr. 24,1.12; 25,2.6.7.12; 49,1). *Cassian uses monazontes synonymously with monachi to indicate the hermit's ancient kind of life separated from the *world (Conl. 18,5,4). In an encyclical *letter, *Athanasius preserved in an *epigraph that the non-*Arian monks of *Alexandria called themselves μονάζοντες and μοναχοῖς (CIG IV, n. 8607 pl. XII; see de Jerphanion, La vraie teneur d'un texte de s. Athanase rétabli par l'epigraphie: l'Epistula ad monachos: RecSR 20 [1930] 529-544).

J. Leclercq, Études sur le vocabulaire monastique au moyen âge, Rome 1961 (SA 48); F.E. Morard, Monachos, moine: Histoire du terme grec jusqu'au IV^e siècle. Influence biblique et gnostique: FZPhTh 20 (1973) 332-411; Id., Monachos: une importation sémitique en Egypte?, SP, Berlin 1975 (TU 115), 242-246; E.A. Judge, The Earliest Use of Monachus for "Monk" (P. Coll. Youtie 77) and the Origins of Monasticism: JbAC 20 (1977) 72-89; A. Guillaumont, Aux origines du monachisme chrétien, Abbaye de Bellefontaines 1979.

M.G. Bianco

MONICA (331–387). The details about her life come from the writings of her son *Augustine, esp. the Confessions and the Cassiciacum Dialogues (the texts have been gathered in S. Agostino, Mia madre, ed. A. Trapè). She was born in 331 in Thagaste (now Souk Ahras) in *Africa, in the highlands of *Numidia. She was strictly raised in a devout *Catholic family. She married *Patricius, who was a *pagan and a member of the town council. She was twenty-three years old when Augustine was born; apparently he was the firstborn. She had at least another son, *Navigius, and a daughter whose name we do not know. She was a young, intelligent and strong-willed *woman, devout in the faith, and she prayed diligently—she was an exemplary Christian wife and mother. She was widowed around the age of forty after helping in her husband's *conversion; she was completely dedicated to the education of her *children and at the service of the "servants of God" (Confess. 9,9,22).

Her discrete hard work is worthy of particular admiration, a woman of few words and many prayers, for the conversion of her son Augustine, who became a fierce *Manichean after being a Catholic *catechumen. She followed him to *Carthage, *Rome and *Milan. She assisted him there through his interior struggles, conversion and *baptism. Soon after, they returned to Africa. At ancient Ostia, during a rest from their *journey, she was struck with a fever and died piously around October of 387. She was fifty-six years old. She was buried there acc. to her wishes, and her relics were transported to the church of St. Augustine in Rome, under Pope Martin V (9 April 1430), where they are venerated.

In addition to her many natural gifts, Monica also had mystical experiences (Confess. 6,1,1; 6,13,23). Particularly worthy of note is the *ecstasy at Ostia amply and magisterially described in the Confessions of her son (9,10,23-25).

BS 9, 548-558; DACL 11, 2232-2256; F.-H. Bougaud, Histoire de sainte Monique, Paris [12]1901; M.G. Dorè, Monica la mamma che salva, Brescia (n.d.); L.A. Delastre, Sainte Monique, Lyon 1960; A. Trapè, S. Agostino, Mia Madre, Rome [3]1983; G. Falbo, Vita di S. Monica, Rome 1980; I. Cacciavillani, Mamma fino a diventare santa. La vicenda umana di Monica alla ricerca del figlio Agostino, Padua 1986; M. Dulaey, Songe et prophétie dans les Confessions d'Augustin. Du rêve de Monique à la conversion au jardin de Milan: Augustinianum 29 (1989) 379-391; E. Lamirande, Quand Monique, la mère d'Augustin, prend la parole, in Signum pietatis, Fest. C.P. Meyer, Würzburg 1989, 3-19; R. Holte, Monica, "the Philosopher": Augustinus 39 (1994) 293-316; M. O'Rourke Boyle, Divine Domesticity, Augustine of Thagaste to Teresa of Avila, Leiden 1996, passim; F. Vattioni, Ancora l'etimologia di Monica: Augustinianum 36 (1996) 183-184; D.F. Wright, Monica's Baptism, Augustine's Deferred Baptism, and Patricius: Augustinian Studies 29 (1998) 1-17. For the epitaph of Anicio Auchenio Basso, see A. Casamassa, Rend. PARA 23 (1952–1954) 271-273 (reproduced in Scritti patristici: Lateranum [1955] 217-218); W. Wischmeyer, Zum Epitaph der Monica: Römische Quartalschrift für christliche Altertumskunde und für Kirchengeschichte 70 (1975) 32-41; F. Vattioni, L'etimologia di Monica: Augustinianum 22 (1982) 583-584. For the translation of the relics, see Bolla di Martino V in L. da Empoli, Bullarium Ordinis erem. S. Aug., Rome 1628, 258. For the discourse that the pope delivered on that occasion, see A. Casamassa, L'autore di un preteso discorso di Martino V, in Miscellanea Pio Paschini, Rome 1949, 109-125; PCBE 1, 758-762; G. Saginario, Monica mia madre, Rome 2005.

A. Trapè

MONOENERGISM – MONOTHELITISM. These teachings surface during the 6th and 7th c. in the context of attempts made in the East to reach a compromise between *monophysitism and *dyophysitism. Already at the beginning of the 7th c., during the reign of *Heraclius, the patriarch *Sergius of Constantinople (d. 638) confronted the christological issue by emphasizing the concept of energy (energeia) instead of nature—i.e., the energy and activity of Christ derived singularly from his person (hypostasis), rather than from his two natures. In this way, Sergius could speak of the one energy of Christ, without referring to only one nature, like the monophysites wanted. He started to cautiously popularize this teaching, gaining supporters from the Eastern episcopate and adherents from not only the *Chalcedonian dyophysites but also the monophysites. Cyrus, a *Melkite (Chalcedonian) patriarch from Alexandria, imposed the teaching in Egypt (633). Despite opposition from *Sophronius, patriarch of Jerusalem 634–638, and from a monk named *Maximus, who would later be called the Confessor, Sergius decided to reach an agreement with Rome and wrote to Pope *Honorius, praising all that he had accomplished in the East and asked if, in order to avoid a semantic argument, he might abolish the terms "one-energy" and "two-energies" and affirm that the Only-Begotten had worked (energein) in divine and human ways and that every energy, divine and human, derives inseparably from the one and the same incarnate Logos. Honorius approved of Sergius's advice to abolish the terms because it was enough to affirm that all of Christ's actions, divine and human, were the work of one single subject and for this reason only one will. In a synodical letter, Sophronius explained the concepts of energy and activity in terms of nature, rather than person, and affirmed that just as Christ has two natures so he must have two energies. He had little success after his edict (634/635), which ratified the prohibition of speaking of one or two energies of Christ. In 638, Heraclius circulated a response to Honorius's letter called the Ekthesis, a new edict inspired by Sergius, which set aside the terms of nature and energy and affirmed the perfect harmony of the human and divine will in Christ as one unique will, leaving the two natures unmixed in the unique person of the incarnate Logos. The desire to reach an agreement with the monophysites was frustrated by the Arab conquest of Syria and Egypt, the regions in which they were more numerous. Despite this and the opposition by Maximus—who insisted that if the two distinct wills in Christ, divine and human, are not affirmed, then the two distinct natures are also abolished—the Ekthesis was vigorously maintained also by the successors of Heraclius, until *Constans published the Typos (648) with which he prohibited the discussion of one or two operations and wills of Christ.

Rome had already taken a position of strict Chalcedonian observance in 640–641 with *John IV against monothelitism. When Constans published the Typos, *Martin I gathered a council of predominantly Italian bishops in the Lateran (649), which condemned both monothelitism and the Typos. Constans reacted fiercely and arrested Martin when the opportunity presented itself. Martin was transported to *Constantinople, put on trial, mistreated and exiled to Crimea (653–655). Even Maximus was tortured and exiled (662). Given the political situation determined by the Arab invasion, the clash seemed to have lost its raison d'être, but it continued for many years, until Constantine IV reconciled with Rome following the Third Council of Constantinople (680–681), which condemned monoenergism and monothelitism, together with a good number of their supporters, living and dead, and grasped that two wills and two energies inseparably exist in Christ.

DTC 10, 2307-2323; Fliche-Martin V, 169-184, 193-197, 228-248; M. Doucet, Est-ce que le monothélisme a fait autant d'illustres victimes? Réflexions sur un ouvrage de F.-M. Léthel: Science et esprit 35 (1983) 53-83; M. Simonetti, La controversia cristologica nel VI e VII secolo, in Martino I papa (649–655) e il suo tempo, Spoleto 1992, 85-102; Fr. Winkelmann, Monoenergetisch-monotheletischer Streit: TRE 23 (1994) 205-209 (bibl.)

M. Simonetti

MONOGRAM. A particular character resulting from the conjunction and partial interweaving of letters in one or more words. It is not, however, a link or abbreviation, summarizing their characteristics. Monograms occur in different settings, esp. Christian inscriptions relating to funeral, votive and liturgical accoutrements (capitals, dosserets, plutei) and often in *rings and *seals. Other than the many forms of monograms with the name of Christ (see *epigraphy, Christian), noted examples tend to refer to more masculine anthroponyms (feminine anthroponyms appear more frequently on jewelry) and, in minor cases, acclamations (in pace and the like).

Simpler but less common monograms include examples where the word's initial letter surrounds or is surrrounded by the other letters reduced in size. The more popular monograms are based on the interlacing of letters, exploiting common elements, like vertical or horizontal strokes, so that one element can be read many times and in different ways. From this it can be seen that since no definite rules are followed in formulating monograms, examining and interpreting them can prove difficult, with a variety of dubious and equivocal results. One should bear in mind the case of the Roman slab from the cemetery of Priscilla, now in the Vatican Museum (Zilliacus, SyllInscrChristVetMusVat, 107) where the monogram can be resolved in any one of thirty different ways. Or the monogram engraved on the threshold of the four-sided portico of the Memoria Apostolorum in Rome (ICUR V, 13277), which can be differently read Constantinus, Constans or Constantius. (The second option seems preferable to me.)

The quadrate or square monogram, defined by the regularity of its composing elements, is already noted in the classical period, but it finds wider use from the 4th to the 5th c. Besides the numerous examples on graveyard stones and Roman basilicas (see the famous monogram of John II on the plutei of the in schola cantorum of St. Clement, ca. 533–535), one thinks of the monograms of Bishop Frugiferus in St. Justus in Trieste (5th c.), of Neon in St. Vitale in Ravenna (5th c.), of Bishop Euphrasius in Parenzium (6th c.), of Elias and of the donor Ioannes in St. Euphemia in Grado (6th c.). There is no lack of monograms in the East—esp. in Greece, Syria and Palestine.

H. Leclercq: DACL XI, 2369-2391; E. Josi: EC VIII, 1307-1308; F. Grossi Gondi, Trattato di epigrafia cristiana latina e greca del mondo romano occidentale, Rome 1920, 60; P. Testini, Archeologia cristiana, Rome 1958 (Bari [2]1980), 352-354; P. Bruun, Symboles, signes et monogrammes, in SyllInscrChristVetMusVat, 2, Helsinki 1963, 126-129 and 156-166; V. Laurent, Le corpus des sceaux del'Empire byzantin,V, Paris 1963–1972; V. Gardthausen, Das alte Monogramm,Wiesbaden 1966; J.E. Hartmann, Greek Numismatic Epigraphy, Cambridge 1969; F. Manns, Les sceaux byzantins du Musée de la Flagellation: SBF 26 (1976) 213-271; A. Ferrua, La polemica antiariana nei monumenti paleocristiani, Vatican City 1991, 37-50, 61-62; E. Dinkler von Schubert, ΣΤΑΥΡΟΣ Vom "Wort vom Kreuz" (1 Kor. 1,18) zum Kreuz-Symbol, in C. Moss - K. Kiefer (eds.), Byzantine East, Latin West. Art-Historical Studies in Honor of Kurt Weitzmann, Princeton, NJ 1995, 29-39; D. Mazzoleni, Origine e cronologia dei monogrammi riflessi nelle iscrizioni dei Musei Vaticani, in I. Di Stefano Manzella (ed.), Le iscrizioni dei cristiani in Vaticano (Inscriptiones Sanctae Sedis 2), Vatican City 1997, 165-171; D. Mazzoleni, La produzione epigrafica nelle catacombe romane, in V. Fiocchi Nicolai - F. Bisconti - D. Mazzoleni, Le catacombe cristiane di Roma, Regensburg 1998, 159; C. Carletti, Un monogramma tardoantico nell'epigrafia funeraria dei cristiani, in "Domum Tuam Dilexi." Miscellanea in onore di A. Nestori, Vatican City 1998, 127-142; D. Mazzoleni, Monogramma (s.v.): TIP, 220-223.

D. Mazzoleni

MONOGRAMMA CHRISTI, De. This work is a brief description of the monogram of Christ in its Greek form. Three interwoven letters must be drawn out: X′ (600) + I′ (10) + S′ (6) = 616. The author, in fact, declares that there is a numerical design in this figure, from which the name of Christ can be derived (Redactus autem in monogramma, id est, quasi in unam litteram, et notam et nomem et numerum facit hoc signo). Morin, the editor of the little pamphlet (Anecd. Mareds., 194), attributes the interpretation to *Jerome, even if what is written cannot hide a certain kabbalistic tendency (Hieronymi de monogramm., 229). Haussleiter denies this reading (124, note 4) and also rejects the dating of the pamphlet as contemporary with Jerome. Incipit: Hic est sapientia et intellectus . . .

CPL 637; CPPM 2, 940; PLS 2, 287-291; G. Haussleiter, CSEL 49, 124; G. Morin, Anecdota Maredsolana II, 3 (1903) 194-198; Id., Hieronymi de monogrammate: RBen 20 (1903) 225-232; Id., Études, Textes, Découvertes, Paris 1931, 20ff.; EC 4, 1427; H.I. Marrou, Autour du monogramme constantinien, in Mélanges E. Gilson, Toronto-Paris 1959, 411ff.

L. Dattrino

MONOIMUS, gnostic. An Arab who lived in the 2nd c. (ca. 150–ca. 210) whose name is perhaps a Hellenized form of the Semitic Menahem. Monoimus is mentioned by *Theodoret in the Haereticarum Fabularum Compendium (I, 18,) and in the Philosophumena (VIII, 5-8) as a follower of *Tatian the Assyrian. In a letter to Theophrastus recorded by *Hippolytus, he wrote that you should not seek God in creation but in yourself—since human beings are a microcosm of the universe—in your mind, in your understanding, in your soul and body, and, by beginning with yourself, you find the way out of yourself. The *Stoic language used by Monoimus is evident in the letter, esp. in his recollection of the doctrine of oikeiōsis ("appropriating, familiarizing yourself with something"), where he affirms that God "absolutely appropriates unto himself everything that is within you." Monoimus, whose cosmological conceptions appear to be Pythagorean, introduced the use of the term monad into a *gnostic context: the world began with the Monad or Iota, from which emerged the Dyad, the Triad etc. all the way up to the Decad—stages already constituted within the Monad, which is absolutely simple and infinitely unfolding itself and identified by Monoimus, on the one hand, as the gnostic aeons and, on the other hand, as the phases of creation in Genesis. The plagues of Egypt are interpreted *allegorically as symbols of material creation, but they are not seen as evil: "The whole world and all the causes of creation constitute a Passover, i.e., a feast of the Lord, since the Lord rejoices in the conversion of creation" (Ref. VIII, 7). Each element—as in the Pythagorean-*Platonic tradition, acc. to Monoimus—is associated with a geometric figure, each of which originates from a number derived from the Monad. There is an overlap between the Greek tenfold schema—to which Monoimus also connects the ten *Aristotelian categories—and the Hebrew sevenfold schema. *Hippolytus's report seems to correspond to two versions of the gnostic text found in the *Nag Hammadi Library called the Epistle of Eugnostos, where the same sequence of Monads to Decads is described. The Eugnostos shares an affinity with another gnostic text, the Sophia of Jesus Christ, where the Monad also shows up. Monoimus makes many references to the NT, like Colossians and an allusion to the Prologue in John's gospel, where Monoimus reflects upon the creation of the Son-Logos. His use of the expression "man" and "Son of Man," also found in the gospels, could suggest a link with the Naassenes (see *Ophites – Naassenes). In fact, Monoimus describes the first principle as both Father and Mother, and his phrase "Father and Mother, the two immortal names," seems to be taken from a Naassene hymn. A possible common ancestor for this terminology is in the Apophasis Megale of *Simon Magus. For Monoimus, even the six powers responsible for creation resemble the six "roots" of Simon. Moreover, the contrast that Monoimus makes between the "Son of Man" and those "born of woman" is found also in the ps.-*Clementine Homilies, II, 17.

Dictionary of Gnosis and Western Esotericism, ed. W.J. Hanegraaff, in collaboration with A. Faivre, R. van den Broek, J.P. Brach, Leiden 2005, 2800-2801.

I. Ramelli

MONOPHYSITISM – MONOPHYSITES. From μόνος meaning "only one," and φύσις meaning "nature." The word refers to those who affirm only one nature in Christ, instead of two (human and divine) as sanctioned by the *Chalcedonian Council (451). Although the term was coined very late, it is vague because the affirmation that Christ has only one nature has been explained in ways both compatible and incompatible with orthodoxy. Toward the end of the 4th c., the first monophysites were *Apollinaris of Laodicea and his disciples. They claimed that Christ has only one nature—in the sense of material nature as the source of activity—and that the humanity assumed by the divine Logos would have lacked a soul (or nous, the seat of rationality). This claim was made in order to reaffrim the unity of Christ that was put in question by some anti-Arian polemicists (mostly in an Antiochene context) who excessively stressed the distinction between Christ's human and divine natures. The teaching of Apollinaris was condemned by Catholics, but its form, "the One Incarnate Nature of God the Logos," was passed on through his disciples to *Athanasius and was adopted by *Cyril in the controversy with *Nestorius and constituted the basis of the famous 12 anathemas. He used nature (physis) to refer to a concretely subsistent individual (hypostasis, persona) and explained the formula in a way that if one could imagine the two natures of Christ (human and divine) before the union, then one could imagine only one subsistent nature resulting from the union—in other words, only one hypostasis, the Logos. This allowed him to attribute all of the human characteristics as united to, but not intermingled with, the divine characteristics, so as to affirm Christ as fully human and fully God in one single subject, the divine Logos.

The teaching was based on the Cyrillian formulation but apparently not explained with the precision of Cyril, and it spread throughout *Constantinople in 445 by the elderly and influential monk *Eutyches. Without naming names, this teaching was already refuted by *Theodoret of Cyrrhus in his Eranistes (447), as rendering the humanity of Christ useless—an accusation directed at Eutyches in 448 by *Eusebius of Dorylaeum. On 22 November, Eutyches was brought before a small council of bishops in Constantinople, with the local bishop *Flavian presiding. Eutyches denied the *docetism of Apollinaris and Valentinus, which diminished the humanity of Christ, but he affirmed that Christ is not homoousios ("consubstantial") with us and that the two natures before the union resulted in only one nature after the union. Eutyches's thinking was more confused than erroneous, but the council condemned him because he, like Apollinaris and *Valentinus, denied the real humanity of Christ. The condemnation elicited violent reactions in Cyrillian contexts, where they saw it as a condemnation of the monophysite *Christology of their teacher. The reaction eventually brought about the Council of *Ephesus (449) launched by *Dioscorus of Alexandria and backed by the emperor *Theodosius II, which rehabilitated Eutyches and condemned his adversaries, Flavian and Theodoret. Dioscorus used the same formulation as Cyril, "the One Incarnate Nature of God the Logos," so as not to diminish the reality of the humanity of Christ and his consubstantiality with us. But his language became incomprehensible to the Eastern *dyophysites (Antiochene) and to the West (*Leo the Great), and the violence which he had used against his rivals had created a very bad reputation. The sudden death of Theodosius, followed by *Marcian and *Pulcheria coming to power, allowed them to support the dyophysite counterreaction: the Council of Chalcedon (451) condemned Dioscorus and sanctioned the formulation which said that in Christ the human nature and the divine nature coexist, without intermingling or change, united in one hypostasis (of the Logos). This formulation is based on a different conception of nature than that of Cyril. The two natures of Christ are concrete and individual, but are considered in themselves, abstracting from the subject in which they are grounded—which is solely that of the Logos.

Chalcedon represented a compromise between Antiochene dyophysitism and Alexandrian monophysitism, but it did not satisfy in any way the monophysites, who reacted strongly to the council's decisions. In fact, they were predominantly in *Egypt, but numerous in Syria, and throughout many regions in the East. The basis of their opposition, often launched by ignorant and intolerant monks with the deepest sense of popular piety, was to provoke religious figures to become hostile toward oppressive political powers and to promote the revival of the native Syrian and Coptic element in opposition to the Greek cultural hegemony. In Egypt, their resistance was unstoppable. In 457, the Catholic bishop *Proterius was murdered in Alexandria by a ferocious mob, and he was replaced by a monophysite named *Timothy Aelurus, who occupied the episcopal seat twice, although his reign was interrupted by a long exile, and he was succeeded by another monophysite named *Peter Mongus (477). The monophysites made their presence known elsewhere, even in the center of dyophysite Christology (Antioch), and they managed to impose their will with the help of *Peter the Fuller, who inserted the expression "you were crucified for us" into the Trisagion hymn which has a clear monophysite meaning (ca. 485).

The emperor could not ignore these conflicts, as they provoked public upheaval and weakened the unity of the empire. After an initial overture to the monophysites by the usurper *Basiliscus (475), whose Enkyklion condemned Chalcedon and Leo the Great's Tomus ad Flavianum*, Zeno published the Henoticon (482) with the blessing of Patriarch *Acacius of Constantinople, which required the signatures of all the bishops: this clever compromise formulation reaffirmed the validity of the Nicene symbol—confirmed at Constantinople (381), Ephesus (431) and in the 12 anathemas of Cyril—much to the chagrin of the Antiochenes. Avoiding the term nature, it affirmed that Christ is consubstantial with the Father acc. to his divinity and to us acc. to his humanity, stressing Christ's integrity and reality. It also condemned Nestorius and Eutyches, and even those who defended the authority of Chalcedon. The Christology put forward by the document was orthodox, and it took into account the fact that many monophysites did not share the radical positions of Eutyches and that their target had become the Council of Chalcedon. The Henoticon was signed by many bishops in the East, from Peter Mongus in Alexandria, to Peter the Fuller in Antioch, and *Martyrius in Jerusalem. But it was opposed by all the dyophysites because they would not renounce the decisions of Chalcedon. It was condemned for the same reason in Rome by *Felix III (484), marking the beginning of the *Acacian schism. It was also opposed by radical monophysites in Egypt affiliated with Peter Mongus, who were called the *acephali, meaning "without a head or leader," which would later be used to define, like the Eutychians, the monophysites in general. The politics of Zeno continued with *Anastasius (491), despite the resistance of the dyophysites, who were strong in Constantinople and in Asia Minor, as well as in the W regions of the empire and were supported by Rome. Precisely for their sympathies toward Chalcedon the bishops of Constantinople *Euphemius (496) and *Macedonius (511) were deposed. The monophysites reinforced their positions during the failed attempts to reconcile with Rome in the time of *Gelasius (ca. 495) and *Hormisdas (515). Uncontested in Egypt, they conquered many areas in Syria and Palestine due to the activity of *Philoxenus of Mabbug, a Syrian who did not know Greek, and *Severus, who was the most important monophysite theorist and polemicist. During his time in Constantinople (508–511), Severus popularized monophysite ideas, and he was eventually elected as bishop of *Antioch in 512, while *Elias of Jerusalem was deposed for having refused him Communion. Upon the death of Anastasius (518), the religious situation remained unsettled despite the apparent harmony posed by the Henoticon: Egypt was monophysite, and in Syria the monophysites were prevalent, though the Chalcedonians still remained vital there, while remaining dominant in the other regions of the empire.

In the 2nd half of the 5th c., monophysitism not only spread but also evolved doctrinally, with the result of splitting into different branches, which, for our purposes, we will identify as two main groups: real monophysitism and verbal monophysitism. Real monophysitism believed that the union of Christ's two natures into one was accomplished through a change in the component parts. Some of them believed that the body of Christ was only apparent or from heaven, others believed that his body was absorbed by divinity like a drop of honey in the sea, others thought that the divinity of the Logos was annulled in the humanity of Christ, still others thought that humanity and divinity were mixed together to form one composite made up of a human part and a divine part. All these forms of real monophysitism have been labeled as Eutychian because Eutyches, more in caricature than in reality, was considered as the one who claimed that the human nature was altered in the union. For the same reason, Eutyches was condemned by representatives of verbal monophysitism, also called Severian because its most important exponent was Severus (others were Timothy Aelurus and Philoxenus of Mabbug). In fact, the Severians were technically monophysite insofar as they used the Cyrillian slogan "the One Incarnate Nature of God the Logos" to indicate that the nature of Christ that results from the union is one concrete and individual subsistent nature, in other words, one hypostasis (persona). But on the other hand, these verbal monophysites believed that in this nature (hypostasis), all the human and divine properties continued to subsist, inseparably, but also without intermingling and alteration, so that Christ was fully human and fully God in one unique subject, in this way consubstantial with the Father as God, and with us as human. Fixed upon the exclusive meaning they attributed to nature, they believed that Christ had derived from two natures, but that he did not subsist in two natures, as the Chalcedonian expression has it, because they considered this affirmation as equivalent to that of two persons or hypostases, and thus Nestorian. For this reason, they rejected the Council of Chalcedon and Leo's Tome. Within this form of monophysitism were the so-called *aphthartodocetae, followers of *Julian of Halicarnassus in his dispute with Severus, who distinguished themselves with the belief that the body of Christ was impassible and immortal by nature and had suffered only by the will of the Savior. Then on the basis of an equivalence between nature and hypostasis, *John Philoponus claimed that in the Trinity, we must distinguish three natures as we distinguish three hypostases. This idea, however, was purely nominal tritheism since Philoponus also claimed that the Trinity is constituted of only one God. Other minor distinctions among the Severians do not need mentioning here.

With *Justin coming to power (518) and then his nephew *Justinian (527), imperial politics radically changed. The political conflict that arose with the Henoticon had benefited only the monophysites without securing the religious peace. The realization of this fact encouraged Justin, an Illyrian and thus a Chalcedonian, to reestablish the Chalcedonian faith everywhere and to reach an agreement with Rome to put an end to the Acacian schism; this was why he submitted to the grave conditions imposed by Pope *Hormisdas (519). Only in Egypt were the monophysites too strong to be disturbed, and Severus and Julian of Halicarnassus, among others forced to abandon their sees, found refuge there. But Justinian was convinced that it was possible to reach an agreement with the monophysites, even more so now that he thought it indispensable to perfect, in the anti-Nestorian sense, the Chalcedonian faith. In this line of thought, he and other theologians (like *Leontius of Jerusalem) spread the teaching that modern scholars call Neochalcedonianism, which integrated Chalcedonian doctrine with the 12 anathemas of Cyril, while the christological formula unus de Trinitate crucifixus was imposed and taught for some years with little success by Scythian monks. The failure of a conference held in Constantinople in 533 between monophysites and Chalcedonians did not alter the emperor's orientation, who went so far as to get the *acoemetic monks condemned as Nestorians (534) and brought Severus to Constantinople (535). Inevitably in 536, under pressure by Pope *Agapetus, Justinian was forced to take radical measures against the monophysites by sending their leaders into exile. Even in Alexandria a Chalcedonian bishop was put in place, *Paul of Canopus, who was ferocious against his adversaries (537). But the attempt to fence monophysitism out of the episcopate was in part frustrated by the bishop of *Edessa *Jacob Baradeus, who, escaping from public authorities, traveled all over the Eastern regions, consecrating a group of monophysite bishops to compete with the Catholic episcopate. From his name the monophysites were called *Jacobites, while the Chalcedonians were called Melkites, meaning imperialists. Another attempt made by Justinian toward the monophysites brought about the *Three Chapters controversy (Council of Constantinople 533), which was the postmortem condemnation of *Theodore of Mopsuestia, *Theodoret of Cyrrhus and *Ibas of Edessa, who were all hated by the monophysites because they had inspired and supported *Nestorius. Another serious crisis erupted with the death of the emperor (565), and religious peace became only a vague mirage.

*Justin II, the nephew and successor of Justinian, returned to the political project of openness toward the monophysites and published a first (567) and a second (571) Henoticon, in which he made large concessions, without explicitly rejecting the dyophysite teaching of Chalcedon. But a conference of monophysite leaders held in Callinicum in 567 refused to sign the first Henoticon, and an attempt to forcefully impose the second ended with inconclusive results. Tiberius (576–582) and Maurice (582–602) maintained a very moderate attitude toward the monophysites, leaving things more or less as they were, with the result that they, though suffering from profound schisms and internal rivalry, were preserved and promoted. In 616, under *Heraclius, there was reconciliation between the monophysite churches in Egypt with those in Syria.

When this reconciliation occurred, the Persian invasion was already underway. Before being driven out by Heraclius they ruled over Syria for eighteen years (611–629) and over Egypt for eleven years (618–629). The Persian administration left the Christians in peace with all their diverse confessions while supporting the monophysites because they were rightly considered as being hostile toward the emperor. So when Heraclius reconquered those areas he found that monophysitism was as strong as ever. He offered once again to compromise with them, publishing the Ekthesis (638) at the suggestion of and with assistance from Patriarch *Sergius of Constantinople, which declared that in Christ there is one will, two distinct natures in the unique person of the incarnate Logos (see *monoenergism – monothelitism). But when the document was published, the Arab invasion was already underway in Syria and Egypt and both ended in 639. The Arabs took advantage of the state of disorder and internal discord caused by the religious controversies which had radically weakened the loyalty of the monophysite population. Cases of real and utter betrayal were not lacking, esp. in Egypt, where there were those who considered it better to be ruled by the invaders rather than the emperor. The Arabs were fundamentally tolerant of Christians, so that the monophysites could live in peace, destined for a long life, even if it was difficult and grim. But those monophysites amid the regions under the emperor existed in small numbers, and once they were separated from the strength of the movement, they quickly lost their vitality.

DTC 5, 1582-1609 (s.v. Eutychès); 10, 2216-2251 (Monophysisme); J. Lebon, La christologie du monophysisme syrien: CGG 1, 425-580; II, 95ff. (in the CGG there are other articles that refer to monophysitism); W. DeVries, Primat und Communio bei den syrischen Monophysiten, Rome 1940; E. Honigmann, Évêques et évêchés monophysites, Louvain 1951; W.H.C. Frend, The Rise of the Monophysite Movement, Cambridge 1972 (bibl.); L. Perrone, La chiesa di Palestina e le controversie cristologiche, Brescia 1980 (bibl.); P. Allen, Monophysiten: TRE 23 (1994) 219-233 (bibl.).

M. Simonetti

MONOTHEISM. As opposed to polytheism, monotheism affirms only one God to the exclusion of every other, a teaching that one finds in Judaism, while henotheism admits belief in one God as well, but reconciles this belief with the existence of other deities of lower rank, as found in a variety of classical pagan philosophies. The fundamental categories for the study of monotheism and henotheism in classic Antiquity, both Jewish and Christian, were already defined by scholars like A. De Broglie (Monothéisme, hénothéisme, polythéisme, Paris 1910), the historian of religions R. Pettazzoni (e.g., Mitologia e monoteismo., Rome 1951) and E. Peterson (Eis Theos: epigraphische, formgeschichtliche und religionsgeschichtliche Untersuchungen, Göttingen 1926; Id., Der Monotheismus. als politisches Problem, Leipzig 1935). More recently, a theoretical treatment of these concepts has been offered by B. Gladigow (Polytheismus und Monotheismus., in M. Krebernik - J. van Oorschot [eds.], Polytheismus und Monotheismus in den Religionen des Vorderen Orients, Münster 2002, 3-20).

Faced with pagan polytheistic religion, as expressed in its myths and sacred rites, Greek philosophy began very early with Xenophanes to speak of theos in the singular in order to offer a critique of Greek mythological religion (A. Lefka, The Xenophanean Religious Thought: Kernos 2 [1989] 89-96); later, with *Aristotle, Met. A5, 986b24-25, it began to identify God, ὁ θεός, with the One, τὸ ἕν, although Xenophanes seems to also include contemporary as well as traditional gods, as pointed out, seeing it perhaps anachronistically as a contradiction (see H. Versnel, Thrice One: Three Greek Experiments in Oneness, in B. Nevling Porter [ed.], One God or Many, Casco Bay, ME 2000, 79-164, 98-106). There is an affinity then with henotheistic thought, which was expressed particularly in *Platonic or *Stoic philosophy, where a divinity imposes itself as summus deus and the others are often considered allegorically as merely partial manifestations (see I. Ramelli, Allegoria, I, Milan 2004): this is verified in the development of paganism, whether in Platonic transcendentalism or in Stoic immanentism, albeit in diverse ways, as, e.g., in Hinduism. Despite the profound differences between Platonic metaphysics and the Stoic refusal of transcendence, the affinity also suggests, from the perspective of monotheism and providence, that the Stoic teachings regarding God and pronoia are rooted in Plato, particularly in Timaeus, rather than in Aristotelian concepts—so hypothesizes D. Sedley, The Origins of Stoic God, in Traditions of Theology, ed. D. Frede - A. Laks, Leiden 2002, 41-84: more specifically, 41-42, 65, 80-81, following the work of H.J. Krämer).

Given that pagan thought never reached the doctrine of creation out of nothing, it remained fundamentally alien to monotheism in the strict sense, since its concept of the divine (θεῖον, which absorbs the personal θεός as one of its manifestations) is structurally more open to pluralism, even when at its peak it put forward a supreme divinity. According to Acts 17:16-34, St. Paul was the first Christian to reconcile philosophical theology in Athens—not without citing the Stoics—by preaching the Christian God as the agnostos theos. Although this seems to be a god among gods, Paul proclaimed him as unique and the Creator (K. Sandnes, Paul and Socrates: The Aim of Paul's Areopagos Speech: JSNT 50 [1993] 13-26; R. Penna, Paolo nell'Agorà e all'Areopago di Atene: Rassegna di Teol. 36 [1995] 653-677; F. Brenk, Mixed Monotheism? The Areopagos Speech of Paul, in Le monothéisme: diversité, exclusivisme ou dialogue?, ed. C. Guittard, Paris 2006). This was a difficult dialogue in Athens, in the middle of the 1st c., that was interrupted with the proclamation of the resurrection, since it not only reconciled the unique Christian God with the summus deus of philosophers—which Philo had already done for Judaism, which Sterling suggests is an influence of Philo on Paul's theology (G. Sterling, Hellenistic Philosophy and the NT, in S.E. Porter (ed.), Handbook to Exegesis of the NT, Leiden 1997, 313-358; 330-334)—but it also proclaimed the resurrection and divinity of Christ, even if Paul does not directly identify him with God in this instance, which indeed complicated the discourse.

However, engagement with Greek philosophy continued with apologetics, where we find monotheism decisively affirmed, alongside the more inclusive henotheism of pagan philosophy. The terms ἑνότης and ἕνωσις are already used in the Apostolic Fathers, esp. in *Ignatius of Antioch, as expressions of monotheism, together with the verb ἑνοῦν, and are found in the *apologists, particularly in *Athenagoras, to indicate the inseparability of the three beings that form the unique divine nature (*Suppl.*12). And in polemics with the pagans, *Tertullian repeatedly insists in the Apologeticum upon the absolute uniqueness of God, which excludes every other divinity, even inferior ones (17,1; 18,2; 23,11; 24,1), as does *Minucius Felix, *Oct.*10,3, who defines the Christian God as "unique and solitary." At the same time, in pagan writings, esp. in *Middle Platonism, where the Ideas of Plato tend to be conceived as Ideas of God, there develops a major emphasis upon henotheism: like Apuleius, De Plat. I, 5, attributing the doctrine of the uniqueness of God to Plato, or at least the doctrine of the supremacy of God that reigns over every other inferior divinity; in Plutarch the One supreme God (εἶ ἕν, De E, 393AB) is reconciled with the lesser deities, following the guidance of his teacher Ammonius, who saw God as the One, Creator, perfect Good and Beautiful—and then Eudorius identified the One or εἷς with the Supreme God, ὁ ὑπεράνω θεός (ap. Simpl. Phys. 181, 7-30 Diels): v. H. Dörrie - M. Baltes, Der Platonismus in der Antike, IV, Stuttgart-Bad Cannstatt 1996, 209-213; 473-477.

A particular literary development of henotheism during the Aurelian and Constantinian age is the solar theology and panegyrics. For example, in Firmicus Maternus, the Sun optimus maximus that closes the first book of Mathesis is the summus deus, superior to other gods (I, 10,14); also this supreme god is unnamable (V pr. 3), acc. to a Middle and *Neoplatonic tradition that has more or less introduced an apophaticism. Similar conceptions of the summus deus superior to all others is expressed in the pagan panegyrics to *Constantine (e.g., IX, 26; X,7), providing a relative reconciliation between henotheism and Christianity vague enough that even the Christian side was tempted, in particular by *Lactantius, though in a rather superficial way from a theological point of view. Especially in *Late Antiquity, with Neoplatonism and its developments—if the notion of the divine, strictly associated with the Good already linked by Plato, is enriched by the introduction of infinity, finally understood in a positive sense—pagan thought was tinted with a henotheistic religiosity (Pagan Monotheism in Late Antiquity, ed. P. Athanassiadi - M. Frede, Oxford 1999, in particular M. West, Towards Monotheism, 21-41, and the discussion of T.D. Barnes, Monotheists All?: Phoenix 55 [2001] 142-62). See also M. Frede, Monotheism and Pagan Philosophy in Later Antiquity, 41-68: 41-44, who substantially attributes monotheism to all ancient philosophies except Epicureanism.

Some scholars, like H. Dörrie, have spoken of two antithetical religions, Christian and Neoplatonic; and other scholars, like G. Stroumsa (Fin du sacrifice. Les mutations religieuses de l'Antiquité tardive, Paris 2005), have directly called into question whether in Late Antiquity, in the comparison between pagans and Christians, it is truly correct to oppose polytheism and monotheism. In fact, it is essential to recall the category of henotheism. In particular, Neoplatonic henotheism increasingly emphasized the absolute transcendence of the One, and at the same time structured the divine progressively into ever more complex hierarchies, as in Proclus (see I. Ramelli, Proclo, in Enciclopedia Filosofica, ed. V. Melchiorre, Milan [2]2006), often organized in triads that were rooted in the divine triad of the Middle Platonic Pythagorean Numenius. (For the hierarchy of the first and second gods in the Middle Platonism of the 2nd and 3rd c. AD, see Dörrie - Baltes, Platonismus, III, 1993, 92-93, 335-336). Frede, in the above-mentioned Monotheism and Pagan Philosophy, sees no contradiction in the Platonic triads with respect to monotheism, since they could be considered a composite hypostasis of the one God.

In fact, it is not primarily from the pagan world that Christianity derived its absolute monotheism, but rather from the Hebrew biblical tradition, where—after the emergence of Yahweh from Elohim (J. de Moor, The Rise of Yahwism: The Roots of Israelite Monotheism, Leuven 1990; [2]1997)—the Mosaic commandments begin precisely with the uniqueness of God to the exclusion of all other deities, as is repeated in the shema, the synthesis of Jewish theology: Adonai Elohenu, Adonai Echad, "the Lord our God, the Lord is One." This monotheism arrived after that which many scholars appropriately call monolatry, which does not deny the existence of gods among other peoples, but reserves worship for their God only: to such exclusive worship is added the belief that their God was the Creator of the heavens and earth and was the greatest and most powerful, the sovereign God (H. Ringgren, Israelite Religion, Philadelphia 1966, 67 and 99). Philo reconciled Jewish monotheism with Platonic thought in a synthesis that patristic philosophy had yet to carry out, which was quite demanding—esp. regarding creation—and basically defined Jewish monotheism with the concept of monarchy, whereby "monarchy" in Philo normally indicates monotheism, a vocabulary passed on to Christian apologists like *Justin (Dial. Tryph. I, 3), *Tatian (Or. ad Gr. 14,1.29) and *Theophilus (Ad Aut. II, 4.28); indeed, Justin and *Irenaeus wrote tracts On the Monarchy.

Some developments of Jewish religious thought, such as the kabbalah, however, contain elements of tension in respect to a strict monotheism, like the Sephirot, in which God's hiddenness is manifested acc. to the 13th-c. Zohar, and by virtue of which all things exist: the first of them is the Nothing or Abyss, from which Wisdom and Intellect flow. Although, rabbis like Azriel of Gerona, in the same period, or Moshe Chaim Luzzatto in the 18th c. feel the necessity to attempt to reconcile the doctrine of the Sephirot with Jewish monotheism. Another difficulty in respect to absolute monotheism appears in the 13th c. with ps.-Hai, who instituted a triad inside the same hidden kabbalistic divinity, but not without a Christian trinitarian influence (Wainwright, § 7.1).

Returning to the decisive monotheism of the Jewish era, and particularly to that of the 1st c. AD (see L. Hurtado, First-Century Jewish Monotheism: JSNT 71 [1998] 3-26): In order to maintain Jewish monotheism, Christianity (see, Id., One God, One Lord, Edinburgh 1998; The Jewish Roots of Christological Monotheism, ed. C. Newman, Leiden 1999), while acknowledging the divinity of the Messiah, as well as that of the *Holy Spirit, had to confront the huge dogmatic trinitarian and christological problems, leading to the definition of God as one nature in three Persons, and Christ as one Person with two natures, divine and human. Thus, heresies like *monarchianism and *Arianism can be considered as fundamentally inspired by the desire to preserve an absolute monotheism like one finds in Judaism (see R. Lorenz, Arius judaizans?, Göttingen 1979). In fact, Arius felt the primary necessity was to preserve the absolute unity and transcendence of God, as found in Ep. 2,1,3. The oneness of God was, in his view, threatened by the emergence of the figure of the Son, and, like the monarchians, he wanted to restore it to its absoluteness. However, unlike them, Arius felt the affirmation of the real distinction of three divine ὑποστάσεις in Origenistic-Alexandrian theology kept him from embracing a modalist solution, which considered the Son as a modality of manifesting the Father. He had only then to exclude the Son from the realm of divinity, in order to maintain a complete unity in God. In this way, the slight *subordinationism of *Origen (but it seems like Origen was the first to use ὁμοούσιος in reference to the Son) reached a much greater depth. The Arians could not acknowledge a generation of the Son from the substance of the Father, since this would have introduced a schism into the divine substance, which must remain absolutely simple and one; therefore, the Son is not begotten, but—not without an allusion to Plato's Phaedrus, 245C—created (γενητόν) by the Father ἀγένητον. Using the Middle Platonic notion, Arius affirmed the preexistence and absolute supremacy of the simple divine Monad in respect to the creaturely Dyad (the Son), as seen in frag. 2 of the Thalia: "The Monad has always existed, while the Dyad did not exist before coming into existence."

Neo-Arians like Aetius and *Eunomius were disposed to acknowledge with the *Nicenes that the Son was begotten (γεννητόν), but they also thought that if one wishes to preserve the absolute unity of God, one must acknowledge that God, unbegotten, cannot share the same substance of the begotten Son. It is a different position from that of Arius and characterized by *anomoianism (a difference of nature between Father and Son, which results in ἀνόμοιοι), but always motivated by the desire to preserve monotheism, conceived by Arians and neo-Arians in a very rigid way (see R.P. Vaggione, Eunomius, Oxford 2003). In this polemic against neo-Arianism and esp. Eunomius, the Cappadocians adopted a better definition of the trinitarian doctrine that safeguarded monotheism, while acknowledging the divinity of the Son and the Holy Spirit: *Gregory of Nyssa explained the orthodox trinitarian doctrine, in Ad Graecos de communibus notionibus and in Ad Ablabium quod non sint tres dii (tr. and comm. G. Maspero, La Trinità e l'uomo, Rome 2004), officially proclaimed by *Gregory of Nazianzus at the Council of *Constantinople in 381: to acknowledge the three divine Persons does not mean acknowledging three gods, since God is one in substance, in divinity, in power and will, while he is triune in the Persons or hypostases (see L. Turcescu, Prosopon and Hypostasis in Basil of Caesarea's Against Eunomius and the Epistles: VChr 51 [1997] 374-395). Thus Gregory concludes his treatise Ad Ablabium quod non sint tres dii : "Since the idea of cause differentiates the Hypostases of the Holy Trinity, acknowledging with reverence the distinction between existing without a cause and being caused, and since . . . the divine nature is immutable and indivisible, we rightly proclaim the Godhead alone to be one and God alone to be one along with all other names that could be ascribed to God" (see L. Ayres, Not Three People: Modern Theology 18 [2002] 445-474).

Ancient philosophy: C. Moreschini, Monoteismo cristiano e m. platonico nella cultura latina di età imperiale, in Platonismus und Christentum. Festschrift H. Dörrie, Münster 1980, 131-160; F. Downing, Ethical Pagan Theism and the Speeches in Acts: NTS 27 (1981) 544-563; L. Napolitano, Eudoro di Alessandria: monismo, dualismo, assiologia dei principî: MusPat 3 (1985) 289-312; W. Wainwright, Monotheism, in Rationality, Religious Belief, and Moral Commitment, ed. R. Audi - W. Wainwright, Ithaca, NY 1986; J. Mansfeld, Compatible Alternatives: Middle-Platonist Theology and the Xenophanes Reception, in Knowledge of God in the Graeco-Roman World, ed. J. Mansfeld - R. van der Broek - T. Baarda, Leiden 1988, 92-117; H.S. Versnel, Ter Unus. Isis, Dionysos, Hermes. Three Studies in Henotheism, Leiden 1990; J.P. Kenney, Mystical Monotheism: A Study in Ancient Platonic Theology, London 1991; M.J. Edwards, Xenophanes Christianus?: GRBS 32 (1991) 219-228; G. Filoramo, Il m. tardo-antico, in Figure del sacro, Brescia 1993, 109-125; C. Eucken, Die Gotteserfassung im Symposiondes Xenophanes: WJA 19 (1993) 5-17; B. Wisniewski, La conception de dieu chez Xénophane: Prometheus 20 (1994) 97-103; E. Heitsch, Xenophanes und die Anfänge kritischen Denkens, Stuttgart 1994; C. Schäfer, Xenophanes von Kolophon, Stuttgart 1996; One God or Many? Concepts of Divinity in the Ancient World, ed. B.N. Porter, Casco Bay, ME 2000; A. Lebedev, Xenophanes on the Immutability of God: Hermes 128 (2000) 385-391; D. Runia, The King, the Architect, and the Craftsman: A Philosophical Image in Philo, in Ancient Approaches to Plato's Timaeus, ed. R.W. Sharples - A. Sheppard, London 2003, 89-106; J. Dillon, Plutarch and God, in Frede-Laks, Traditions of Theology, 223-237; D. Sedley, The Origin of Stoic God, in Traditions of Theology, 41-83; H.J. Klauck, Pantheisten, Polytheisten, Monotheisten, in Religion und Gesellschaft im frühen Christentum, Tübingen 2003, 3-56; Id., The Religious Context of Early Christianity, Minneapolis 2003, 331-428; W. Wainwright, Monotheism, in Stanford Encyclopedia of Philosophy 2005 [http://plato.stanford.edu], esp. §§ 1 and 7; Gott und die Götter bei Plutarch, ed. R. Hirsch-Luipold, Berlin 2005, esp. R. Hirsch-Luipold, Der eine Gott bei Philon von Alexandrien und Plutarch, 141-168, for a treatment of Philo's monotheism and Plutarch's henotheism, see F. Brenk, Plutarch's Middle-Platonic God, 27-50.

Hebraism and Judaism: T. Meek, Hebrew Origins, New York 1960; F. Eakin, The Religion and Culture of Israel, Boston 1971; S. Quinzio, Monoteismo ed ebraismo, Rome 1975; The Early Kabbalah, ed. J. Dan, New York 1986; G. Scholem, Origins of the Kabbalah, Princeton, NJ 1987; Monotheismus und Christologie: zur Gottesfrage im hellenistischen Judentum und im Urchristentum, ed. H.J. Klauck, Freiburg 1992; Ein Gott allein?, ed. W. Dietrich - M. Klopfenstein, Freiburg 1994; The Triumph of Elohim: From Yahwisms to Judaisms, ed. D.V. Edelman, Kampen 1995; J.J. Collins, Natural Theology and Biblical Tradition: The Case of Hellenistic Judaism: CBQ 60 (1998) 1-15; G. Scarpelli, Il Dio solo: alle origini del monoteismo., Rome 2003; J. Assmann, Die Mosaische Unterscheidung, oder der Preis des Monotheismus, Munich-Vienna 2003; Early Jewish and Christian Monotheism, ed. L.T. Stuckenbruck - W.E.S. North, London-New York 2004; Monotheismus Israels und christlicher Trinitätsglaube, ed. M. Striet, Freiburg 2004; A. Lemaire, La nascita del monoteismo, Brescia 2005.

Christianity: R. Arnou, Unité numérique et unité de nature chez les pères, après le Concile de Nicée: Gregorianum 15 (1934) 242-254; B. Krivocheine, Simplicité de la nature divine et les distinctions en Dieu selon Grégoire de Nysse: StPatr 16 (1985) 389-411; L. Hartmann, Johannine Jesus-Belief and Monotheism, in Aspects on the Johannine Literature, ed. L. Hartmann - B. Olsson, Uppsala 1987, 85-99; A. Manaranche, Il monoteismo cristiano, Brescia 1988; L. Zagzebski, Christian Monotheism: Faith and Philosophy 8 (1989) 3-18; Le ragioni di Abramo: razionalità e fede nel monoteismo, LII Convegno del Centro di Studi Filosofici di Gallarate, aprile 1997, ed. S. Biolo, Turin 1999; R. Bauckham, God Crucified, Grand Rapids, MI 1999; B. Duvick, The Trinitarian Tracts of Gregory of Nyssa, in Gregory of Nyssa: Homilies on the Beatitudes, ed. H.R. Drobner - A. Vinciano, Leiden 2000, 581-592; R. Stark, One True God: Historical Consequences of Monotheism, Princeton-Oxford 2001; Ist der Glaube Feind der Freiheit? Die neue Debatte um den Montheismus, ed. T. Söding, Freiburg 2003; Il Dio di Gesù Cristo e i monoteismo, ed. M. Crociata, Rome 2003; C. Moreschini, Storia della filosofia patristica, Brescia 2004, esp. 25-36; 240-241; 507-512; M. Wallraff, Pagan Monotheism in Late Antiquity: MediterrAnt 6 (2003) 531-536; J. Duponcheele, Comprendre l'homme pour penser Dieu: dialogues critiques sur la raison pure croyante dans les monothéismes, Paris 2005; Das Gewaltpotential des Monotheismus und der dreieine Gott, ed. P. Walter, Freiburg 2005.

Arianism: G.C. Stead, The Platonism of Arius: JTS 15 (1964) 16-31; M. Simonetti, Studi sull'Arianesimo, Rome 1965; Id., Arianesimo latino, Spoleto 1967; Id., La crisi ariana nel IV secolo, Rome 1975; M. Meslin, Les ariens d'Occident, 335-430, Paris 1967; É. Boularand, L'hérésie d'Arius et la 'foi' de Nicée, I-II, Paris 1972; T. Kopecek, A History of Neo-Arianism, I-II, Cambridge, MA 1979; Arianism: Historical and Theological Reassessments, ed. R. Gregg, Cambridge, MA 1985; H. Brennecke, Untersuchungen zur dritten Phase des arianischen Streites (337–361), Berlin-New York 1984; Scripta Arriana Latina, Turnholti 1982; R. Williams, Arius: Heresy and Tradition, London 1987, [2]2001; R.P.C. Hanson, The Search for the Christian Doctrine of God: The Arian Controversy, 318–381, Edinburgh 1988; T. Böhm, Die Christologie des Arius, St. Ottilien 1991; C. Kannengiesser, Arius and Athanasius: Two Alexandrian Theologians, Aldershot 1991; Papers of the XI International Conference on Patristic Studies, ed. E. Livingstone, I-V, Leuven 1993; P. Widdicombe, The Fatherhood of God from Origen to Athanasius, Oxford 1994; D. Williams, Ambrose of Milan and the End of the Nicene-Arian Conflicts, Oxford 1995; M. Wiles, Archetypal Heresy: Arianism Through the Centuries, Oxford 1996; R.E. Rubenstein, When Jesus Became God, New York 1999; R. Vaggione, Eunomius of Cyzicus and the Nicene Revolution, Oxford 2000; Augustini Contra sermonem Arrianorum; Sermo Arrianorum, ed. M. Suda, Vienna 2000; F. Pilloni, Teologia come sapienza della fede: teologia e filosofia nella crisi ariana del IV secolo, Bologna 2003; var. aus., L'Uno e i Molti. Rappresentazioni del divino nella tarda antichità, ed. M.V. Cerruti: Annali di Scienze religiose 8 (2003) 95-195; Vigilio di Tapso, Contro gli ariani, ed. P. Guidi, Rome 2005.

I. RAMELLI

MONTANUS – MONTANISM (2nd c.). Montanus, a prophet who suddenly revealed himself in *Phrygia ca. AD 155–160, claimed to be the mouthpiece of the *Holy Spirit and the *Paraclete incarnate as promised in Jn 14:26; 16:7. He founded Montanism.

The motivations of his claim are unknown, but his way was paved by the widespread unease among Christians of his time whose anticipation of the end times had diminished and whose spiritual fervor had declined, i.e., among those aware of becoming lukewarm in contrast with the Christian life of former times. The numerous writings of Montanus and his two most important followers, the prophetesses *Maximilla and Prisc(ill)a, are lost; only a few directly transmitted *oracles remain. What we do know about Montanus and the movement he founded comes from indirect sources (esp. Eus., HE 5, 14-19, and Epiphanius, Haer. 48f., which draw on early anti-Montanist writings). Montanus is inseparable from the "new prophecy" movement (which subsequently his adversaries pejoratively called "Montanism").

Characteristics and teachings of Montanism. Above all, the most characteristic traits are speaking in tongues and a spiritual language tending toward *ecstasy and enthusiasm. Montanus, as well as Prisc(ill)a and Maximilla (but no one else), professed to be the voice of Christ and the Holy Spirit. Thus, they speak with the authority of this Spirit and elicit unconditional *faith and absolute obedience from their followers. They denied all ecclesiastical *authority. In their prophecy, they pronounced the imminent end of the *world, which Maximilla predicted would occur immediately after her death. The wars that broke out under *Marcus Aurelius were interpreted as warning signs. As preparation for the end, a rigorously ascetic morality was required, with a ban on marriage (subsequently only remarriage), severe *fasting, substantial *almsgiving of every kind; *martyrdom was encouraged, *flight from *persecution was prohibited. The New *Jerusalem of Rev 21:1-10, descending from heaven, would be located at Pepuza or Timione (Phrygia). The believers must be found there at the Lord's coming. No heretical position was assumed on a dogmatic level: they remained in orthodox territory. It was only later that it was claimed otherwise. That the Montanists also professed the bodily *resurrection is explicitly attested. The movement was restorative, even reactionary, not so much interested in theological matters and rather naive. It was nourished by the ancient prophetic and apocalyptic traditions. With recourse to the authority of the Paraclete, the aim was to reawaken and restore the ancient situation of the church: efficacy of the Spirit, speaking in tongues, anticipation of the end times, rigorous ethics.

History of the movement. The teaching of Montanism was difficult to critique dogmatically and created problems for the church, which found it hard to combat effectively. Several synods met in *Asia Minor (probably the first in the history of the church: Eus., HE 5, 16,10; *Anonymous *Antimontanist) to check the dangerously rapid expansion of the movement, which was also well organized. The point of the whole matter was whether they should consider the "new prophecy" as a real manifestation of the Spirit or as demon possession. The traditional ways of unmasking false prophets (see the signs in the *Didache) were not sufficient or did not affect the movement. Neither a desire for clearer discussion nor the claim that the Montantists had unduly influenced "consenting" bishops to join them was enough (Eus., HE 5,16,17). Nor were they able to obtain results with an appeal to the OT and NT. In fact, Montanus claimed that the Paraclete spoke through him, and that he was above the authority of the Holy *Scriptures.

The movement, nevertheless, was *excommunicated from the church in those Asia Minor synods and was thus forcibly reduced to a sect. What ruined them was their own claim, which conflicted with the church's desire to safeguard the *tradition (canonical rules, profession of faith, office). Still, the sect expanded further in the West. In *Rome it seems that its recognition was considered for a long time (ca. 177–178), but was later prevented by *Praxeas (Tertullian, Adv. Prax. 1). In *Gaul followers of Montanus were well known in this same period, and their prophetic talents made a great impression. The martyrs of *Lyons wrote *letters in favor of the Montanists (evidently against the opinion of other sectors of the community) to the community of *Asia and Phrygia and to Bishop *Eleutherus of Rome urging them to be reconciled. With the death of Maximilla (179), the end of the world did not occur as she had prophesied, but the movement was not completely abandoned, and their frenetic anticipation for the end gradually diminished (see the letter from *Firmilian to Cyprian, Ep. 75,10).

A new phase of Montanism began (ca. 200) characterized by an increased moral rigor. With this, the development by which Montanism gradually undid itself within the church was prepared. In this situation, the movement realized that the prophetic spirit which the early church had experienced before could not have success. The most important representative of second-generation Montanism was *Tertullian, who, in 207, joined the Montanists because of its strong and rigorous ethic. The numerous *ascetic and dogmatic writings of his later period do more to illuminate the Montanist Tertullian than to provide a portrait of the movement. However, even Tertullian explicitly recognized the salvation-historical function that Montanus had claimed. With him as the Paraclete, a new phase of divine *revelation would be opened beyond that of the NT.

Naturally, the subsequent history of the movement is less significant. The Montanists are mentioned again by later ecclesiastical writers, appearing in the lists of *heretics, and regular mention is made in imperial laws against heretics, until the 6th c. However, this does not necessarily indicate the movement's survival in any significant way. Only in Phrygia, and esp. in Pepuza, it seems that the Montanist church continued to thrive. Pepuza was the governing headquarters of the sect with an intercommunal organizational structure (Jerome., Ep. 41,3-4). In the 4th c., *Epiphanius (Haer. 49,1,2-4) speaks of some Montanists that slept in the temple in order to receive apparitions of Christ (*see incubatio). At the end of the 4th c. in a Dialogue Between a Montanist and an Orthodox*, two anonymous characters debate a series of problems connected with the "new prophecy" and in particular the existence of prophecy after Christ, the doctrine of the *Trinity, the Paraclete and the prophetic power of *women.

DSp 10, 1670-1676; P. de Labriolle, Les sources de l'histoire du Montanisme, Paris 1913; Id., La crise Montaniste, Paris 1913; A. Faggiotto, L'eresia dei Frigi, Rome 1924; W. Schepelern, Der Montanismus und die phrygischen Kulte. Eine religionsgeschichtliche Untersuchung, Tübingen 1929; H. Kraft, Die altkirchliche Prophetie und die Entstehung des Montanismus: ThZ 11 (1955) 249-271; K. Aland, Bemerkungen zum Montanismus und zur frühchristlichen Eschatologie: Kirchengeschichtliche Entwürfe, Gütersloh 1960, 105-148 (with ed. of the Montanist oracles); see also op. cit., 149-164; H. v. Campenhausen, Die Entstehung der christlichen Bibel, Tübingen 1968, 257-268; T.D. Barnes, The Chronology of Montanism: JTS 21 (1970) 403-408; A. Strobel, Das heilige Land der Montanisten, Berlin 1980; R. Braun, Tertullien et le montanisme: église institutionelle et église spirituelle: RSLR 21 (1985) 245-257; V. Grossi, A proposito della conversione di Tertulliano al montanismo. De pudicitia I, 10-13: Augustinianum 27 (1987) 57-70; B. Czesz, La "tradizione" profetica nella controversia montanista: Augustinianum 29 (1989) 55-70; G. Visonà, Il fenomeno profetico del montanismo: Ricerche Storico/bibliche (1993) 149-164; R.E. Heine, The Montanist Oracles and Testimonia, Macon, GA 1989; Ch. Markschies, Nochmals: wo lag Pepuza? Wo lag Tymon: JbAC 37 (1994) 7-28; W. Tabbernee, Montanist Inscriptions and Testimonia: Epigraphical Sources Illustrating the History of Montanism, Macon, GA 1996; S. Elm, "Pierced by Bronze Needles": Anti-Montanist Charges of Ritual Stigmazation in Their Fourth-Century Context: JECS 4 (1996) 409-439; Ch. Trevett, Montanism: Gender, Authority and the New Prophecy, Cambridge 1996; A.M. Berruto, Millenarismo e montanismo: AnSE 15/1 (1998) 85-100; T. Baumeister, Die prophetische Bewegung des Montanismus als Minderheit in Christentum, in Ethische und religiöse Minderheiten in Kleinasien, ed. P. Herz - J. Kobes, Wiesbaden 1998, 99-112; A. Stewart-Sykes, The Original Condemnation of Asian Montanism: JEH 50 (1999) 1-22; J.C. Poirier, Montanist Pepuza-Jerusalem and the Dwelling Place of Wisdom: JECS 7 (1999) 491-507; A.M. Berruto, Dialogo di un montanista con un ortodosso, Bologna 1999.

B. Aland

MONTANUS of Toledo. Bishop 522–531; first among Toledo's bishops to act as metropolitan. He presided over the Second Council of *Toledo (ca. 527). With a *letter to the faithful of the church in Palencia, and another to *Turibius the monk, he took part in the struggle against *Priscillianism and the regulation of the powers conferred upon priests. Both letters were evidently given much consideration by contemporaries, as they are preserved in the Hispana *canonical collection as an appendix to the Second Council of Toledo. Montanus was an eloquent and careful administrator. *Ildefonsus (Vir. ill. 2) admired him for the notable prestige the diocese of Toledo acquired after his work.

CPL 1094; Díaz 4-5; PL 65, 51-60; 84, 338-342; DHEE 3, 1725; J.F. Rivera Recio, Encumbramiento de la sede toledana durante la dominación visigótica: Historia Sacra 8 (1955) 3-34; U. Domínguez del Val, II, 354-356.

M. Díaz y Díaz - P. Marone

MONTANUS, LUCIUS and COMPANIONS. The Cal. Carth. places the execution of Montanus and Lucius on 23 May and that of *Flavian on 25 May, protagonists of the passion BHL 6009. The dates agree with the passion and are confirmed by the Mart. hier.; the passion gives the year as 259. The Passio Montani belongs to the literary group of African passions that have certainly been influenced by the Passio Perpetuae (autobiographical documents, *visions of martyrs), whose substantial authenticity is certain. However, the Passio Montani fully agrees with all that we know from other sources about *Valerian's persecution. The Mart. rom., that assigns their feast day to 24 February, is mistaken about the meaning of one of the numerous errors of the Mart. hier.

P. Franchi de' Cavalieri, Gli Atti dei SS. Montano, Lucio e compagni: RQA 8 (1808), repr. ST 221, 199-292; DACL 11, 2522-2529; Vies des SS. 2, 499-506; BS 9, 572-576; V. Saxer, Afrique latine, in Hagiographies I, ed. G. Philippart, Turnhout 1994, 47-49.

V. Saxer

MONTIBUS SINA ET SION, De. A tract written in Vulgar Latin, erroneously attributed to *Cyprian. The place of composition is unknown. If one accepts the hypothesis of a dating prior to 240 proposed by Altaner (Patrologia, 181), then the suggestion that the author could have known Cyprian and that he was in some way dependent on him falls short. Alternately, J. Daniélou (La littérature latine, 369) and C. Burini (I due monti Sinai e Sion, 14-17) maintain that the author's Jewish-Christian origin is not sufficiently demonstrable, and we cannot exclude the possibility that he could be a pagan convert to Christianity. The complete title is De duobus montibus Sina et Sion adversus Iudaeos. The author expounds a general hermeneutical principle: The OT is a figure of the NT, since Jesus Christ fulfills in reality that which was prefigured in the OT (Quae in vetere testamento figuraliter scripta sunt, per novo testament spiritaliter intelligenda sunt, quae per Christum in veritate adimpleta sunt). Mount Zion represents the NT; Sinai, the OT. Through this *allegorical method, the discourse presents and carries outs a quite unpredictable range of allegorical speculation on the most diverse topics.

CPL 61; CPPM 2, 551; PL 4, 989ff.; CSEL 3, 3, 104-119; C. Burini (ed.), Pseudo Cipriano, I due monti Sinai e Sion, Florence 1994; G. Mercati, in Opere Minori, II (ST), Vatican City 1937, 195-197; EC 4, 1428-1429; A. Stuiber, Die Wachhütte in Weingarten: JbAC 2 (1959) 87-89; Altaner, Patrologia, 181; Quasten, Patrologia I, 601; J. Daniélou, La littérature latine avant Tertullien: REL 48 (1970) 357-375, and esp. 368-375; J.E. Bruns, Biblical Citations and the Agraphon in Pseudo-Cyprian's Liber de montibus Sina et Sion: VChr 26 (1972) 112-116; E. Romero-Pose, El tratado "de montibus Sina et Sion" y el donatismo: Gregorianum 63/2 (1982) 274; A.M. Laato, Jews and Christians in De duobus montibus Sina et Sion: An Approach to Early Latin Adversus Iudaeos Literature, Abo (Finland) 1999.

L. Dattrino

MOON. Along with the Christian appropriation of the rich symbolism of the sun already present in the pagan world (see the mosaic depiction of Christ with a cruciform halo as Helios, Sol novus and invictus, in the mausoleum of the Iulii within the Vatican necropolis, 3rd c.), Christianity of the first centuries saw a parallel development in which the principal motifs of the lunar and ancient astral cult, both certainly pre-Hellenic in origin, were adapted to express the mysteries of the new faith.

First of all, the moon came to represent humanity, not only as an object of the redemption in Christ, but also as called to welcome in love his salvific action and cooperate with it. Helios and Selene, the son and the moon—the original and unfailing light on the one hand, and on the other that which is reflected and inconstant, destined to be extinguished when it meets the bridegroom and brother so as to be reborn in splendor—is for *Theophilus of *Antioch an image of the great mystery (see Eph 5:32) of God and humanity (Ad Autol. 2,15); more explicitly, for *Origen (Hom. Gn 1,5-7) this figure relates to Christ and the church. According to H. Rahner, "Everything which subsequently in theology and in Latin and Greek mysticism is said about the church as a 'spiritual moon' is to be referred directly or indirectly to Origen." To the moon, called "Queen of heaven," acc. to an original interpretation of Jer 44:17, and to the stars in general, Origen along *Platonic lines attributes a spiritual and even rational soul, and a will subject in obedience to the Creator (Princ. 1,7,2-3), also affirming that each is assigned an angel (Hom. Ier. 10,6); he considers the moon and stars as affected by sin, as are the rest of creation, and for this reason bound by corporeality, even though they are heavenly and luminous (Princ. 1,7,4-5); in his polemic against star worship, he states that the Christian may not address prayers to the stars, but should consider them participants in the universal prayer of praise (Cels. 5,11); in response to the pagan charge of not venerating the sun, moon and stars, Origen affirms that the Christian looks at them always with the greatest reverence (Cels. 5,13), in short because of their exalted symbolic value. These themes are taken up also in Orat. 7.

For *Methodius of Olympus (Symp. 8,6-8) the moon at the feet of the apocalyptic woman (see Rev. 12:1-16) is the image of a humanity still in the psychic state, which the church then generates in *baptism to be pneumatic, spiritual and conformed to Christ: in the sacramental washing the regenerated are like the moon (σελήνη) in that, acc. to a weak assonance, they shine with a new light (νεὸν σέλας) and are called newly lit (νεοφώτιστοι). The ecclesiological symbolism of the moon in its various phases—waning, waxing, shining bright—is frequent in *Ambrose of Milan: the obscuring refers to the defection of Christians in time of persecution, and the increasing light to the church's greater glory in virtue of the sacrifice of the martyrs (Hexam. 4,2,7); in a more radically christological approach, it can symbolize the voluntary self-annihilation of the Word: annuntiavit luna mysterium Christi (Hexam. 4,8,32). Finally, the moon recalls the transitoriness of the whole of creation and its yearning for rebirth (Hexam. 4,8,31), and in this sense *Tertullian (Res. mor. 12,3) had listed it among the natural symbols of *resurrection. In the direct line of tradition which follows Origen we find *Cyril, *Ammonius and *Anastasius the Sinaite.

*Augustine too understands the alternation of the moon's darkening and lightening *allegorically in relation to the different phases of the trials of the church: not only martyrdom but also the clash with paganism, the detraction and calumny of its adversaries, and the persistence of the *sin of carnal men within it—all are reasons for its temporary darkening (Enarr. Ps. 10,4). In reference to the enduring belief in the influence of the Zodiac on human destiny, some authors—among whom are Methodius and Ambrose (in the passages already cited) and *Zeno of Verona (Tr. 1,38)—describe the baptized as freed from the constraint of the stars, which should be read in light of the conviction that the lunar regions, luminous and spanned by the unchangeable glow of the ether, is opposed to the darkness and predetermination which reigns in the sublunar world.

Against this background may be placed the somewhat different motif of the darkening of the sun and moon at the death of Christ as a sign of the mourning of creation (which seems to develop Lk 23:45 by combining it with Is 24:23), attested to for the first time by *Alexander of Alexandria (Sermo de anima et corpore 6: PG 18, 599C), but which may, acc. to H. Rahner, go back to *Melito of Sardis; this idea would find extensive expression in exegesis and in figurative medieval art.

DACL 1/2, 3018-3025 (Croix 4. Les astres et la crucifixion); 9/2, 2707-2710; J. Pépin, Théologie cosmique et théologie chrétienne (Ambr., Exam 1,1,1-4), Paris 1964; H. Rahner, Mysterium lunae: ZKTh 63 (1939) 311-349 and 64 (1940) 61-80, 121-131; Id., Miti greci nella interpretazione cristiana, Bologna 1980 (orig. ed. Zürich 1957), 107-121; 175-197; Id., L'ecclesiologia dei Padri. Simboli della Chiesa, Rome 1971 (orig. ed. Salzburg 1964), 145-287.

F. Pieri

MOPSUESTIA, Council of. In the polemical climate that led to the calling of the 5th ecumenical *council—*Constantinople II (5 May–2 June 553)—and the condemnation of the *Three Chapters, the emperor *Justinian (528–565) gave orders to the synod of bishops of *Cilicia Secunda to make inquiries at Mopsuestia regarding the veneration of Bishop *Theodore (b. ca. 350, bishop of Mopsuestia 392–428) to respond to the perplexities of those who found it irregular to condemn a dead bishop in the *communion of the church. At the council held at Mopsuestia (17 June 550) and presided over by the metropolitan of Justinianopolis (province of *Galatia) in the presence of eight bishops and the imperial representative Marthamis, some witnesses, evidently tampered with, declared that the name of Theodore was never put in *diptychs: in this way, the furor theologicus not only followed Theodore after his death but also prepared for his condemnation at the Council of Constantinople in 553.

Mansi 9, 274-289: Hfl-Lecl III, 1, 38-40: Fliche-Martin IV, 467; Palazzini 3, 139-140.

C. Nardi

MOS MAIORUM. From the very beginning to the twilight of the Roman Empire, the mos mairoum constituted one of the foundations of political and social life. The concept did not lose its importance even after written legislation had developed to a greater degree, remaining as both a source of the body of law and the principle of interpretation of the laws. Thus when we consider both the role of *tradition in *Judaism and the rise of the traditions of the church fathers around the end of the 4th c. (see Macrob., Sat. 3,8,9; Symm., Ep. 3,2), it is not surprising that *Tertullian (De Coron. 4,5; De virg. vel. 1,1), *Augustine of Hippo, *Leo the Great and *Vincent of Lérins treat the concept of ecclesiastical consuetudo in a way that evokes Latin *rhetoric, esp. that of Cicero (see Ulp., Frag. 1,4: Mores sunt tacitus consensus populi larga consuetudine inveteratus). Augustine (Ep. 36,1,1; 55,19,34) and Leo (Ep. 6,6) fuse the consuetudo universae Ecclesiae and the mos traditum (ecclesiasticum) with the authority of the Bible and of the synodal canons, making reference to the trilogy that was at the foundation of Roman life: religion, senate and the very mos maiorum (see Ehrhardt, Metaphysik 1, 276). In the writings of Leo, the same triad appears: synodal law, decretal law and custom (see Ep. 129,12,5; 19,1). It is important to remember that the concept of consuetudo is distinct from "tradition" as "transmission" of the gospel, and that it incorporates a sense of veritas ("*truth") and of ratio (Becker 249-250).

RAC 3 (1957) 379-390; H. Rech, Mos maiorum, (diss.) Marburg 1936; A. Ehrhardt, Politische Metaphysik von Solon bis Augustin, Tübingen 1959; P. McShane, La romanitas et le Pape Léon le Grand, Paris 1979; H.J. Becker, Gewohnheit, III/1: Antike und Alte Kirche: TRE 13 (1984) 248ff.; A. Zumkeller, Consuetudo: AugLex 1 (1994) 1253-1266 (bibl.); B. Studer, Schola Christiana, Paderborn 1998, 62-65 (bibl.).

B. Studer

MOSAIC

I. Techniques and materials - II. The floor mosaic - III. The wall mosaic.

I. Techniques and materials. In the age of *Late Antiquity, the mosaic techniques applied to floor decoration (opus tessellatum) and to wall decoration (opus musivum) continued to develop, already broadly explored in the Greco-Roman age. On the walls, the laying of the mosaic took place directly: the sketching of the figural design (in sinopite) was made on the first layers, then covered at the base with the larger tesserae, on which was placed the color design that served as a guide for putting the smaller tessellae into place. The texturing of the surfaces now appears finer than in the past, and the dimensions of the tesserae vary, for closer adaptation to the design and for rendering the details. Colored glass becomes the most common material: the fabrication of pasta vitrea produces flat sheets, from which tesserae of the desired size are cut. Also in use are tesserae of marble for rendering skin tone, tesserae of terracotta (in the age of *Constantine) and tesserae of mother-of-pearl. With sporadic examples in the imperial age, the use of gold and silver tesserae finally assumes fundamental importance. A foil of gold or of silver is placed on a wedge of transparent glass that is contained by a fine layer of pasta vitrea, very clear and still molten, that undergoes a firing. The use and the diffusion of materials reveal the difference in function assigned to the mosaic in the West and the East. Pasta vitrea and natural stone complement the Roman illusionistic tradition in the West. Gold and silver tesserae are employed in the East, in order to obtain the effect of a uniform background that tends to express hierarchy and an unearthly setting. The tesserae are placed in the binding mortar and angled toward the base, namely, toward the observer, in such a way as to adjust the intensity of light and to avoid the effect of a uniform and distracting mirror. The Christian ritual space exalts the mosaic as a "picture into eternity," and the decorative system exploits the symbolism of the masonry structure that since the advent of religious peace has become a trophy of victory and an official, public monument of the Christian community.

II. The floor mosaic. 1. The West. During the late empire, the necessity of covering increasingly extended surfaces with mosaics, esp. floor surfaces, results in a heightening of chromaticism to great effect. Along with a reduction of the figural repertoire, there is a greater prevalence of the geometric mosaic in imitation of a carpet. In fact, during the imperial age the insertion of the emblem in the geometric weaving overtook the floor surface and its two-dimensional quality. Beginning in the 4th c., there is a development in the technique of the geometric carpet mosaic that underlines the unity and the solidity of the floor. At the same time, the style of this decorative system evolves in very different directions in the West and the East. In an iconographic sense, the evolution contributes to the transformation of the pagan repertoire. In some cases worldly symbols are reinterpreted in light of Christian doctrine and are used as the means of its propagation, while other symbols are reduced to simple decorative elements inserted in the geometric carpet mosaics. As an illustration of this idea, note the evolution of the geometric mosaic at *Aquileia. In the Theodorian complex of the N and S halls (around the 2nd decade of the 4th c.), we have the first attempt to tackle a grand floor cycle of figural and symbolic elements. The warp of the geometric carpet juxtaposes scenes as if they were verses in a narrative, and contraposes concepts along with symbolic animals (N hall, perhaps the worship hall). These two devices heighten the didactic function of the mosaic representation. The aniconic tone and the total absence of any reference to three-dimensionality are characteristic of the geometric mosaics that appeared increasingly from the 5th c. in Aquileia; note some mosaics of the so-called oratories, perhaps only private spaces, of the 1st half of the 4th c., such as the mosaic of the Good Shepherd in the post-Theodorian basilica that was superimposed on the N hall in the year 370, or the apse of the basilica of Beligna, dated to 390. The geometric mosaic also appeared in the entire area of Aquilean influence, esp. during the 4th c. and following, up to the 7th c.; note the churches of Grado, including S. Maria delle Grazie (first phase dated to 420–440) and S. Eufemia (1st part of the 5th c.), and the various examples in Venetia, in *Histria including the Euphrasian basilica (2nd half of the 6th c.) at *Parentium (modern Poreč), and in the ancient provinces of *Rhaetia, *Noricum and *Pannonia. In the figural representation, notably at Aquileia, the portrait is configured with a striking dark line that represents the profile of the faces, accentuating an expressionistic sense of pathos. Especially noteworthy are the 14 donors on the floor of the S Theodorian basilica (early 4th c.). The prevalence of line over volume responds to a precise tendency that begins in the 5th c., with increasingly simplified and reduced figures that favor decorative geometrization.

In the evolution of the geometric floor mosaic, the production at *Ravenna takes on a particular connotation. As well as a greater sensibility for color, one notices here, above all in the era after *Justinian, the connection between the articulation of the surroundings and a rigorous separation of the ecclesial space from the zone of the geometric decoration, with a similarity to African and Palestinian compositional schemes.

The African workshops assume a particularly active role, and they broadly influence the Western Roman world and the Hellenistic-Roman world. Right from the end of the 3rd. c., typical themes of N African production are imported into Italy, esp. in connection with the cycles of the latifundia. A wide use of polychromy and realism prevails in representations of hunting and entertainment scenes, configured in a greater number of registers, with figures freely painted in the background. In this context, Sicily assumes a particularly strategic position, in which the mosaics document a convergence and a coexistence of diverse experiences and cultural traditions. The most notable examples are the mosaics of the Villa of Piazza Armerina (most likely from the 1st decades of the 4th c.). The Italic tradition lives on in the continuous narration and in the rotation of minor scenes around to two major scenes, as in the so-called small hunt. On the other hand, there are elements that anticipate compositional schemes belonging to African mosaic production of the hunting subject, such as the absence of an apparent narrative sequence and the tendency of overlapping scenes in the "great hunt."

Recently, new contributions to the knowledge of Sicilian production come from the discovery of other villas of significant size and rich decoration, such as those of Tellaro and of Patti (2nd half of the 5th c.) that refer to the same stylistic features of Piazza Armerina, as well as to the geometric mosaics found at Carini (province of *Palermo, datable to 320–360). A common element of the various island mosaics is the geometric carpet designs. Like the figural examples, they heighten the sense of expressionism and chromaticism, and result from the direct influence or presence of African workers onsite. This pattern is confirmed by the floor decoration of ritual spaces such as the churches of the Pirrera district in the town of S. Croce Camerina and the church of S. Michele in the town of Salemi (late 5th–early 6th c.).

In other areas, the distinctive features of African production are assimilated by the local tradition. In the Theodorian hall at Aquileia, the scene of *Jonah at sea among cupids and fishermen, rendered with liveliness and spontaneity in the placement of the elements, is a unique example of figural representation on the floors of religious settings. Especially during the 4th c., such settings avoid realistic subjects. In the so-called palace of *Theodoric at Ravenna (late 5th–early 6th c.), circus or amphitheater scenes are inserted into a definite architectonic space. The hunting scene is subsumed in a landscape. The mythological scene with the representation of the seasons alludes to the fertility of nature, and the decoration is well suited to the function of the triclinium. Realistic subjects imported from *Africa are also common in *Gaul. On the Iberian Peninsula, the production is more complex. Here we see the influence of both the Roman tradition (emblematic designs and mosaics in black and white) and the Gallic tradition (polychrome mosaics that are divided into panels), the latter being connected at the beginning of the 3rd c. with the African tradition. In Africa, building on the demand of the ecclesiastical leadership for floor decoration of religious settings, geometric and floral ornaments predominated in the course of the 4th and 5th c. (basilicas at *Hippo, Dermech of *Carthage, *Timgad, *Tebessa etc.), along with very simple tomb mosaics (*Sétif). Furthermore, one often finds a typical funerary mosaic in basilicas and in ancillary spaces such as baptisteries and chapels, differentiated acc. to locality. The Christian symbolic tradition appears in nonfigural panels in the guise of a crowned *monogram, or an epitaph surrounded by floral elements. The latter appears in the church of the priest Felix near Kélibia (Cap Bon), paved with fifty panels in two series that date to the end of the 4th and through the entire 5th c. On one hand, we see that the use of the panels did not favor the production of large-scale compositions. On the other hand, a strong reluctance to represent sacred figures on the surface of the ground led to a rich array of aniconic patterns.

After the Byzantine reconquest, abstract decoration persists. Yet figural subjects of animals, flowers and plants begin to appear, even in religious settings. A very important example is the floor of the basilica at *Sabratha, from the age of Justinian, decorated with a large expanse of tendrils that bloom from a central kantharos and coil around birds. The symmetrical decorative scheme is directly connected to the styles of *Constantinople and the Hellenistic East. We see a reflection of this very typical African work in nearby *Spain, where rare examples of funerary mosaics appear, perhaps commissioned directly by African immigrants. In the churches of the Balearic Islands, floor mosaics, which some consider patterned after African work, appear, with floral and animal designs that surround large central panels containing subjects of paradise or mythological scenes. The mosaics are dated to the 6th c. and later, and they respond to the significant increase of new themes in a religious setting.

2. The East. The innovations that began in the 3rd c. with the mosaics of N Africa continue in the mosaic work of *Antioch, a city that seems to have become a means of transmission and a place of exchange between the West, the East and Africa. Certainly, the Hellenistic tradition is much more rooted here and persists longer than in the West. Nevertheless, the changes that first occurred in the 4th c. clearly appear in the middle of the 5th c., notably in the mosaic of the Villa of Constantine the Great. The scenes of hunting are placed in registers around a central nucleus, and the composition of the figures is free. The abstraction of the geometric designs in imitation of a carpet accentuates the absence of spatial depth; in this sense there are connections with the "Eastern" tradition, in particular the Iranian tradition. In contrast with the African production, a well-known hunting mosaic at *Apamea demonstrates the persistence of the Hellenistic tradition in the plasticity and the three-dimensionality of the figures. Around the same time but in *Syria and Jordan, mosaics in imitation of a carpet with a geometric and floral subject are very common, and the animals are configured within a heraldic scheme. In order to comprehend the transmission of certain figural themes from the East to the Roman West, it is essential to take into account the various forms of patronage. The ruling class in the East is completely similar to that in the West: not surprisingly, its members prefer themes such as those represented in the Megalopsychia hunt mosaic of Antioch. Here the central medallion features a bust of a woman that probably commemorates the generosity of the owner, a patron of the amphitheater depicted in the mosaic; on the border there is represented the city of Antioch with a clear allusion to the civic patriotism of the patron. Meanwhile, the mosaic decoration in the peristyle at the Great Palace of Constantinople exemplifies the imperial contribution. Here we find Hellenistic schemes as well as more recent innovations: groups of figures are placed in various registers over a uniform and white background, and the themes are mythology and fantasy. There are various conjectures on the dating of these mosaics (450–550 as well as 530–700), but the most likely attribution seems to belong to the age of Justinian. Certainly, one can say that from the 5th c. the mosaic decoration in the East (Syria, *Palestine, Greece, Aegean islands, the Balkans) develops with an increasing interconnection between figural subjects and geometric and botanical designs. Meanwhile, the age of Justinian ushers in an apparent return to three-dimensionality, emphasizing the borders around the central inlay and seeking a dynamic balance between the background and the figures contained by it. We find evidence of the Byzantine influence in the decoration of church floors, until this time predominantly aniconic.

From the 4th to 7th c., floral elements, animals and figural panels frequently appear, reworking already familiar subjects. In the church of the Multiplication of the Loaves and the Fishes at Tabgha (5th c.?) in Galilee, we find wide panels with Nilotic scenes in the transept. In other cases, the same subjects represent the landscape of paradise, acc. to what the sacred texts suggest. An example is the map mosaic at *Madaba (2nd half of the 6th c.): the animals, placed along the sides of the surfaces and separated from the trees, surround a female bust of Megalopsychia. Additional scenes of hunting are found in the nave of the Theotokos chapel (7th c.) on Mount Nebo, as well as in the martyria of *Seleucia and of Mopsuestia, where the ark of Noah is represented. Also simple rural or pastoral scenes become reinterpreted as Christian (e.g., in the monastery at Beit She'an [*Scythopolis], in a funerary chapel of the 6th c.). Finally, classical myths are transposed, such as the myth of Orpheus, in a chapel at *Jerusalem. Also in churches we find topographical and cosmographical elements worked out in the perspective of ecclesiastical politics: the church is a microcosm. In the case of the basilica dedicated to Saint Demetrius, at Nicopolis of Epirus, a landscape with trees and birds, surrounded by water, represents the earth surrounded by the ocean. In a simpler fashion at Gerasa, in the churches of St. John the Baptist and of Saints Peter and Paul, the familiar Nilotic landscape (1st half of the 6th c.) alludes to the cities of *Egypt. At Madaba, the floor is even covered by a map of Palestine and adjoining lands. The contemporary mosaic decoration in the synagogues of Palestine provides an interesting contrast: symbols and scenes pertaining to Judaism are introduced, together with the Christian and classical repertoire. In the synagogue at Gerasa, the scene of Noah is brought to life by a lively procession of animals (6th c.); in the synagogue at *Gaza the myth of Orpheus is represented; and in the synagogue at Beth Alpha the cycle of the Zodiac is associated with the seasons, with the chariot of the Sun at the center.

III. The wall mosaic. It is disputed whether churches before the religious peace included iconic decoration: the frescoes of *Dura Europos remain for now a unicum with a baptismal theme. Therefore, we understand why, until the end of the 3rd c., the examples of wall mosaics on a Christian subject are rare and are limited to funerary contexts. The most significant example at *Rome is the mosaic of the vault of mausoleum M (of the Julii) in the Vatican necropolis (dated no earlier than the 2nd half of the 3rd c.). Vine stocks, growing from four angular clusters, frame the central image of the quadriga, driven by the Christus-Helios, a new Sol iustitiae or Sol salutis. On the walls, the surviving sketches preserve the scenes of the fisherman and of Jonah. The tesserae are small and made of enamel; the lively style is associated with the Hellenistic tradition. After the Constantinian peace, there was a dramatic increase in the laying of mosaics as an ornament for apses and walls, in Christian churches (basilicas and baptisteries), and in the buildings erected above or next to the tombs of martyrs (martyria). In the mausoleum of Constantine at Rome (dated to the middle of the 4th c.), the repertory of the surviving mosaics of the annular vault represents the point of transition from floor decoration to wall decoration. The alternating sections with geometric ornamentation, with vine stocks and with glimpses of the grape harvest, form the so-called asarōton, or unswept floor, that is typical of the Hellenistic repertoire. Through Renaissance watercolors and written descriptions, we also know about the decoration of the cupola, essential for understanding the relationship between the function of the decorative architectonic component and the symbolism of the decoration. The spherical vault is divided into twelve sections by caryatid candlesticks, adorned with scenes of the OT and NT set in seascapes and river views, in accordance with a lively Hellenistic style. We find the same decorative scheme in the spherical vault of the mausoleum of Centcelles in Spain (2nd half of the 4th c.), with the addition of the personifications of the seasons, and now accompanied by hunting scenes spread all around the lower section of the same spherical vault. Quite differently, we find a representation of Christ's triumph in the cupola of the baptistery of S. Giovanni in Fonte at *Naples (late 4th c.–early 5th c.). Upon a dark blue background with gold stars, enclosed within an opulent frame of birds surrounding a phoenix and clusters of fruit, the hand of the Eternal crowns the Christogram and nimbus with the flanking apocalyptic letters of Α and Ω. The same elements recur in the decoration of the baptistery of Albenga (middle of the 5th c.). Yet in the decoration of the basilica in Casaranello (located between Gallipoli and Leuca; 5th c.), a gold cross replaces the Christogram.

In the famous mausoleum of Galla Placidia at Ravenna (2nd quarter of the 5th c.), the hemispheric cupola, adorned with a full 800 stars with their light shining toward a centrally placed Latin cross, now presents the distinctive style of the workshops at Ravenna. The coexistence of different traditions characterizes this style: the court tradition expressed by the scenes of the Good Shepherd and by the martyrdom of St. *Lawrence, a tradition that is more effective in offering an impressionistic rendering of the bodies and faces of the *apostles. At the same time, the frontally placed deer prefigure the heraldic schemes of Byzantine art. During the 4th and 5th c., the decoration of the church building, increasingly assimilated to the imperial hall, mimics theological controversies or accommodates messages of religious policy. In this iconographic context, new ensembles enter the traditional repertoire: the hetoimasia represented by the Solium regale, with a suppedaneum (footstool), cushion and drape (the sudarium Christi), and the insignia Christi placed on the cushion. Here, the trophies of the triumph of Jesus over death reinforce the eschatological meaning with the soteriological meaning of the Secundus Adventus or Parousia* of the Judge of the world. Replacing the theanthropic image is the book of the gospel, placed on the cushion for the first time in the center of the assembly at the Council of *Ephesus (431). At Rome, the Magister et Rex image of Christ on a throne amid the apostles should be placed within the most ancient apsidal mosaic compositions of the Constantinian age. Let us begin with the mosaic of the Vatican basilica of St. Peter, with its division into two zones: in the upper zone, on a gilded and starry background, the Christ enthroned between *Peter and *Paul acclaiming him; in the lower zone, a royal throne bearing the cross and, below, the mystic Lamb. In all probability, even the original mosaic decoration in the apse of the ecclesia Salvatoris of the Constantinian age (later known as St. John Lateran) was intended to represent a theophany. In a vertical arrangement, a clipeus with the bust of a bearded Christ rises above a cross on the mountain of paradise. The face of Christ has been adapted from the ternary scene (Christ—Peter—Paul) in a lunette of the catacombs of S. Domitilla (2nd half of the 4th. c), wrongly thought to be heterodox on the basis of the superimposed inscription, QUI FILIUS DICERIS ET PATER INVENIRIS.

At *Milan, we find the same representational scheme in the apsidal mosaic of the chapel of S. Aquilino (late 4th c.), perhaps a mausoleum that was annexed to the basilica of S. Lorenzo. We find a confirmation of the reconstructive hypotheses for the now-lost mosaic figurations in the apsidal mosaic of the basilica of S. Pudenziana, where there is a close connection between a theanthropic image and a cross, victoriae et iudicii signum (hetoimasia). The original elements of this church are the personifications, placed by the shoulders of the apostles, of the two ecclesiae (ex-circumcisione, ex-gentibus), representing the continuity and unity of the old and new divine law. In stylistic terms, they are comparable with the personifications of the basilica of S. Sabina (432–440) in the characterization and liveliness of the facial qualities. These last elements, together with the spatial depth given to the scene, point to the connection of the works with the Roman court style of the age of the emperors *Theodosius and *Honorius.

Yet the culmination of the connection between cross and throne is the outstanding achievement of the basilica of S. Maria Maggiore (432–440). The representation at the center of the triumphal arch unifies the motifs of the Expositio Evangelii and the Parousia. Among the scenes of the Infantia Salvatoris that unfold on the triumphal arch and that all lead to the exaltation of the Virgin Theotokos, the most significant are certainly the scenes of Queen Mary adapted from the Protevangelium of James* and the highly solemn *Epiphany with entirely royal symbolic components. Thus the decoration of the triumphal arch assumes the significance of an official monument (dedication by Pope *Sixtus III) following the Council of Ephesus and spiritual testimony. The double series of squares, adorning the walls of the central aisle with scenes from the lives of *Abraham and *Jacob, *Moses and *Jesus, reveals that the compositional schemes derive from MS illumination. Through their liveliness and chromaticism, they continue the Hellenistic-Roman tradition of narration.

The decoration of the chapel of S. Matrona in the church of S. Prisco at S. Maria Capua Vetere (late 5th–early 6th c.) perhaps derives from the Roman prototype. We observe the latest development of the scene of the hetoimasia: as a symbol of the *Holy Spirit, the *dove is added to the head of the throne, while the *cross placed on the mountain of *paradise is accompanied by twelve doves, alluding to the company of the apostles.

The mosaic decoration of the baptistery of the orthodox and of the much later baptistery of the *Arians at Ravenna, together with the oratory of St. John the Evangelist at Rome (next to the Lateran baptistery, 461–468), affirms the system of dividing the cupola into sections that culminate in the figure of Christ at the center as the imago mundi, the emanation of the Logos. In the case of the oratory, Christ appears instead in the form of the mystic *Lamb. In terms of style, the images of the baptistery of the orthodox lack depth, yet still retain a certain liveliness, while the images of the baptistery of the Arians more clearly betray a flattening and stylization of the image. Although the oratory faces a similar problem, the sectional division of its cupola is sustained by the exuberance of the bunches of flowers and the chromatic liveliness of the early Christian vaults.

The theme of the Expositio Evangelii finally reaches its defining moment in the cupola mosaic of the rotunda of St. George at *Thessalonica. Amid the architectonic structures, the emerging image incorporates a "furniture piece," interpreted as a table or throne, that bears a cushion upon which is placed a book (compare the orthodox baptistery). The chronological attribution of the mosaic to the middle of the 5th c. would fit well with the individuation of the Virgin in an unfinished figure among the apostles. As we have already noted at S. Maria Maggiore, the Virgin begins to claim a position of prestige in the mosaic representations of this century. In a Byzantine context, the church of Hagia Sophia at Constantinople (6th c.) provides a much later confirmation of the integration of mosaic image and architectural space. The cupola repositions the *Christos Pantocrator in the central clipeus, and in the second zone, the apostles and the Virgin between two *angels.

The influence of the definitively Byzantine style, articulated during the 5th and even further in the 6th c., is particularly evident in the production at Ravenna. The city on the Adriatic creatively refashions the foreign influences gained through the cosmopolitan connections of the imperial court, even temporarily positioning itself as a bridge between the East and the West. In the most noteworthy monument of Justinian, the church of S. Vitale, we see the touch of Hellenistic-Roman master craftsmen in the mosaics of the medallions and lunettes of the presbytery, where the scenes of the OT are animated and represented in an environment characterized by naturalism. The triumphal arch, apse and side walls constitute a cycle of images based on the heavenly and terrestrial courts. In the apse, the representation of *theophany shows the beardless Redeemer on a turquoise blue globe between two angels, with various majestic figures placed on a common level and on a unified gold background. The walls counterpoise the court of Justinian on the left with the court of *Theodora on the right, engaged in the ritual act of offering liturgical vessels with figures in strict frontal view, static and incorporeal. Of outstanding stylistic value is the portrait of the bishop *Maximian, placed at the side of the emperor. The schematism of the figural construction is accentuated in the realization of the basilica of S. Apollinare in Classe (around the middle of the 6th c.). An underlying sketch has revealed that the apsidal decoration followed a variation from the initial figuration. The most interesting part is the dome: at the top, a jeweled disk contains the cross, at the center of which stands Christ flanked by *Elijah and Moses, an allusion to the transfiguration on Mount Tabor; at the bottom, at the center of a flowery valley of paradise, stands the solemn and hieratic figure of St. *Apollinaris, an early example of representing a saint in an apsidal hemisphere.

The Euphrasian basilica at Parentium (535–543) provides a significant thematic comparison. The Virgin and Child dominate in the apse, at the center, with various figures at the sides, arranged acc. to a hierarchical order; at the top, above the Virgin, Christ upon a globe. The basilica of S. Apollinare Nuovo offers further confirmation of the role assumed by the Virgin in the liturgical gathering, and then in the figurative repertoire. In the second phase of its decoration, the basilica betrays both a stiffening of the earlier style and a certain provincialism, evident in the ideas of the saints and martyrs (attributed to the age of Justinian or the years following 560), first in the ensemble of Christ between angels and then in the ensemble of the Virgin with Child. Fixedness and flattening empty the figures onto a uniform and gilded background lacking depth.

Many apsidal mosaic achievements in Rome definitely confirm the Byzantine stylistic elements. On one hand is the decorative scheme that privileges the figure of the Virgin or of the saint, a fulcrum of the liturgical action; on the other hand is the alignment with the Byzantine model, even in the techniques used for the mosaics. The apses of the churches of S. Lorenzo and S. Agnese exemplify flattened figures, a monochrome and abstract background on the walls, a statuary pose, a profusion of garments, attributes and jewels, and the presence of the *patron. With its Roman expressive vigor, the basilica of Sts. Cosmas and Damian provides a partial exception to this rule. In the dome of the apse, with Christ as a celestial emperor who walks solemnly through the clouds, the two chief apostles present the two titular saints along with Pope *Felix, who offers up the church of St.*Theodore. And yet in the central clipeus of the triumphal arch, a Byzantine scheme and language are detectable in the figural placement of the Agnus Dei upon a jeweled throne, on which rests a cross; this constitutes a further development in the representation of the throne Sedes Dei et Agni. In the church of St. Theodore, the apsidal mosaic (dated to the 2nd half of the 6th c.) accommodates the Redeemer offering a blessing at the center, seated on a starry globe, flanked by Peter and Paul, who introduce various saints including the soldier St. Theodore. A bit later, the mosaic decoration of the Pelagian basilica of S. Lorenzo (578–590) shows for the first time a theophany on the triumphal arch: Christ on the throne carries the cross, with the flanking Peter and Paul who are presented as clearly separate from the offering saints. The figure resembles the pantocrators of the churches of S. Teodoro and S. Vitale, and of the Euphrasian basilica at Parentium. Nevertheless, the protagonist of the apsidal mosaic had to be the martyr St. Lawrence, in the position of orans, acc. to the iconography that was spreading in the East (e.g., St. Demetrius at Thessalonica, with panels portraying various saints, 6th–7th c.) and at Ravenna. Otherwise, in the apsidal mosaic of the church of S. Agnese (625–638), the statuary orans image in sumptuous vestments of a "basilissa," stands isolated on an abstract gold background. In the apse of the oratory of S. Venanzio (642–649), we find a vertical succession, following the scheme already adapted at Parentium. At the top, we see the bust of the bearded Savior and the Virgin orans, who is surrounded by numerous saints in side-by-side position connected to the construction of the church; the side walls extend the procession of martyrs, who are placed on horizontal fasciae. In confirmation of the close connections with the Byzantine artistic world, right in this very mosaic we detect a particular method of apportioning the tesserae imported from Constantinople: minute tesserae for the figures, larger tesserae for the ground and broad interstitial spaces that allow the white of the stucco to emerge.

In harmony with the changing conception of the church building, the mosaic compositions of the following centuries continued to increase the prevalence of gold along with increasingly bolder tones.

Studies: Essential, beyond the voices of encyclopedias and dictionaries in current use, are the following works: M. van Berchem and E. Clouzot, Mosaïques chrétiennes du IV[e] au X[e] siècle, Geneva 1924; H.P. L'Orange and P.J. Nordhangen, Mosaik. Von der Antike bis zum Mittelalter, Munich 1960. For reports and updates on discoveries, refer to: Atti dei Congressi Internazionali di Archeologia Cristiana (VI, Ravenna 1962, 1965; VII, Trier 1965, 1969; VIII, Barcelona 1969, 1972; IX, Rome 1975, 1978; X, Vatican City 1984; XI, Rome 1989; XII, Vatican City 1991; XIII Split, Vatican City 1998); Colloques Internationaux du Centre National de la Recherche Scientifique; La mosaïque gréco-romaine, I, Paris 1963 (1965); Deuxième Colloque international pour l'étude de la mosaïque antique, Vienna 1971 (1975); Atti del III Colloquio internazionale sul mosaico antico, Ravenna 1983; VI Coloquio internacional sobre mosaico antiguo: Palencia-Merida, octubre 1990, ed. C.M. Batalla, Guadalajara 1994; Fifth International Colloquium on Ancient Mosaics, Held at Bath, England, on September 5-12, 1987, ed. R. Ling, Ann Arbor, MI 1995; Bollettini dell'AIEMA (Association Internationale pour l'Étude de la Mosaïque Antique) 15, 1994/1995; 16, 1997, with bibl. for 1994–1995, and in particular, the tribute to M.A. Alexander, with an extensive bibl., esp. on the mosaics of Tunisia, including Christian examples; Atti dei Colloqui dell'AISCOM (Associazione Italiana per lo Studio e la Conservazione del Mosaico) and for the general picture on Italy, see: R. Farioli Campanati, Il mosaico in Italia dalla fine della Tarda Antichità al Medioevo: nuove conoscenze dai Colloqui AISCOM, in Atti dell'VIII Colloquio dell'Associazione Italiana per lo Studio e la Conservazione del Mosaico (AISCOM), ed. F. Guidobaldi and A. Paribeni (Florence 2001), Ravenna 2001, 27-36 (hereafter cited as AISCOM VIII, 2001). L'edificio battesimale in Italia. Aspetti e Problemi, Atti dell'VIII Congr. Naz. di Archeologia Cristiana (Genoa, Sarzana, Albenga, Finale Ligure, Ventimiglia, 21-26 settembre 1998), ed. E. Russo (Istituto Internazionale di Studi Liguri - Bordighera. Atti dei Convegni, V), Florence 2001, 2 vols.: many entries analyze the various aspects of the baptismal iconography, including evidence from wall and floor mosaics (in particular the contributions of G. Wataghin Cantino, D. Mazzoleni, G. Bertelli, M. Falla Castelfranchi, V. Fiocchi Nicolai, S. Gelichi, F. Bisconti, G. Cuscito, G. Binazzi, L. De Maria, A. Casentino, C. Rizzardi, C. Martorelli, G. Volpe, A. Biffino, R. Giuliani); M. Piccirillo, L'Arabia cristiana. Dalla provincia imperiale al primo periodo islamico, Milan 2002.

General themes: F. Betti, La pittura a Roma dal IV al IX secolo, in Crypta Balbi (2001) 122-131; the author analyzes the pictorial decoration at Rome, making reference to the figural mosaic systems pertaining to ritual spaces and their retracing in iconographic and stylistic development; W. Tronzo, The Shape of Narrative: A Problem in the Mural Decoration of Early Medieval Rome, in Roma nell'Alto Medioevo, Settimane di Studio del Centro Italiano di Studi sull'Alto Medioevo, XLVIII (27 aprille–1 maggio 2000), Spoleto 2001, I, 457-487: the author captures the narrative dimension of the Christian spiritual culture, and naturally makes reference to the principal mosaic cycles that have been preserved (S. Maria Maggiore, S. Sabina), and to those that have been lost yet are documented (S. Pietro, S. Paolo fuori le mura); Art, cérémonial et liturgie au Moyen Âge. Actes du Colloque de 3[e] Cycle Romand de Lettres, Lausanne and Fribourg, 2000, ed. N. Bock, P. Kurmann, S. Romano, and J.-M. Spieser, Rome 2002; of particular interest: J.G. Deckers, Der erste Diener Christi. Die Proskynese der Kaiser als Schlüsselmotiv der Mosaiken in S. Vitale (Ravenna) und in der Hagia Sophia (Istanbul), 11-70: the author analyzes the iconographic motif of the adoratio of Christ, esp. in the mosaic programs of the churches of S. Vitale and S. Sofia; Arte e iconografia a Roma dal Tardoantico alla fine del Medioevo, ed. M. Andaloro, S. Romano, Milan 2002: interesting contributions on the literature of specific iconographic themes, written by curators and others; E. Concina, Le arti di Bisanzio. Secoli VI–XV, Milan 2002: the full and careful examination of the history of Byzantine art is not divorced from mosaic evidence, above all wall mosaics, whether in the East or in the West; the author does not overlook any significant evidence and the argument is extended as well to significant examples in the production of proto-Byzantine floor mosaics and of icons. Specific entries: on the catacombs: L. Cuppo Csaki, Qui filius diceris et pater inveniris: il mosaico "dello scalone" nella catacomba di S. Domitilla a Roma: Atti AIEMA VII (1999) 777-794; F. Bisconti, Mosaici nel cimitero di S. Gaudioso: revisione iconografica e approfondimenti iconologici: Atti AISCOM VII (2001) 87-98; L. De Maria, La storia di Giona nella chiusura mosaicata di un loculo del Cimitero di Aproniano: Atti AISCOM VII (2002) 141-152; R. Giuliani, Un arcosolio mosaicato nelle catacombe di S. Ermete sulla via Salaria Vetus: Atti AISCOM VII (2001) 153-166; S. Maria Maggiore: B. Brenk, La tecnica dei mosaici paleocristiani di S. Maria Maggiore a Roma, in Medieval Mosaics, ed. E. Borsook et al., Milan 2000, 139-148: the author reconsiders the entire mosaic cycle in light of direct observations and treats it as the output of entirely Roman workers (in contrast with the mausoleum of Constantine); furthermore, the author considers the mosaic inscription dedicated to Sixtus III on the triumphal arch to be contemporary with the figural repertory, in which case the pope would be the original patron of all the mosaics; I mosaici paleocristiani di Santa Maria Maggiore negli acquerelli della Collezione Wilpert, ed. Nestori and F. Bisconti, Vatican City 2000, XXXV-23.

Technique: P.J. Nordhagen, The Technique of Italian Mosaics of the Fourth and Fifth Century AD: AAAd 13 (1978) 259-265 (with bibl.). For a careful and thorough examination of the application of the mosaic: P.J. Nordhagen, Mosaico: EAM 8, 563-574 (hereafter cited as Nordhagen 1997): in particular, the results obtained through the use of new technologies; the invention first of gold leaf, and then in the 5th c. of silver leaf, both in a Roman context, but enhanced by Eastern achievements in the early Byzantine mosaics; the prevalent use of tesserae of pasta vitrea with colors actually based on the traditional palette of Greco-Roman painting, in an Eastern setting; the introduction in the human figures of white stone tesserae for the exposed parts of the body in contrast with the colors of the clothing and of the decorative motifs in general, and the introduction of the figural border realized with gold tesserae (seen as well in the Rotunda of St. George at Thessalonica); the outstanding technical skill achieved in the play of light on the surfaces of the mosaic, and in the case of tesserae with gold leaf for applying them on the walls, a reduction of half the number, with significant savings. On the general character of technique: Medieval Mosaics: Light, Color, Materials, ed. E. Borsook, F. Gioffredi Superbi and G. Pagliarulo, Milan 2000: in particular, refer to the contributions on the theme of the perception of color in Antiquity and in the age of *Byzantium, to the techniques of fabricating the mosaic materials in the light of chemical and mineralogical investigations, as well as to the specific mosaic materials of S. Maria Maggiore and of S. Clemente, and to the more general theme of the connection between architecture and mosaic art (E. Schwarzenberg, L. James, M. Verità, B. Brenk, G. Basile, L. Trizzino). See also: I Mosaici. Cultura, tecnologia, conservazione. Atti del Convegno di Studi Scienza e Beni Culturali, XVIII - 2002 (Bressanone), ed. G. Biscontin and G. Driussi, Venice 2002: numerous entries on the results of analyzing degradation, and a study of the means of execution for various types of both well-known and lesser-known mosaics.

For cataloging with photography and infrared reflectography: A.M. Iannucci, N. Santopuoli, and L. Seccia, Il nuovo atlante dei mosaic del Battistero Neoniano: catalogazione fotografica e riflettografica, in XIV Corso di Cultura sull'Arte Ravennate e Bizantina. Seminario internazionale di studi sul tema "Le grandi isole del Mediterraneo orientale tra tarda antichità e medioevo." In memoria di Luciano Laurenzi (Ravenna 1998), ed. R. Farioli Campanati, Ravenna 2001, 333-359 (hereafter cited as XIV Corso Cultura, 2001).

Floor mosaics: Aquileia and the surrounding region: to begin, G. Brusin and P.L. Zovatto, Mosaici paleocristiani delle Venezie, Udine 1963; S. Tavano, Mosaici cristiani nell'area aquileiese: AAAd 2,2 (1972) 237-272 (with an outstanding chronological chart); R. Farioli, Mosaici pavimentali dell'Alto Adriatico e dell'Africa Settentrionale in età bizantina: AAAd 5 (1974) 285-302 (for the similarities and contrasts with Africa); L. Bertacchi, Architettura e mosaici: da Aquileia a Venezia, Milan 1980; see also various contributions to AAAd 1 (1972) and AAAd 8 (1975). A critical and bibliographic update in R. Farioli Campanati, Mosaico pavimentale paleocristiano: EAA, Suppl. II, 3, Rome 1995, 815-821: the author turns to the relationship between the articulation of the carpet mosaic and sacred space; the weaving of the mosaic is adapted in fact to the disposition of the spaces, e.g., geometric motifs repeated in the corridors of the lateral aisles, motifs with curvilinear development in the apses: thus architectonic lines, spatial function and mosaic motifs are interwoven. The geometric figures are developed acc. to rigorous rules of measure and proportion, prevalent in the West; in the East, iconic motifs are affirmed during a first phase, then avoided with the edicts of Theodosius the Great, but then they later return in animal and plant weavings, until the profusion of the "emblem" and "pseudo-emblem" in the age of Justinian. Thus messianic concepts are represented by animals at peace, in a heraldic position between fruit trees or on the sides of a vase that represents the fountain of life (the facing griffins appear in this way); or the vineyard of the Lord comes to be symbolized by the introduction of grape bunches, with the four rivers of paradise and the seasons, acc. to the nexus of peace—seasons—life.

Aquileia: I Mosaici della Basilica di Aquileia, ed. G. Marini, with texts by G.C. Menis, G. Marini and D. Venuto, Rovigo 2003. The largest uninterrupted carpet mosaic (760 m² [909 yd²]) is covered by a rich and masterly documentation in photographs with the community at Aquileia being in a close relationship with the *Didaskaleion of Alexandria in Egypt. The documentation highlights the excellent technique of execution for the mosaics, the naturalism and the iconographic schemes that still derive from the classical world, all revitalized to represent the gospel, even through the image of the primitive terrestrial "paradise."

Rome: Dall'antichità al Medioevo. Archeologia e storia nel Museo Nazionale Romano Crypta Balbi, ed. M.S. Arena, P. Delogu, L. Paroli, M. Ricci, L. Saguì and L. Vendittelli, Venice 2001 (hereafter cited as Crypta Balbi, 2001); with general entries (Betti) as well as specific entries on a few Roman churches in light of recent investigations (Guidobaldi, Pentiricci, Episcopo, Cecchelli).

Ravenna: R. Farioli, Pavimenti musivi di Ravenna paleocristiana, Ravenna 1975 (with bibl.); F. Berti, Mosaici antichi in Italia, Regio VIII, Ravenna I, Rome 1976; R. Farioli Campanati, I mosaici pavimentali della chiesa di S. Giovanni Evangelista in Ravenna, Biblioteca di "Felix Ravenna," 8. Pavimenti musivi medievali in Val Padana, Ravenna 1995. For an interesting rereading of the famous mosaic cycle in S. Apollinare Nuovo: S. Lusuardi Siena, Teodorico: EAM 9, Rome 2000, 118-125; D. Longhi, La cronaca di Agnello come fonte per la ricostruzione dell'immagine epurata dal timpano del Palatium, in S. Apollinare Nuovo: Atti AISCOM 7 (2001) 99-108; P. Novara, Storia delle scoperte archeologiche di Ravenna e Classe, Ravenna 1998; G. Montanari, Ravenna. L'iconologia. Saggi di interpretazione culturale e religiosa dei cicli musivi, Ravenna 2002.

Petra (Jordan): R. Bartoloni, Splendidi mosaici di Petra Bizantina: Archeologia Viva (nov.-dic. 2000) 14-15: important discoveries made of a Byzantine basilica (three discernible phases: 450–500, 500–550, 600) during a mission at *Petra sponsored by the American Center of Oriental Research. The basilica is near the Temple of the Lions, with pavement in slabs of marble and stone in geometric compositions, and in the lateral aisles there is a complex system of medallions, with borders in vine stocks that branch out from a vase that is placed in the central aisle. There are also objects and indigenous animals (peacocks, elephants, giraffes, horses, boar), human figures and personifications that are identifiable on the basis of Greek inscriptions.

Sidi Jdidi* (a Byzantine province, today inland of Hammamet, perhaps the city of Aradi): A. Ben Abed, M. Bonifay, M. Fixot and S. Roucole, Les basiliques chrétiennes de Sidi Jdidi: RivAC 76 (2000) 555-587: two basilicas have been discovered, the N one presents a floor covered by funerary mosaics bound together with decorative fasciae, the altar presents a great botanical crown and leafy branches inhabited by birds (1st quarter of 5th c.); in the S basilica the apse presents a geometric, polychrome mosaic floor, a panel with a Latin inscription and a kantharos that is flanked by peacocks and from which proceed some vine stocks; in addition, there are preserved panels with alpha and omega and chrismon and other animal and plant elements (beginning of the 5th c., rebuilding 2nd quarter of 6th c.); see a contribution by the same authors in Atti AIEMA VII (1999) 267-284.

Madaba (Jordan): M. Piccirillo and E. Alliata, The Madaba Map Centenary (1897–1997): Travelling Through the Byzantine Umayyad Period (Collectio Maior 40), Jerusalem 1999: the volume celebrates the anniversary of the map mosaic of Madaba (6th c.) with the representation of the territory contained between the Jordan River and the Nile delta, in its connections with OT and NT history.

Africa: general works: L. Foucher, Inventaire des mosaïques de la Gaule et de l'Afrique, II Tunisie, III Algérie, Paris 1913, 1925; K.M.D. Dunbabin, The Mosaics of Roman North Africa, Oxford 1978 (with a broad overview of the connections between West and East, and an updated bibl.). For the theme of the hunt and of the cycles of the latifundia: J.W. Salomonson, La mosaïque aux chevaux de l'Antiquarium de Carthage, The Hague 1965; T. Sarnowski, Les representations de villas sur les mosaïques africaines tardives, Warsaw 1978. For the major decorations in ritual spaces: E. Marec, Monuments chrétiens d'Hippone, Paris 1958; M. Fendri, Basiliques chrétiennes de la Skhira, Paris 1961. For funerary mosaics: N. Duval, Le Mosaïque funéraire dans l'art paleochrétien, Ravenna 1976 (of general interest); Atti del VII Colloquio Internazionale sul Mosaico Antico (AIEMA), Il Mosaico greco-romano (Tunis 1994), Tunis 1999, 2 vols.; G.P.R. Metraux, Mosaics, Liturgy and Architecture in the Basilica of Dermech I, Carthage, in Atti dell'VIII Colloquio Internazionale per lo Studio del Mosaico antico e medievale (AIEMA), ed. D. Paunier and Chr. Schmidt, (Lausanne 1997), Lausanne 2001, 434-443.

Sicily: for the connections with Africa found amid the various contributions of A. Carandini, see: La villa di Piazza Armerina, la circolazione della cultura figurativa africana nel tardo impero: Dialoghi di Archeol. 1 (1967); G.Ch. Picard, Rapports de la Sicile et de l'Afrique pendant l'Empire Romain: Kokalos 18-19 (1972–1973) 108-111; N. Duval, Sulla villa del Tellaro: Kokalos 22-23 (1976–1977) 634-635. For Piazza Armerina: S. Settis, Per l'interpretazione di Piazza Armerina: MEFR Ant. 87 (1975) 873-994 (with bibl.); H.J. Marrou, Sur deux mosaïques de la ville romaine de Piazza Armerina: Christiana Tempora (Collection de l'École Française de Rome) 35 (1978) 253-295; A. Carandini, A. Ricci, and M. De Vos, Filosofiana: la villa di Piazza Armerina: immagine di un aristocratico romano al tempo di Costantino, 2 vols., Palermo 1982. On the subject of the new Sicilian villas, see: S.L. Agnello: Archivio Storico Siracusano n.s. I (1971) 145-147; II (1972–1973) 101-102; G. Voza, Mosaici della villa del Tellaro. Archeologia della Sicilia Sud-Orientale, Naples 1973; Id., L'Attività della Soprintendenza alle Antichità della Sicilia Orientale II: Kokalos 22-23 (1976–1977) 551-576. For the mosaics of Carini, see: R. Camerata Scavazzo, Mosaici pavimentali di Carini: Arch. Class. 29,1 (1977) 134-160. For S. Croce Camerina, see: G.V. Gentili, La basilica bizantina della Pirrera (di S. Croce Camerina), Ravenna 1969. Other sorts of interesting comparisons are found in R. Moreno Cassano, Mosaici paleocristiani di Puglia: MEFR Ant. 88 (1976) 277-373.

Cyprus: D. Michaelides, Archeologia paleocristiana a Cipro: XIV Corso Cultura (2001) 179-239; M. Demetrios, Some Characteristic Traits of a Mosaic Workshop in Early Christian Cyprus, in Atti dell'VIII Colloquio Internazionale per lo Studio del Mosaico antico e medievale (AIEMA), ed. D. Paunier and Chr. Schmidt (Lausanne 1997), Lausanne 2001, 314-325.

For the provinces of both the Western and Eastern empire, see the contribution in the Atti dei Congressi and of the cited "Colloques." In addition: Spain: P. de Palol Sabellas, Arqueología cristiana de la España romana, siglos IV–VI, Madrid-Valladolid 1967; J. González Navarrete, Mosaicos Hispánicos del bajo imperio: Arch.Esp.Arq. 45-47 (1972–1974) 419-432. The East: E. Kitzinger, Stylistic Developments in Pavement Mosaics in the Greek East from Constantine to Justinian, in La mosaïque I, cited, 341-351. Antioch: D. Levi, Antioch Mosaic Pavement, Princeton, NJ 1947; I. Lavin, The Hunting Mosaics of Antioch and Their Sources: DOP 17 (1963) 181-286. Apamea and Spain: J. Balty, La Grande Mosaïque de Chasse du Triclinos, Fouilles d'Apamée de Syrie. Miscellanea 2, Brussels 1969. Lebanon: M. Chehab, Mosaïques du Liban: Bull. du Musée de Beyrouth 14-15 (1958–1959). Cilicia: L. Budde, Antike Mosaiken in Kilikien I: Frühchristliche Mosaiken in Misis-Mopsuhestia, Recklinghausen 1969. Palestine: for the churches, see: M. Avi-Yonah, Mosaic Pavements in Palestine: Quarterly Dep. Ant. Pal. II (1932–1933), III (1933–1934); for the synagogue of Beth Alpha: E.L. Sukenik, The Ancient Synagogue of Beth Alpha, Jerusalem 1932. Jordan: see M. Piccirillo, Mosaici di Giordania, Jerusalem 1982.

For a bibl. of a general nature on the Eastern world, see the Atti del VII Colloquio Internazionale sul Mosaico Antico (AIEMA) (Tunis 1994), Il Mosaico greco-romano, Tunis 1999, 2 vols. (hereafter cited as Atti AIEMA, VII, 1999), in particular: M. Piccirillo, Ateliers de mosaïstes entre le Mont Nebo et Kastron Mefaa dans le territoire de Madaba (Jordanie), 127-140; N. Duval, Rapport sur les mosaïques "chrétiennes" d'Algerie, 251-266; G. Canuti, Iconographia e iconologia nei pavimenti musivi absidali delle chiese del Vicino Oriente, 759-776. Atti dell'VIII Colloquio Internazionale per lo Studio del Mosaico antico e medievale (AIEMA) (Lausanne 1997), ed. D. Paunier and Chr. Schmidt, Lausanne 2001, 2 vols.; R. Farioli Campanati, I mosaici pavimentali della Basilica di Mitropolis a Gortyna nell'ambito della produzione musiva di Creta, 261-265 (also in XIV Corso Cultura [2001] 83-121); M. Demetrios, Some Characteristic Traits of a Mosaic Workshop in Early Christian Cyprus, 314-325; G.P.R. Metraux, Mosaics, Liturgy and Architecture in the Basilica of Dermech I, Carthage, 434-443; M. Piccirillo, Mosaici tardo-romani e ommaiadi. Nuove scoperte in Giordania. 1994–1996, 444-458; Atti AISCOM VIII (2001); note esp. the following contributions: F. Mosca and P. Puppo, Osservazioni su alcuni mosaici pavimentali a schema geometrico della Basilica Eufrasiana di Parenzo, 175-183; F. Maselli Scotti, Aquileia, il complesso paleocristiano: stato attuale dei mosaici e loro valorizzazione, 185-190.

Wall mosaics: to the general works one might add F.B. Sear, Roman Wall Vault Mosaics: MDAI Erg. H 23 (1977), esp. for the mosaics discovered in catacombs and hypogea (Rome and Naples). Rome: J. Wilpert, Die römische Mosaiken und Malereien der kirchl. Bauten von IV bis XIII Jahr., Freiburg 1916; C. Cecchelli, I mosaici della basilica di S. Maria Maggiore, Rome 1956; G. Matthiae, Mosaici medioevali delle chiese di Roma, Rome 1967. Concerning the development of apsidal decoration, see: Ch. Ihm, Die Programme der christlichen Apsismalerei von vierten Jahr. bis zur Mitte des achtes Jahr., Wiesbaden 1960; J. Engemann, Zu den apsis-Tituli des Paulinus von Nola: JbAC 17 (1974) 21-46; P. Testini, Il sarcofago del Tuscolo ora in S. Maria in Vivario a Frascati: RAC 52 (1976) 65-108 (with an updated bibl. on the mosaics sharing the theme of the hetoimasia). Ravenna: F.W. Deichmann, Ravenna, Hauptstadt des spätantiken Abendlandes I, Ravenna Geschichte und Monumente, Wiesbaden 1969; II, Kommentar 1–3, Wiesbaden 1974–1976; Id., Frühchristliche Bauten und Mosaiken von Ravenna, Baden-Baden 1958. Greece: S. Pelekanidis, Gli affreschi paleocristiani ed i più antichi mosaici parietali di Salonicco, Ravenna 1963; M. Vickers, The Date of the Mosaics of the Rotunda at Thessaloniki: PBSR 38 (1970) 183-197 (see Testini, op. cit., notes 13, 34, 39, 76). For a general picture of the development of mosaics in the Byzantine era, see W.Fr. Volbach, Frühchristliche Kunst, Die Kunst der Spätantike in West- und Ostrom, Munich 1958; D. Talbot Rice, Arte di Bisanzio, Florence 1959. A critical and bibliographic update in F. Bisconti and D. Mazzoleni, Mosaico parietale cristiano: EAA, Suppl. II, 3, Rome 1995, 821-827: the authors retrace the development of wall decoration in funerary contexts and esp. in an ecclesial context. Attention is given to some achievements in a catacomb setting, where the mosaic has the function of indirectly lighting the setting (as with an arcosolium in the catacombs of S. Domitilla, or in the catacomb of S. Gennaro and the catacomb of S. Gaudioso at Naples). Among the great Christian achievements, attention is given to the debate on the mosaics of S. Maria Maggiore and their actual link to Sixtus III: M. Andaloro points out other possible exegetical connections to works of *Augustine of Hippo and of *Leo the Great (however, the works of Leo are dated after the completion of the mosaics); see M. Andaloro, Aggiornamento scientifico e bibliografico, in G. Matthiae (ed.), Pittura romana nel Medioevo - secoli IV–X, Rome [2]1987, a highly valuable work for all mosaic production (for S. Maria Maggiore, esp. 74-81, but note the counterargument of Brenk, in Medieval Mosaics, ed. E. Borsook et al., Milan 2000).

L. Ungaro Testini

MOSES

I. In patristics - II. Iconography.

I. In patristics. Moses, a figure of primary importance in the OT esp. in relation to the constitution of the people of Israel and the gift of the law, was understood by the ancient Christian writers, as were many other characters of the first economy, in essentially christological terms. In particular, he was understood as a prophet and type of Christ. Along this line, the Fathers found themselves having to balance a positive evaluation of Moses and everything connected with him—in particular the law in light of the controversies with the *gnostics, *Marcionites and *Manicheans (Aug., C. Faust. 22)—with a glorification (think of the place that Moses occupies in the works of *Philo, see A. Jaubert, La notion d'alliance, 375-452) that could threaten to overshadow the victory accomplished by Christ (on this balance, see Orig., C. Cels. 2,51-54). Thus their constant concern is to show how throughout his life Moses did nothing other than foreshadow Christ (Tertull., Adv. Marc. 3,18,6-7; 5,11,8; Orig., Hom. Num. 7,2; Cyp., Ad Fort. 8; Cyr. Jer., Catech. 13,20). They also demonstrated how the gifts that were given to him by God, first of all, the law, were not for Israel alone but for all people (Tertull., Adv. Iud. 2,1). The ever-present anti-Jewish polemic had a tendency to compare Moses with other figures seen to be superior and more universal in nature: Christ, first of all, who received the covenant as heir, while Moses received it as a servant (Barn. 14,4-5; John Chrys., Hom. Mt. 28,2; Cyr. Alex., In Jo. 3,3); *Abraham who, unlike Moses (Ex 3:5), did not have to take off his shoes when he went up the mountain, not coming from Egypt and therefore not having "the bonds of mortality tied to his feet" (Orig., Hom. Gen. 8,7); *Joshua, who, contrary to Moses, could enter the Promised Land (Orig., Com. Io. 6,228-230; Hom. Num. 22,4; Tertull., Adv. Iud. 9,22; Adv. Marc. 3,16,4); *John the Baptist, acc. to the words of Christ himself (Cyr. Alex., Catech. 3,6); the *apostles, who at *Pentecost did not receive tablets of stone but the *Holy Spirit himself (John Chrys., *Hom. Mt.*1,1).

Moses's knowledge of Egyptian wisdom is recalled in Acts 7:22, on which foundation *Origen offers a historical-literal interpretation of the construction of *Noah's Ark (Hom. Gen. 2,2), while *Basil emphasizes its inferiority compared to the truth (Hex. 6,1; De Leg. Lib. Gent. 2: PG 31, 567). All the episodes from the life of Moses receive an interpretation consistent with the uniqueness of Christianity: the transformation of the rod (virga*) (Ex 4:2ff.) is considered a symbol of the power of God to raise the dead (Epiph., Ancor. 96) or even a symbol of the death and *resurrection of Christ (Cyr. Jer., Catech. 18,12; Aug., En. in ps. 73,5; Trinit. III, 10,20); the episode of the bronze serpent (Num 21:8ff., recalled in Jn 3:14) is interpreted typologically in reference to Christ (Barn., 12,6; Tertull., Adv. Marc. 3,18); his prayer with outstretched arms is a figure of the cross (Barn., 12,2; Cyp., Ad Fort. 8; Justin, Dial. 114,4) but also a model for worshipers (Orig., Hom. Ex. 3,3); the refusal of God to forgive the people despite the intercession of Moses (Ex 32:31) is explained as a sign of the impossibility of forgiveness for idolaters (Cyp., Ad Fort. 4; De lapsis 19). Moses is the law itself (Ambr., In Luc. 1,41) which, in passing from the synagogue to the church, loses its literal shell in order to gain the strength and greatness of the spirit (Orig., Hom. Ex. 2,4). His death, outside the Promised Land, is interpreted as consequence of his lack of faith demonstrated at Meribah (Num 20:10-12; cf. Orig., Hom. Num. 22,3; Basil., Hom. in ps. 48,9; Aug., En. in ps. 105,28) or as motivated by the divine will to avoid attributing the entrance into the Promised Land to Moses rather than to God (John Chrys., Hom. 5,4 in Mt.). It is as a dead man that he was called up from the underworld at the time of the transfiguration of Christ, because Jesus was recognized as God even by the underworld (Chrom., Serm. 22).

In addition to being a type of Christ, Moses is also, for the Fathers, who follow the typology already present in Philo, a type of every believer who aspires to encounter God: this is the main theme of the work of *Gregory of Nyssa's De vita Moysis, and it is also found abundantly in other authors (Orig., Hom. Jer. 18,2; Jer., In Jon. 3,4; Ambr., De paen. 2,11; Aug., Trinit. II, 16,27-28; Ep. 147,13,32; Theodoret, Orat. de car. 31,5). He is the model teacher, because he knows how to calibrate his teaching acc. to his listeners' capabilities (Orig., Hom. Num. 27,12; Hom. Lev. 6,6; 16,2), a privileged example for bishops and monks (Severus of Antioch, Hom. 41). Taking off his shoes began that stripping-purification that would become total for every Christian at *baptism (Epiph., Ancor. 115). Finally, Moses is indicated as the author of the Pentateuch (Tertull., Adv. Herm. 19,1; Novat., De Trinit. 17,95; Cyr. Jer., Catech. 4,35; Basil, Hex. 1; John. Chrys., Catech. 3,18; Ambr., Ex. 2,5; Ruf., De symb. 35; Aug., En. in ps. 70,1,19; Greg. Gt., In Ezech. 1,1), and based on 2 Cor 3:15 his name is used as synonymous with the entire OT Scripture (Orig., Hom. 7,2 in Gen).

DSp 10, 1453-1471; BS 9, 626-628; J. Daniélou, Sacramentum Futuri, Paris 1950, 131-200; var. aus., Moïse, l'homme de l'alliance, Tournai 1955; A. Jaubert, La notion d'alliance dans le judaisme, Paris 1963; A. Monaci Castagno, "Moyses stella est in nobis" (HomGen 1,7): l'interpretazione origeniana della figura di Mosè: ASE 2 (1985) 161-174; M.I. Danieli, La teologia e la spiritualità dell'esodo negli scritti di Origene e dei primi Padri monastici (III–V secolo): DSBP 18, Rome 1997, 53-76; Id., Il cammino d'Israele nel deserto nella lettura di Origene: Vita monastica 52/212 (1999) 7-31; Omelie sull'Esodo. Lettura origeniana, Biblioteca di Scienze Religiose 174, ed. M. Maritano - E. dal Covolo, Rome 2002.

F. Cocchini

II. Iconography. The most ancient representations of Moses belong to cemetery iconography: Moses saved from the waters, at the burning bush, speaking with Pharaoh and leaving Egypt, crossing of the Red Sea, the miracle of the *quails, the miracle of the *manna, the miracle of the water gushing from the rock and receiving the law.

1. Moses saved from the waters (Ex 2:1-6). The scene appears for the first time in a fresco in Rome (325–350) in the catacomb of Via Dino Compagni (Ferrua, pl. 94). On the left, hidden by reeds, the sister of Moses; on the right, the daughter of Pharaoh, followed by two attendants; amid the waters, Moses in a sort of cradle.

2. Moses at the burning bush (Ex 3:1-6). Depicted in taking off his sandals (Ex 3:5) with his left or right foot on a little rise, Moses looks to the place from where the divine voice is coming. He appears this way both in paintings (e.g., Rome, Coemeterium Maius: Wp 168; Domitilla: Wp 230,1), as well as on Roman (e.g., Ws 206,1; 86,3) or provincial (e.g., Ws 206,2) *sarcophagi. Sometimes the hand of God is represented above (e.g., Rome, catacomb of Via Dino Compagni: Ferrua, pl. 64; Crypt of the Sheep in Callisto: Wp 275,2). In Vat. 178 (Ws 86,3) Moses takes his sandals off in front of four characters.

3. Moses speaking with Pharaoh and leaving Egypt (Ex 12:31-34). On the left side of a sarcophagus at *Arles (Ws 97,3), in addition to the confrontation between Moses and Pharaoh, the preparations for the exodus and Moses receiving the law are represented. The tomb dates from the late 4th c.

4. Crossing the Red Sea (Ex 14:21-31). In the late 4th c., this appears on 20 sarcophagi and in 3 paintings. The most ancient examples adorn the covers of sarcophagi (e.g., Ws 216,2; 209,1; 210,2), then the fronts, usually occupying the entire space (e.g., Ws 210,1; 209,3). In the composition, in addition to Moses with the virga that divides the waters, there appear, together or in part, the pillar of fire (Ex 13:21-22); the Jews fleeing preceded by Miriam, Moses's sister, who plays the tambourine; Pharaoh, who comes out of a city door on a chariot followed by knights; the Egyptians with Pharaoh swept away by the waters. Under the horses appear sometimes personifications of the earth or the Red Sea. The representation in the so-called Chapel of the Exodus at El-Bagawat (mid-4th c.) has specific symbolic value in the context of the other frescoed scenes. In the two Roman frescoes, the pillar of fire is represented independently (catacomb of Via Dino Compagni: Ferrua pl. 75, 98) and is associated with Moses's receiving the law. The scene symbolically alludes to salvation and bears resemblance in its composition to the relief of the Arch of Constantine with the Battle of the Milvian Bridge.

5. Miracle of the rock (Ex 17:5-6). In the earliest period (Rome, Priscilla, Greek chapel: Wp 73) Moses is depicted beardless in a tunic and pallium, while with the virga he strikes the rock of Horeb, from which flows the water that quenches the thirst of the Hebrews, sometimes depicted as bibentes. Often the bibentes are dressed in military *clothing (e.g., Ws 127,1; 215,6), in which case Moses is identified with *Peter, who strikes the rock, and finishes by taking on the iconographic characteristics of the apostle. The Moses-Peter combination finds itself as a rule in the so-called Petrine trilogy (Fount-Arrest-Rooster), whose earliest example is probably Vat. 119, dated between the late 3rd and early 4th c. (Ws 9,3). The scene clearly alludes to the necessity of *baptism, which frees us from original *sin.

6. Moses receives the law (Ex 24:12-18). This is a common scene in sculpture, but rare in painting (Rome, Giordani: Fasola, pl. III,10; catacomb of Via Dino Compagni: Ferrua, pl. 98, 75). The main elements are Moses and the hand of God protruding from some clouds; Sinai is depicted as a small hill sometimes with a tree identified as an olive tree (Ws 205,3). The episode is often found to the left, rarely to the right (Ws 195,4), on sarcophagi with a central clipeus. Sometimes there is present a third character in tunic and pallium, identified by Wilpert as the angel mentioned in the speech of Stephen (Acts 7:38) (Ws 91; 205,5). On the sarcophagus of Servannes (Ws 15), the scene is very rich in details; in addition to Moses, *Aaron and the people, both men and women, appear. Sometimes Moses holds a scroll in his left hand (Ws 180,2) that, acc. to Wilpert, indicates his knowledge.

The repertoire of depictions of Moses is richer in nonfunerary art: in addition to the representations already mentioned, the mosaics of the right aisle of S. Maria Maggiore in Rome (mid-5th c.) have representations of Moses with the daughter of Pharaoh (Ex 2:10), the marriage of Moses with Zipporah (Ex 2:16-21), the waters of Marah (Ex 15:22-23), the battle with the Amalekites (Ex 17:8-13) and the death of Moses (Dt 32:48-50); all new scenes in Paleo-Christian art. Of particular interest in these mosaics are the crossing of the Red Sea, the burning bush, both of which have already been examined, and Moses among philosophers, whose source is not the OT but probably the speech of St. Stephen (Acts 7:22) or Josephus (J.A. 2,9,7). Also in Rome, the wooden door of St. Sabina from the 5th c. should be mentioned (Jeremias pls. 15; 20; 30), where many scenes depict the life of Moses (e.g., the water of Marah, the crossing through the Red Sea, Moses receiving the law). Outside of Rome, in S. Vitale in *Ravenna (mid-6th c.), a scene depicts Moses at the burning bush and receiving the law (Deichmann, pls. 316, 317). Among ivories, the valuable reliquary of Brescia (mid 4th c.) has well-known scenes (e.g., Moses taking off his sandals) and new ones such as Moses's killing of the Egyptian (Ex 2:11-12) and the incident of the golden calf (Ex 32:4-5). Representations of Moses also appear on other objects in ivory (St. Petersburg pyx: Volbach, n. 190) or in silver (Thessalonica reliquary: Panayotidi-Grabar, fig. 7), in miniatures (Ashburnham Pentateuch, from the 7th c.: Gebhardt pls. 14-20; codex of *Cosmas Indicopleustes (9th c., but from a 6th-c. prototype: Stornaiolo, pl. 25).

A testimony in itself is the synagogue of Dura Europos: here the frescoes with Moses saved from the waters, Moses leading the Jews out of the city and the crossing of the Red Sea are the most ancient (before AD 256) and interesting in regard to Moses iconography.

DACL 11, 1648ff.; BS 9, 629ff.; LCI 4, 298ff.; Ws 237ff.; P. v. Moorsel, Il miracolo della rupe nella letteratura e nell'arte paleocristiana: RivAC 40 (1964) 221ff.; E. Dassmann, Sündenvergebung durch Taufe, Busse und Martyrerfürbitte in den Zeugnissen frühchristlicher Frömmigkeit und Kunst, Münster 1973, 196ff.; C. Rizzardi, I sarcofagi paleocristiani con rappresentazione del passaggio del Mar Rosso, Faenza 1970; O. v. Gebhardt, The Minn. of the Ashburnhampentateuch, London 1883; C. Stornaiolo, Le miniature della topografia cristiana di Cosma Indicopleuste (vat. gr. 699), Milan 1908; J. Kollwitz, Die Lipsanothek von Brescia, Berlin-Leipzig 1933; C. Cecchelli, I mosaici della basilica di S. Maria Maggiore, Turin 1956; C.H. Kraeling, The Synagogue: The Excavations at Dura Europos (Fin. Rep. 8), New Haven 1956 (repr.); U. Fasola, Le recenti scoperte nelle catacombe sotto villa Savoia. Il "Coemeterium Iordanorum ad S. Alexandrum": Actas VIII Congr. Intern. Arqueol. Crist., Vatican City-Barcelona 1972; M. Panayotidi - A. Grabar, Un reliquaire paléochrétien récemment découvert près de Tessalonique: Cahiers Archéol. 24 (1975) 33-48; W.F. Volbach, Elfenbeinarbeiten der Spätantike und des frühen Mittelalters, Mainz [3]1976; A.M. Nieddu, Miracolo della fonte: TIP 216-219; U. Utro, Mosè: TIP 223-225; C. Sanmorì, Passaggio del Mar Rosso: TIP 245-247.

D. Calcagnini Carletti

MOSES of Khorene (Movsēs Xorenac'i). Author of History of the Armenians, which presents itself explicitly as composed in the 5th c., but the text transmitted uses sources and forms no earlier than the 8th c. In some cases this discrepancy is due to subsequent editorial interventions. Also attributed to Moses of Khorene are a treatise on rhetoric (De tropis) and a Geography (Asxarhac'oyc'), the second of which is now held to be written by *Ananias of Shirak (7th c.).

Patrologia V, 602-603; DSp 10, 1473-1475; M. Abegjan - S. Harowt'iwnean, Movsēs Xorenac'i Patmowt'iwn Hayoc',Tiflis 1913; V. Langlois, Collection des historiens anciens et modernes de l'Arménie. II, Paris 1869, 45-175; R. Sgarbi, Contributo allo studio delle fonti dell'opera yaḷags Pitoyits' attribuita a Mosè di Corene: RIL 102 (1969) 78-84; R.W. Thomson, Moses Khorenats'i, History of the Armenians, Cambridge, MA-London 1978; G. Traina, Il complesso di Trimalcione. Movsēs Xorenac'i e le origini del pensiero storico armeno (Eurasiatica 27), Venezia 1991; E. Gulbekian, Movsēs Khorenatsi and Ghazar P'arpetsi: HA 108 (1994) 1-7; K. Balekjian, Remarques sur les dits anachronismes dans le texte des manuscrits-copies de l'"Histoire de l'Arménie par Moïse de Khorène" et la philologie arménienne, Montréal 1994; G. Traina, Materiali per un commento a Movsēs Xorenac'i, Patmowt'iwn Hayoc', I-II: Mus 108 (1995) 279-333; 111 (1998) 95-138; J.R. Russell, Sound as Symbol: The Case in Pagan and Christian Armenian Poetics: Mus 109 (1996) 113-126; A. Top'č'yan, Firmilian's Narration as a Source for Movsēs

Xorenac'i: REARm 27 (1998–2000) 99-115; Ph. Gignoux, Quelle connaissance eut de l'Iran Movsēs Xorenac'i?: Studia Iranica 28 (1999) 215-226.

S.J. Voicu

MOSES the Saracen. Hermit of the Egyptian desert of Arab origin whose feast falls on 7 February. According to *Socrates, *Sozomen and *Theodoret, he was called by Mavia, queen of Phoinikon, the widow of the king of the Saracens, to convert her realm by allowing himself to be consecrated bishop of the Saracens in exchange for peace with the Roman emperor *Valens (373–378): previously the Saracens had been allied with the Romans, then they rebelled under Mavia, and "they devastated all regions of the East." Moses acquiesced against his wishes because the Romans were in favor of peace. He was brought to Alexandria, where the *Arian bishop, Luke or Lucius, would have to ordain him. But Moses refused to have imposed on him a hand "full of blood," which had sent many people into exile or to death by wild beasts or fire. These actions against his brothers, Moses held, proved that the doctrines of the bishop were not Christian. Instead, Moses was consecrated by bishops who were in exile "in the mountains," and having concluded peace with the Romans, Mavia gave her daughter in marriage to Victor, the Roman army general. According to Devreesse, Phoinikon would be identifiable with al-Nakhla, midway between Suez and Aqaba: following the conversion of the Saracens aided by Moses, Christianity began to spread in the Negeb. "Saracen," Gk. Σαρακηνός, perhaps from the Arabic Sharkeen, "Eastern," was used by Greek writers of the early centuries to designate the bedouins from E Arabia, by others to indicate the Arabic tribes of *Palestine and *Syria (such as the designation of the *Osroene King *Abgar of *Edessa by Tacitus as rex Arabum Acbarus), by still others for the Berbers of NE *Africa.

R. Devreesse, Le Christianisme dans le Sud palestinien: RSR 20 (1940) 235-251, esp. 238-239.

M. van Esbroeck

MTSKHETA-SVETI TSKHOVELI. A city of ancient origin, which was the capital of Georgia until the 7th c. (when the capital was transferred to Tbilisi) and, starting in 471, the see of the catholicos. According to the tradition passed on by *Rufinus (HE 1,10-11), the conversion of Iberia to Christianity took place at Mtskheta-Sveti Tskhoveli, the result of the work of St. Nino, who had a place of worship built there. (Sveti Tskhoveli means "living column," the column in the account of Rufinus.) This was probably a building of small proportions, so far as examinations of the remains of the buildings from the 4th c. in Georgia allow us to hypothesize. The Cathedral of the Holy Cross was built between 586 and 604 with the commission of Prince Stephen, who was portrayed as a donor on the outside of the building. The cathedral, with four domes, four angular areas and one large cupola, marked a historic step forward in the evolution of Georgian architecture, as it became the prototype for some of the most significant buildings in the region (e.g., the Sion of Ateni, 7th c.).

G. Čubinasvili, I monumenti del tipo Ǧvari, Milan [2]1974; D. Braund, Georgia in Antiquity: A History of Colchis and Transcaucasian Iberia 550 BC–AD 562, Oxford 1994; N. Garsoïan, L'église arménienne et le Grand Schisme d'Orient, CSCO 574, Subs. 100, Louvain 1998; Santa Nino e la Georgia. Storia e spiritualità cristiana nel Paese del Vello d'oro, Atti del I Conv. Int. di studi georgiani, ed. G. Shurgaia, Rome 2000; ODB 2, 1325.

M. Falla Castelfranchi

MUIRCHÚ (d. after 697). Irish author, called Moccu Machténi. Taking inspiration from Cogitosus (author of a Life of St. Brigid of Kildare), whom he calls his pater, Muirchù at the invitation of Aed, bishop of Sletty (680–700), wrote a Life of St. *Patrick, on the occasion of the aggregation of Sletty to the paruchia of Patrick, while he was abbot of Armagh Ségíne (662–688). The Life written by Muirchù, to which all the other biographies of Patrick go back, is riddled with legendary elements, often inspired by political-religious situations of the 7th c. It is contained in the Book of Armagh (Dublin, Trinity College, 52, copied in 807 by Ferdomnach) along with the Collectanea of Tírechán and other texts. He is locally commemorated as a saint 8 June.

Sharpe 1068; Lapidge-Sharpe 303; CPL 1105; J. Gammack: DCB 3, 999; L. Boyle: BS IX, 666-668; SLH 10 (1979), 62-122 (L. Bieler). E. Hogan, Vitae S. Patricii, Brussles 1886, 17-121; W. Stokes, The Tripartite Life of Patrick with Other Documents Relating to That Saint, London 1887, I, 269-300: Liber Ardmachanus, ed. J. Gwynn, Dublin 1913, 3-16, 39-40, 442-452; J.F. Kenney, The Sources of the Early History of Ireland, New York 1929, I, 128; L. Bieler, Studies on the Text of Muirchú: PRIA 52 (1950) 179-220; 59 (1959) 181-195; J.-M. Picard, Structural Patterns in Early Hiberno-Latin Hagiography: Peritia 4 (1985) 67-82.

E. Malaspina

MURATORIAN FRAGMENT. See *CANON, MURATORIAN

MUSANUS, polemicist. According to *Eusebius (HE IV, 28), Musanus wrote a very rigorous book for some Christians tending toward *encratism. This book has not survived, but it seems that Eusebius was still able to consult it. The dating of his activities remains uncertain, whether at the time of *Marcus Aurelius (Eus., HE 4, 21; see also Jerome, Vir. Ill. 31, which depends on Eusebius) or of *Septimius Severus (Eus.-Jer., Chron. XII year of Severus: GCS p. 212). His place of origin (*Egypt or *Asia Minor) is also uncertain.

DCB 3, 1003f.; LTK³ 7, 542.

A. Pollastri

MUSEUS of Marseille (d. ca. 461). Priest of Marseille who lived in the 5th c. and died around 461, highly educated and an expert in the Holy Scriptures. According to *Gennadius (De vir. Ill. 79 [80]), at the request of the bishop Venerius and then of his successor Eustathius, he composed a lectionary (Lectiones totius anni), a responsorial (Responsoria psalmorum capitula), a sacramentary and probably a collection of *homilies. Unfortunately the liturgical works of Museus are difficult to trace, and historians have struggled to reconstruct them. Two fragments of the responsorial are found in the National Library of Paris (New Acquisitions 1628).

CPL 1947. A. Stuiber, Libelli Sacramentorum Romani (Bonn 1950); G. Berti, Il più antico lezionario della Chiesa: EphLit 68 (1954) 147-154; Kl. Gamber, Das Lektionar und Sakramentar des Musaeus von Marsilia: RBen 69 (1959) 198-225; C. Vogel, Introduction aux sources de l'histoire du culte, Turin 1975, 25, 259, 290; Patrologia III, 499.

M. Maritano

MUSIC. If the ecclesiastical chant was widely practiced from the first few centuries of the spread of Christianity, it never brought about, at least in the patristic age, the rise of a corresponding musicological literature designed to inform us about the technique and execution of its theoretical presuppositions. Among the Greek Fathers, it is possible to grasp here and there scattered references to particular features of ecclesiastical chant and value judgments about the use of this or that instrument, but these are still isolated insights, never framed in a systematic treatment, inasmuch as they are short and concise. Nor is it possible to find any mention of chants from the primitive church from the many musicological treatises in Greek by authors such as Nicomachus, Gaudentius, Ptolemy and many others flourishing in the early centuries of this era. In the Latin West it is possible to speak of a real and genuine Christian musicological literature: works like De musica by St. *Augustine, De institutione musica by *Boethius, the musicological sections of the Institutiones of *Cassiodorus and the Etymologiae of *Isidore of Seville. However, these are works, in the wake of the encyclopedic tradition opened in *Rome by Varro, in which music is mostly treated as a mathematical discipline and detached, as such, from its artistic aspect. Thus, e.g., St. Augustine's De musica, while it offers us in its 6th book a prestigious essay of musical aesthetics of fundamental importance for the reconstruction of the first phase of the thought of the future bishop of Hippo, it tells us nothing concrete in the first five books (all focused on the arithmetic consideration of various meters) regarding the music of his time. The same is true for De institutione musica of Boethius that, though a constant point of reference for the theoretical speculations of medieval musicologists, it is not, in substance, anything but a work of mere scholarly compilation divorced from contemporary practice. No different in character are the later compilations of Cassiodorus and Isidore, even if in the latter—despite certain unique contradictions—it is possible to note here and there a greater concession to the practical aspect. It should be noted in conclusion that numerous witnesses testify to the interest of the Venerable *Bede in the art of sounds, even if the so-called Musica theorica, a systematic collection of scholia on the Boethian musical treatises, is unlikely to have been written by him.

F. Amerio, Il De musica di S. Agostino: Didaskaleion 7 (1929) 1-196; J. Quasten, Music and Worship in Pagan and Christian Antiquity, Washington, DC 1983 (2nd ed. orig. German, Münster 1973); J. McKinnon, Music in Early Christian Literature, Cambridge 1987; Ph. Bernard, Les chants liturgiques chrétiens en Occident, source nouvelle pour la connaissance de l'Antiquité tardive? Une archéologie musicale au service de l'histoire: Antiquité tardive 3 (1995) 147-157; Augustine Through the Ages: An Encyclopedia, ed. A. Fitzgerald, Grand Rapids, MI 1999, 572-576; AL 1, 724-728; E. Costa, Canto e musica, in Liturgia (Dizionari S. Paolo), Milan 2001, 302-328; P. Otala González, El De Musica de san Agustín, Valladolid 2005.

U. Pizzani

MUZIANUS (Mutianus) of Antioch (6th c.). Also called scholasticus ("school teacher") and excellent translator from Greek to *Latin, described by *Cassiodorus as disertissimus. At his request, at *Vivarium in Calabria he translated the 34 Homiliae Hebraeos of *John Chrysostom (Inst. 1,8,3: PL 70, 1120). Other translations, whose attribution to Muzianus is uncertain, are lost, such as Chrysostom's Homiliae in Acta Apostolorum (Inst. 1,9,1: PL 70, 1122) and *Gaudentius's De musica (Inst. 2,5,1: PL 70, 1208). Generally he is identified with the Mocianus scholasticus against whom *Facundus of Hermiane wrote.

DTC 10, 2544 and 10, 978; PG 63, 237-456.

S.J. Voicu

MYSTAGOGY. In the Greek patristic literature, the term μυσταγωγία, with the related forms μυσταγωγέω and μυσταγωγός, has connections with the semantic development of the term μυστήριον. Initially it had the primary meaning of initiation into the mysteries (arcane things or teachings). Over time this came to refer to pagan rites and myths (see Iren., Adv. Haer. I,15,6; I,23,3 in Eus., HE IV,11,4f.) that were sometimes treated as a demonic imitation of Christian rites (see Just., 1 Apol. 66,4). In Alexandrian theology, however, language for *mystery functions to describe both initial conversion and esp. the ascent of the *gnostic believer toward union with God (see Clem. Alex., Strom. IV, 162,3: Orig., C. Cels. III, 60; Com. Jo. fr. 36). The Logos was presented as the hierophant that leads the μύστης into the light of God (see Clem. Alex., Protr. XII, 120).

This spiritual theme, already articulated in *Philo of Alexandria (see Vita Moysis III,3), would always be found in later authors. *Gregory of Nyssa is the most famous example in this regard (texts in Daniélou 189-193). The expanding cultural horizons of the 4th c. further contributed to a sacramental orientation, already suggested by the baptismal imagery of some earlier texts on spirituality (see Studer, Mysterienfeier, 29-32). In this sense preachers, esp. *Cyril of Jerusalem and *John Chrysostom, present the *catechetical lessons on *baptism and on the *Eucharist as mystagogy (Cyr. Jer., Cat. 19,11; 20,1), doing the same for the *sacraments themselves (Greg. Nyss., C. Eunom. 11: PG 45, 881C; In diem luminum: PG 46, 584C; John Chrys., Hom. in Jo. 85,3; PG 59, 463; Cat. bapt. 5,18: SC 50bis, 209; Cyr. Alex., Comm. in Is. 5,2: PG 70, 1196) or even for the words of institution in the *Eucharist (John Chrys., Hom. in 1 Cor. 27,4: PG 61, 229). It is quite remarkable how this sacramental meaning is profoundly interconnected with the spiritual meaning. According to *Basil of Caesarea, therefore, the mystagogy in the name of the Father, Son and Holy Spirit brings to us the knowledge of God (De Sp. s. 29,75: SC 17bis, 516f.). The Latin patristic literature, while receiving the theme of the mysterium (μυστήριον), does not seem to have retained the term μυσταγωγία. Nonetheless, *Ambrose of Milan adopts the language for mystery in his catechetical writings on the sacraments (see De myst. I, 1,1). Also noteworthy is the fact that *Augustine of Hippo, in his paschal theology (Ep. 55), speaks of the divine eloquence that is articulated through the sacramenta ("*symbols, sacred signs"), whether in the Bible or in the liturgy, as an expression of the deepest love of God (see B. Studer, Mysterienfeier, 32-36, with Aug., Ep. 55,7[12f.], 10 [19]).

Lampe 890-891; H. Stephanus, Thesaurus Graecae Linguae, Graz 1954 (repr.), 6, 1312-1313; J. Daniélou, Platonisme et Théologie mystique, Paris 1944; H.M. Riley, Christian Initiation, Washington 1974 (passim); J. Finkenzeller, Die Lehre von den Sakramenten im allgemeinen: HDG IV/1a, Freiburg 1980 (bibl.); B. Studer, Der christliche Gottesdienst eine Mysterienfeier: Stud. Ans. 113 (1993) 27-45; B. Studer, Ambrogio di Milano, teologo mistagogico, SEA 50, Rome 1997, 569-586 (bibl.); A. Wollbold: LTK³ 7, 570-571; RGG 5 (2002) 1635ff.

B. Studer

MYSTERY. Even if the etymological explanations of μυστήριον remain unclear, the fundamental meaning of the Greek concerns a secret that is to be hidden and that is to be shown only to the initiated. In this sense, the word is found primarily in the so-called mystery religions. *Plato, however, further applied the language of mystery to the concept of initiation into the most profound truths of philosophy. Yet the first Christian usage of μυστήριον does not derive from this double meaning. Instead, it grows out of apocalyptic Judaism, in which μυστήριον refers to the heavenly realities to be revealed at the end of the ages, but communicated in advance to a visionary. Thus in the corpus paulinum the term refers to the salvific design of divine knowledge, hidden in ages past, revealed in Christ, proclaimed by the apostles and fully manifested in the *parousia of the Lord.

This "Pauline" meaning, even if reduced to a single event in the life of Jesus, came to be constantly present in patristic theology. There is also a great degree of dependence on the "exegetical sense." In this concept, the events and characters of the OT, as anticipatory realizations of God's salvific purpose, are mysteries, types and figures of the underlying realities of Christ and of the church. This happens for the first time in *Justin Martyr, who introduces the concept into the framework of his theology in which history is directed by the Logos of God.

This usage finds its best expression in *Origen, for whom everything in both creation and history (first of all the Scriptures, and then the incarnation and the church) is a symbol and a mystery of the Logos.

Beginning with Justin, the pagan mysteries appear in the literature, at first in an entirely negative sense as an imitation of Christian rites. Only in the 4th c. would this particular meaning of ritual receive a positive evaluation. *Athanasius, and most of all *Cyril of Jerusalem and the subsequent church fathers, would apply it to the Christian rites and to consecrated things, esp. the Eucharist. *John Chrysostom would provide further shades of meaning with a "tremendous" mystery. The same pattern is found in ps.-*Dionysius. Beginning with *Clement of Alexandria, the specifically philosophical sense makes its way into Christian theology. As time goes on, the language of mystery becomes a way of describing the spiritual ascension of the *soul toward the vision of the transcendent God. Although other layers of meaning tend to intrude, this developing sense of mystery no longer indicates just the secret teaching but also God's ineffable truth that is only knowable through God's gracious revelation. This is seen most clearly in *Gregory of Nyssa, who expounded the most elaborate doctrine of mystery. Finally, it is noteworthy that the multiple levels of meaning in the term μυστήριον are essentially passed over in the Latin renditions mysterium and sacramentum*.

TWNT 4, 809-834 (TDNT 4, 802-828); J. Daniélou, Le Mystère du culte dans les sermons de s. Grégoire de Nysse, in Vom christlichen Mysterium, Düsseldorf 1951, 76-93; H. Crouzel, Origène et la connaissance mystique, Paris 1961; J. Finkenzeller, HDG IV/1a, Freiburg 1980, 4-23 (bibl.); E. Ruffini - E. Lodi, eds., "Mysterion" e "Sacramentum," Bologna 1987; B. Neunheuser, Mistero: NDizLit (1988) 805-823 (bibl.); B. Studer, Der christliche Gottesdienst eine Mysterienfeier?: Stud. Ans. 113 (1993) 26-45 (bibl.); D. Zeller, in TRE 23 (1994) 504-526, esp. 519-522: Mysterien und frühes Christentum (bibl.); LTK[3] 7, 577-582, esp. 580 (E.M. Faber).

B. Studer

MYSTICAL BODY. The expression mystical body (of Christ) is part of contemporary theological language and refers to the church; as such, it draws its origins only marginally from the patristic tradition, although the 20th-c. theologians who systematically elaborated its content did so with ample recourse to the writings of the Fathers. The expression's importance is accentuated by its reception by the Catholic magisterium with Pius XII's encyclical Mystici Corporis (1943). The Pauline terminology on which it is based is "body (or flesh) of Christ," which has three possible applications: physical body of Christ (mortal: Col 1:22, and glorious: Phil 3:21), eucharistic body of Christ (1 Cor 10:16-17) and ecclesial body of Christ (1 Cor 12:27). The addition of the adjective "mystical" is a specification: in clear contraposition to "physical," it can refer to both of the other meanings, and in fact the history of the semantic content of the term mystical body displays an oscillation and a mutual relation between them. The first documented use is in the Latin translation of *Hesychius of Jerusalem's Commentary on Leviticus, written in the 1st half of the 5th c. (PG 93, 1070 C-D), and refers to the *Eucharist; Hesychius's use of the term is confirmed by a Greek fragment on the Psalms with the same meaning (μυστικὸν σῶμα, in PG 93, 1285 CD). Drawn from Hesychius, the expression reappears in Rabanus Maurus's Expositiones in Leviticum (9th c.) (PL 108, 492 D), becoming a common term within a few decades because of the discussions on the Eucharist at that time (Paschasius Radbert, Ratramnus and others): mystical body was used to indicate the sacrament—the true body—whose function was to build up the church. The use of mystical body in reference to the church and no longer to the Eucharist, already observable in the 12th c., was confirmed in the following century, clearly in order to emphasize eucharistic realism: the church is the mystical body, the Eucharist the true body. Systematic analysis of the possible ecclesiological implications of mystical body was begun in the 19th c. by theologians attempting to overcome an apologetic approach resulting from anti-Protestant polemic, which reduced the church to its visible/institutional aspect (J.A. Möhler, J.H. Newman, M.J. Scheeben); although Vatican I intentionally avoided designating the church the mystical body, research continued in the 1st half of the 20th c. (E. Mersch, S. Tromp and others), resulting in its acceptance by the Catholic magisterium. The patristic documentation drawn upon by these theologians clearly echoes their intended purpose: the affirmation of the status, at once visible/institutional (body) and invisible/spiritual (mystical), of the church; this double "nature" was never called into question in the patristic era, and thus all the applications of "body of Christ" to the church in the Fathers' writings were apt for the purpose: this accounts for the abundance, but also the heterogeneity, of the witnesses adopted. Moreover, these studies have made plain how the Fathers used the image of the body of Christ to illustrate various aspects of the relationship between "multiplicity" (of the faithful) and "unity" (of the church).

If the uniting of all the faithful in the body of Christ starts in *baptism and is manifest, acc. to *Irenaeus, in the profession of the same faith, guaranteed by the bishops, successors of the *apostles (Ad. Haer. IV, 33,8), the sacrament ordered to realizing the unity of the ecclesial body of Christ is the Eucharist: already in Didache* 9,4 we find the image of the grains scattered on the mountain, gathered into a single loaf, to signify the effect of the Eucharist, which gathers the faithful; appearing again in other liturgical texts (Euchology of Serapion; Ap. Const. VII,25,3; Anaphora of Deir Balyzeh), it was used to illustrate the close relation between the eucharistic body and the ecclesial body, together with the analogous image of the wine produced from different grapes (Cypr., Ep. 69,5,2; John Chrys., Hom. 24 in 1Cor.). *Augustine esp., grappling with the divisions caused by the *Donatists, developed its implications esp. in mystagogical contexts, explaining the Eucharist in this way: just as fire is needed to obtain the eucharistic bread from the dough, composed of grains (the faithful) and water (baptism), so the *Holy Spirit is necessary for the ecclesial body of Christ as the unifying element (Ser. 227; 229,1; 272; also in Gaudentius of Brescia, Hom. Pas. 2), almost the soul of the ecclesial body (Ser. 267,4; 268,2; Tr. in Joh. XXVI, 13-14). We thus arrive at the "ontological" unification of the ecclesial body (Ser. 229/A,1: quod accipitis, vos estis, gratia qua redempti estis; subscribitis, quando "Amen" respondetis. Hoc quod videtis, sacramentum est unitatis; similarly, Ser. 229,1; 272; also in *Cyril of Alexandria, as a reflection of the unity of the divine substance: Tr. in Joh. XI,11), the body of which Christ is the head and Christians the members (Ser. 45,5; 229/A; Tr. in Joh. XXVI,15).

The identification with the Eucharist implies that the sacrifice of the Head would at the same time be the sacrifice of the members, brought about by their death to the world to live in God, through temperance, *ascesis, and works of mercy (De Civ. Dei, X, 6): mere ritual participation in the Eucharist is not enough to truly belong to the body of Christ (De Civ. Dei, XXI, 25,3-4); by the same token, the sufferings of each member belong to the Head and to the whole body (En. in Ps. 61,4; 62, 2), just as the prayer of each member has its basis in that of Christ (qui et oret pro nobis, et oret in nobis, et oretur a nobis: En. in Ps. 85,1). For *John Chrysostom, mercy, expressed through almsgiving, guarantees unity beyond social divisions, precisely because the poor by their sufferings participate in a special way in Christ's sacrifice (Hom. in 2Cor. 20; Hom. in Mat. 50,3-4). In Augustine the Head/member distinction within the one body (totus Christus), which includes the saints of the OT (De Cat. Rud. III, 7), becomes a paradigm of biblical hermeneutics: taken from *Tyconius's Liber Regularum (De Doct. Chr. XXXI,44: the scriptural statements can refer to Christ/Head or to the members; XXXI,45: they can concern the true members of the body, saints, or the false members, sinners), the paradigm is applied in a particular way in the explanation of the Psalms (emblematic is a passage from En. in Ps. 100,3: cantat enim hoc Christus; si solum caput cantat, a Domino est canticum hoc, ad nos non pertinet; si autem totus Christus, id est caput et corpus eius, esto in membris eius, adhaere illi per fidem, et per spem, et per caritatem; et in illo cantas, in illo exsultas; quia et ipse in te laborat, in te sitit, in te esurit et tribulatur). Even now the members receive from the Head a participation in the *resurrection (En. in Ps. 100,3: ille in te adhuc moritur, et tu in illo iam resurrexisti), in view of the eschatological fulfillment (Tr. in Joh. XXVI, 17), as we find already in Irenaeus (Ad. Haer. II, 19,3), in *Origen (Comm. in Joh. X, 36,236-238) and esp. in *Hilary: if through baptism and the Eucharist the members already participate in the body of Christ, thanks to the *incarnation, the goal is glorification, possible because the Head has gone before them and awaits them in the resurrection (Tr. in Ps 13,4; 51,3).

S. Tromp, Corpus Christi quod est Ecclesia, Romae 1937; S.J. Grabowski, St. Augustine and the Doctrine of the Mystical Body of Christ: ThS 7 (1946) 72-125; E. Mersch, Le corps mystique du Christ, Paris [3]1951; H. de Lubac, Corpus mysticum, Paris 1949; M. Réveillaud, Le Christ-Homme, tête de l'église. Étude d'ecclésiologie selon les Enarrationes in Psalmos d'Augustin: RecAug 6 (1968) 67-94; B. Bruning - T.J. van Bavel, Die Einheit des "Totus Christus" bei Augustinus: C.P. Mayer, ed., Scientia augustiniana, Würzburg 1975, 43-75; J.M.R. Tillard, Chair de l'Église, chair du Christ, Paris 1992; S. Alberto, "Corpus Suum mystice constituit" (LG7), La Chiesa corpo mistico di Cristo nel primo capitolo della "Lumen gentium," Regensburg 1996; S. Mirbach, Ihr aber seid Leib Christi, Regensburg 1998; V. Grossi, Sant'Agostino. L'Eucaristia corpo della Chiesa, Rome 2000.

A. Grappone

MYSTICISM – MYSTICAL THEOLOGY. The terms mysterion and mystikos signify something of a "hidden" quality and of a "secret," as they do in classical Greece. The mystical phenomenon primarily indicates a movement through an object, going above and beyond the limits of empirical experience. The Christian mystical literature is characterized by the connection with the "mystery" of Christ, with the divine design to "reunite everything in Christ" (Eph 1:9-10; Col 1:20-27). This corresponds to the intention hidden in the mind of God, which in the last days has been revealed through the historic event of the incarnate Logos, even if it continues to surpass human comprehension. In a comparative analysis, however, elements of "mystery" are already seen in *Plato, as in the Symposium, which speaks of the perfect and initiatory teachings (210a), and in the Phaedrus, which describes the contemplation of the supercelestial world (250b; 250e). The Platonic tradition had revived this element of "mystery." Plutarch defined the highest level of philosophy, namely theology, as "initiatory," and the knowledge of the highest divinity as "initiation" (Isis and Osiris 382D; Table Talk VIII, 2,718CD). According to Alcinous, some teachings of Plato, as the famous passage of Timaeus 28c demonstrates, were reserved for the few (Didask. p. 179, 33-34), and the term "to be initiated" refers to the study of the highest level of philosophy (p. 182,8). The same tension appears in Maximus of Tyre (see diss. 4,5) and in Apuleius, who declares that he is dedicated to a great number of religions (Apol. 55,9). Of course, this and even greater tension is found in *gnosticism, which routinely employs the term mystery to indicate the knowledge of the highest reality at the heart of religion.

In consequence, does the Christian theoria* derive from the Bible, or is it a philosophical legacy? Right from the start, we are faced with the problem of whether the experience of God is a purely intellectual phenomenon along the lines of philosophy (and more specifically along Platonic lines), or whether it is necessary instead to postulate a direct contact with God, above and beyond any form of mediation. In Christian thought, and most of all at the city of *Alexandria in *Egypt with its reception of many religious influences, the syncretism introduced a strong interest in the forms of religious expression. *Clement of Alexandria examines the matter in the 5th and 6th books of the Stromata. Otherwise, already the exegetes had tried to find something "suggestive" in a word, a number or an object. *Justin Martyr finds a typological meaning in the use of the words "rod" and "wood" (Dial. 86,1-6); for Clement, the biblical names are open to etymological interpretation (Eclogae propheticae 32). *Origen, at the end of the Homilies on Numbers, associates every "station" in the desert with an etymological analysis that reveals its true meaning for the ascent of the *soul. He defends his analysis by claiming that the name of each station of the Israelites' wandering in the desert, and the stage between one and another station, indicates the progress of intelligence and signifies the growth of the virtues.

Clement makes use of the symbology of mystery in order to demonstrate to his readers at Alexandria, who were certainly aware of the *pagan mysteries and their associated rites, that there is a new and Christian initiation. He sets out to portray Christianity by strongly emphasizing a mystical formulation, anticipating the argument of Origen. Fundamental to this task is the exhortation which concludes the Protrepticus (118,4–119,1; 120,1). Here Clement wants to demonstrate to the pagans the new, true mystery, the Christian mystery, the only one that can bring them purification and salvation, in contrast with the much more familiar Eleusinian mysteries. In this text, he modifies the pagan "mysteries" with a Christian sense: now the true Savior is the Logos of God, while the Christian is the new initiate who is distinguished and contrasted with the profane, in this case the pagan. Yet Justin had established a precedent, as has been noted. In fact, he had engaged in polemic against the pagan mysteries, in his days very prevalent and threatening to the Christian message, much more so than traditional religion (1 Apol. 54; 66). According to Justin, the cult of Mithras was a pagan forgery of the *Eucharist; the same idea is found in *Tertullian's treatise titled De corona militis. Instead, the true mystery is the one contained in Scripture.

Clement, therefore, sees the mystical aspect as being present in the knowledge of God: reaching God is an illumination. This is esp. highlighted by Völker, who emphasizes that acc. to Clement, the saint no longer sees through a mirror, but with absolutely clarity and pure vision, and he strives to become like God by remaining in a state of union with God (Strom. VII, 3,14,1). The true science, then, is the science of knowing God (II, 10,47,4), and therefore the science of God is a mystical phenomenon, in contrast with the thinking of the Greek philosophers. The "true gnostic," having passed through all the states of mystical experience, comes face-to-face with God (VII, 10,57,1). According to Lilla, however, this concept is not unique to Clement. He argues that not only did it spread through the Egyptian cultural context of the 2nd and 3rd c. but also that it has always been a feature of gnosticism. Moreover, gnosis has a strong esoteric component, acc. to which the innermost teachings are not to be revealed to everyone but are reserved for a few, and precisely for those who have been shown to be worthy of them. One finds this idea in Clement (Strom. V, 19,2-3; 56,3), who even cites Plato with passages from the Republic (494a), the Theaetetus (155e) and the Epinomis (973e), interpreting them in a sense of mystery. He finds confirmation in the saying of Mt 22:14 ("Many are called, but few are chosen"), to which he associates the saying of Socrates in the Phaedo (69c: "Many are those who carry the sacred basket to Bacchus, but the initiates are few"). He interprets Mt 10:26 in the same way: "There is nothing hidden from you that will not be manifested, and nothing covered that will not be revealed." Clement is often insistent on affirming that the gnosis is something hidden, to which only a few can arrive. The hidden quality of these teachings explains why he refers to them with the term "mysteries." In other contexts, the term is found in three passages of the synoptic gospels (Mt 13:11; Mk 4:11; Lk 8:10) and in Paul (1 Cor 2:7, Eph 3:3-4, 9). Yet the Jewish wisdom tradition had already emphasized the quality of mystery in the highest teachings, namely, those that concern God (see Wis 6:22). Furthermore, such a concept constantly occurs in *Philo of Alexandria. It is likely that Clement was influenced by the Alexandrian tradition.

Furthermore, Origen maintains in Against Celsus (VII, 10) that revelation, enfolded in a material wrapping, is a "mystery" whose external features are "signs," "types," "images" and "symbols." The use of terms and concepts for mystery in defining the Christian revelation is most clearly evident in Against Celsus, the work in which Origen has to take on the corresponding pagan conceptions of mystery and contrast them with the Christian conceptions. He makes note that the existence of the mysteries was also known by the pagan philosophers, including the Pythagoreans (Against Celsus I, 7), and was also known throughout the Greek world (I, 9). Yet the Christians are also capable, and certainly no less so than the pagans, of examining and explaining the prophetic enigmas, the gospel parables and countless other things that have been given in symbolic terms, even if the vast majority of the faithful are not able to comprehend all of this in a rational way. In other contexts, the sages of *Egypt and *Persia also reached the same level of understanding. The initiations were present among the sages; they are interpreted "rationally" by the gathered members, while the popular celebrations are enacted in symbols. As Sfameni observes, the matter does not so much involve the Persian cults, among which there was no esoteric practice of initiation, but primarily the Mithraic mysteries that were familiar to Celsus (VI, 12).

Thus for Origen the rites of mystery and the mythic narratives that refer to them, together with the whole body of texts concerning religious traditions, contain a hidden lesson, comprehensible only through a kind of "rational" reading that requires a scrupulous application of the rules of *allegory. Therefore, he also employs the various terms of pagan language concerning mystery, such as epopteia ("illumination") and mystagōgia ("initiation"). *Baptism is treated as a symbol of purification, and in the symbolic sense it is not different from the preliminary purifications that exist in pagan rites. Origen distinguishes between persons who are "advancing" and those who are "commencing" in the way of salvation and of knowledge. The imagery of illumination and light allows him to clarify the process of deepening growth into Christian truth, in the manner of illumination found in the mystery cults. The same Platonic and Pythagorean teachings on the immortality of the soul contain a mystery that Christianity first accepts and then poses once again, yet with a new and greater degree of authority (Against Celsus III, 81). In a passage of his Commentary on John (VI, 3,15.16), he resorts to using a series of terms that possess a resounding echo of mystery, such as "perfect gnosis," "demonstration," "initiation" and "contemplation." Yet in this conception we must recognize Origen's intense interest in biblical *exegesis, considered to be the unique instrument for reaching comprehension of the divine revelation. In fact, it is repeated not only in his writing against Celsus but also in his homilies. Thus in the Homilies on Genesis he keeps restating, "to penetrate such a vast sea of mysteries" (IX, 1); "see how such a great cloud of mysteries pursues us" (X, 5); "all things that have been written are of the mysteries" (X, 2); "they are not told through the stories of history, yet they are woven into the mysteries" (X, 4); "seeing that all these great mysteries are concealed in the divine Scriptures" (XIII, 4). And in the Homilies on Leviticus, he says, "I am sure that in my exegesis the greatness of the mysteries surpasses my abilities. Yet even if I am not capable of treating everything, nonetheless we are aware that everything is full of mysteries" (III,8). With these words, Origen develops and accentuates, even in accordance with the ideas of his time, the famous Pauline declaration (1 Cor 2:6–3:4). The Logos is he who unveils the Christian mystery and allows human persons to be initiated by this renewing experience (see Comm. on Mt. XIX, 14; Comm. on Jn XIII, 25 ; XIII, 50 etc.).

The doctrine of mystery, proposed in general terms by Origen for the Christian religion, is revisited and expanded, yet limited to a personal experience of the knowledge of God by *Gregory of Nyssa, a follower of Origen. His adaptation is vividly described by the expression "stretching forward" (epektasis), taken from Phil 3:13. The mystical ascent is uninterrupted, due to the limitedness of the soul in tension with the unlimitedness of the object that the soul yearns to reach. This progression, when considered in the context of intellectual knowledge, already appeared in *Plotinus, who had placed the knowledge of the One at the summit of the ascent. The mystical experience, therefore, represents the highest level of knowledge of God, the peak of gnosis. Such knowledge, however, is a dark shadow. This is affirmed in The Life of Moses, where the same sense of interpretation is given to the darkness that surrounds Moses, who has climbed the mountain (Ex 26 and 27), and in a passage of the Homilies on the Song of Songs (XI, p. 322ff.). The dark shadow signifies the obscurity that surrounds the senses and the faculty of reason, which are incapable of the knowledge of God, since this knowledge is altogether unreachable. Once having surpassed this first level of darkness, however, one will not gain an illumination of the reality of God: the human person always enters into the darkness, yet can never go out from it. This teaching finds precedent with Philo of Alexandria and in his concept of "sober drunkenness." The person who is capable of contemplating God moves out of earthly senses, as if drunk, but such drunkenness is in reality sober, since it permits a state of knowledge.

The concept that the word of God constitutes a mystery is extended to the very wording of Scripture by the great biblical philologist *Jerome. This is more significant than it may seem at first sight. In the translation of the Holy Scriptures, even the ordo verborum is a mysterium (Epist. 57,5,2). In this scheme, the premise that translation in general need not be verbum de verbo, but ad sensum, is no longer valid for Scripture, where one applies the norm of mystery.

The last of the great patristic theologians who treat the doctrine of mystery and of the mystical is *Dionysius the Areopagite in his Mystical Theology. Union with God is an experience that withdraws from any sensory or intellectual activity, by placing the highest divinity above and outside of any affirmation or negation, any word or thought. God appears as the one who is approached within the dark shadow of the unknowable, as in the experience of Moses at Sinai; the knowledge that one can have of God is the experience of not knowing. The mystical darkness is the expression of this reality; the entry into the darkness is represented by the total absence of word and thought. The first Letter also associates the knowledge of God with the experience of not knowing, and the fifth reprises the argument of the divine shadow, into which the person who wants to attain to the knowledge of God must enter. The way of negation, acc. to which one knows not that which God is, but only that which he is not, eventually finds resolution in not knowing and in silence. A person must become like God by going beyond human intelligence and by being reduced to a total unity. In the mystical union, the human mind loses its own identity and no longer belongs to itself, but only to the desired object that has attracted it. The themes of contemplation, ecstasy and shadows were developed and exploited through the path of ps.-Dionysius in the medieval period and by the Carmelite mystical teaching.

A particularly important component of the Christian mystical tradition is the one called the "mystical light." For Christians, it is certain that the divine mystery is made known through a revelation of the Spirit that takes place at different levels. One speaks of ecstasy in realizing the suspension of human faculties. The first step of ecstasy, acc. to the definition of prayer given by *Nilus of Ancyra, is "a total rapture of the spirit, outside the realm of the senses" (Ad Magnam 27: PG 79, 1004 A). In the state of ecstasy, human intelligence can forget everything that is not God. *Philoxenus of Mabbug (Exhortation to a Jewish Convert, 5: Fr. tr., M. Albert, OrSyr 6 [1961] 44) identifies ecstasy as the state of the soul that has been completely detached from everything that might distract it.

Ecstasy in *Evagrius is more radical; it derives from the theology of apophasis. This is the "infinite ignorance" in all partial notions or concepts, the state of "pure intellectuality." The intellect, image of God, becomes pure light: having reached this summit, the intellect "reflects the light of the Holy Trinity." But it does not go outside of itself: it is not a kind of "ecstasy," but rather of "catastasis." The entry into the life of gnosis constructs the imagery of mystical light.

DSp 2, 1862-1911; 10, 1861-1874, 1889-1984; H. Lewy, Sobria ebrietas. Untersuchungen zur Geschichte der antiken Mystik, Giessen 1929; L. Bouyer, Mystique. Essai sur l'histoire d'un mot: La Vie Spirituelle 3 (1949) 3-23; J. Daniélou, Platonisme et théologie mystique, Paris ²1954; H. Crouzel, Origène et la "connaissance mystique," Paris 1961; S. Lilla, Clement of Alexandria: A Study in Christian Platonism and Gnosticism, London 1971; T. Špidlík, La spiritualité de l'Orient chrétien. Manuel systématique, OCA 206, Rome 1978, 23, 27, 327ff., 386ff. (bibl.); P. Serra Zanetti, Una nota sul "mysterium" dell'"ordo verborum"nelle Scritture: Civiltà Classica e Cristiana VI/3 (1985) 507-520; L. Rizzerio, Clemente di Alessandria e la "physiologia veramente gnostica." Saggio sulle origini e le implicazioni di un'epistemologia e di un'ontologia "cristiana," Leuven 1996; Id., L'accès à la transcendance divine sélon Clement d'Alexandrie: dialectique platonicienne ou expérience de l'"union chrétienne"?: REAug 44 (1998) 159-173; G. Sfameni Gasparro, La terminologia misterica nel linguaggio della rivelazione in Origene, in Lingua e teologia nel cristianesimo greco, Atti del Convegno di Trento (11-12 dic. 1997), Brescia 1999; W. Völker, Gregor von Nyssa als Mystiker, Wiesbaden 1955 (Gregorio di Nissa filosofo e mistico, ed. C. Moreschini, It. tr., C.O. Tommasi, Milan 1993); S. Lilla, Dionigi l'Areopagita e il platonismo cristiano, Brescia 2005.

C. Moreschini

MYTHOLOGY. In the NT, the term μῦθος is always used in a negative sense (1 Tim 1:4; 4:7; Tit 1:14; 2 Pet 1:16); in 2 Tim 4:4 it is starkly contrasted with ἀλήθεια. The *antithesis μῦθος-ἀλήθεια, largely present in Greek thought and even in *Philo (Exsecr. 162), one also finds in Christian authors and in their polemics against *pagan mythological conceptions; e.g., *Origen claims that one must flee from myths in the search for truth (C. Cels. VIII, 66). Christians frequently emphasized the immorality, *impiety, falsehood and absurdity of pagan myths. *Augustine observed how they are purely human inventions (Civ. Dei XVIII, 13) and have a negative influence on the education of young people (Confess. I, 16,25). The antimythological polemic was already underway with pagan writers like Euhemerus of Messene and Lucian of Samosata. Even *Plato had openly criticized traditional myths (cf. Rep. II, 377ff.; Laws. XII, 941b), as Origen observes (C. Cels. IV, 50). Euhemerus's theory claimed that the gods were only divinized dead men, and it was often used in Christian contexts (see Athenag., Suppl. 28-30; Theoph., Ad Autol. I, 9; Min. Fel., Oct. 21; Tertull., Apol. 10,3; 11,1; Firm. Mat., De err. prof. relig. 2,3). In their refutation of myths, Christian apologists also rejected their *allegorical interpretation (Aristides, Apol. 13,7; Tat., Orat. 21,2; Orig., C. Cels. V, 38; VIII, 67), calling into question the immorality of those stories that allowed pagans to cover up obscene things as if they were honest through the use of *allegory (Arnob., Adv. Nat. V, 43); not even on these terms were the myths accepted (Orig., C. Cels. IV, 48); the very different Christian narratives were contrasted with them (Just., 1 Apol. 21,1; Tat., Orat. 21,1; Atenag., Suppl. 10,1).

However, we must also note that an apologist like *Justin expressed a clear condemnation of pagan myths but also sought to establish a parallel between some aspects of them with Christian concepts. As H. Rahner observes in regard to 1 Apol. 22, "Justin [is led to] a daring feat of apologetics, in which he actually sets the Hermes-Logos [of the Greeks] and the Christian Jesus-Logos more or less side by side, saying: 'In this we are one with you' he writes 'we both regard the Logos, whom you call Hermes, as the messenger of God'" (Greek Myths, p. 196-197). In the same passage just cited, the apologist, always making reference to Jesus, continues: "In maintaining that he is born of a Virgin, we liken him to Perseus. In maintaining that he restored health to the crippled, the lame and those with birth defects, and raised the dead, we establish a resemblance with the wondrous attributes of your Asclepius" (I. Giordani, San Giustino. Le apologie, Rome 1962, 89). Naturally, this does not prevent Justin from strongly affirming that Christian doctrine is the only truth, earlier than every pagan writer, and that before the *incarnation of the Son of God some, instigated by *demons, anticipated him by selling their fantastical myths as history (1 Apol. 23).

The reinterpretation of some mythical themes in proto-Christian literature and art is very interesting—e.g., the motif of Odysseus bound to the masthead of the ship. This scene was depicted on Christian *sarcophagi, and came to signify that which bound the believer to the wood of the *cross, the door through which one enters salvation. This Christian reinterpretation of the myth of Odysseus and the Sirens pervades the writings of the fathers of the church, as Rahner has made clear (328ff.). There are diverse mythical themes that proto-Christian art reinterprets and uses for iconography such as the sun on the chariot of fire, the head of Medusa, Eros and Psyche, *Orpheus, as a guide for souls, Hermes in whom the Good *Shepherd is refigured.

GLNT 7, 537-630 (TDNT 4, 762-795); M. Carena, La critica della mitologia pagana negli Apologeti greci del II secolo: Didaskaleion n.s. 1 (1923) 23-55 (fasc. I) and 3-42 (fasc. III); H. Rahner, Greek Myths and Christian Mystery, London 1963; TRE 23, 597-678; V. Pyykkö, Die griechischen Mythen bei den grossen Kappadokiern und bei Johannes Chrysostomos, Turku 1991; M. Fiedrowicz, Apologie im frühen Christentum, Paderborn 2000.

S. Zincone

N

NABOR and FELIX. Milanese martyrs. Their feast is celebrated in *Milan on 12 July, following the passion. In the Mart. hier. the 10th and 11th are also mentioned, but these are erroneous duplications. The details given for the 10th contains corrupted details taken from the passion; acc. to this, the martyrs were of African origin, suffered martyrdom at Lodi, and their bodies were transferred from there to Milan. In the church named after them in Milan the bodies of Sts. *Gervasius and Protasius were found, whose cult subsequently eclipsed their own.

Delehaye OC 335-337; LTK[2] 7, 755; Vies des SS. 7, 268; BS 9, 689-693.

V. Saxer

NAG HAMMADI (writings of). Library of *Coptic translations of Greek writings, discovered accidentally by Muhammad 'Ali al-Sammân Muhammad Khalîfah in Dec 1945 near Nag Hammadi, Egypt (ancient Khenoboskion, between Siut and Luxor), to the N of Hamra Dom, near the city of Farshut. He found a broken jar full of *papyri, which were in part subsequently burned by his mother to stoke the fire. What remained was sold on the black market through traffickers in ancient artifacts, attracting the attention of the Egyptian government, and ending up in part in the Museum of Cairo, and in part purchased by the Jung Foundation on the counsel of the historian of religions G. Quispel, who studied photographs of the others in Cairo, discovering first the Gospel of Thomas and then other writings.

The library of Nag Hammadi contains thirteen codices, eight pages having been removed in *Late Antiquity and folded into the cover of the seventh, which has provided us with a complete text. Each codex, with the exception of the tenth, consists of a collection of relatively brief works, making a total of 52 treatises. Here is a schema of the principal treatises of the library: Codex I: The Prayer of the Apostle Paul; The Apocryphon of James; The Gospel of Truth; The Treatise on the Resurrection; Codex II: The Apocryphon of John; The Gospel of Philip; The Hypostasis of the Archons; On the Origin of the World; The Exegesis on the Soul; The Book of Thomas the Contender; The Gospel of Thomas; Codex III: Eugnostos the Blessed; The Wisdom of Jesus Christ; The Dialogue of the Savior; The Gospel of the Egyptians; Codex V: The First Apocalypse of James; The Second Apocalypse of James; The Apocalypse of Adam; The Apocalypse of Paul; Codex VI: The Acts of Peter and the Twelve Apostles; The Thunder: Perfect Mind; Authoritative Teaching; The Concept of Our Great Power; The Prayer of Thanksgiving; Asclepius; The Discourse on the Eighth and the Ninth; Codex VII: The Paraphrase of Shem; The Second Treatise of the Great Seth; The Three Steles of Seth; The Apocalypse of Peter; The Teachings of Silvanus; Codex VIII: Letter of Peter to Philip; Zostrianos; Codex IX: The Thought of Norea; The Testimony of Truth; Melchizedek; Codex X: Marsanes; Codex XI: The Interpretation of Knowledge; A Valentinian Exposition; On Baptism, A-B; Hypsiphrone; Allogenes; On the Eucharist A-B; Codex XII: The Sentences of Sextus; The Gospel of Truth; Codex XIII: Trimorphic Protennoia; On the Origin of the World. Of these, six are duplicated: The Apocryphon of John is present in three versions: II, 1; III, 1; IV, 1; two of Eugnostos: III, 3 and V, 1; two of The Gospel of Truth I, 3 and XII, 2; two of The Untitled Text: II, 5 and XIII, 2 (both to be found in the translation of H.G. Bethge - B. Layton, On The Origin of The World [II, 5 and XIII, 2], in J.M. Robinson, The Nag Hammadi Library in English, [4]1996, 170-189). Six were already known before the discovery of the library, either in the Greek original (VI, 5: a passage from Plato, Republic, 588B-589B; VI, 6: a Hermetic prayer of thanksgiving; XII, 1: The Sentences of Sextus) or in *Latin (VI, 8 = Asclepius 21-29) or Coptic (II, 1 and parallels: Apocryphon of John, Giovanni; III, 4: The Wisdom of Jesus Christ) translations. Of the forty new treatises that remain, some (VIII, 1; IX, 1, 2, 3; X, 1; XI, 1, 2, 3, 4; XII, 2) are very fragmentary.

The contents of the library are therefore not specifically *gnostic. Alongside the passage of Plato and The Sentences of Sextus, we can note The Teachings of Silvanus (VII, 3), an example of Christian Wisdom literature, originating in all probability in a monastic setting. The Acts of Peter and the Twelve Apostles (VI, 1) do not contain any specifically gnostic themes, although certain motifs (the stranger, the journey, the hidden pearl) could be easily accommodated to a gnostic interpretation. The group of *Hermetic writings, VI, 6 (The Discourse on the Eighth [Ogdoad] and the Ninth [Ennead], tr. J. Brashler - P.A. Dirkse - D. M. Parrott in The Nag Hammadi Library in English, ed. J.M. Robinson. Leiden-New York [4]1996) is closely related to Tractate XIII of the Corpus Hermeticum on regeneration (see I. Ramelli et al., Corpus Hermeticum, Milan 2005, supplementary essay). The more properly gnostic writings include a great variety of genres: gospels, acts, letters, apocalypses, dialogues, tractates, discourses of revelation, prayers etc. They originate in various different sects. Some are from the circle of the *Valentinian school (I, 3: The Gospel of Truth; I, 4: Treatise on the Resurrection; I, 5: The Tripartite Tractate; II, 3: The Gospel of Philip) or have been influenced by it (I, 1: The Prayer of the Apostle Paul; I, 2: The Apocryphon of John). Others may be ascribed to groups of the *Sethian type, or in any case do not correspond to the classifications of the *heresiologists. The Gospel of Truth may be identified, acc. to Quispel, who published the first edition with his collaborators, with the work of the same name branded "full of impiety" by *Irenaeus of Lyons in his Adversus haereses. The Testimony of Truth narrates the history of Eden from the point of view of the serpent, which was venerated by the gnostics, esp. the *Ophites, as the guardian of knowledge. The Thunder: Perfect Mind contains a splendid poem, pronounced by a female divine power who looks down upon her opponents.

Many hypotheses have been advanced on the origin and nature of the Library, questions made more difficult by the fact that up to now archaeological digs in loco have not yielded any clarifying evidence. The collection was perhaps the library of a gnostic group or sect or even of an individual gnostic; or it could have been the documentation collected by a polemicist or heresiologist for the purposes of refutation; or, more simply, it could represent what remains of a more extensive library. Certain details, such as names of persons, titles and addresses, may be found in the material in which the codices have been wrapped, and these point to a monastic settling of the *Pachomian type, of about the mid-4th c. AD. It was supposed that at the time of the triumph of *orthodoxy, when heretical books were being outlawed and destroyed, a monk hid these papyri in a jar and then buried it, where it remained for 1,600 years.

Linguistic features suggest that more than one Coptic translator has been at work (which does not necessarily mean that there was more than one scribe responsible for the copies that we have). The existence of duplicates or writings in multiple versions shows that there must have been different translators, working on different Greek texts. Attempts to study the different "hands" of the copyists have suggested that the translations and transcriptions were brought to completion in the 4th c.: scholars are substantially in agreement in dating the translations at ca. 350–400. The origins are obviously older, but the problems of dating them are far from being resolved: some texts do not seem later than AD 120–150, as Irenaeus of Lyons, who writes in about 180, declares that "the heretics boast of possessing more gospels than in fact exist," and laments that in his time such writings circulated freely, from Gaul to Rome, to Greece, and to Asia Minor. Quispel and his collaborators, first to publish the Gospel of Thomas, conjecture a date of about 140 for the Greek; Helmut Koester, of Harvard University, suggests that the collection of logia of that gospel, even if it was compiled in about 140, could include some traditions even earlier than the canonical gospels, perhaps going back to AD 50–100 (see also W. Schrage, Das Verhältnis des Thomas-Evangeliums zur synoptischen Tradition, Berlin 1964, Beihefte zur ZNW 29, and the recent collection Thomas at the Crossroads: Essays on the Gospel of Thomas, ed. R. Uro, Edinburgh 1998).

The study of the library has been made difficult by the complicated events which surrounded its acquisition by the Egyptian government and private concerns, such as the case of the first or Jung Codex, which takes its name from the Swiss foundation of that name, and which was translated by F.L. Cross, The Jung Codex: A Newly Recovered Gnostic Papyrus, with three studies by H.C. Puech, G. Quispel, W.C. van Unnik, London 1955, then by W. Attridge (see bibl.) and finally by P. Nagel, Der Tractatus tripertitus aus Nag Hammadi Codex I: Codex Jung, Tübingen 1998 (Studien und Texte zu Antike und Christentum 1). Today the library is kept in its entirety at the Coptic Museum of Cairo. In 1972 a facsimile edition was begun, finished in 1977, which has made the library accessible to all interested scholars. The Facsimile Edition of The Nag Hammadi Codices, published under the auspices of the Department of Antiquities of the Arab Republic of Egypt in conjunction with UNESCO, ed. S. Farid et al., Leiden 1972–1977; Nag Hammadi Codices: Greek and Coptic Papyri from the Cartonnage of the Covers, ed. J.W.B. Barns - G.M. Browne - J.C. Shelton, Leiden 1981 (Nag Hammadi Studies [NHS] 16). Several complete translations of the library have been published, two by research groups who have occupied themselves with editions of the text: The Nag Hammadi Library in English, tr., intro. by members of the Coptic Gnostic Library Project of the Institute for Antiquity and Christianity, Claremont, CA, ed. J.M. Robinson, Leiden [3]1988; [4]1996. Nag Hammadi Deutsch, intro. and tr. by members of the Berliner Arbeitskreises für koptisch-gnostische Schriften, ed. H.-M. Schenke - H.G. Bethge - U. Ulrike Kaiser, Berlin-New York 2001 (GCS 8. Koptisch-gnostische Schriften 2). Also to be noted is Textos gnósticos: Biblioteca de Nag Hammadi, 1- tr. by A. Piñero - J. Montserrat Torrents - F. García Bazán - F. Bermejo - A. Quevedo, ed. de A. Piñero, Madrid 1997.

There has been continuous publication of different tractates of the library, usually with translations, the work mainly of three groups of scholars, of course not forgetting other editions.

The Coptic Gnostic Project under the direction of J.M. Robinson (see Id., The Coptic Gnostic Library Today: NT 14 (1967/68) 356-401), has published, with text, translation and commentary, in the series Nag Hammadi Studies [NHS], texts including the following: N.H.C. III, 2 and IV, 2. The Gospel of Egyptians (The Holy Book of The Great Invisible Spirit), ed. A. Böhlig - F. Wisse - P. Labib, Leiden 1975 (NHS 4); NHC V, 2-5 and VI with 'Papyrus Berolinensis' 8502, 1 and 4, ed. D.M. Parrott, Leiden 1979 (NHS 11); NHC 9 and 10, ed. B.A. Pearson, Leiden 1981 (NHS 15); NHC 1 (The Jung Codex) . . . , ed. H.W. Attridge, Leiden 1985 (NHS 22-23); L'Exégèse de l'âme: NHC 2, 6, intro., tr., comm. M. Scopello, Leiden 1985 (NHS 25); NHC 2, 2-7: Together with XIII, 2, Brit. Lib. Or. 4926 (1), and P. Oxy. 1, 654, 655, ed. B. Layton, Leiden 1989 (NHS 20-21) [with: Gospel of Thomas, Gospel of Philip, Hypostasis of the Archons]; NHC 8, ed. J.H. Sieber, Leiden 1991 (NHS 31); NHC 11, 12, 13, ed. Ch.W. Hedrick, Leiden 1990 (NHS 28); NHC 3, 3-4 and 5, 1 with Papyrus Berolinensis 8502, 3 and Oxyrhynchus Papyrus 1081: Eugnostos and The Sophia of Jesus Christ, ed. D.M. Parrott, Leiden 1991 (NHS 27); L'Exégèse de l'âme: NHC 2, 6, intro., tr., comm. M. Scopello, Leiden 1985 (NHS 25). Additionally: NHC VII, ed. B.A. Pearson, Leiden-New York-Cologne 1996 (NHMS 30). Further, certain philological studies on the texts should be mentioned, such as The Apocryphon of John: Synopsis of NHC II, 1; III, 1; and IV, 1 with BG 8502, 2, ed. M. Waldstein - F. Wisse, Leiden-New York-Cologne 1995 (Nag Hammadi and Manichaean studies [NHMS] 33), with bibl. 199-209.

Berliner Arbeitskreise, mentioned above, ed. H.M. Schenke, has published in the series TU the following texts, all in critical editions with translation and commentary: Die dreigestaltige Protennoia (NHC XIII), ed. G. Schenke, Berlin 1984 (TU 132); Epistula Jacobi apocrypha: die zweite Schrift aus NHC I, ed. D. Kirchner, Berlin 1989 (TU 136); Das Thomas-Buch (NHC II, 7), ed. H.-M. Schenke, Berlin 1989 (TU 138); U.-K. Plisch, Die Auslegung der Erkenntnis (NHC XI, 1), Berlin 1996 (TU 142); Der Brief des Petrus an Philippus: ein neutestamentliches Apokryphon aus dem Fund von Nag Hammadi (NHC VIII, 2), ed. H.-G. Bethge, Berlin 1997 (TU 141) [also contains Koptische apokryphe Apostelacten, ed. O. v. Lemm]; Das Philippus-Evangelium (NHC II, 3), ed. H.-M. Schenke, Berlin 1997 (TU 143); The Coptic Apocalypse of Peter: NHC VII, 3, ed. H.W. Havelaar, Berlin 1999 (TU 144).

The research group of the Universities of Strasbourg and Laval directed by J.E. Ménard has published the following critical editions with translations, in the series Bibliothèque Copte de Nag Hammadi [BCNH]: La lettre de Pierre à Philippe, ed. J.E. Ménard, Québec 1977; L'Authentikos Logos, ed. Id., Québec 1977; Hermès en Haute-Égypte, ed. J.P. Mahé, Québec 1978; La Protennoia trimorphe, ed. Y. Janssens, Québec 1978; L'Hypostase des Archontes (NH II, 4), suivi de Norea (NH IX, 2), ed. B. Barc - M. Roberge, Québec-Louvain 1980 (BCNH 5); Le II[e] Traité du Grand Seth, ed. L. Painchaud, Québec-Louvain 1982; P. Claude, Les Trois stèles de Seth: hymne gnostique à la Triade (NH VII, 5), Québec 1983 (BCNH, Textes 8); L'Évangile selon Marie: BG 1, ed. tr. A. Pasquier, Québec 1983 (BCNH, Textes 10); Le Traité sur la resurrection (NH 1, 4), ed. J.E. Ménard, Québec 1983 (BCNH, Textes 12); L'Exposé valentinien: les fragments sur le baptême et sur l'eucharistie: NH XI, 2, ed. J.É. Ménard, ibid., 1985 (BCNH, Textes 14); L'Apocalypse d'Adam: NH V, 5, ed. F. Morard, Québec 1985 (BCNH, Textes 15); Le livre de Thomas: NH II, 7, ed. tr. R. Kuntzmann, Québec 1986 (BCNH, Textes 16); La première Apocalypse de Jacques: NH V, 3. Le seconde Apocalypse de Jacques: NH V, 4, ed. J. Veilleux, Québec 1986 (BCNH, Textes 17); Le traité tripartite: NH I, 5, ed. E. Thomassen - L. Painchaud, Québec 1989 (BCNH, Textes 19); La sagesse de Jésus-Christ (BG 3; NH III, 4), ed. C. Barry, Québec 1993 (BCNH, Textes 20); L'écrit sans titre: traité sur l'origine du monde (NH II, 5 and XIII, 2 et Brit. Lib. Or. 4926 [1]), ed. L. Painchaud, Québec-Louvain-Paris 1995 (BCNH, Textes 21); Le Tonnerre, Intellect parfait: NH VI, 2, ed. P.-H. Poirier, Québec-Paris 1995 (BCNH, Textes 22); Le Témoignage véritable (NH IX, 3): gnose et martyre, ed. A. & J.P. Mahé, Québec-Paris 1996 (BCNH, Textes 23); Zostrien (NH VIII), ed. C. Barry, Québec-Paris 2000 (BCNH, Textes 24); La paraphrase de Sem (NH VII, 1), ed. M. Roberge, Québec-Paris 2000 (BCNH, Textes 25); Eugnoste (NH III, 3 et V, 1): lettre sur le Dieu transcendant, ed. A. Pasquier, Québec-Paris 2000 (BCNH, Textes 26); Marsanès (NH X), ed. W.P. Funk - P.H. Poirier - J.D. Turner, Québec-Paris 2000 (BCNH, Textes 27).

Among other critical editions of the texts of Nag Hammadi that are not part of the preceding groups and series, we can mention the following, which include translations and often introductions and commentaries: J. Doresse, Le livre sacré du Grand Esprit Invisible ou L'Évangile des Égyptiens, ed., tr., comm.: JA 254 (1966) 319-435; 256 (1968) 289-386; The Hypostasis of The Archons, ed., tr., comm. R.A. Bullard - M. Krause, Berlin 1970 (Patristische Texte und Studien 10); Le Concept de notre grande Puissance (CG 6., 4), ed., tr. P. Cherix, Fribourg-Göttingen 1982 (Orbis biblicus et orientalis 47); The Apocalypse of Adam: NHC V, 5 Considered from Its Egyptian Background, ed., tr. P.A. Linder, Lund 1991 (Lund studies in African and Asian religion 7).

Recently, indexes, concordances and bibliographies on the texts of Nag Hammadi have been published. A systematic bibliography, with annual supplements in NovT, we owe to D.M. Scholer, Nag Hammadi Bibliography, 1948-79, Leiden 1971 (NHS 1); 1970-94, Leiden 1997 (NHMS 32), 1995-2006, Leiden 2009 (NHMS 65). A vocabulary and an index have been prepared by F. Siegert, Nag-Hammadi-Register: Wörterbuch zur Erfassung der Begriffe in den Koptisch-gnostischen Schriften von Nag-Hammadi, mit Index, Tübingen 1982 (Wissenschaftliche Untersuchungen zum Neuen Testament 26), as well as an excellent index which provides parallels with biblical literature: Nag Hammadi Texts and the Bible: A Synopsis and Index, by C.A. Evans - R.L. Webb - R.A. Wiebe, Leiden 1993 (New Testament Tools and Studies 18). Finally, the recent Concordance des textes de Nag Hammadi Le codex VII, by R. Charron, Sainte-Foy-Louvain-Paris 1992 (BCNH, Concordances 1); Le codex VI, by P. Cherix, Sainte-Foy-Louvain-Paris 1993 (BCNH, Concordances 2); Le codex III, by R. Charron, Sainte-Foy-Louvain-Paris 1995 (BCNH, Concordances 3); Le codex I, by P. Cherix, Sainte-Foy-Louvain-Paris 1995 (BCNH, Concordances 4); Les codices VIII et IX, by W.P. Funk, Sainte-Foy-Louvain-Paris 1997 (BCNH, Concordances 5); Les codices X et XIA, by W.P. Funk, Sainte-Foy-Louvain-Paris 2000 (BCNH, Concordances 6).

We should also mention the studies, papers of conferences and miscellanea devoted to the Nag Hammadi texts: some of them give a useful general status quaestionis, such as The Nag Hammadi Library After Fifty Years, ed. D. Turner - A. McGuire, Leiden 1997 (NHMS 44), with an extensive bibl. 497-531, and also Les textes de Nag Hammadi et le problème de leur classification: actes du colloque, Québec 15-19 septembre 1993, ed. L. Painchaud - A. Pasquier, Québec-Louvain-Paris 1995 (BCNH, Études 3): traditionally gnosticism is divided into two principal strands, the "Valentinian" and the "Sethian," so that, e.g., the collection of essays edited by B. Layton, The Rediscovery of Gnosticism, divides into two volumes: I, The School of Valentinus, Leiden 1980; II, Sethian Gnosticism, Leiden 1981; others investigate particular aspects. Among the acts of conferences of the last twenty years we should mention at least M. Krause, Die Texte von Nag Hammadi: Gnosis. Festschrift H. Jonas, Göttingen 1978, 216-243; Colloque international sur les textes de Nag Hammadi, Québec, 22-25 August 1978, ed. B. Barc, Québec-Louvain 1981 (BCNH, Études 1); Gnosis and Gnosticism: Papers Read at the Eighth International Conference on Patristic Studies, Oxford, September 3rd-8th 1979, ed. M. Krause, Leiden 1981 (NHS 17); cf. M.V. Cerutti - D.M. Cosi - L. Saibene, Il Colloquio di Louvain-la-Neuve su "Gnosticismo e mondo ellenistico" (11-14 marzo 1980): Aevum 55 (1981) 139-143; Apocalittica e gnosticismo: atti del Colloquio internazionale, Rome, 18-19 giugno 1993, ed. M.V. Cerutti, Rome 1995; For the Children, Perfect Instruction: Studies in Honor of H.-M. Schenke on the Occasion of the Berliner Arbeitskreis für koptisch-gnostische Schriften's Thirtieth Year, ed. H.G. Bethge - S. Emmel - K.L. King - I. Schletterer, Leiden-Boston 2002 (NHMS 54). A series of study days which are held regularly and include work on Gnosticism and Nag Hammadi is that of the Études coptes, being published gradually in the Cahiers de la Bibliothèque copte: the first volume of the series was Écritures et traditions dans la littérature copte: Journée d'études coptes, Strasbourg, 28 May 1982, Louvain 1983 (Cahiers de la Bibliothèque copte 1). Finally, owing to the increasing abundance of publications in this area, an entire section of the Annual Meeting of the Society of Biblical Literature was dedicated to Nag Hammadi and Gnosticism in Atlanta, 22-25 Nov. 2003, from which papers of particular note include: B.A. Pearson, Basilides the Gnostic; K.L. King, Reading the Apocryphon of John Intertextually; J.M. Asgeirsson, From Demiourgos to Architekton: Intertextual Elements of Creation in Plato's Timaeus and the Thomasine Literature; D.M. Parrott, A Sethian Genesis in the Apocalypse of Adam (NHC V, 5); I. Dunderberg, Genesis Exegesis in Valentinus's Fragment 4 and the Gospel of Thomas; J.D. Turner, Gnostic Readings of Plato's Timaeus; E. Thomassen, An Unknown Sayings Gospel (NHC XI, 1); L. Painchaud, The Use of Parables in the Interpretation of Knowledge (NHC XI, 1); M. Kaler, The Legendary Paul. In the annual conferences of the Society of Biblical Literature sections are usually dedicated to Nag Hammadi. Many articles focused on the Nag Hammadi tractates have appeared in collections of essays on varied subjects: e.g., Y. Janssens, Le concept de notre Grande Puissance (NH VI 4): une apocalypse gnostique?, in Acts of The Second International Congress of Coptic Studies, ed. T. Orlandi - F. Wisse, Rome 1985, 83-88; the Untitled Text, the *Gospel of the Egyptian*s, the Concept and the Apocalypse of Adam have been analyzed by G. Sfameni Gasparro, Tempo della storia e tempo della salvezza nello Gnosticismo in *Theoretical Frameworks for the Study of Graeco-Roman Religions. XVIII*th Congress of the International Association for the History of Religions, Durban (South Africa) 2000, Thessaloniki 2003, 171-207; on the Paraphrase of Shem also by Gasparro, Temi apocalittici nello Gnosticismo, in Millennium, ed. R. Uglione, Turin 2002, 101-141: 117ff.

Among recent monographs on single tractates of the library or on common themes, we should note at least M. Tardieu, Trois mythes gnostiques: Adam, Eros et les animaux d'Égypte dans un écrit de Nag Hammadi (II, 5), Paris 1974 (Études augustiniennes 51); A. Böhlig - F. Wisse, Zum Hellenismus in den Schriften von Nag Hammadi, Wiesbaden 1975; G. Filoramo, Aspetti del dualism gnostico: mito, manifestazione e rivelazione nello 'Scritto senza titolo' del Codice Gnostico II di Nag Hammadi, Turin 1978 (MAT, ser. V., II, 1978, 4); Id., L'Attesa della fine: storia della gnosi, Rome-Bari 1987, with bibl. 291-304; K. Koschorke, Die Polemik der Gnostiker gegen das kirchliche Christentum: unter besonderer Berücksichtigung der Nag- Hammadi-Traktate "Apokalypse des Petrus" (NHC VII, 3) . . . und "Testimonium veritatis" (NHC IX, 3), Leiden 1978 (NHS 12); Ch.W. Hedrick, The Apocalypse of Adam: A Literary and Source Analysis, Ann Arbor, MI 1980; J. Doresse, Les Livres secrets des gnostiques d'Égypte, Monaco 1984; J. Frickel, Hellenistische Erlösung in christlicher Deutung, Leiden 1984 (NHS 19); I.S. Gilhus, The Nature of The Archons: A Study in the Soteriology of a Gnostic Treatise from Nag Hammadi (CGII, 4), Wiesbaden 1985; J.-M. Sevrin, Le dossier baptismal séthien: études sur la sacramentaire gnostique, Québec 1986 (BCNH, Études 2); C. Scholten, Martyrium und Sophiamythos im Gnostizismus nach den Texten N.H., Münster 1987 (JAC. Ergänzungsbände 14); J.A. Williams, Biblical Interpretation in the Gnostic Gospel of Truth from Nag Hammadi, Atlanta 1988 (SBL Dissertation Series 79); A. Böhlig, Gnosis und Synkretismus, I-II, Tübingen 1989; T. Onuki, Gnosis und Stoa: eine Untersuchung zum Apokryphon des Johannes, Freiburg-Göttingen 1989; W.G. Röhl, Die Rezeption des Johannesevangeliums in christlich-gnostischen Schriften aus Nag Hammadi, Frankfurt a.M. 1991; A. Böhlig - Chr. Markschies, Gnosis und Manichäismus: Forschungen und Studien zu Texten von Valentin und Mani sowie zu den Bibliotheken von N.H. und Medinet Madi, Berlin-New York 1994 (Beihefte zur ZNTW 72); R. van den Broek, Studies in Gnosticism and Alexandrian Christianity, Leiden 1996 (NHMS 39; cf. also, recently, M.J. Edwards, Origen Against Plato, Aldershot 2002); A. Marjanen, The Woman Jesus Loved: Mary Magdalene in the Nag Hammadi Library and Related Documents, Leiden 1996 (NHMS 40), with bibl. 226-246; K. Rudolph, Gnosis und spätantike Religionsgeschichte: gesammelte Aufsätze, Leiden 1996 (NHMS 42); S. Petersen, 'Zerstort die Werke der Weiblichkeit!' Maria Magdalena, Salome und andere Jüngerinnen Jesu in christlich-gnostischen Schriften, Leiden 1999 (NHMS 48); T. Nagel, Die Rezeption des Johannesevangeliums im 2. Jahrhundert, Leipzig 2000 (Arbeiten zur Bibel und ihrer Geschichte 2), bibl. 493-541; J.D. Turner, Sethian Gnosticism and the Platonic Tradition, Québec-Louvain-Paris 2001 (BCNH, Études 6), with bibl. 761-788; F.E. Williams, Mental Perception: A Commentary on NHC VI, 4: The Concept of Our Great Power, Leiden 2001 (NHMS 51); C. Markschies, Gnosis, Poole, Dorset 2003; K. King, The Seven Revelations of John, Cambridge 2006, who in pages 258-264 restates the thesis of the marked uniformity of gnosticism. Naturally there are many articles in journals which relate to the Nag Hammadi texts: G. MacRae, The Apocalypse of Adam (First to Fourth Century): A New Translation and Introduction, in The Old Testament Pseudepigrapha, I, ed. J.H. Charlesworth, New York 1983, 707-719; Y. Janssens, L'Évangile des Égyptiens: Muséon 100 (1987) 181-197; L. Painchaud, The Redaction of the Writing Without Title (CG II 5): SCent 8 (1991) 217-234; A. Camplani, Sulla trasmissione dei testi gnostici in copto, in L'Egitto cristiano. Aspetti e problemi in età tardo-antica, ed. A. Camplani, Rome 1997, 121-175 (codicology and the structure of the MSS.).

The well-known full collections of Italian translations are: Testi gnostici, ed. L. Moraldi, Turin 1982; Gli apocrifi dell'Antico Testamento, ed. P. Sacchi: I, Turin 1981; II, Turin 1989; III, Brescia 1999; IV, Brescia 2000. The story of the discovery of the Nag Hammadi Library may be found, e.g., in Gnostic Dualism in Asia Minor During the First Centuries A.D., I, publ. J.C. Gieben 1993 (The Light and the Dark: a cultural history of dualism 8), ch. III, A Library in a Jar, 8.

G. Filoramo - I. Ramelli

NAIN, SON of the WIDOW of (iconography). An episode not frequently depicted in paleo-Christian art, limited as it was to sculpture, with about twenty instances in *Gaul (e.g., Ws 26, 2/3; 227, 1/2) and *Rome (e.g., Ws 214, 2; 8, 4). The biblical account (Lk 7:11-15), containing numerous personalities, is adapted synthetically: Jesus, accompanied by at least one apostle, touches with a virga the body of the son of the widow of Nain, already prepared for burial (e.g., Ws 214, 2), underlining by his action the message of faith implied in the composition. The mummy is shown either in a *sarcophagus, sometimes strigilated and placed on leonine legs, or directly on the ground (Ws 128, 1). The mother also appears on some reliefs (Ws 8, 4; 225, 2; 26, 2/3). Sarcophagi bearing this scene were produced in the workshops of the first thirty years of the 4th c. (Ws 8, 4).

DACL 12, 1, 582ff.; LCI 4, 542ff.; Ws 304-306; Rep.; D. Calcagnini, La resurrezione del figlio della vedova di Naim nell'iconografia del IV secolo: Bessarione 5 (1986) 121-145; Id., Resurrezione del figlio della vedova di Naim: TIP 268-269.

D. Calcagnini Carletti

NAME (ὄνομα, nomen)

I. Greek usage - II. Biblical usage - III. Jewish post-biblical usage: Hellenistic Judaism and rabbinic literature - IV. Patristic and NT usage.

I. Greek usage. In Greek, ὄνομα indicates the name, at first, in *Homer, only of persons, which through commanding one seeks to obtain good omens and even things. As early as Homer, the term also means "renown," or "name" in contrast to "thing" (ἔργον, πρᾶγμα) or to "nature" (φύσις), acc. to a polarity emphasized by the Sophists. On the contrary, ὄνομα + genitive, esp. in poetry, could indicate either the thing or the person itself (ὄνομα Πολυνείκους = Polynices himself in Eur., Phoen. 1702). Finally, ὄνομα could have the grammatical function and meaning of "noun," "substantive" or more generically "word." From Homer onward we find an interest in etymology, which in Plato, after the discussions of the Sophists, was explored in its ontological foundations in the Cratylus—where in the end etymology is not regarded as a reliable way to knowledge—and became the main tool of the allegoresis of myths in a philosophical sense (see I. Ramelli, Allegoria, I, L'età classica, with G. Lucchetta, Milan 2004). This was esp. true in the *Stoic context, where the study of grammar was also developed, along with the distinction of the parts of a discourse, and in Chrysippus, where the differentiation between ὄνομα κύριον or proper name, which indicates the proper and particular essence (ἰδία οὐσία) and ὄνομα προσηγορικόν or appellative and common name, which indicates the common and general essence (κοινὴ οὐσία). In this context, already from Hesiod onward, who provides the etymology of the name of Aphrodite (Theog. 188-198), and amplified by the Stoics, attention was particularly directed to divine names and epithets, the number of which was in direct proportion to the power of the divinity (Menandr., Rhet. Gr. III, 445, 25-26); thus Aesch., Ag. 160ff. allows Zeus, the supreme god, to be invoked by the name which he prefers; and in Apul., Met. XI, 15 Isis affirms: "My divinity is unique, but the whole earth honors it in different ways, with different cults, with different names." In *Hermeticism, however, the divine πολυωνυμία is transformed into ἐνωνυμία, for the one supreme god (ὁ θεὸς εἷς· ὁ δὲ εἷς ὀνόματος οὐ προσδέεται· ἔστι γὰρ ὁ ὢν ἀνώνυμος, "God is One, and the One does not have need, moreover, of a name: he who is is in fact without name," Corp. Herm. fr. 3; αὐτὸς ὄνομα οὐκ ἔκει, ὅτι πάντων ἐστι πατήρ, "He himself does not have name, since he is Father of all beings," ibid., V, 10). This idea was widespread in the imperial age, from *Middle Platonism onward (see Arrhetos Theos. L'ineffabilità del primo principio nel Medioplatonismo, ed. F. Calabi, Pisa 2002), and was taken up by the Fathers.

II. Biblical usage. In the biblical and patristic traditions, a name tends to express the essence of that which it designates. In the OT the name is indicated with šēm, which occurs 770 times in the singular and indicates the proper name of humans, divine beings or animals, or of places or objects; it can also indicate renown and reputation. The giving of the name establishes a relationship of ownership between the giver and the receiver: e.g., children receive their names from the father, and animals from Adam, which thus inaugurates his dominion over creation. Some OT passages such as Ex 32:32ff., Ps 69:29, Is 4:3 and Ezek 13:9 formulate the idea, found subsequently in late Judaism and in the NT, that the names of the just are recorded in the *book of life. Since the name designates the person, etymology is frequently seen to be important: Nabal, as his name denotes, is a door (1 Sam 25:25); Isaac recalls the laughing of his parents (Gen 17:17; 18:12; 21:6) etc. God, moreover, changes the names of his elect when he gives them a mission: Jacob becomes Israel because he has "wrestled with God" (Gen 32:29); Abram become Abraham since he will be "father of nations"; and Sarai, Sarah, i.e., "princess" (Gen 17:5, 15). In the OT the name par excellence is that of God, represented by the sacred tetragrammaton YHWH, replaced in Hebrew, when reading, with Adonai, and in Greek with κύριος, attributed then in the NT to Christ: both appellations mean "Lord." The other names which are ascribed to God in the OT, such as ʾēl šadday (Gen 17:1), are simply substitutes and do not indicate the true name of God, which is of such importance that a commandment prohibits its being taken in vain (Ex 20:7; Dt 5:11) and that it is entrusted to the priests, even if in the OT one does not truly find a secret name of God, and šēm is often used with the prepositions l and b, "in the name of," followed by the name of God, yhwh, with verbs of invocation, speech, prophecy and blessing, guaranteeing the intervention of God relative to the act. David confronts Goliath bešēm yhwh (1 Sam 17:45); one's enemies are laid low bešēm yhwh (Ps 118:10-12). Already in the pre-Deuteronomic period the šēm yhwh was considered an autonomous form of revelation chosen by God (see Ex 23:20; Is 30:27). The veneration of the name of God is carried almost to hypostatization, so that it is held that while God lives in heaven (Dt 4:36), the šēm yhwh had a place on earth in which to reside—i.e., the temple (Ex 23:21; Dt 12:5; 14:24; Is 30:27; Ps 20:2; 54:3; 89:25; Mal 1:11). In the post-Deuteronomic period, in the Prophets and Psalms, the name of God often has the meaning of the honor or glory of God, and is connected with the exaltation of his power; in many cases it seems to be identified with God himself (e.g., Ps 7:18; 9:11; 18:50; 68:5; 74:18; 86:12; 92:2; Pr 18:10; Is 25:1; 26:8; Mal 3:16).

In the LXX, šēm is almost always translated as ὄνομα, even if sometimes it is rendered θρόνον or μνημόσυνον. The expression bešēm is found in several forms, acc. to the context: ἐκ τοῦ ὀνόματος (Esth 8:8), διά without ὄνομα (Esth 3:12; 8:10), ἐπὶ τῷ ὀνόματι or ἐν τῷ ὀνόματι at various times in the books of Kings. It is revealing that the LXX differs from the Masoretic Text—unless the translators had a different version—introducing ὄνομα where the Hebrew is lacking šēm: e.g., in Ezek 43:7, a markedly anthropomorphic passage, the name of God is referred to and not God himself; in Num 14:21, to "I live" is added "and my name lives."

III. Jewish postbiblical usage: Hellenistic Judaism and rabbinic literature. In general in Hellenistic Judaism one notices a great importance given to names. In *Philo of Alexandria, Decal. 82, the name is defined as the shadow which accompanies the body, for which reason in the Decalogue God is mentioned first, and then his name; the name is the mirror of thought (Vit. cont. 78). Moses, interpreted as a type of one who possesses perfect knowledge, is never mistaken in his choice and use of words (θέσις τῶν ὀνομάτων, Agric. 1-2; Cher. 56). Because the origin of names goes back to Adam (Op. mund. 148; Quest. in Gen. I, 20-21), they correspond to the reality, and the exercise of etymology, which had a notable place in Stoicism, is taken up again in the service of allegoresis. Philo draws on Ex 3:14 in the LXX version, calling God ὁ ὤν; he observes that there is absolutely no name which is fitted to the nature of God (Vit. Mos. I, 75); God cannot be named, but simply is (Somn. I, 230 s.). As God is ineffable, his true name cannot be known by creatures (Rer. div. her. 170); the name of God given to men is κύριος ὁ θεός (Mut. nom. 11-12), but neither θεός nor κύριος, the divine names used in the Bible, indicate God's essence, but only his powers (Somn. I, 163; Plant. 85-86; Leg. all. III, 73), respectively that of sovereignty and that of grace. Obviously Philo knows the sacred tetragrammaton, the letters of which were inscribed on the diadem of the high priest (Vit. Mos. II, 132; cf. 114). Taking up the Stoic tradition, which he clearly has in mind, he asserts that the powers of the Being/Deity have several names (Somn. II, 254) and that wisdom is characterized by polyonymy (Leg. all. I, 43), which is proper also to the Logos, who is also called "name of God." In a negative sense, Philo also speaks of the improper names of God, declaring that he must not be invoked thoughtlessly, nor should we swear by him, as his nature is unknown to us, but only by his name (Spec. leg. IV, 40).

Josephus, for his part, avoids using in ordinary speech not only the name of God but also that of Κύριος; for this reason, there are almost no literal biblical quotations. He shows the same reserve in the use of ὄνομα, to which Josephus prefers "appellation," προσηγορία: "God made known his appellation to Moses, which before had not reached man, and about which it is not licit for me to say anything" (Ant. II, 275-276). He does use ὄνομα to indicate the tetragrammaton inscribed on the front of the temple, before which even Alexander the Great is said to have bowed (Ant. III, 178; XI, 331); it is not said, however, whether the tetragrammaton is the ὄνομα which Jews invoke when their lives are in danger, in J.W. V, 438. Josephus, perhaps adapting to his Greek readership, does not now say that God inhabits the temple, but rather that there a part of the Spirit of God may be found (Ant. VIII, 114).

The reflection on the name of God continues in the Jewish pseudepigraphal literature and in rabbinism, contemporary to the church fathers. In Slavonic Enoch, part of the extraordinary knowledge granted to the author is that of the names of all plants and animals, and the name of Adam is interpreted in the sense of a cosmic being. The name of Eve, as in the case of Eve herself, is considered to have been taken from Adam. Ethiopic Enoch returns to the idea of the book of life: those whose names are stricken from it are lost forever. Particular attention is paid to the names of the saints, of the fallen angels, of the stars and of the "starry heavens." In these writings the name of God is also present, and esp. in 4 Esd, where in particular the seven names of God are recorded, indicating his attributes; the angels sing forever "blessed the name of the Lord," the same in which the just triumph and will be saved (Eth. Enoch 50, 2). The "name of the Son of Man" is also glorified, the name pronounced before the creation of the stars (ibid., 48, 2-3), which indicates the eternal preexistence of the Son. In many cases the name of God is described in this literature as a mysterious power revealed to humanity by means of the angels, through which everything was created (Eth. Enoch 69, 13-21; Iub. 36, 7): it seems thus to be identified with the Logos.

In the rabbinic literature the various meanings of šēm are maintained; if during the biblical reading in the synagogue, on the one hand, the sacred tetragrammaton was read "Adonai," in the schools, on the other hand, when citing a biblical passage one said haššēm; while the tetragrammaton was pronounced in the temple cult, the strict rabbinic prohibition against uttering it resulted, with the passing of time, in lack of knowledge as to how precisely it should be pronounced. The rabbis called the tetragrammaton "name of four letters," but there were also references to 12 or 42 letters, or even one of 72 letters in the Midrash (Gen. rabb. 44 at 15, 14; Lev. rabb. 23 at 18, 3; Pes. rabb. 76 b).

IV. Patristic and NT usage. We should set the NT and patristic usage against this cultural background. In the NT ὄνομα indicates persons' names, reputations or the persons themselves, in Acts 1:15; Rev 3:4; 11:13. Many passages refer to the name of God, which is glorified through the work of Christ (Jn 12:28) which first of all, in the prayer of Jesus, must be hallowed (Mt 6:9 and parallels). In Mt 1:21-23 Jesus Christ receives the name chosen by God which expresses salvation, as for Philo, Mut. nom. 121, the name Jesus means "salvation of the Lord, " σωτηρία Κυρίου. This name of Κύριος, which in the LXX is always used of God, passes also to Christ (Phil 2:9; Rev 19:16). In Jn 1:1 Jesus, as the Logos, is set to become the name of God. In some passages of the NT ὄνομα is used in an absolute sense in the place of Jesus (Acts 5:41; 3 Jn 7). For the expression "in the name of" we find often ἐν τῷ ὀνόματι, ἐπὶ τῷ ὀνόματι, εἰς τὸ ὄνομα. Jesus comes "in the name of the Lord/of the Father" (ἐν ὀνόματι Κυρίου, ἐν τῷ ὀνόματι τοῦ Πατρός, Mt 23:39; Mk 11:10; Jn 10:24-25). The expression "in the name of" applies now to the Son of God: whoever believes "in his name" has life in his name and becomes a child of God (Jn 1:12; 20:31; 1 Jn 5:13): this is the name in which/through which (ἐν ᾧ) we can be saved (Acts 4:12). God the Father should be thanked "in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ" (Eph 5:20) and sends the Holy Spirit in the name of Jesus Christ (Jn 14:26). This profound communion we find in Mt 28:19, where the names of the three persons of the *Trinity are united. *Baptism is celebrated "in the name of " (εἰς τὸ ὄνομα τοῦ . . . Mt 28:19; Acts 2:38; 8:16; 19:5) with the meaning of "become the property of, " probably through the influence of the Semitic lešēm, with final value. The community furthermore prays "in the name of Jesus" (Jn 14:13-14; 15:16; 16:23-26), and that which the disciples ask in the name of Jesus Christ, he will do, so that the Father may be glorified in the Son (Jn 14:13-14). Not only faith but also good works are exercised "through the name of Jesus" (ἐπὶ τῷ ὀνόματι, Mt 18:5 and parallels), as are miracles (e.g., Acts 3:6; 4:7; 16:18: ἐν ὀνόματι). The name of Jesus is itself the content of the gospel message (Acts 8:12; 9:15, 27). The admonitions and counsels of Paul are given "in the name of Jesus, " i.e., on his behalf (2 Th 3:6; 1 Cor 1:10): the disciples must suffer for (ὑπέρ) the name of Christ (Acts 5:41; cf. Acts 9:16), which is the "excellent name" pronounced over Christians since they are the property of the Lord (Jas 2:7). In a negative sense, ὄνομα is associated with the beast and the harlot of Revelation. A change of name, as already in the OT, is also in the NT a sign of a special mission given by God, and here by Jesus Christ: Simon receives the name of Peter and the sons of Zebedee that of Βοανηργές or "sons of thunder" (Mk 3:16-17). In Rev 21:14 the names of the apostles are written on the twelve foundation stones of the new Jerusalem, and in 2:17 whoever receives a white stone written with a new name is transported to a new state of life in which his or her old sinful nature has disappeared.

The OT use, with all that it comports, constitutes the basis of the patristic reflections on name. The name of Jesus Christ is almost hypostatized in the Shepherd of Hermas (Sim. 9, 14, 15): τὸ ὄνομα τοῦ υἱοῦ τοῦ Θεοῦ μέγα ἐστὶ καὶ ἀχώρητον καὶ τὸν κόσμον ὅλον βαστάζει· εἰ οὖν πᾶσα ἡ κτίσις διὰ τοῦ θεοῦ βαστάζεται, . . . "the name of the Son of God is great and uncontainable, and sustains the entire universe: if therefore the whole creation is sustained by the Son of God, . . ." from which the identification is evident between the Son and his name (see also Sim. 9, 12, 4-8; 9, 13, 2-3; 1 Clem. 58, 1; 60, 4). The interpretation of the divine names, already practiced in the OT context, remained very important in patristic theology: one thinks of De divinis nominibus of ps.-*Dionysius the Areopagite, in the 5th c., an important exponent of the negative theology already found in the Cappadocians—and, in a pagan setting, in *Plotinus—and heir to a tradition of reflection on the names of God and on their relationship with his essence. According to *Justin Martyr, the divine names derive from the divine action (2 Apol. 6, 2: ("'Father,' 'God,' 'Creator,' 'Lord' and 'Master' are not proper names, but appellations derived from his benefits"), and the different names correspond to different divine activities, as *Basil observes (Contra Eunom. I, 7), and to the various benevolent actions of God toward humanity, acc. to *Gregory of Nyssa (Contra Eunom., ed. W. Jaeger, II, 242, 10). Thus, for ps.-Dionysius the Areopagite, God "is without name, has many names, and is above every name" (ἀνώνυμος, πολυώνυμος, ὑπερώνυμος).

There had existed for some time a clear awareness that the ὄνομα, as a human word, cannot express the divine essence, something that no word can do fully, as *John Chrysostom confirms (Hom. In Hbr. 2, 2): the name θεός, "God, " is not the name of the divine essence, which is impossible to arrive at. Humans, in fact, do not know the word expressing the divine nature, which remains for us always inexpressible and transcendent, as Gregory of Nyssa observes (Contra Eunom., ed. W. Jaeger, II 169ff). The idea is well present already in the apologists of the 2nd c., such as Justin and *Minucius Felix (18, 10), but also in *Clement of Alexandria and in (ps.-) Justin (Cohort. ad gent. 21): "No name can properly designate God [οὐδὲν ὄνομα ἐπὶ Θεοῦ κυριολογεῖ σθαι δυνατόν]: in fact, names serve to indicate and to distinguish objects, which are many and various. . . . But God, being one and one only [εἷς καὶ μόνον], has not deemed it necessary to give a name to himself [ὀνομάζειν ἑαυτόν]." The *Platonic Justin insists several times on the ineffability of God, as *Middle Platonic thinkers did at the same time, as was noted above, e.g., in 1 Apol. 10, 1: "God cannot be called with any name established by human beings [μηδενὶ ὀνόματι θετῷ]"; 61, 11: "No one can give a name to the ineffable God [ἄρρητος]"; 2 Apol., 6, 1-3: "There exists no name established by human beings [ὄνομα θετόν] which is suited to the ingenerate Father of all beings; if one were to call him by any name, in fact, it means that one would have been before him who would have given him a name. . . . His Son, then, the only one who can be called properly [λεγόμενος κυρίως] 'Son,' i.e., the Logos . . . he is called Christ since he receives the anointing . . . in the same way also 'God' is a common name, an appellation [προσηγόρευμα], not a proper name [ὄνομα]."

In continuity with Justin, Clement affirms that God is "invisible and ineffable, " ἄρρητος (Strom. V, 12, 78, 3 and 81, 3). "It is not learnable nor expressible on the part of men" (Strom. V, 71, 5; cf. II 2, 5, 4, etc.). Precisely because of the difficulty of characterizing God, he has no name or he has all names, as *Gregory of Nazianzus explains in a hymn: "You are One, and all beings, and No One, being yet neither One nor all beings: or you have all names [πανώνυμε], what shall I call you?" The only true expression of the divine nature is his Logos, which is identified with Christ as early as the prologue of the gospel of John, and which for *Origen has a second body, next to that of Jesus in which ὁ Λόγος σὰρξ ἐγένετο, also in the Scriptures, the spiritual significance of which, contained in the body littera, is indeed the Christ, the Logos, the expression of God (see M. Simonetti, Origene esegeta e la sua tradizione, Brescia 2004, esp. 14-19, 32ff.).

DB 4, 1669-1677; LTK² 7, 780-783; ODC 720-721; KLP 4, 657-661; RGG³ 4, 1298-1306; Evangelisches Kirchenlexikon, II, 1499-1502; H. Bietenhard, ὄνομα: GLNT 8, 681-794 (TDNT 5, 242-283); J. Fichter - Ch. de Morè Pontgibaud, Sur l'analogie des noms divins: RSR 19 (1929) 481-512; 20 (1930) 193-223; 38 (1952) 161-188; 42 (1954) 321-360; O. Grether, Name und Wort Gottes im A.T.: BZAW 64 (1934); C. Mazzantini, La questione dei "nomi divini": GM 9 (1954) 113-124; E. Sittig, De graecorum nominibus theophoris, Diss. Philol. Halenses, XX, pars I, 1911; K. Ruh, Die mystische Gotteslehre des Dionysius Areopagita, Munich 1987; F. García Bazán, El Dios transcendente en Dionisio Areopagita: Epimeleia 2 (1993) 169-188; B.R. Suchla, Textprobleme in der Schrift Περὶ θείων ὀνομάτων des Ps. Dionysius Areopagita: Augustinianum 32 (1992) 387-422; Id., Verteidigung eines platonischen Denkmodells einer christlichen Welt, Göttingen 1995; Id., Wahrheit über jeder Wahrheit: ThQ 176 (1996) 205-217; H. Saffrey, Les débuts de la théologie comme science: RSPh 80 (1996) 201-220; G.K. Kaltenbrunner, Dionysios von Areopag, Zug 1996; S. Matthaios, Kurion onoma, in Ancient grammar: content and context, ed. by P. Swiggers - A. Wouters, Leuven 1996, 55-77; Y. de Andia (ed.), Denys l'Aréopagite et sa postérité en Orient et en Occident, Paris 1997; W. Beierwaltes, Der verborgene Gott, Trier 1997; P.L. Dickerson, The Sources of the Account of the Mission to Samaria in Acts 8, 5-25: NT 39 (1997) 210-234; J. Peláez, Significado de la expresión "hagiastheto to onoma sou" en el evangelio de Mateo (6, 9): CFC(G) 8 (1998) 43-52; M.A. Vannier, Aux sources de la voie négative: RSR 72 (1998) 403-419; J.P. Williams, The Apophatic Theology of Dionysius the Pseudo-Areopagite, 1-2: Downside Review 117 (1999) 157-172; 235-250; M. Fattal, *Vérité et fausseté de l'*onoma et du logos dans le Cratyle de Platon, in Ontologie et dialogue: mélanges en hommage à Pierre Aubenque avec sa collaboration à l'occasion de son 70e anniversaire, ed. N.-L. Cordero, Paris 2000, 13-31; J. Dietrich, Negative Theologie bei Pseudo-Dionysios Areopagita und Mose ben Maimon: Th&Ph 76 (2001) 161-184; J. Fischer, The Theology of Dissimilarity: JR 81 (2001) 529-548; A. Meis Wörmer, Die Verborgenheit Gottes im Höhenliedkommentar Gregors von Nyssa und ihre Rezeption durch Pseudo-Dionysios Areopagita: EThL 77 (2001) 73-107; M. Nasta, Les êtres de paroles, 2001; G. Gertoux, The Name of God Y.EH.OW.AH Which Is Pronounced as It Is Written, Lanham, MD 2002.

I. Ramelli

NAMES, CHRISTIAN. The first Christians, being of Jewish origin, had Semitic names (Simon, Zachariah, Judas, Barnabas, Thomas, Peter, John, Bartholomew, Elizabeth, Thaddeus etc.); quickly, however, pagans converted, keeping their names: the centurion *Cornelius (Acts 10:1-11); Saul, after the meeting with Sergius Paulus in Cyprus, always uses the Roman name *Paul (Acts 13:9); a companion of his is called Apollo (1 Cor 16:12); another Hermogenes (Rom 16:14); there is a Hermes (Rom 16:14), an Epaphroditus (Phil 4:18), a Phoebe (Rom 16:1). The newly baptized, being almost all adults, normally kept their previous names, whether Semitic, Greek, Latin, Punic, Syriac etc. For example, already in the 2nd c. (180) we find Punic and Roman names among the *Scillitan martyrs: Saturninus (a typical African name), Speratus, Cittinus, Narzalus etc. (Atti e passioni dei martiri, ed. A.A.R. Bastiaensen, Milan 1987, 100ff.). The pagan Maximus of Madauros criticizes the names of Christian martyrs of Punic origin: Mygdon, Sanae, Namphano, Lucita. Names of Punic origin were to disappear almost completely in the following centuries (N. Duval, 451). That of the African martyr Miggin, being very well known, became popular among N African Christians. The 86 signatories of the Council of *Carthage of 256 all have common names, except one Paul, also a pagan name, and a Peter (n. 72).

There is therefore no typical Christian nomenclature in the first centuries, because the newly baptized kept their names; and names were given to children acc. to the traditions of each people, with reference to their parents and forebears. For example, in the Roman tradition the daughter took the feminine version of the name of the father: a daughter of Tullius Cicero would be called Tullia. So also in the Jewish world, as we may deduce from the episode of *John the Baptist, in which those present observe: "None of your relatives has this name" (Lk 1:61). Moreover, the Christian community did not concern itself with imposing the practice of a particular type of name. Local traditions were followed. In fact, many names of Christians, and even of martyrs, had cognomina connected with the pagan divinities. As the author of the *Letter to Diognetus says (ch. 5), Christians were not distinguished in anything from the inhabitants of the empire other than in their way of life. In fact, many names of Christians referred back to pagan divinities (theophoric names), although perhaps the link, at least in the popular mind, was no longer perceived. While rejecting in a radical way every form of polytheism, the Christians did not concern themselves with using those names which had a strict religious connection. The fervent Leonides called his son Origenes ("son of Horus"); the brother of Ambrose was called Satyrus; in Roman *Africa the names Saturninus and Saturnina (from Saturnus) were common.

